could not be proved by parol evidence, plaintiff's counsel asked and the court granted them leave to introduce evidence of the labor done by plaintiffs on the ditch, on the condition that they should afterwards connect it with written evidence of the agreement. On this condition, and without any apparent restriction, plaintiff not only gave evidence of the labor done on the ditch, but of all that was orally said by both parties in connection with that labor, yet failed to introduce or to offer any evidence, parol or written, tending to prove the express agreement alleged in their complaint. The evidence fails to show the amount or the proportion of the work done by the plaintiffs, or by either of them, but does show that a considerable portion of the work in repairing the ditch was done by persons who are not parties to the action, and who never claimed any interest in the ditch, but who were occasionally permitted by defendants to use portions of the surplus water. Counsel for respondents contends that the labor done by them and the defendants in enlarging the ditch destroyed the identity of the original ditch as described in the complaint, and created a new ditch, in which, by virtue of their labor, plaintiffs are entitled to share as tenants in common with defendants in the proportion that their labor bears to the whole labor of construction. To say nothing of the impracticability of ascertaining on this theory what proportion of the alleged new ditch they are entitled to, the theory itself is inconsistent with the complaint. The allegation in the complaint that plaintiffs should become tenants in common with the defendants in the ditch and water-rights by express agreement with the defendants—"the then owners"—in consideration of plaintiffs' labor, is irreconcilably inconsistent with the theory that they became such tenants in common by merely assisting in the labor of enlarging the ditch. Their allegation is, in effect, that they acquired such title as they claim by purchase from the defendants, for which purchase their labor was the consideration. They now ignore the purchase theory, and claim title to an undivided portion of the ditch, by virtue of having created it by the same labor that is alleged to have been the consideration for their purchase. Other apparently valid objections might be made to this unpleaded theory; but, for the purposes of this appeal, it is enough that the theory is inconsistent with plaintiffs' complaint.

It is further contended for respondents "that defendants are estopped from denying that plaintiffs have an interest in said ditch and water;" and also that plaintiffs acquired title by adverse user of the water for a period of more than five years. Conceding that the facts necessary to sustain these points are averred in the complaint, (which is doubtful,) such facts are negatived by findings of the court which are fully justified by the evidence.

As the record discloses no ground upon which a new trial should have been granted, nor any reason for believing that a new trial can justly result in a judg-

WATKINS v. BRYANT et al. (No. 14,288.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1891.)

SETTING ASIDE DECREE—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS —PARTIES.

1. An action to set aside, on the ground of fraud, a decree annulling a deed of trust as fraudulent against the grantor's creditors, if not brought within three years (the statutory period) after rendition of the decree, is barred, and the complaint is demurrable, where plaintiff merely avers that he had no notice of the fraud until after rendition of the decree, without alleging that he discovered the fraud within three years before commencing the suit.

2. A decree annulling, on the ground of fraud, a deed of trust given to secure creditors not named therein, rendered on default of the trustee in an action in which he was a party, is not absolutely void as to creditors who were not made parties to the action, since they were represented therein by the trustee.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. SWINNERTON, Judge.

Action by C. G. Watkins against M. E. Bryant and others, on behalf of plaintiff and other creditors of said Bryant, to set aside a decree annulling a deed of trust, and to enforce the trust. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John B. Hall, for appellant. Baldwin & Campbell and Wilkes & Rutherford, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. A demurrer to the complaint in this action was sustained. The plaintiff declined to amend his complaint, and thereupon judgment was rendered in favor of defendants. This appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment presents the general question whether or not the demurrer should have been sustained. The complaint purports to be on behalf of the plaintiff and of such other creditors of Bryant as will come in and contribute to the expenses of the suit, and occupies 27 pages of the transcript; but the following is deemed a sufficient statement of its substance for all purposes of the appeal: On January 17, 1885, the defendant Bryant made two promissory notes to the defendant Tully, each for the sum of \$500, payable six months after date, with interest at the rate of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per month. On the same day Tully indorsed the notes to plaintiff in these words: "Without recourse on me, John Tully." The consideration for the notes was a loan from plaintiff to Bryant of \$1,000, which loan had been negotiated by Tully, and the notes were intended to secure payment of that loan. At the time of making these notes, "Bryant was indebted, and still is indebted in divers sums, to many persons besides this plaintiff," amounting to not less than \$35,000, upon promissory notes made by him to Tully, and indorsed by Tully to them. On October 1, 1885, for the purpose of securing the payment of the above-mentioned promissory notes, and like notes to be thereafter made, the whole not to exceed \$60,000, Bryant executed to John S. Davis a deed of trust of some 11 tracts of land, described by legal subdivisions, and 3 town lots, aggregating about 1,400 acres. John Tully was named as party of the third part to this deed of trust, and authorized to pay the taxes on the land, and to prosecute or defend suits considered necessary to protect the trust and the title to the land. In case of Bryant's default in making payment of any of the debts secured, the trustee, Davis, is authorized to sell so much of the trust property as necessary, and to apply the proceeds to the payment of such debts. None of the creditors intended to be secured, except Davis and Tully, are named in the trust-deed. Davis expressly accepted the trust. The execution of this instrument was acknowledged by Bryant on the day of its date, and on the 9th day of October, 1885, was duly recorded. On February 16, 1886, Bryant, in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Code, made an assignment of all his property, subject to the trust created by the above instrument, to the defendants Wilhoit, Langford, and Bemert, for the benefit of his creditors; and on the same day filed in the office of the county recorder an inventory of his estate, including all the land described in the above deed of trust, and wherein the defendants Davis and Tully are listed as creditors for large sums of money, and wherein it is stated that said lands were incumbered by certain mortgages other than the deed of trust, and also that one quarter-section of the land was exempt from execution, it being his homestead. On April 6, 1886, the assignees, Wilhoit, Langford, and Bemert, commenced an action against Davis, Tully, and Bryant to set aside and annul the deed of trust above set out, on the ground of fraud, and that it was never delivered to Davis by authority of Bryant, the acts constituting the fraud being stated in the complaint, and being sufficient to warrant the relief asked, as against Davis, Bryant, and Tully, the only defendants in that action; but neither the plaintiff in this action, nor any other creditor of Bryant, except Davis and Tully, were made parties to that action. The defendants were duly served with summons, but made default, and on May 27, 1886, judgment was rendered against them to the effect that the trust-deed of October 1, 1885, was fraudulent, and a cloud upon the title of the plaintiffs in that action, as assignees for the creditors of Bryant; that it be annulled and canceled; that Davis convey the lands to the assignees by good and sufficient deed, etc., within five days; and that Davis and Tully be perpetually enjoined from asserting any title to or claim upon the lands under or by virtue of the deed of trust.

After stating the above facts, the complaint herein proceeds to allege that the material averments of the complaint of the assignees against Davis, Tully, and Bryant, as to fraud and non-delivery of the deed of trust, were false and known to beso by Davis, Tully, and Bryant at the time they made default, and at the times their default was entered, and judgment taken against them; that the plaintiff herein, Watkins, "had no notice or knowledge either of said suit or the decree therein, until after the rendition of said decree;" and that divers other creditors of Bryant, designated in said deed of trust, had no notice or knowledge of said suit and decree before the rendition and entry of said decree. The complaint herein further states that Davis has not done any act or thing in or towards the execution of his trust, or the performance of his duty under the deed of trust, and "at all times since the date of said decree has refused to perform the said trust, and the duties connected therewith." That in the years 1886 and 1887 several portions of the land described in the deed of trust were sold under several decrees of court, to satisfy mortgages thereon prior to the deed of trust, and that such mortgages were satisfied from the proceeds of such sales. From the description of the land thus sold by legal subdivisions, it must amount to over 600 acres. That an additional one-quarter section of said land (the homestead quarter) was sold under a foreclosure decree on April 27, 1889, to satisfy a mortgage executed by Bryant to defendant Wilkes on February 17, 1886, to secure a note of that date for $9,033, but that the consideration for this note consisted solely of the sum of several smaller notes, made before the date of the deed of trust, and which were secured by the deed of trust. This quarter section was purchased by Wilkes at the foreclosure sale for the sum required to satisfy the foreclosure decree, viz., $12,125.58. Wilkes had notice of the deed of trust at and before the time he took the mortgage thus foreclosed. That, on one of the foreclosure sales above mentioned, the sheriff reported a surplus of $1,533.40, which was ordered by the court to be paid to the assignees without notice to Davis or to plaintiff. That the assignees sold the right of redemption to another tract which had been sold at a foreclosure sale for $9,000, which they now hold in their hands. That the assignees redeemed from the foreclosure sale the three town lots, and resold them at a profit of $1,000; and, further, that they have received and hold in their hands, of the income, rents, and profits derived from said lands since February 16, 1886, (date of assignment,) about $10,000. That Bryant has no property subject to the payment of his debts except the real estate described in the deed of trust, and plaintiff has no security except his lien upon that property or its proceeds by virtue of the deed of trust. That no part of his debt has been paid, and that the trust remains unexecuted, and will so continue unless enforced by decree of this court. It is also alleged in the complaint that on July 13, 1889, the plaintiff commenced an action against Bryant on the two promissory notes indorsed to him by Tully, as above stated, and obtained a personal judgment against Bryant for the sum of $2,342.60, including interest and costs. The prayer of the complaint is that it may be adjudged that the decree canceling and annulling the deed of trust "is in fraud of the rights of, and of no effect as against, this plaintiff; that the several tracts, pieces, or parcels of land in said deed described, * * * not heretofore sold for the satisfaction of the mortgages to which said deed of trust refers, together with the said surplus," viz., the sums alleged to be in the hands of the assignees, Wilhoit, Langford, and Bemert, amounting to about $21,000, be adjudged subject to said deed of trust; that the last above described lands be sold under the direction of the court, and the proceeds thereof, together with the money in the hands of the assignees, Wilhoit, Langford, and Bemert, "be applied to the payment in full, or the payment ratably, of this plaintiff's said demands, with those of all other creditors meant, mentioned, or intended to be secured by the said deed of trust, and who may come in and contribute to the expenses of this suit; and that the mortgage of February 17, 1886, to the defendant Wilkes, was subsequent and subordinate to the equitable lien of this plaintiff," and for such other relief, etc. To this complaint the defendants Wilhoit, Langford, and Bemert, the assignees, and Wilkes demurred, on the general ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and on the special grounds of non-joinder of parties plaintiff and defendant, misjoinder of causes of action, and that the causes of action appear to be barred by sections 318, 337, 338, and 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The other defendants, Bryant, Davis, and Tully, made default.

1. Conceding, without deciding, that there is not a misjoinder of causes of action, still the complaint shows that the judgment of May 27, 1886, canceling the deed of trust, ordering Davis, the trustee, to convey the trust property to the assignees, Wilhoit, Langford, and Bemert, and perpetually enjoining Davis and Tully from asserting any title or claim to the trust property, is an insuperable obstacle to any relief sought in this action so long as that judgment remains in force; and this is the theory of the complaint, which charges that that judgment was obtained by and through the fraudulent default of Davis and Tully, and, on the ground of this alleged fraud, seeks to annul it in this action. The prayer of the complaint is that it be adjudged that that judgment "is in fraud of, and of no effect against, this plaintiff." If this relief cannot be granted, it is plain that the deed of trust, canceled by that judgment, cannot be enforced in this action, either through the instrumentality of Davis, or any trustee appointed by the court. Therefore, if it appears that the cause of action to annul and set aside that judgment on the ground of fraud is barred by the statute of limitations, the plaintiff can have no cause of action upon the canceled deed of trust, and the demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained on that ground. This action was not commenced within three years after the rendition of the judgment annulling the deed of trust, and, consequently, not within three years after the acts constituting the fraud by which that judgment is alleged to have been obtained; yet there is no averment in the complaint that the fraud was first discovered within three years next before the commencement of this action, (People v. Blankenship, 52 Cal. 612,) the only averment in this respect being that the plaintiff "had no notice or knowledge either of said suit or the decree therein until after the rendition of said decree."

It is contended, however, for the appellant, that the decree canceling the deed of trust, etc., was absolutely void as to this plaintiff, as he was not a party to the suit in which that decree was rendered. The answer to this is that, although not named as a party to that action, he was represented therein by the trustee, Davis. Says Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on Remedies and Remedial Rights, (section 357:) "There is a broad distinction between the case of an action brought in opposition to the trust, to set aside the deed or other instrument by which it was created, and to procure it to be declared a nullity, and that of an action brought in furtherance of the trust, to enforce its provisions, to establish it as valid, or to procure it to be wound up and settled. In the first case the suit may be maintained without the presence of the beneficiaries, since the trustees represent them all, and defend them." This, as an exception to the general rule, applies to the case at bar, and seems to be well supported by the following and other authorities: Kerrison v. Stewart, 93 U. S. 155; Corcoran v. Canal Co., 94 U. S. 744; Rand v. Walker, 117 U. S. 344, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 769; Richter v. Jerome, 123 U. S. 246, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 106; Railroad Co. v. Dull, 124 U. S. 171, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 433; Rogers v. Rogers, 3 Paige, 378; Winslow v. Railroad Co., 4 Minn. 313, (Gil. 230); Paul v. Fulton, 25 Mo. 156; Bank v. Suydam, 6 How. Pr. 379; Mitchell v. Bank, 7 Minn. 252, (Gil. 192); Jonas, Mortg. 1399; Code Civil Proc. § 369; Chew v. Brumagen, 13 Wall. 497. Admitting that, in a case of this kind, the beneficiaries would have been proper parties, and also that, in case they were not made parties, it was the duty of the trustee to notify them of the pendency of the suit, yet it does not appear in this case that either the trustee, Davis, or the plaintiffs in the action to annul the trust-deed, knew, or had the means of ascertaining, who were the beneficiaries. The deed of trust did not name nor describe any one of them. Nor did it classify them by reference to any common attribute, except that the class consisted of all such persons as held negotiable notes made by Bryant to Tully, and indorsed by the latter, amounting to not more than $60,000, and which may have been made either before or after the execution of the deed of trust. There may have been 30, 60, or 120 holders of these notes, and many of the notes may have been negotiated after their indorsement by Tully. Suppose a holder of any one of these notes, made after the execution of the deed of trust, had been found, how could it have been ascertained whether his note was within or in excess of the $60,000 limit? Under these circumstances, the application of the exceptional rule permitting the trustee to represent the holders of these notes is peculiarly appropriate. Besides, it seems at least doubtful whether or not the deed of trust was void for uncertainty as to the beneficiaries.

2. It is claimed by appellant that the court erred in refusing to give judgment against the defaulting defendants, Bryant, Davis, and Tully; but, inasmuch as the complaint shows that the deed of trust upon which the action was brought had been canceled, the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief against Davis or Tully. No personal judgment against Bryant on his promissory notes is asked; besides, such a judgment would have been superfluous, as plaintiff had obtained a personal judgment against Bryant on those notes in July, 1889.

As the foregoing considerations dispose of the case finally, it is not necessary to consider the point as to laches and equitable estoppel. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

WIXON v. DEVINE. (No. 14,365.)

PLEADING—AMENDMENT OF ANSWER—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action to determine plaintiff's rights in a water-course, he claimed title by actual appropriation in 1883. Defendant in his answer asked no affirmative relief, but, to defeat plaintiff's claim, set up a prior appropriation by himself in 1877, and also an adverse user for more than six years before commencement of the action. No other denial of plaintiff's claim was made. Held, that evidence on defendant's behalf that, in 1865, one under whom he claimed his land by mesne conveyances appropriated the waters, was properly excluded, as not within the issues raised by the pleadings.

2. Where evidence gotten into the case without objection is entirely without the issues raised by the pleadings, and it appears that the court expressly denied the right to amend so as to bring it within the issues, no issue will, on the principle of estoppel, be taken to have been raised by the introduction of evidence.

3. In an action to determine plaintiff's rights in a water-course, he claimed by actual appropriation. Defendant, to defeat his claim, merely set up prior appropriation by himself in 1877. After the taking of evidence at the trial had almost concluded, an amendment of the answer was offered alleging an appropriation in 1865 by one from whom defendant claimed title to his land by mesne conveyances. Facts similar to those in the proposed amendment had been pleaded by the same attorneys as a defense eight years before, in another suit between some of the same parties, litigating some of the same rights. Defendant could not have been misled by believing the evidence admissible under his original answer, and the amendment was contradictory to an admission in his answer. Held, that the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to allow the amendment.

Department I. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; J. M. WALLING, Judge.

Action by J. S. Wixon against Thomas Devine to establish his rights in a certain water-course. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. L. Gear and F. R. Wehl, for appellant.
T. L. Ford and S. B. Davidson, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to determine the rights of the parties to the waters of Kentucky ravine and its east and west branches, located in Sierra county, Cal. The court adjudged the plaintiff to be entitled to 25 inches of the waters of said ravine under a 4-inch pressure. Defendant appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial, and for grounds of reversal insists (1) that certain evidence offered was improperly rejected; (2) the court erred in refusing to allow the defendant to amend his answer during the progress of the trial. Plaintiff claimed title to these waters by actual appropriation in 1883. Defendant claimed no affirmative relief in his answer, but, for the purpose of defeating plaintiff's right, set up a prior appropriation of these waters by himself in 1877; and he also relied upon an adverse user for a period of more than six years before the commencement of this action. During the progress of the trial, while the defendant was presenting his evidence to the court, he offered to prove "a prior actual appropriation and diversion of all the waters of Kentucky ravine in the year 1865 by James Galloway; that he was the original claimant and possessor of the land described in the answer as the 'Doyle Ranch,' and that it was then known as the 'Galloway Ranch;' that said appropriation and diversion was made at a point above plaintiff's dam and ditch; that said waters, by actual use and enjoyment, were made an appurtenance to said ranch, and passed with the ranch by mesne conveyances to defendant," etc. An objection was sustained to the admission of the foregoing testimony, upon the ground that it was not within the issues made by the answer. Appellant insists that he was entitled to make such proof under the general issue. If his answer had contained a specific denial of plaintiff's right to the waters of the ravine, we are not prepared to say but that, under the following authorities, he would have been entitled to make the proof sought by virtue of such denial. Marshall v. Shafter, 32 Cal. 192; Bruck v. Tucker, 42 Cal. 346; Daniels v. Henderson, 49 Cal. 247; Roberts v. Columbet, 63 Cal. 25; Hyde v. Mangan, 88 Cal. 325, 26 Pac. Rep. 180, and cases there cited. But the record upon this appeal does not present the question to us for consideration. There is no specific denial of any material allegation of the complaint. The answer raises no "general issue" within the meaning of the statute and authorities. In his answer, defendant denies plaintiff's right to these waters, "except as hereinafter expressly stated." Again, he admits plaintiff's right, "subject to the prior right of defendant," specially referring to his right under acts of appropriation in 1877. In short, the answer confesses plaintiff's right, but seeks to avoid it by asserting a particular prior right in defendant. Under this condition of the pleadings the evidence was properly rejected as not being within the issues made.

It appears that the witness Galloway, without objection, did testify generally to many of the facts encompassed in the proposed amendment to the answer, and appellant insists that such evidence was sufficient to defeat plaintiff's right of recovery, and that the court should have so found. It is unnecessary to enter into a detailed examination as to the sufficiency of this evidence in point of fact to defeat plaintiff's right of recovery. As we have already seen, such evidence was not only entirely without the issues as made by the pleadings, but the court expressly denied the right to amend so that this particular evidence might become germane by being brought within the issues as made by the amended pleading. Referring to this question in Ortega v. Cordero, 88 Cal. 227, 26 Pac. Rep. 80, the court said: "To justify this application of the principle of estoppel it should appear, from the record on appeal, among the other elements of an estoppel, that the issue was actually and intentionally tried by the introduction of pertinent evidence, and that the party against whom the estoppel is invoked consciously participated or acquiesced in such trial as if the issue had been made by the pleadings, and in such manner as may have induced the other party to believe that the issue had been properly made, or diverted his attention from the fact that it was not made by the pleadings." Applying the foregoing rule to the case at bar, it can hardly be contended that the evidence of Galloway and the acts and conduct of the parties created an issue as to the appropriation by Galloway of the waters of this ravine in 1865, and that the court was in error in not finding upon such issue.

It is insisted that the court erred in refusing to allow the proposed amendment to the answer. The amendment, in effect, was "that an actual appropriation and diversion of all the waters of Kentucky ravine was made by James Galloway, the original claimant and possessor of the tract of land owned by defendant, by means of a ditch constructed by said Galloway in 1865, at a point above where plaintiff's dam and ditch are now located, and the right to the waters of said ravine, by actual use and enjoyment, became appurtenant to said ranch for the irrigation thereof, and passed by conveyance to defendant herein." While the power of the court in granting amendments to pleadings should be freely and liberally exercised, in order that all the substantial merits of a cause may be reached and determined without unnecessary delay and in one suit, yet, when the court has exercised that power by granting or refusing an amendment to a pleading, such ruling is only subject to review by this court, when it is apparent that an abuse of discretion has occurred. From an examination of the record, it appears there are sufficient grounds to support the ruling of the court in the exercise of its discretion in denying this proposed amendment to the answer. We will not review all these grounds in extenso. It appears that the taking of eviidence at the trial had almost concluded at the time the proposed amendment was offered; that the same attorneys, in another suit between some of the same parties, in litigating some of the same rights here involved, eight years prior, pleaded as a defense in that suit facts very similar to those set out in the proposed amendment. Again, defendant could not have been misled by believing the evidence admissible under the allegations of his answer as it was framed; and also the proposed amendment was directly contradictory to an admission in the answer, to-wit: "That plaintiff had a right to twenty-five inches of the waters of Kentucky ravine, subject to defendant's right, by prior appropriation and diversion in 1877." As an additional ground to sustain the action of the lower court, we would say that while the amendment proposed shows that the location and diversion of the waters of the ravine occurred at a point above plaintiff's dam and ditch, yet the evidence offered to the court to support the amendment shows that, for the purposes for which the water could be claimed as appurtenant to defendant's ranch, it was taken from the ravine at a point below plaintiff's ditch and dam; and it must be conceded that the prior decisions of this case found in 67 Cal. 341, 7 Pac. Rep. 776, and 80 Cal. 385, 22 Pac. Rep. 224, when taken together, at least settle one principle of law as between these parties beyond doubt, and this is, that plaintiff has the first right to 25 inches of water at a point upon the ravine where his dam and ditch are located. If the defendant's evidence is too weak to support the pleading, it would be idle to allow the amendment. Several years ago, in writing an opinion in this case, (67 Cal. 345, 7 Pac. Rep. 776,) SEARLS, C., said: "There should be a limit to litigation." This cause has been dragging its slow length along the judicial highway for nearly a decade, and is now with us for the third time, and we think it in order to repeat the words of the learned commissioner, "There should be a limit to litigation;" and we believe, for the foregoing reasons given, the limit in this case has been reached. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

RUTLEDGE v. CRAWFORD. (No. 14,584.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 8, 1891.)

ELECTIONS AND VOTERS—LEGALITY OF BALLOTS—ELECTION CONTEST—PLEADING.

1. The fact that on the back of a ballot, otherwise regular, is a faint type impression of the face of a similar ticket, caused by there having been too much ink on the type, or that there is a small piece of red sealing wax, or a stain, as from a drop of oil, does not, in the absence of evidence of unlawful intent in causing the impression, make the ballot illegal, within the meaning of Pol. Code Cal. §§ 1206, 1207, which provide that a ballot must be rejected if it bears on the outside any impression, device, color, or thing "designed" to distinguish it from other legal ballots, or "intended" to designate or impart knowledge of the person who voted it.

2. A ballot read: "18. Judge of the Superior Court, R. 19. Judge of the Superior Court, O.

20. State Senator, 10th District, H." The name H. was erased, and opposite, or in line with it, was written the name of respondent, who was a candidate for judge of the superior court. Held, that it was error to count the ballot for respondent, as candidate for judge.

3. Where the printed name of one candidate on a ballot is erased with an indelible pencil or with red ink, and the name of another written opposite with the same kind of pencil or ink, the ballot should be counted for the latter, under Pol. Code Cal. § 1204, providing that when one name has been erased on a ballot, and another substituted therefor, in any other manner than by the use of "a lead-pencil or common writing ink," the name erased must be counted; it being the intention of the legislature merely to prohibit erasures and substitutions in any other style or form, or with any different effect, than would be produced by the use of a lead-pencil or common writing ink.

4. If no name is substituted for a name erased on a ballot, the erased name must be counted, under the provisions of Pol. Code Cal. § 1204; such requirement of the statute not being unconstitutional as requiring an educational qualification for the voter, nor as requiring him to disclose the secrecy of his ballot, nor for any other reason.

5. In an action by a candidate to establish his right to an office to which the opposing candidate has been illegally declared elected, the complaint is not fatally defective in not alleging that plaintiff possesses the qualifications for the office; but, if it alleges that he is an elector, it shows his right to contest defendant's right to the office, and may be amended so as to allege that plaintiff is qualified to hold it.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge.

Action by one Rutledge against one Crawford to contest defendant's right to an office. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. P. Ware, (T. J. Geary, of counsel,) for appellant. C. S. Farvuar and J. A. Barham, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The parties to this action were opposing candidates for the office of judge of the superior court of Sonoma county at the general election of 1890. The respondent, Crawford, received a certificate of election, and this is an action contesting his right thereto. As a result of the trial and recount in the superior court, it appearing that the defendant received one vote more than the plaintiff, the court, on motion of defendant, granted a nonsuit and dismissed the proceedings. The plaintiff appeals from this judgment, and claims that the court erred in counting certain ballots for the respondent, and in refusing to count others for the appellant.

1. Two ballots, regular on their face, and with the appellant's name printed thereon for judge of the superior court, were not counted by the court for the reason that there was on the back of each a faint type impression of a portion of the face of a similar ticket. The impression is known among printers as an "off-set," and, if there is too much ink upon the type used, is produced when one ticket is placed face down ward upon the back of another, which has preceded it from the press. In our opinion the court erred in its refusal to count these ballots for appellant. Section 1206 of the Political Code provides: "When a ballot found in any ballot-box bears upon the outside thereof any impression, device, color, or thing, or is folded in a manner, designed to distinguish such ballot from other legal ballots deposited therein, it must, with all its contents, be rejected." Prior to the adoption of the Code it was the usual practice to have the tickets of the different political parties of a different color or weight or size, so that an observer at the polls could see at a glance and detect which party ticket was deposited by the voter. It was to prevent this, and secure to the citizen absolute secrecy for his ballot, that the section above quoted, and others of the same Code, were enacted, prescribing for ballots uniformity of paper, color, and size; and, in order to justify the rejection of a ballot under this section, it must appear that such "impression, device, color, or thing," on the outside thereof, was intended to distinguish it from other legal ballots, (Wyman v. Lemon, 51 Cal. 273;) and the court is not authorized to find such design when it is just as reasonable to attribute the appearance of the ticket to accident as design. It is not doubted, as was argued here, that tickets may be marked as these were for the purpose of distinguishing them from other ballots, and to be furnished only to a certain class of voters. But in the absence of any proof tending to show this the presumption must be that such an impression was the result of accident, and not intended, and therefore within neither the letter nor spirit of this section, or section 1207 of the same Code, which provides that when a ballot bears upon it any impression, device, color, or thing intended to designate or impart knowledge of the person who voted it, it must be rejected.

2. What is said in the preceding paragraph will apply with equal force to the two ballots not counted for appellant, one of which had upon its back a very small piece of red sealing wax, and the other a small stain as if made by a drop of oil, or something of that nature. It is far more reasonable to suppose that the wax was accidentally placed upon the ticket by the officers of election in sealing the package in which it was returned than to believe that it was designedly placed there as a distinguishing mark before its deposit in the ballot-box; and, as to the other, the mark or discoloration is of that character that the most natural conclusion in relation to it is that it was due to some accidental cause, and was not intended to distinguish the ballot, or impart knowledge of the person who voted it.

3. The court erred in counting ballot marked "Exhibit 37" as a vote for the respondent. The ticket, so far as necessary to be set out, is as follows: "18. Judge of the Superior Court, Thomas Rutledge. 19. Judge of the Superior Court, J. W. Oates. 20. State Senator, Tenth District, Robert Howe,"—with the name Robert Howe erased, and that of the respondent written opposite, or in line with it. We do not see how this ticket can be read as a vote for respondent for the office of judge of the superior court. A ballot is to be construed as any other writing; and, while a resort to parol evidence of extrinsic circumstances may be had for the purpose of interpreting what would otherwise be doubtful, it cannot be shown, by such or any evidence, that the intention of the voter was anything different from what plainly appears upon the face of the ballot. People v. Seaman, 5 Denio, 409. And, when the ballot intelligently shows that a particular person is voted for to fill a particular office, it cannot be counted differently because the court may believe that the voter made a mistake in preparing his ticket. Voting for a person to fill an office for which he is not a candidate may be the result of mistake, or it may be merely the frivolous exercise of the right of suffrage; but, no matter whether such action be attributed to folly or mistake, the ballot is the only expression of the voter's will, and it must be counted according to its legal effect. The intention of the voter as it appears upon the face of this ballot was to vote for respondent for state senator, and not for judge of the superior court, and it should be so counted.

4. Upon certain ballots the printed name of the respondent was erased with an indelible pencil, and the name of the appellant written opposite thereto with the same kind of pencil. The court refused to count the same for appellant, but did count such ballots as votes for respondent. The respondent insists that the rulings of the court in relation to the counting of these ballots are justified by section 1204 of the Political Code. That section declares: "When upon a ballot found in any ballot-box a name has been erased, and another substituted therefor, in any other manner than by the use of a lead-pencil or common writing ink, the substituted name must be rejected, and the name erased, if it can be ascertained from an inspection of the ballot, must be counted." There was evidence introduced tending to show that indelible pencils are not in fact lead-pencils, nor commonly known as such by merchants selling them. The question is thus presented, whether a voter must follow the very letter of this section of the Code in preparing his ticket, or have his vote for a particular candidate rejected. We think it very clear that such is not the purpose or the meaning of that section. The Code commissioners, in their note to this section, say: "This section is intended to prevent the use of nitrate of silver, or any other chemical substance which may be written over a name and not be distinguishable until time brings out the impression; also, to prevent the use of pasters, the use of which is subject to two objections: First, their liability to come off; second, their liability to be fraudulently taken off." This object of the law—and it is apparent that the legislature could have had no other in view—is attained if the erasure and substitution are made in such a manner as to present at the time and retain the same general appearance as if made by a lead-pencil or common writing ink. This section, in declaring that erasures and change of names shall not be made "in any other manner than by the use of a lead-pencil or common writing ink," really means that the erasure and substitution shall not be made in any other style or form, or with any different effect than would be produced by the use of a lead-pencil or common writing ink. The law looks only to matters of substance, and does not waste its energy in pursuit of shadows; and, if the appearance of having been made with a lead-pencil is produced by the use of an indelible pencil, there is a substantial compliance with the statute, although such a pencil may not, strictly speaking, be known as a lead-pencil. Any other construction would sacrifice the spirit and reason of the law to the mere letter; and yet it is one of the great maxims of interpretation to keep always in view the general scope, object, and purpose of the law, rather than its mere letter. "He who considers merely the letter of an instrument goes but skin deep into its meaning." Broom, Leg. Max. 611. "A rigid and literal meaning would, in many cases, defeat the very object of the statute, and would exemplify the maxim that 'the letter killeth, while the spirit keepeth alive.' Every statute ought to be expounded, not according to the letter, but according to the meaning. * * * And the intention is to govern, although such construction may not in all respects agree with the letter of the statute." Tracy v. Railroad Co., 38 N. Y. 437.

5. The court erred in counting ballot No. 8 as a vote for the respondent. Upon this ticket the printed name of respondent was erased with red ink, and that of J. W. Oates written in place of it, also in red ink. The respondent contends that red ink is not common ink, within the meaning of the statute. We cannot say that it is not such ink, and it is clear its use is not within the mischief which it is the object of the law to prevent.

6. Upon several ballots the name of appellant was erased, and no name substituted therefor, and the words "No vote" were not written after the name erased. These were counted as votes for appellant. The court was correct in this ruling. The statute, in order to guard against fraudulent erasures, has provided this as the only way in which the voter can manifest his intention to erase a name, when he does not substitute another, and under such circumstances the erasure is not complete unless followed by these words. There is no valid constitutional objection to this requirement. It does not prescribe any educational qualification for the voter, nor require him to disclose the secrecy of his ballot, as contended.

7. The statement or complaint filed herein by appellant does not allege that he possesses the qualifications required by the constitution of this state to make him eligible to the office of judge of the superior court, and it is claimed by respondent that the statement is therefore fatally defective, and for that reason the judgment dismissing the proceeding should be affirmed. It is true that in order to entitle appellant to the full relief asked for, to-wit, a judgment that he was elected instead of respondent, the statement should have alleged facts showing that he was eligible. But the statement is not fatally defective, if it states a case for any relief. Perri v. Beaumont, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 534, pt. 10. And we think that it does. It is alleged that the appellant is an elector of the county of Sonoma; and, such being the case, he was authorized to commence this proceeding, and upon proof of facts alleged in his statement was entitled to a judgment annulling the election of defendant. As the case must be remanded for a new trial, the court below should, upon application, permit the appellant to amend his statement so as to allege the necessary facts showing his eligibility to be chosen to the office, the election to which is in controversy here. Perri v. Beaumont, supra. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1891.)

FORGERY—ORDER OF SCHOOL TRUSTEES—INDICTMENT—EVIDENCE—COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING.

1. Pen. Code Cal. § 470, declaring guilty of forgery "every person who, with intent to defraud another, falsely makes, alters, forges, or counterfeits any * * * writing obligatory, * * * bond, * * * check, draft, bill of exchange, contract, promissory note, due-bill for the payment of money, * * * county order or warrant, or request for the payment of money," is sufficiently broad in its terms to include the offense of forging an order of the trustees of a school-district upon the county superintendent of schools for a requisition upon the auditor for a county warrant.

2. Pol. Code Cal. § 1543, subd. 3, relating to the duties of the county superintendent of schools, provides that "no requisition shall be drawn up on the order of the board of trustees against the county fund of any district, except for teachers' salaries, unless such order is accompanied by an itemized bill." Held that, in a prosecution for the forgery of such an order, it was unnecessary to allege or prove the accompaniment of an itemized bill. People v. Todd, 77 Cal. 464, 19 Pac. Rep. 883, followed. People v. Tomlinson, 35 Cal. 503, distinguished.

3. The order being valid upon its face, and subscribed with the names of B. and C., "school trustees of Pleasant Valley district," it was unnecessary to allege the existence of the district, or the fact that the persons named were trustees of that district.

4. In a prosecution for forging a money order other instruments of the same general character, proven in defendant's handwriting, are admissible before the jury for the purpose of comparison, and also, it would seem, for the purpose of showing his guilty knowledge in passing the said order.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge. Hinds & Merriam, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and Geo. E. Church, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction for the crime of forgery, and also from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The defendant was the deputy county superintendent of schools of Fresno county, and the information charged him with forging, uttering, and passing with intent to defraud the First National Bank of Fresno a certain writing of the following tenor, to-wit: "Order upon the county superintendent of public schools No. 3, Oct. 23, 1889. The county superintendent of public schools of Fresno county will draw a requisition on the county auditor against the county school fund in favor of B. N. Colwell, or order, to the amount of one hundred and twenty dollars, for material and work from ——— to ———, during the present school year, in the Pleasant Valley school-district; monthly salary of teacher, $——. T. T. BARNES, J. W. Cox, School Trustees of Pleasant Valley District. $120." The defendant filed a demurrer to the information upon various grounds, which demurrer was overruled. He also moved an arrest of judgment for the same reasons, which motion was denied.

Section 470 of the Penal Code¹ is very broad in its terms, and, we think, sufficiently broad to include the offense of forging an order of the trustees of a school-district upon the county superintendent of schools for a requisition upon the auditor for a county warrant.

Appellant contends that the order is illegal upon its face, for the reason that it does not appear by the information that it was accompanied by a bill of items; that such an order is worthless paper, save for the purpose of forming a foundation upon which to issue a requisition to the auditor for a county warrant; and that no requisition could issue in this case, because the order was not accompanied by a bill of items. Section 1543, subd. 3, of the Political Code, in stating the duties of the county superintendent of schools, provides, among other things: "No requisition shall be drawn unless the money is in the fund to pay it; and no requisition shall be drawn upon the order of the board of trustees against the county fund of any district, except for teachers' salaries, unless such order is accompanied by an itemized bill showing the separate items, and the price of each, in payment for which the order is drawn," etc. Appellant's contention cannot be supported. The case at bar, in this regard, bears a striking likeness to the Hawkeswood Case, East, P.C. 955. Hawkeswood was indicted for forgery of a bill of exchange, and objection was taken that, not being stamped, it was no bill of exchange, and that this was an objection apparent upon the face of it, and no person could be deceived or defrauded thereby, unless he took it without looking at it, which would be gross negligence. The court held that, as the stamp act was merely a revenue law, and did not purport in any way to alter the crime of forgery, and as the false instrument had the semblance of a bill of exchange, and was negotiated by the person as such, the conviction was proper. The judgment being respited, all the judges were of opinion that "the prisoner was properly convicted; for the stamp act, in saying that a bill without a stamp shall not be pleaded or given in evidence, or available in law or equity, means only that it shall not be made use of to recover the debt; and, besides, the holder might get it stamped after it was made." In Com. v. Costello, 120 Mass. 367, where the defendant was charged with forging a bond to be used for the purpose of dissolving an attachment, the court held that an instrument falsely made with intent to defraud is a forgery, although, if it had been genuine, other steps must have been taken before the instrument would have been perfected, and those steps were not taken. It was contended that the bond was worthless upon its face, as it was not approved, and until approved could not serve to dissolve the attachment. The court said: "It is true that the false making of an instrument merely frivolous, or one which upon its face is clearly void, is not forgery, because from its character it could not have operated to defraud, or been intended for that purpose; but if the instrument is one made with intent to defraud, although before it can have effect other steps must be taken or other proceedings had upon the basis of it, then the false making is a forgery, notwithstanding such steps may never have been taken or proceedings had." In Ex parte Finley, 66 Cal. 264, 5 Pac. Rep. 222, the defendant was convicted of forging a decree of divorce; and it was held that the information was sufficient without averring a marriage of the parties to the forged decree, as "on its face the writing shows that it may have been used to consummate a fraud." In People v. Todd, 77 Cal. 464, 19 Pac. Rep. 883, where the defendant was charged with forging a will, upon demurrer it was held not necessary to state in the indictment that the testator had property that might have been affected by the will. Appellant's views are not supported by the case of People v. Tomlinson, 35 Cal. 503. The instrument alleged in that case to have been forged was a nudum pactum, and so appeared by its face; and, after citing many authorities, the court said: "These cases establish the doctrine that, to constitute forgery, the forged instrument must be one which, if genuine, may injure another." We think the present cause comes clearly within the foregoing rule. The order is a valid order upon its face. It fulfills every requirement of the law; and, if genuine, would have a distinct, well-defined value. A bill of items is no part of the order, and is only required to accompany the order when a requisition is demanded from the county superintendent. At that time, and only at that time, has the bill of items any value. The county superintendent of schools is prohibited from drawing the requisition until there is money in the fund of the school district. The inhibition in this regard is equally as strict as in drawing a requisition without the bill of items; yet, could it be contended that the order of the board of trustees could not be forged because there was no money in the fund? This order is certainly as valid, for the purposes of a forgery, as a bill of exchange without a stamp, or a bond without the approval of the court. If genuine, it has a value; for, if issued by the board of trustees to the proper party without an accompanying bill of items, no reason is apparent why legal proceedings could not be taken by the holder of the order to compel the furnishing of a proper bill by such board in case of a refusal. We conclude that the information was sufficient, the instrument being a valid instrument upon its face, and that it was neither necessary to allege nor prove that a bill of items accompanied the order.

The instrument being valid upon its face, it was not necessary to allege the existence of "Pleasant Valley school-district," or the fact that T. T. Barnes and J. W. Cox were trustees of such district. In Ex parte Finley, supra, the court declared that "the rule does not require that the indictment or information shall contain an express allegation of the existence of every fact, the existence of which is assumed in the forged instrument. It is enough if the writing is one which, if genuine, might apparently be of legal efficacy."

Appellant complains of the conduct of the prosecution in introducing before the jury other orders of the same general character as the one set out in the information herein. Having proven these orders to be in the handwriting of defendant, there was no valid objection to their admissibility as evidence to be considered by the jury for the purpose of determining by comparison whether the defendant was the forger of the order recited in the information. While those orders may have, unfortunately to the defendant, demonstrated his ample capabilities in the line of the creation of spurious paper, still that fact afforded no legal objection to their admissibility as evidence of his handwriting; and it was upon this ground alone, as stated by the district attorney at the time, that they were offered and received in evidence. Aside from the foregoing reasons, it would seem the evidence of the forgery of other orders of the same character, and at about the same time, by appellant, in the line of a systematic course of conduct, would be admissible for the purpose of showing the guilty knowledge of appellant when he passed the forged order relied upon in this case. People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 515; People v. Gray, 66 Cal. 276, 5 Pac. Rep. 240; 2 Russ. Crimes, p. 404. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

APPEAL—NOT TAKEN IN TIME—ESTOPPEL.

1. The running of the 10 days within which an appeal must be taken under Act Cal. March 16, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 213, § 6,) in a proceeding to determine the validity of the organization of an irrigation district, and orders for the issuance of bonds, is not affected by the fact that appellants had no notice of the entry of the judgment, since the statute does not require such notice.

2. A stipulation by respondents on appeal that the transcript is correct, and that the appeal has been duly perfected, means nothing more than that the papers in the transcript are correct copies of the record, and that a sufficient undertaking was properly filed by appellants, and does not estop them to ask dismissal of the appeal if it was not taken in time.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKINLEY, Judge.

Proceeding by the Palmdale Irrigation District and others against one Rathke and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Appeal dismissed.

R. H. F. Variel and Spencer G. Millard, for appellants. Louis Luckel, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss appeal. This is a proceeding under the act of March 16, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 212,) to determine the validity of the organization of an irrigation district, and certain orders for the issuance of bonds, etc. Judgment in favor of the defendants was entered August 8, 1891, and notice of appeal therefrom was filed and served August 21, following. But the statute (section 6, p. 213) requires that the appeal in this class of cases shall be taken within 10 days after entry of judgment, and therefore this appeal was not taken in time. Appellants admit that it appears from the record that the appeal was not taken within 10 days after the entry of judgment, but they show by affidavit that they had no notice of such entry until a day or two before the appeal was taken. The statute, however, does not require notice of the entry of judgment in order to set the time for appeal running.

Appellants also claim that respondents are estopped by their stipulation to the correctness of the transcript, and that the appeal has been duly perfected. But we understand this stipulation to mean nothing more than that the papers in the transcript are correct copies of the record, and that a sufficient undertaking was properly filed within five days after notice of appeal. In that sense it does not conflict with the proof afforded by the record that the appeal was not taken in time to confer jurisdiction upon this court to review the judgment of the superior court. Appeal dismissed.

EJECTMENT—PLEADING—TITLE—ENTRY OF MINERAL LAND.

1. In ejectment, a portion of defendant's answer, alleging that plaintiffs' claim of title arises from a pretended entry of the land in the United States land-office as a placer mining claim, and a certificate of purchase based thereon, which they induced the local land-office to issue to them by means of false affidavits and testimony, and that defendant had filed a protest against the allowance of the entry in the general land-office, is properly stricken out, since it does not show that any question as to the validity of plaintiffs' entry and purchase was then pending and undecided in the land-office.

2. The fact that the secretary of the interior directed a hearing and determination of defendant's protest against plaintiffs' entry nine months after the trial of the ejectment action does not render the striking out of the above portion of the answer erroneous, since the action of the secretary of the interior could not have been anticipated by the court.

3. Where plaintiffs in ejectment claim title under an entry and purchase of the land from the federal government, defendant cannot set up title in himself by adverse possession before plaintiffs' entry, since the statute of limitations does not run against the federal government.

4. Where defendant in ejectment for mineral land alleges, and introduces evidence to prove, adverse possession by himself at the time of its location by plaintiffs, who claimed under a certificate of purchase from the federal government pursuant to such location, a failure by the court to find as to such adverse possession is reversible error, since Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1925, which renders a certificate of purchase or location of land, issued by the federal government, prima facie evidence of title in the holder, also provides that such evidence may be overcome by proof that at the time of the location the land was in the adverse possession of the adverse party.

In bank.

BEATTY, C. J. Justice GAROUTTE is, for the purpose of a decision herein, assigned to department 2.

VANCLIEF, C. The action is ejectment to recover possession of 50 acres of placer mineral land, described by legal subdivisions of section 22, township 2, range 14 N., M. D. M., and called "Crystal Spring Gravel Placer Mine," situate in the county of Tuolumne. The complaint is in the most general form, alleging, in substance, that plaintiffs own the demanded premises, and are entitled to the possession thereof, and that defendant is wrongfully in possession, and wrongfully withholds the possession from the plaintiffs. The answer of the defendant specially denies each allegation of the complaint, except that he withholds the possession, and affirmatively alleges that defendant is entitled to the possession by right and title derived from his grantors, who, in April, 1873, had entered and paid for the land in the United States land-office, and received a certificate of purchase therefor. Further answering, defendant alleged that for more than 7 years last past he had been in the open, continuous, notorious, exclusive, peaceable, and adverse possession of the demanded premises as against all persons except one Wiggins, who was a tenant in common with him, and especially as against the plaintiffs; and further alleges that he and his grantors and tenants in common have been in like adverse possession for more than 15 years last past. In the seventh division of his answer the defendant alleges as a further defense, among other things, substantially that the only right or title under which plaintiffs claim arises from "a pretended entry of said land at the United States land-office" as a placer mining claim, which entry was founded upon fraudulent proceedings, and false testimony and affidavits as to having posted on the claims the plat and notice for the period of 60 days, and as to having done $500 worth of work, as required by law. That, when said attempted locations were made, all of said land was, and long prior thereto had been, and now is, in the adverse, open, notorious, continuous, exclusive, and peaceable possession of said defendant; and that said plaintiffs and applicants well knew such to be the case. That the register and receiver of the land-office were deceived and imposed upon by the aforesaid false affidavits and testimony, and were thereby induced to issue to plaintiffs the certificate of purchase under which they claim the land. That defendant, by his attorney, has filed in the general land-office at Washington a protest against the allowance of said entry by plaintiffs, in which is set forth all the facts showing the invalidity of the application and entry by plaintiffs, and he verily believes a hearing will be granted in the matter, and that said entry will be canceled. On motion of plaintiffs, the seventh division of the answer, except the above italicized quotation therefrom, was stricken out by the court. The court found the facts as follows: "(1) That on January 1, 1889, the plaintiffs were, and have ever since continued to be, the owners of and entitled to the possession of all that certain placer mining claim, described as follows, to-wit, [here follows the description:] (2) that on January 1, 1889, the defendant was, and has ever since continued to be, in possession of a portion of said mining claim, against the will and without the consent of plaintiffs, and has refused, and continues to refuse, to yield possession thereof to plaintiffs; (3) that defendant has no title to said mining claim or any portion thereof, either by adverse possession or otherwise, and has no right to the possession thereof, nor to the possession of any portion thereof." Upon these findings judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for possession of the land, and costs; from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

1. It is contended for appellant that the court erred in striking out part of the seventh division of defendant's answer. Perhaps this point would be good if the seventh division of the answer had stated facts showing that the question as to the validity of the entry in the land-office, under which the plaintiffs claim, was then pending and undecided; as in such case a very serious question at least would have been raised as to whether the certificate of purchase issued to plaintiffs should have been considered prima facie evidence of title under section 1925 of the Code of Civil Procedure.¹ Campbell v. Buckman, 49 Cal. 362. But as the answer does not state the pendency of any question in the land-office as to the validity of plaintiffs' certificate of purchase, admitted to have been issued to them, nor facts from which the pendency of such question must necessarily be inferred, I think the court did not err in striking out that portion of it which was stricken out.

Counsel refer to a decision of the secretary of the interior, rendered nine months after the trial of this cause, directing a hearing and determination of the matter of defendant's protest against the entry under which plaintiffs claim, and suspending that entry pending the investigation, and also directing, in a certain contingency, a readjudication of the matter of the cancellation of the entry under which defendant claims, and a restatement of it. 12 Dec. Dep. Int. 125. But nothing of this could have been anticipated by the court below.

2. It is claimed that the third finding is not justified by the evidence; but as the statute of limitation did not run against the government, and less than two years intervened between the date of plaintiffs' entry and the commencement of this action, the finding that defendant acquired "no title by adverse possession," whether a fact or a conclusion of law, is correct. For the mere purpose of proving title by prescription, defendant's alleged adverse possession before plaintiffs entered and paid for the land counted for nothing.

3. It is further claimed that the decision is against law, for the reason that the court did not find upon all the material issues of fact; and I think this point is well taken. There was no other evidence of plaintiffs' title or right of possession than their certificate of purchase, dated May 23, 1888, the effect of which, as evidence in this action, might have been overcome "by proof that, at the time of the location" of the mining claim upon which the certificate issued, the land was in the adverse possession of the defendant. Code Civil Proc. § 1925; Witcher v. Conklin, 84 Cal. 500, 24 Pac. Rep. 302, and cases there cited. This, however, goes on the assumption that section 1925 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies to certificates of purchase of mineral land, as I think it does, and there is no controversy here on this point. But if that section does not apply to mineral lands, then there is no evidence to sustain the first finding, since it is by virtue of that section alone that certificates of sale are made "primary evidence" of ownership, (Haven v. Haws, 63 Cal. 452;) and the result would be that appellant's point that the first finding is not justified by the evidence should be sustained. The answer, as above shown, raises the issue as to defendant's adverse possession at the time of the location of the mining claim upon which plaintiffs' certificate of purchase was issued, and thence until the commencement of this action, and there was evidence upon that issue strongly tending to prove such adverse possession; yet there is no finding upon that issue. The third finding, that defendant "has no title by adverse possession," being perfectly consistent with the adverse possession alleged, does not touch the issue as to the existence of such adverse possession. The adverse possession may have been such as contemplated by section 1925 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and quite sufficient to overcome the evidence afforded by plaintiffs' certificate of purchase, and yet insufficient to prove title by prescription, for reasons above indicated. For the failure to find upon this issue as to adverse possession, I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

WE CONCUR: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial granted.

COX et al. v. HAYES.²

DEED—DESCRIPTION—WHAT PROPERTY PASSES.

A land-owner, having sold 22.29 acres of the south-easterly portion of a certain quarter section, conveyed to another person "the east one hundred acres [of the quarter section,] commencing on the west bank of the F. river, and running back to the westward far enough so as to contain one hundred acres, and so as to comprise the east one hundred acres [of the quarter section,] excepting therefrom a small piece of land" previously sold. Held, that the deed conveyed 77.71 acres. McKee, J., dissenting.

¹This section provides: "A certificate of purchase or of location of any lands in this state, issued or made in pursuance of any law of the United States or of this state, is primary evidence that the holder or assignee of such certificate is the owner of the land described therein; but this evidence may be overcome by proof that at the time of the location, or time of filing a pre-emption claim on which the certificate may have been issued, the land was in the adverse possession of the adverse party, or those under whom he claims, or that the adverse party is holding the land for mining purposes."

Action of ejectment by Thomas Cox and others against John Hayes. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

I. S. Belcher, for appellant. Reardan & Freer, for respondents.

Ross, J. F. R. and A. O. Larkin, being the owners of a certain quarter section of land, conveyed to one Campbell a small portion of it taken from the south-easterly part of the quarter section, and containing 22.29 acres. Afterwards the Larkins conveyed to one Hudson, and Hudson to the plaintiffs, "the east one hundred acres [of the quarter section,] commencing on the west bank of the Feather river, and running back to the westward far enough so as to contain one hundred acres, and so as to comprise the east one hundred acres [of the quarter section,] excepting therefrom a small piece of land sold by F. R. and A. O. Larkin to A. W. Campbell." If by this deed 100 acres of the quarter section were conveyed, the judgment should be affirmed. If, on the other hand, from the 100 acres mentioned in it is to be deducted the tract previously conveyed to Campbell, the judgment must be reversed. The language of the deed is awkward, but we think its true construction is that it conveys the east 100 acres, etc., excepting therefrom the 22.29 acres previously conveyed to Campbell. In other words, that the deed in question conveyed 77.71 acres only. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

INSOLVENCY—JURISDICTION—MEETING OF CREDITORS.

Where, on petition of creditors, the court orders a person to show cause why he should not be adjudged insolvent, and the person appears with attorney, the court has jurisdiction to adjudge him insolvent, without waiting for a meeting of creditors.

Department 2. Appeal from district court, Sacramento county.

Action by E. Lyon and another against C. C. Crosby, sheriff, and another, upon the sheriff's official bond. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Grove L. Johnson and D. E. Alexander, for appellants. Hale & Craig and J. M. Fulweiler, for respondents.

MYRICK, J. Upon receiving the petition of three creditors of Bryant, the debtor, the court made an order that Bryant show cause why he should not be adjudged an insolvent debtor, and a surrender of his estate be made for the benefit of his creditors. On the return-day of the order Bryant appeared in person and with counsel, and, after hearing statements and admissions made by him and his counsel, the court adjudged him an insolvent debtor, and ordered that all proceedings against him and his property be stayed. The court also appointed a receiver of his property, and ordered notice to be given to creditors by publication. At this point in the history of the case, the sheriff, Crosby, who had previously attached goods of Bryant for a debt due the plaintiffs, and had advertised a sale under execution, turned the property over to the receiver. This action is brought to recover of the sheriff and his bondsmen the value of the property so turned over. We are of opinion that the court had jurisdiction to adjudge Bryant an insolvent in an involuntary proceeding, without waiting for the meeting of creditors. We think the evidence sustains the findings of the court as to the fraudulent procurement of the attachment and obtaining the judgment, as against the insolvent law. We see no error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

BOSWORTH v. WEBSTER, Tax Collector.²

TAXATION—ASSESSMENT ROLL—MANDAMUS—PLEADING.

1. The words, "To all owners and claimants, known and unknown, in A. township," in the heading of an assessment roll, are an idle recital, and do not vitiate the assessment.

2. Where, in the tabular part of the assessment roll, under the heading "Tax-Payer's Name," appear the words, "Place, Wilson, Newman, and others," the assessment is invalid.

3. A writ of mandate will not issue to compel a tax collector to issue a certificate and deed to a purchaser at a tax-sale, where the petition fails to aver that the property was assessed, that any taxes were levied, or that the taxes were unpaid.

Department 1.

Application for writ of mandamus by William Bosworth against James A. Webster, tax collector. Denied.

E. A. & G. E. Lawrence, for petitioner.

MYRICK, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate that the respondent issue to petitioner a certificate and deed of certain premises alleged to have been purchased by him at a sale for unpaid taxes.

1. As to the taxes for 1870-71. The heading of the assessment roll reads: "Assessment of property for the fiscal year ending April 1, 1871. To all owners and claimants, known and unknown, in Alameda township." In San Francisco v. Phelan, 61 Cal. 619, we held that this recital in the heading was an idle recital, which did not vitiate the assessment. In the tabular part of the assessment roll, under the heading "Tax-Payer's Name," are the words, "Place, Wilson, Newman, and others." This places the assessment within Hearst v. Eggle- stone, 55 Cal. 365, and Brady v. Dowden, 59 Cal. 51. A certificate and deed, based on such an assessment, (or, rather, alleged assessment,) would convey no title, and the issuance thereof would be vain; therefore the application of the petitioner is denied as to the certificate and deed based on the alleged assessment for 1870-71.

2. As to the petition, so far as it relates to taxes for the year 1877-78, there is no averment that the property referred to was assessed for taxes, nor that any taxes were levied, or that taxes were unpaid. Application denied.

NEW TRIAL—AMENDMENT OF STATEMENT ON MOTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

1. The fact the trial court allowed a party to amend his statement on motion for a new trial is not error where it does not appear that the other party was injured thereby.

2. An order granting a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support the finding will not be reversed where no error appears from the record, and the evidence is conflicting.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Butte county.

Action by F. F. Low and another against Ellen McCallan and another. Verdict for plaintiffs. New trial granted. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Reardan & Freer, for appellants. Gray & Sexton and Chas. F. Lott, for respondents.

MYRICK, J. 1. When the defendants' motion for a new trial came on for hearing in the court below, the court permitted the defendants (respondents here) to amend their statement by adding and inserting the words "or predecessors" after the word "grantors," in specification 1. We do not see that any injury resulted to the plaintiffs.

2. It was material whether the land between the ditch of plaintiffs and the building of the defendant McCallan had ever been located as a portion of a mining claim, and, if so located, whether an abandonment had occurred. The court granted the new trial on the sole ground that the evidence did not establish the fact that the premises had, prior to the year 1868, been located and appropriated as a mining claim; or, if so located and appropriated, that plaintiffs had succeeded to the rights of the locators. We do not find, from an examination of the evidence, that the court committed an error in so holding. As to abandonment in fact, whether properly located or not, the evidence, in the most favorable aspect for plaintiffs, is conflicting. The order is affirmed.

TRUSTS—ACCOUNTING BY TRUSTEES—INTEREST.

1. Where a trustee held certain moneys on condition that he would pay interest thereon at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month after demand, and, in an action for an accounting, no demand was found, it was error to compute interest at that rate.

2. In an action for an accounting, the trustee should not be charged with the principal or interest of sums received by him after the filing of the complaint, where no amended or supplemental complaint was filed.

3. It was error to charge the trustee with sums paid to discharge a debt which, unless connected with the trust, was barred by limitations, where no such connection appears.

Department 2. Appeal from district court, twelfth judicial district.

Action for an accounting by C. C. Butler against F. B. Austin. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

L. Quint and Wilson & Wilson, for appellant. E. Kirkpatrick and John P. Hoge, for respondent.

MYRICK, J. The plaintiff alleged in his complaint that defendant was indebted to him as a balance for moneys paid out and expended in the sum of $2,434.32, and asked that an accounting be had. This complaint was filed October 7, 1875. On the 19th of October, 1877, the defendant filed his answer, which set up several matters by way of counter-claim, and alleged that plaintiff was indebted to defendant in large sums of money, for principal and interest. This pleading seems to have been regarded by the parties as a cross-complaint, and was demurred to by the plaintiff. The demurrer was overruled. By stipulation, the case was referred to a referee, with instructions to take the testimony and report the same, together with the findings of fact. On the 27th of October, 1879, the referee made his report, in which he stated the aggregate amount held in trust by plaintiff for defendant to be $22,960.57, and the aggregate amount paid by plaintiff for account of defendant $252.71. Judgment was thereupon rendered for defendant and against plaintiff for $22,707.76.

1. The instrument in writing executed by plaintiff to defendant, by the terms of which he was to account for and pay to defendant the moneys therein specified, provided for the payment of interest at the rate of 1½ per cent. per month after demand. No demand was found; therefore it was error to compute interest at that rate.

2. The cross-complaint was filed October 19, 1877. The report of the referee was filed October 27, 1879. The referee heard evidence of and charged the plaintiff with amounts received between those dates. This was error, there being no amended or supplemental cross-complaint. The plaintiff was called upon to meet only the transactions occurring prior to October 19, 1877.

² This case, filed July 3, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

3. The referee allowed to the defendant computations of interest on amounts received by plaintiff after the filing of the cross-complaint. This also was error.

4. It does not appear from the findings that either of the sums paid to Lloyd Baldwin and in satisfaction of the judgment in Vassault v. Austin was in any connected with the relations of trust existing between the parties or the accounts thereof. If not so related, they would be barred by the statute of limitations.

5. The referee charged the plaintiff with $598 (and interest thereon) received by him in 1879 from the San Francisco & Point Lobos Road Company. There was no pleading to justify this.

6. The referee allowed the defendant and charged the plaintiff with rents received after the trial.

For these reasons the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

FORCIBLE ENTRY—WHEN LIES—TRESPASS.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1159, provides that "every person is guilty of a forcible entry who either, (1) by breaking open doors, windows, or other parts of a house, or by any kind of violence or circumstance of terror, enters upon or into any real property; or (2) who, after entering peaceably upon real property, turns out by force, threats, or menacing conduct the party in possession." Held, that a person in the wrongful possession of real property cannot maintain trespass against the owner, who has the right to possession, but makes a forcible entry, since the remedy provided by the statute is exclusive.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Jane Canavan against Hamilton W. Gray and others in trespass. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

William Reade and B. S. Brooks, for appellants. M. C. Hassett, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. On the 19th day of August, 1875, James Canavan, who was then the husband of the plaintiff, was the lessee and in the possession of the 50-vara lot on the south-east corner of Third and Brannan streets, in San Francisco, and was the owner of all the frame buildings thereon; and on that day he assigned said lease and sold said buildings to the defendant H. W. Gray. On the same day he signed and delivered to said Gray an instrument in writing, of which the following is a copy: "This is to certify that I have rented four rooms, upper story, south-east corner Third and Brannan streets, at ($20) twenty dollars per month; and I hereby agree to deliver up possession of the said rooms upon receipt of ten days' notice, said notice to take effect from 13th day of August, 1875."

On the 20th of September, 1875, said Gray commenced an action against said James Canavan for the possession of said premises, and on the 27th of the same month Canavan went away, leaving his family, including his wife, the plaintiff herein, in said rooms. He has never occupied said rooms since. But the plaintiff has continued to occupy them without paying any rent for the use and occupation thereof. On the 5th day of April, 1879, some persons, who had been employed by said Gray for that purpose, unroofed the house containing said rooms, and, by so doing, damaged the personal property of the plaintiff herein, and this action was brought to recover the damages which the plaintiff thereby sustained. Upon these and other facts which do not change the legal aspect of the case, a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $1,000. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendants, and denied by the court, on condition that the plaintiff should remit $250 of the damages, which she did. The appeal is from that order and the judgment. The vital question is, can the plaintiff, upon these facts, maintain an action of trespass against the defendant? Upon that question the cases are conflicting, and we shall not attempt to enumerate them on the one side or the other, but will briefly examine the grounds upon which the opinions pro and con are based. All agree that at common law the plaintiff could not, upon the facts disclosed by this record, maintain any action whatever against the defendants. It is also conceded that the only change which has been made in the law relating to this subject is that made by the statute, which in this state, as in many others, provides a summary remedy for forcible entry upon or into any real property. It is only as to the extent of the change wrought by this statute that there is any difference of opinion. The insistence on one side is that "the statute of forcible entry and detainer, not in terms, but by necessary construction, forbids a forcible entry, even by the owner, upon the actual possession of another. Such entry is therefore unlawful. If unlawful, it is a trespass, and an action for the trespass must necessarily lie." Reeder v. Purdy, 41 Ill. 279.

On the other side it is urged that the remedy given by the statute is exclusive. In this state the plaintiff, in an action of forcible entry, may recover the damages occasioned thereby, together with a judgment for the restitution of the premises.

The rule of the common law, that statutes in derogation thereof are to be strictly construed, has no application to the Code of Civil Procedure, but it establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates, and its provisions and all proceedings under it are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice. Code Civil Proc. § 4. An action of forcible entry would be a proceeding under the Code, and its provisions relating to that subject, in such a proceeding, would have to be liberally construed. The Code has established the law of the state respecting that subject. It has provided a remedy and prescribed a course of procedure in cases of forcible entry. And all statutes, laws, or rules on that subject heretofore enforced in this state, whether consistent or not with the provisions of the Code on the same subject, are repealed and abrogated. Id. § 18. It is doubtless the duty of courts, in actions of forcible entry, to construe the provisions of the Code relating to that subject so as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy; that is, the remedy given by the statute. The legislature has provided a remedy for forcible entry, no matter by whom made. But it has provided only one remedy. Before there was any legislation on the subject, a person in the actual rightful or wrongful possession of real estate could maintain trespass against any one, not having a right to enter, for a forcible entry upon it. A person in the wrongful possession could not maintain an action against the owner, having a right to enter, for a forcible entry. But the statute gives a person, even in the wrongful possession, a right of action, and prescribes its form, against the owner having a right to enter, if he make a forcible entry. Neither expressly nor by necessary implication does the statute give to a person in the wrongful possession the right to maintain any other than the action of forcible entry when such entry is made by the owner, having the right to enter.¹ The legislature has provided a particular remedy for a forcible entry made under such circumstances, but we are unable to see upon what principle it can be held that another and different remedy, and one which did not exist at common law, and is not given by statute, is equally available in such a case. That the legislature, by giving a person in the wrongful possession of the real estate of another the right to bring an action of forcible entry against him for entering forcibly upon that which he had a right to enter upon, impliedly gives a right to maintain trespass in such a case, is, at best, a very doubtful implication, and the rules of the common law are not to be changed by doubtful implication. Wilbur v. Crane, 13 Pick. 284.

As the evidence shows that the premises upon which the alleged trespasses were committed were owned by the defendant H. W. Gray, and that he was entitled to the immediate possession of the same, and that the plaintiff was in the wrongful possession thereof, the defendants' motion for a new trial should have been granted on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. The case was tried upon what we deem to be an erroneous theory, and the errors committed by the court, in the course of the trial, are attributable to that fact. If the theory upon which the case was tried had been the correct one, none of the exceptions could be sustained. It is therefore unnecessary to dwell further upon them. Judgment and order reversed.

C. D. is hereby appointed administrator of the estate of A. B., deceased. [Seal.] Witness: G. H., clerk of the superior court of the county or city and county of _____, with the seal thereof affixed, the _____ day of _____, A. D. 18—. By order of the court. G. H., Clerk." Civil Code, § 1628, provides that a corporate or official seal may be affixed to an instrument by a mere impression on the paper or other material on which such instrument is written. Held, that letters of administration commencing, "State of California, county of Sacramento—ss.: S. D. is hereby appointed administrator of the estate of J. W. D. is hereby appointed administrator of the estate of A. B., deceased. [Seal.] Witness: G. H., clerk of the superior court of the county or city and county of _____, with the seal thereof affixed the _____ day of _____, A. D., 18—. By order of the court. G. H., Clerk." Code Civil Proc. § 1362. The document to which our attention is directed is in the form above prescribed, except that the seal is not affixed between the principal and attestation clauses, but is affixed at the bottom of the page which contains said clauses, and to the left of the signature of the clerk to the jurat of the administrator's oath of office. On the argument a paper was exhibited to the court, by consent of counsel on both sides, as a fac-simile of the paper under which appellant claims to have been appointed administrator. It commences: "State of California, county of Sacramento—ss.: Sperry Dye is hereby appointed administrator of the estate of John W. Sharp, deceased." Next follows the attestation clause; then the oath of office, with the jurat, and then the seal of the court affixed to the left of the signature of the clerk. It is contended by respondent's counsel that these are not "letters of administration," because the seal of the court is not affixed at the place indicated in the form prescribed by the Code above cited. But the Code only requires that they shall be substantially in that form; that is, essentially, by including the material or essential part. And it is not material or essential that the seal should be affixed at the place indicated in the form, unless the fact of a place being so indicated makes the affixing of it at that particular place material or essential. But that would be to so construe the law as to require a literal, where it expressly requires only a substantial, compliance with the form prescribed. The Civil Code provides that "a corporate or official seal may be affixed to an instrument by a mere impression upon the paper or other material on which such instrument is written." Civil Code, § 1628. It was not necessary to affix a seal of the court to any other matter contained on the sheet or page upon which the letters of administration were written, but it was necessary to affix one to said letters, and we think, under the circumstances, that the affixing of a seal upon the paper on which said letters were written was a substantial compliance with the law. GRAND JURY—IMPANELING.

Where the superior court of San Francisco, having legal authority to impanel a grand jury, impaneled and swore a competent number of persons as such jury, and charged it with the duties of a grand jury, it was a grand jury de facto, and one summoned to testify before it cannot refuse to testify on the ground that the jury was not impaneled according to law.

Habeas corpus by Edgar D. Haymond. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

Creed Haymond, for petitioner. Edgar B. Haymond, in pro. per. Atty. Gen. Hart, Wm. S. Barnes, and A. L. Rhodes, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner was subpoenaed as a witness before the grand jury of San Francisco. He refused to appear, and testify, upon the ground that, in his opinion, the grand jury was not a lawful body. For this refusal he was convicted of a contempt of the superior court, and sentenced to fine and imprisonment. Thereupon he sued out this writ, under which he prays to be discharged from custody. It is not controverted that he must be remanded, and the writ discharged, unless he can show that the superior court exceeded its jurisdiction in the contempt proceeding. In order to do this, petitioner offered in evidence the record of the proceedings of the superior court in ordering, selecting, summoning, and impaneling the alleged grand jury, from which he contends that it appears the superior court was guilty of such grave irregularities and violations of plain statutory provisions that the body of men by it sworn and impaneled is not even a de facto grand jury. Without passing upon the question whether the grand jury, before whom the petitioner was summoned to appear, was impaneled in accordance with the provisions of the law relating to that subject, it is sufficient for us to say that such body has certainly a de facto existence, and, this being so, the witness was clearly guilty of contempt in refusing to testify. When a court, having legal authority to impanel a grand jury, has sworn and impaneled a competent number of persons as such, and, itself recognizing the body so formed as a lawful grand jury, charges it with the duties of a grand jury, and it is engaged in the performance of such duties, a person summoned to testify before it cannot raise the question of its competency to act. His duty is to testify as required, leaving the question of the legality of the grand jury to be tested in the modes provided by law by those who may have an interest in the question. The petitioner, on his own showing, has been regularly and properly convicted, and must be remanded. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

COVELL v. WASHBURN. (No. 14,311.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 28, 1891.)

SET-OFF—COSTS AND ATTORNEY'S FEES.

In an action to recover the value of materials furnished and labor performed on defendant's house it appeared that liens against the house for materials furnished plaintiff to be used therein had been paid by defendant after judgment in a suit against both plaintiff and defendant. Held, that defendant was entitled to set off all that he had been compelled to pay to relieve his property from the liens, including the attorney's fees and costs in the suits to enforce the liens.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Action by Covell against Washburn to recover the value of materials furnished and labor performed by plaintiff in building defendant's house. From a judgment for part of his claim, plaintiff appeals, claiming an additional sum. Affirmed.

In bank.

BEATTY, C. J. Justice GAROUTTE is, for the purpose of a decision herein, assigned to department 2.

VANCLIEF, C. The action is to recover the reasonable value of labor done and materials furnished by plaintiff, at defendant's request, in the building of a house for defendant, alleged to be $2,500, of which $560 are admitted to have been paid; and judgment is demanded for the balance, $1,940. The plaintiff recovered judgment for the sum of $423.15, with costs, but appeals from the judgment, on the judgment roll, and claims that upon the facts found by the court he is entitled to judgment for an additional sum of $187.15. The findings show that there was a written contract between the parties for the building of the house by the plaintiff for the price of $3,250; but that the contract did not comply with sections 1183 and 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and was never filed in the office of the county recorder; that plaintiff began the erection of the building and the furnishing of the materials therefor according to the terms of the void written contract, with the knowledge and consent, and at the request, of defendant, and continued the work during a period of about four and a half months, and then ceased to work before the building was completed, and thereafter did no more work and furnished no more materials; that the labor performed and materials furnished by plaintiff were reasonably worth $2,193.50, of which $560 had been paid; that two persons, from whom plaintiff had purchased lumber and materials on credit, filed liens on the building for the price of such lumber and materials, amounting to about $1,070, and thereafter commenced actions against plaintiff and defendant herein to foreclose their liens. A decree of foreclosure was rendered for the full sums for which the liens had been filed, and in addition thereto for $175 allowed by the court for attorney's fees in the foreclosure suits, and $12.15 costs. To discharge his house from the liens the defendant herein paid all these sums, and the court allowed them as offsets against plaintiff's demand in this action. The plaintiff herein having been a party to the suit in which the liens were foreclosed, the validity of the foreclosure decree is not questioned, nor is it questioned that the defendant herein was entitled to set off the amount of the principal and interest adjudged to be due the lienholders in the foreclosure suits, which he had paid, but it is contended that he was not entitled to set off the attorney's fees and costs allowed in the foreclosure suits, not because they were improperly allowed in those suits, but because he should have paid the debts, to secure which the liens had been filed, without suit, and thus have saved the expenses and costs of those suits. In his brief counsel for appellant state the question thus: "Had defendant the right to litigate, as between himself and the lienholders, the validity of their liens, and, if defeated, to offset against the benefit conferred on him by plaintiff the costs and expenses of such litigation?" It should not be overlooked that defendant herein was not personally liable for the debts of plaintiff to the lienholders for the materials furnished by them to plaintiff, and that he cannot be presumed to have known whether or not the plaintiff herein had any valid defense to the foreclosure suits. Had the defendant herein paid the demands on which the materialmen had filed liens, without suit, and without the request of the plaintiff, he would have done so at his peril of being adjudged to have paid them as a mere volunteer to the extent to which the demands paid may not have proved to be valid liens upon his property, and to this extent he would have had no recourse upon the plaintiff for indemnity. Besides, he would have imposed upon himself the burden of proving that the demands paid by him were valid debts of the plaintiff, secured by valid liens upon defendant's property, or that he had paid thereon at plaintiff's request. He was never under any obligation to plaintiff to pay plaintiff's debts to the materialmen. His only obligation to plaintiff was to pay him so much as the labor he had performed, and the materials he had furnished and used on defendant's house, were reasonably worth. Against this obligation he was entitled to set off plaintiff's obligation to indemnify him for all that he had been compelled to pay to relieve his property from the liens thereon to secure plaintiff's debts, including the attorney's fees and costs in the suits to enforce those liens. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

MECHANIC'S LIEN—FORECLOSURE—COSTS—ATTORNEY'S FEE—CROSS-COMPLAINT—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Error in sustaining a demurrer cannot be considered on appeal, where it does not appear from the record that any such demurrer was interposed or sustained.

2. In an action to foreclose a lien for material contracted for on December 7, 1888, and furnished between that day and January 1, 1889, a cross-complaint alleging that defendant, "to avoid threatened litigation," paid plaintiffs on November 30, 1888, a sum of money in excess of what was then due them for materials before that time furnished, and asking judgment for such excess, is not authorized, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 442, providing that, whenever the defendant seeks affirmative relief against any party "relating to or depending upon the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought, or affecting the property to which the action relates," he may, in addition to his answer, file a cross-complaint.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1195, providing that, in actions to enforce mechanics' liens, the court must allow as part of the costs reasonable attorney's fees in the superior and supreme courts to each claimant whose lien is established, an attorney's fee will be allowed in the supreme court on the affirmance of a judgment foreclosing a lien.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by G. A. Clark and others against W. A. Taylor to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas J. Curran, for appellant. Wells, Guthrie & Lee, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to foreclose a lien for materials, alleged to be of the value of $149.35, and to have been furnished for and used in the construction of a house for defendant. The plaintiffs had judgment as prayed for, and the defendant appeals on the judgment roll. Only two grounds are urged for a reversal of the judgment: First, it is contended that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer to defendant's amended answer and counterclaim; and, second, that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer to defendant's cross-complaint.

1. It is not shown by the record that any demurrer was interposed or sustained to the amended answer and counterclaim. This point cannot, therefore, be considered.

2. We think the demurrer to the cross-complaint was properly sustained. The action was a proceeding in equity to foreclose a lien for materials alleged and found to have been contracted for on the 7th day of December, 1888, and to have been furnished between that day and the 1st day of January, 1889. The cross-complaint alleged that defendant, "to avoid threatened litigation," paid to plaintiffs on the 30th day of November, 1888, a sum of money in excess of what was then due them for materials before that time furnished, and it asked judgment for such excess. The cause of action set up in the cross-complaint did not relate to or depend upon the contract or transaction upon which the plaintiffs' action was brought, nor did it affect the property to which the plaintiffs' action related. The cross-complaint was therefore not authorized by section 442 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Besides, the same matters were set up in the counter-claim, and under that pleading were properly cognizable. Respondents ask, in case the judgment is affirmed, that they be allowed a reasonable attorney's fee in this court, citing section 1195 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that in cases of this kind the court must allow "reasonable attorney's fees in the superior and supreme courts." The respondents were allowed an attorney's fee in the court below, and they seem, under this section, to be entitled to one here. We therefore advise that the judgment be affirmed, and that respondents be allowed a reasonable sum as an attorney's fee in this court.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed, and the court below is directed, upon the filing of the remittitur therein, to allow the plaintiffs, as a part of their costs on this appeal, a reasonable fee for the services of their attorney in this court.

FOSS v. HINKELL. (No. 14,014.)

SUPREME COURT DECISIONS—INTERPRETATION.

Where an appeal, though taken from the judgment and order denying a new trial, was heard and determined on the findings alone, and the cause was remanded, with directions that the court below find on the testimony already introduced and such further testimony as may be introduced, whether the land in suit was within the exterior boundaries of a certain rancho granted by the Mexican government, the language of the court on such appeal, that "what the exterior limits of such granted rancho were, must be determined by the expediente of the grant issued by the Mexican government, including petition, diseno, and grant, the boundaries in which may be identified by parol evidence," must be taken as words of definition, rather than of enumeration, limiting the testimony on which the court below was to make its finding.

On rehearing. For former opinion, see 27 Pac. Rep. 644.

PER CURIAM. The former opinion is modified by striking out the words, "The former appeal was taken upon the judgment roll alone," and inserting in lieu thereof the words, "The former appeal, although taken from the judgment and order denying a new trial, was heard and determined upon the findings alone."

GRANT v. OLIVER. (No. 13,104.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 12, 1891.)

EJECTMENT—REVERSAL OF JUDGMENT—ORDER FOR RESTITUTION.

On reversal of a judgment for plaintiff for possession of land, defendant's motion for a restitution of the premises, and the order therefor, should be made, not in the supreme court, but in the superior court, on filing remittitur.

On rehearing. For former opinion, see 27 Pac. Rep. 596.

PER CURIAM. The appellant's motion to modify the judgment is denied. Upon filing remittitur in the court below, the appellant will be entitled to receive from the clerk the money he deposited with him, and also to restitution of the premises, but the motion and order therefor should be made in the superior court.

RECORD ON APPEAL—OPINION OF COURT BELOW.

The opinion of the trial court is no part of the judgment roll, and will not be considered on appeal, unless preserved in the record by a bill of exceptions.

William T. Wilson sued Ellen M. Wilson. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McKEE, J. In this case the only issue presented to the court for trial and determination was whether a transaction which took place between the parties on the 26th of November, 1875, was intended as a mortgage or a conditional sale. By its finding, filed pursuant to sections 632, 633, Code Civil Proc., the court decided that the transaction was a conditional sale, and gave judgment for the defendant. The finding was made upon conflicting evidence, but the evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding, and the finding was sufficient to sustain the judgment. It is contended, however, that the facts found did not warrant the conclusion drawn from them, and that the judgment entered thereon is erroneous. This contention is not founded upon the record of the case; for while the notice of motion for a new trial designated, as ground upon which the motion would be made, that "the decision is against the law," the specification of error is that "the court erred in rendering judgment for defendant, because the opinion of the court shows conclusively that the judgment should have been in favor of plaintiff." This specification concedes the facts as found by the court; and as the court found that the deed and agreement in writing, executed by the parties on the 26th of November, 1875, (which the plaintiff alleged were intended and understood as a mortgage to secure an indebtedness due by him to the defendant,) "were not intended or understood by the parties thereto, either of them, to be or to constitute a mortgage to secure any sum whatever, and the same did not constitute a mortgage," it necessarily followed, as a conclusion of law, that the defendant was entitled to judgment, and the plaintiff was not. Judgment was therefore properly entered for the defendant, upon a conclusion of law legitimately drawn from the facts found. Where a conclusion of law is not legitimately drawn from a finding of facts, it may be reviewed without a bill of exceptions. Thompson v. Hancock, 51 Cal. 110. Such an error, if it exists, is apparent upon the judgment roll. But, if the conclusion be legitimately drawn from the facts as found, there is not, in that regard, any error apparent on the judgment roll; and if anything has occurred, on the trial and determination of a cause, which shows that the decision by the court was erroneous, and is not made by law part of the judgment roll, it must be brought into the record of the case by a bill of exceptions. If it is not made part of the record by a bill of exceptions, or by some other mode sanctioned by law, it is not reviewable by the appellate court. Here the matter or thing to which the appellant objects is an opinion delivered by the court below, in rendering judgment, which, it is contended, shows that the court reached its conclusion by the erroneous application of a principle of law to the evidence in the case. But the appellant did not except to the opinion, nor did he move, upon any grounds of law or fact, for a decision by the court upon what he considered the principle of law applicable to the case; nor did he resort to any other mode known to the law for making the opinion part of the record. In Touchard v. Crow, 20 Cal. 163, the court said: "If counsel, when a case is tried by the court without a jury, desire to present for consideration certain points of law as applicable to the facts established, or sought to be established, upon which the court might be called to charge a jury, were there a jury in the case, the proper course is to present them in the form of propositions, preceding them with a statement that counsel makes the following points, or counsel contends as follows." And in Griswold v. Sharpe, 2 Cal. 24, it is said: "In all cases where the judge below tries the facts of a case, the proper mode of reserving the questions of law arising upon the facts is to ask the court to decide the law as counsel may desire; and, upon a refusal, to have it noted in the bill of exceptions." Neither that course, nor any other known to the law, was taken to make the opinion, or the alleged principle upon which it was based, part of the record in the case. The opinion has therefore no place in the record, and cannot be considered. McClory v. McClory, 38 Cal. 575; Hidden v. Jordan, 28 Cal. 305; Houston v. Williams, 13 Cal. 24; *People v. PEOPLE v. MITCHELL.¹

DEPOSITIONS IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Under Pen. Code Cal. §§ 882, 869, providing that in criminal cases the deposition of a witness on behalf of the people may be taken when it appears from the oath of the witness himself or some other person that he is unable to give sureties for his appearance at the trial, and that it must be read over to and signed by the witness, and certified to by the officer before whom it is taken, a deposition is inadmissible when it does not show that the witness or some other person made oath that he could not give sureties, nor that it was read over to the witness, nor that it was certified to by the officer before whom it was taken.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Criminal prosecution against Thomas Mitchell. Defendant was convicted, and appeals. Reversed.

John D. Whaley, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall, for the People.

McKEE, J. On the trial of this case the court below permitted the district attorney, over the exception of the defendant's counsel, to read in evidence against the defendant a deposition of James Morris, the complaining witness in the case; and the ruling of the court in that regard is the principal assignment of error. The deposition purported to have been taken under section 882 of the Penal Code. According to the provisions of that section, the right to take the deposition of a witness on behalf of the people, in a criminal case, arises out of the fact that the witness is unable to procure sureties for his appearance on the trial; and that fact must be satisfactorily established by the examination on oath of the witness himself, or of some other person. When the fact has been judicially ascertained, the right to take the deposition of the witness may be put in motion. But the examination of the witness must be had in the presence of the defendant, or after due notice to him, and "must be conducted in the same manner as the examination of a witness before a committing magistrate is required by the Penal Code to be conducted." That is to say, the deposition must contain the name of the witness, his place of residence, and his business, the questions put to him, and his answers, together with the objections, if any, made, and the grounds of the objections to any of the questions or answers, and the rulings thereon; and, when the examination is concluded, it must be signed by the witness, or his reasons for refusing to sign stated, and the presiding judge before whom it has been taken must sign and certify to it, if it has been reduced to writing by him or under his direction, unless the examination has been taken down by a phonographic reporter, by order of the judge, in which case the reporter's transcript, when written out in long-hand and certified by him as being a correct statement of the testimony and proceedings, shall be received as prima facie correct. Section 869, Pen. Code. But the testimony of the witness is only taken conditionally, (sections 686, 869, Pen. Code,) and cannot be read against the defendant until it has been "satisfactorily shown to the court" that the witness is dead or insane, or cannot with due diligence be found within the state, (section 686, Pen. Code.) In taking the deposition, the officers, so far as it appears on the face of the deposition, wholly failed to observe the requirements of section 882, supra, in putting the right in motion, and of section 869, in the manner of conducting the examination. The fact that the witness was unable to procure sureties for his appearance at the trial did not appear by examination on oath of the witness, or of any other person. The deposition contained the recital that "it appears from the statement of William Fitzmaurice that the witness, James Morris, was detained in jail, and was unable to procure sureties." Nowhere does it appear that the statement was made on oath. It may have been a mere verbal statement, upon which no action could have been taken. Besides, the deposition does not show that it was read over to the witness, or that he signed it after acknowledging it to be correct, or that the presiding judge or magistrate before whom it was taken certified to it, as he was required to do under the Code, to entitle it to be read in evidence against the defendant. For the informalities and irregularities apparent on its face, the deposition was therefore inadmissible. Taking the testimony of a witness on behalf of the people in a criminal case by deposition is an exception to the rule which entitles the defendant in a criminal action to be confronted with the witnesses against him in the presence of the court, and every substantial requirement of the law which authorizes it must be observed. Any real departure from the course prescribed for the taking of the deposition renders the deposition itself objectionable. People v. Morine, 54 Cal. 575; Williams v. Chadbourne, 6 Cal. 559; People v. Chung Ah Chue, 57 Cal. 567. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

MINING—WASTE BY TENANT IN COMMON—INJUNCTION—ACCOUNTING.

1. The extraction of ore from a mine, and the cutting of timber on the claim to be used in the operation, by a tenant in common, is not waste, within Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 732, providing that, if a tenant in common of real property commit waste thereon, any person aggrieved by the waste may bring an action against him for treble the damages.

2. In the absence of willful injury, or of unnecessary injury or destruction, caused by negligence or unskillfulness, a tenant in common will not, at the instance of his co-tenants, be enjoined from prosecuting the business of mining on their common claim.

3. If an accounting of the profits should be allowed where one tenant in common of a mining claim, which had never been developed, and never afforded rent or profit, develops it with his own means, and without any agreement with the others, he should be allowed a rebate for expenditures necessarily incurred in protecting the common possession and in buying in an outstanding paramount title.

cy "defendant has ever refused, and still does refuse, to admit the plaintiffs, or either of them, to the possession or occupancy of said premises, as tenants in common with defendant or otherwise; and has and still does exclude the plaintiffs, and each of them, from any possession or occupancy of said premises, or any part thereof." That during the time defendant has been in possession as aforesaid it has been, and still is, without the consent or permission of either of plaintiffs, actively engaged and employed in mining in and upon said premises, and, with a large number of men and machinery employed for that purpose, has been, and still is, excavating in and upon the premises, and constructing tunnels and shafts therein, and excavating large quantities of cinnabar therefrom, and cutting down and consuming and destroying growing trees and timber upon said premises, and thereby irreparably injuring and damaging said premises. That the cinnabar so taken from said premises is of the value of $100,000 and upwards. That a large quantity of the cinnabar so taken from said ground by defendant has been by it reduced and converted into quicksilver, and the quicksilver by it sold and disposed of, and the proceeds converted by the defendant. That the defendant has hitherto refused, and still refuses, to deliver to plaintiffs, or either of them, any part of said cinnabar or quicksilver; or to pay over to them, or either of them, any portion of the proceeds of said sales. That defendant has been, and still is, engaged in cutting down and destroying the growing trees upon said premises, and converting the same into wood and timber, "which said defendant has been, and still is, using for purposes of fuel, and in the construction of shaft, tunnels, machinery, and other structures in and about, carrying on its said business of mining in and upon, said premises." That the value of said trees, wood, and timber, so converted by defendant, is about $5,000; and that defendant has refused, and still refuses, to pay to the plaintiffs, or either of them, "any part or portion of such value." That defendant has refused, and still refuses, to give plaintiffs, or either of them, any statement or information in detail "of the quantity or value of the cinnabar so taken from said ground, or of the quicksilver produced therefrom, or of the amount realized from the aforesaid sales of the same, or of the quantity or value of the trees, wood, and timber so taken and converted as aforesaid." That defendant threatens and intends to continue to prosecute, for its own use and benefit, the business of mining in and upon the premises, and its excavations and diggings of cinnabar, and its reduction of the same into quicksilver, and the sale and conversion of the same, etc., and will so continue unless enjoined. That defendant has no other property, etc. That by reason of the premises plaintiffs have sustained great damage, to-wit, in the sum of $105,000 or thereabouts. The prayer is for an injunction, restraining and forever enjoining defendant from prosecuting "the business of mining" in or upon the premises, or from digging, excavating, or constructing shafts or tunnels in or upon the same, or from extracting cinnabar or other minerals therefrom, or from cutting down, injuring, or destroying any trees or timber upon said premises, or committing waste thereon in any manner; that plaintiffs, and each of them, be admitted to the occupation and possession of said premises as tenants in common with said defendant; that they recover of said defendant "the said sum of one hundred and five thousand dollars" for their damages; and that said damages "be trebled, in pursuance of section 732 of the Code of Civil Procedure;" and for such other and further relief as the nature of the case may require, etc. The court below found that the defendant had never claimed the entire mine, and had never excluded the plaintiffs from the common possession, and that plaintiffs had never entered, nor ever intended or desired to enter, into the actual occupation. As the testimony was substantially conflicting, we would not be justified in setting aside these or the other findings. The material questions presented are: Does the excavation and removal of cinnabar from a quicksilver mine, or the cutting of timber trees used in working the mine, by one tenant, constitute waste for which his cotenants may recover treble damages, under section 732 of the Code of Civil Procedure? Does such excavation and cutting and conversion constitute waste which should be enjoined? Are the plaintiffs entitled to an accounting?

1. Section 732 reads: "If a guardian, tenant for life or years, joint tenant, or tenant in common of real property, commit waste thereon, any person aggrieved by the waste may bring an action against him therefor, in which action there may be a judgment for treble the damages." In Elwell v. Burnside, 44 Barb. 447, it was said: "By the common law, one tenant in common could not be guilty of committing waste; that is, the same acts which if committed by a tenant for life or years would constitute waste would not be waste when committed by a tenant in common. He was not liable to his cotenant in an action for waste for the injury done to their common estate. As he is now, however, liable by statute [referring to a statute similar to the section of the Code above recited] to respond to his cotenant in this form of action, for those acts which constituted waste when committed by a tenant for life or years, we must resort to the common law to ascertain whether the acts complained of in this case would be waste, had they been committed by a tenant for life or years." In the case now before us the quicksilver mine had already been opened when plaintiffs and defendant became tenants in common. If, therefore, it be conceded that, under the provision of our Code, a tenant in common is subject to the action in like circumstances as is a tenant for life or years, the plaintiffs cannot recover damages as for waste. "As to all tenants for life, the rule has always been that the working of open mines is not waste." And a tenant for life may open new pits or galleries without committing waste.

Neel v. Neel, 19 Pa. St. 328. A tenant for years is not guilty of waste in taking ore from the mine, the sole subject of the demise, during his term. That is what he pays rent for.

It may be urged that, as between lessor and lessee for years, their contract contemplates the extraction of mineral, and, in case of a life-estate, the grantor or donor must intend that his grantee or donee shall receive some benefit from his estate. But is it not also true, from the very nature of mining property in this state, valuable only because of the mineral it is supposed to contain, that each of the co-tenants may use it in the only way it can be used? The co-tenants out of possession may at any time enter into an equal enjoyment of their possession; their neglect to do so may be regarded as an assent to the sole occupation of the other. This is but another application of the principle announced in Pico v. Columbet, 12 Cal. 414. True, the co-tenants will not be held to assent to the commission of waste by the sole occupant, but the question returns, what acts done by him are waste? It cannot be doubted that on the part of a mere trespasser it is a wrong in the nature of waste to remove any ore from a mine. The cases cited by appellants fully sustain this proposition. But it is not a just inference that, as between tenants in common, the rule is the same. Section 732 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not relate to trespasses committed by those who have no interest in the property; nor does it define "waste," or declare what acts committed by a guardian, tenant for life or years, or joint tenant, or tenant in common, as the case may be, shall be waste. For the appropriate meaning of the word, as applicable to acts done by these several classes of persons, we are relegated to the principles of the common law, and to various considerations of policy arising out of different conditions which the common law recognizes and approves. The word "waste" is not in arbitrary term, to be applied inflexibly without regard to the quantity or quality of the estate, the nature and species of the property, or the relation to it of the person charged to have committed the wrong. As was said by ROANE, J., in Findlay v. Smith, 6 Munf. 134: "In considering what is waste in this country, it is to be remarked that the common law by which it is regulated adapts itself in this, as in other cases, to the varied situations and circumstances of the country. * * * The law on this subject must be applied with reasonable regard to circumstances." In the mining regions of this state, where title to a lode can be acquired from a United States government only after work of certain value has been done upon it, can it be that, if one of several locators or owners shall assume the sole risk of developing the mine, he shall become liable to those who have taken no chance of possible loss, not only for an accounting as to net profits,—supposing him to be fortunate enough to secure any,—but also as a tort-feasor, for three times the value of the whole, or for a proportionate share of the ore taken out?

Cal.Rep. 26-28 P.—45

It will be observed, upon the facts herein, no question arises as to unnecessary damage done to the mine or its works by reason of reckless or unskillful management of the business by the tenant conducting it. There may be cases in which the courts will impose damages for an abuse of his right by a co-tenant in occupation, or interpose to prevent such abuse. But here the theory of plaintiffs is that defendant could not extract ore from the mine without committing waste, because such extraction is a destruction of the very substance of the estate,—an irreparable injury to the inheritance. In view of the character of the property, and of plaintiffs' implied assent to its sole occupation by defendant for mining purposes, we regard the right of the latter to the proceeds of its operations as partaking of the nature of a usufruct; the appropriation of the net returns as a legitimate participation of the profits; and its acts of mining as not impairing or consuming the estate to any greater extent than must be presumed to have been intended to be allowable by each of the parties in interest. Murray v. Haverty, 70 Ill. 320, supposing it to have been correctly decided, does not entirely sustain the view of counsel for appellants. That decision was based upon a statute which authorized a tenant to bring trespass or trover against his co-tenant who should "take away, destroy, lessen in value, or otherwise injure" the common property. The section of our Code does not declare that a co-tenant who "shall take away," etc., shall be guilty of waste. The question waste or no waste is left to the courts. Besides, in Murray v. Haverty the court had already decided the case by holding certain evidence, as to license, inadmissible under the defendant's plea. Counsel quote from Freeman on Co-Tenancy: "In all cases where a co-tenant practically destroys the estate, or some part thereof, trespass may be sustained by the injured co-tenant." Section 302. But this is to be taken with other portions of the same work where the distinction is pointed out between an appropriation of the proceeds, rents, profits, or income, and the destruction of the estate itself. See, also, Wat. Tresp. 947. The tenant in common of a mine may occupy it for the purpose contemplated by all, even though a portion of the soil or ore be removed. Each tenant has the right to use the mine, and, as was intimated by the supreme court of Pennsylvania, so long as an estate is used according to its nature, "it is no valid objection that the use is consumption, and it is no fault of the tenant that it is not more enduring." Irwin v. Covode, 24 Pa. St. 162. The taking of ore from the mine is rather the use than the destruction of the estate, within the meaning of the general rule. The results of the tenant's labor and capital are in the nature of proceeds or profits, the partial exhaustion being but the incidental consequence of the use.

It is not necessary to examine in detail the many cases cited by appellants, as in none are the facts like those of the case at bar. We shall refer to a few of them. Delaney v. Root, 99 Mass. 546, was an action of trover for the conversion of personal property. Stetson v. Day, 51 Me. 434, simply decides that, under a statute of Maine, a tenant for life, who neglected to pay taxes assessed upon the estate during his tenancy, and thereby subjected the estate to a sale, was liable to an action by the reversioner, either of waste, or of case in the nature of waste. Maddox v. Goddard, 15 Me. 219, and Symonds v. Harris, 51 Me. 14, were actions of trespass quare clausum for the destruction of a mill, and for the disservice and removal of machinery from a mill; Blanchard v. Baker, 8 Me. 253, trespass on the case for a similar injury to common property; McDonald v. Trafton, 15 Me. 225, has no bearing upon any question involved in the case before us; and Hubbard v. Hubbard, Id. 198, was a statutory action of trespass "for strip and waste" of timber. As to the destruction of trees charged in the complaint herein, it has been expressly decided in California that, in the enjoyment of his legal rights in the common property, each co-tenant may cut timber, and use or dispose of it, at least to an extent corresponding to his share of the estate. Hihn v. Peck, 18 Cal. 640. In the case before us there is neither averment nor finding that defendant has cut or consumed more than its share. Besides, the use of the trees was merely incidental to the mining operations of defendant. In Pennsylvania it is held that the cutting of timber, to be used in a mine by the tenant for life, whose mining is not waste, is not itself waste. Neel v. Neel, 19 Pa. St. 328. Nowhere is it held to be waste for a tenant in common of a farm to cut wood necessary to the use of the farm. It was indeed held in New York by the supreme court that the cutting down of timber trees by one of several co-tenants, upon land whose principal value consisted of the growing timber, was waste, for which the other co-tenants could recover damages under a clause of the Revised Statutes of that state. Elwell v. Burnside, 44 Barb. 447. But, aside from the rule to the contrary laid down in Hihn v. Peck, 18 Cal. 640, plaintiffs have no averment that the quicksilver mine is "principally valuable" because of the trees growing from its surface. And here it may be added, applying the rule of Hihn v. Peck, it would seem each tenant in common of a mine is at least entitled to take out his share of the ore. That neither of the tenants can "look into the ground" may be a reason why a court of equity should order an account to be taken, but ought not to operate a prohibition upon the working of the mine by anybody.

2. Ought the court below to have enjoined defendant from proceeding with its mining? "In case of joint tenants and tenants in common, with respect to whose acts of waste the common law has provided no remedy, courts of equity will interfere when it appears that waste has been committed or threatened by one tenant in common who has become possessed of the whole premises." Tayl. Landl. & Ten. 694. This general proposition may be conceded to be correctly stated, but the very question here is, has waste been committed? At the common law the tenant had no redress for acts of admitted waste committed by his co-tenant. But the latter might be restrained in equity from felling ornamental trees, or from doing other things amounting to wanton and destructive waste, which were called "equitable waste," because allowable at law. By our statute, however, a tenant may recover damages of his co-tenant in every case of waste. Holding, as we do, that the acts of defendant were not, under the circumstances, wanton or destructive, or any waste, it follows plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction. Counsel rely upon the opinion of the court of chancery of Upper Canada in Dougall v. Foster, 4 Grant, (U. C.) 319, where it was held (ESTEN, V. C., dissenting,) that one tenant in common would be restrained at the suit of his co-tenant from digging earth for bricks on the joint property. There the bill alleged that the portion of the lot from which the clay was being excavated and carried away was very valuable for building purposes, and that (with reference to such purposes) the lot had greatly deteriorated in value by reason of the acts of defendant. In his opposing affidavit defendant did not deny the first of these alleged facts at all, and did not expressly deny the last. The chancellor said: "It is quite true that this court refuses to restrict a tenant in common from the legitimate enjoyment of the estate, because an undivided occupation is of the very essence of that sort of title, (Co. Litt. 180,) and to interfere with the legitimate exercise of that right would be to deny an essential quality of the title." The court held that the legitimate enjoyment of a building lot, "within the limits of the town of Belleville," was to build upon it, or improve or occupy it as town property is usually improved and occupied; and that to dig holes in it, or degrade it below the surrounding level, was not such legitimate enjoyment. To repeat the language of ROANE, J., (Findlay v. Smith, supra:) "The law on this subject must be applied with reasonable regard to circumstances." If it had appeared in Dougall v. Foster that the common property was valuable only as a brick-yard, and was acquired by the co-tenants for that purpose, the case would have approximated more closely to the one at bar. By the laws of the United States the mining lands are disposed of under laws differing from those through which agricultural lands may be acquired. As a condition to their acquisition by individuals, it is requisite that the locators shall have done mining work of a certain value. They are disposed of and acquired for the purpose of mining, and the application of them to that purpose by one tenant in common is not waste of which the others can complain. Hawley v. Clowes, 2 Johns. Ch. 122, was a bill for partition, and for cutting down and carrying away timber, not wanted for the necessary use of the farm. The injunction was granted, in view of the special character of the case, and the insolvency of defendant, and on the ground that the excessive cutting of timber was destructive,

"and not within the usual and legitimate exercise of enjoyment." Chancellor KENT added: "The remedy is peculiarly appropriate and proper pending a partition of the very land." In Hole v. Thomas, 7 Ves. 589, Lord ELDON, after saying, "I never knew of an instance of an application to stay waste by one tenant in common against another, one tenant in common having the right to enjoy as he pleases," granted an injunction against cutting "saplings or any timber trees or underwood at unseasonable times," that being destructive. As was said by ESTEN, V. C., in Dougal v. Foster, it was malicious waste. Twort v Twort, 16 Ves. 128, was a case where one tenant in common was an "occupying tenant" to another. In Baker v. Whiting the tenant in common was the agent of his co-tenants, and the case does not assist the present investigation. 3 Sum. 485. It is said by EDEN (2 Waterman's Eden, Inj., 3d Ed., 210) the instances in which injunctions have been granted between tenants in common against committing waste are few. The application has always been refused, unless attended with peculiar circumstances. In Smallman v. Onions, 3 Brown Ch. 621, an injunction was granted against the cutting of timber, on the ground that the parties were only equitable tenants in common, the legal title being in a trustee; that, therefore, the person who was committing the waste had no title to the possession, and cutting the timber was a trespass upon the trustee; also that the trespasser was insolvent. And in Goodwyn v. Spray, 2 Dick. 667, the lord chancellor denied an injunction prayed for by one tenant against his co-tenant cutting timber, saying the only remedy the plaintiff had was to get a partition. In the absence of allegations, proofs, or findings of willful injury, or of unnecessary injury or destruction caused by the negligence or unskillfulness of defendant, the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction.

3. Is this an action for an accounting? It is established in this state that, in ordinary cases, an action at law cannot be maintained by a tenant in common against a co-tenant in sole possession of the premises, to recover a share of the profits derived from the state by means of the labor and money expended by the party in occupation. The occupation by one tenant, so long as he does not exclude his co-tenant, is but the exercise of a legal right. The money he invests at his own risk. If his transactions result in a loss he cannot call upon his co-tenant for contribution, and if they result in a profit his co-tenant is not entitled to share in such profit. Pico v. Columbet, 12 Cal. 414. The demand of the plaintiffs is not for a sum due by way of rent from defendant as the tenant of their interest, nor is it for a proportionable share of an amount received by defendant for the use and occupation of the premises by third persons, nor is an account sought as an incident to a claim for partition. It is not for their part of moneys received by defendant which belong to all the tenants in common, nor is it based upon an allegation of any of the exceptional facts mentioned in Pico v. Columbet, 12 Cal. 414; in Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 461; and in Abel v. Love, 17 Cal. 233. See, also, Howard v. Throckmorton, 59 Cal. 89.

Nor is the present an action brought to recover a portion of the profits acquired by the expenditure of defendant's money, treating it as the agent of plaintiffs in developing the common property. There is no pretense of an averment of any actual contract between plaintiffs and defendant whereby the latter was authorized to act for the former. On the contrary, it is expressly alleged in the complaint that the acts of defendant were against the will of plaintiffs, and without their consent. Again, the tenant in occupation is not made the bailiff of plaintiffs, in the absence of a contract of agency, by any statute of this state. The statute of Anne (4, 5, 16) has never been adopted here, and, if it had been adopted, that statute would seem only to have applied to cases where one tenant in common had received from a third person money, or other thing of value, to which both tenants were entitled by reason of their co-tenancy, and retained more than his just share according to the proportion of his interest. Pico v. Columbet, supra; Henderson v. Eason, 9 Eng. Law & Eq. 337. If the appropriation by defendant of the net proceeds of its enterprise be considered as merely the legitimate perception of the profits, the action cannot be maintained as an action for an account. Izard v. Bodine, 11 N. J. Eq. 403, cited by counsel for appellants, does not sustain their view. There the bill was for partition and account. The supreme court of New Jersey held: (1) If one tenant in common oust his co-tenant, the latter must first establish his right at law, and thus recover the mesne profits, "for one tenant is bound to account to another only as his bailiff appointed by contract, express or implied." (2) Where one tenant in common "actually receives" the rents, issues, and profits, then he may be compelled to account for such profits actually received, (from third persons;) but this by statute, both in England and this state, and not by the common law. 4 Anne, c. 16; New Jersey Act of 1794; Sargent v. Parsons, 12 Mass. 149. (3) Where one tenant actually occupies the whole estate, without claim on the part of his co-tenants to be admitted into possession, he is under no obligations to account, "for he has a right to such occupancy." Citing Co. Litt. 200b; Sargent v. Parsons, 12 Mass. 149; Meredith v. Andres, 7 Ired. 5; Colburn v. Mason, 25 Me. 434.

Appellants also refer to Nelson's Heirs v. Clay's Heirs, 7 J. J. Marsh. 139. But in that case the court, after saying that a statute of Virginia which, like the English statute, authorized "actions of account in favor of one joint tenant or tenant in common against another, as his bailiff, for receiving more than his just share," was in force in Kentucky, held that the statute did not apply when the estate, at the commencement of the tenancy in common, yielded no rent or profits, and one of the tenants entered, and by improving the estate rendered it productive; the other co-tenant having expended neither money nor labor. In Shiels v. Stark, 14 Ga. 436, the court adjudged that, under the statute of Anne in force in Georgia, a tenant in exclusive occupation was liable to his co-tenant for a proportionate share of the value of the use and occupation; admitting that it had been held in Massachusetts (Sargent v. Parsons, 12 Mass. 149) that, under the statute of Anne, it is necessary to charge the defendant with having received rents and profits "otherwise than by his occupancy." We do not find the language attributed to Dane by the learned court of Georgia (1 Dane, Abr. p. 170, c. 8, art. 3) in our edition of the work referred to. Shiels v. Stark was a bill in equity for a partition and an account.

If it be conceded that the peculiar nature of mining property of itself constitutes such an equity as that the tenants, who could at any time have entered into the joint possession, but who have never expended labor or money upon the common property, or become liable for any portion of the loss which might have followed upon the enterprise of their co-tenant, ought to be entitled to demand an accounting from the latter, and to recover a portion of the net profit gained exclusively by its efforts and capital, the present is not an action for such an accounting. The defendant is charged with having irreparably injured the premises by taking therefrom cinnabar of the value of $100,000, and cutting thereon growing trees of the value of $5,000. The plaintiffs aver they have been damaged in the sum of $105,000, and pray, among other things, that they may have a judgment for three times that sum. It is alleged that defendant has converted the cinnabar, and the proceeds of sales of it, and the trees, and "has refused to deliver to the plaintiffs any part of the cinnabar taken from said ground, or the quicksilver so produced therefrom, or to pay over to them any portion of the proceeds of said sales, and denies to the plaintiffs, and each of them, any share or interest in the same." But neither this nor any other averment found in the complaint makes the action one for an account, legal or equitable. The averments in the complaint, except in so far as they constitute a declaration in ejectment, (and, as we have seen, the court below found that defendant had never disseised or ousted the plaintiffs,) are of facts alleged by plaintiffs to establish waste committed by defendant upon the common property, for which treble damages are asked.

Nevertheless, since the property is described in the complaint, and the exclusive occupation and working of the mine by defendant averred therein, and inasmuch as the court below did in fact take an account, we have looked into the findings and evidence with respect thereto. We have said that the net proceeds from the working of the mine were rather in the nature of profits from the use than the result of the destruction of the inheritance. But it may be conceded, for the purposes of this decision, that the relation of the tenants in common, under the circumstances disclosed, is suu generis, and their rights peculiar; that while the extraction of ore from the mine by one tenant, who does not exclude his co-tenants, is not waste, and the neglect of the latter to enter should be held an assent on their part to the exclusive occupation by the former, yet, because the effect of the exclusive working by one may be to exhaust the mineral, and the uncertainty of the prospective value of the property may render it impossible to make a just partition of it, a court of equity should order an accounting; holding that, while it must have been contemplated by the parties that the tenant in occupation should not be held for waste, or prohibited from proceeding with his work by the co-tenants who do not seek to enter, yet it must also have been contemplated that the tenant in occupation should not appropriate to himself the entire profits. If this be so, however, the co-tenants, not in actual occupation, applying for such account, should at least be required to do equity,—to allow to the defendant all sums actually expended for the protection of the common property. The court below found "that defendant has taken from said mine, since the 18th day of March, 1876, a great number of tons of ore, and has taken therefrom a large sum of money, and that all thereof has been expended in the proper, economical, and necessary development and working of said mine for said ore, and in the proper, economical, and necessary reduction of the said ores, and in properly, economically, and necessarily defending at law the common title to said property, and in proper payment for an outstanding title thereto." The parties here are not mining partners, between whom an accounting is sought. If they can properly be termed partners "in the profits," (see the dictum in Abel v. Love, supra,) they have not, by the averments of their complaint, declared themselves partners in any broader sense. By filing their complaint they did not make themselves liable to the defendant, or to creditors of defendant, in case the account of defendant's transactions should show such transactions had resulted in a loss. They did not make the defendant their agent as to debts by it created beyond the proceeds from its mining, nor did they subject their interest in the mine to any debts of its creation. In their complaint they impliedly, if not expressly, disavow any such purpose. If the plaintiffs here are entitled to an account, their claim to it is based upon special equities; their appeal to the court of equity is on the ground that defendant ought, under the peculiar circumstances, to pay them a share of the profits. It would seem plain that an equity is in turn imposed upon them to allow a rebate for expenditures necessarily incurred in protecting the common possession and in buying in an outstanding title paramount to that of the co-tenants, or such as a prudent man would deem it proper to purchase to avoid expensive and dangerous litigation.

4. Conceding, for the sake of the argument, such an action might have been maintained, the present is not an action to recover rent of defendant as successor to the tenants previously in occupation. Judgment and order affirmed.

LATAILLADE v. ORENA. (No. 13,975.)
(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 30, 1891.)

GUARDIAN AND WARD — ACCOUNTING — FRAUD OF GUARDIAN—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. After the settlement of an estate and discharge of the guardian by the probate court a court of equity may compel the guardian to account for property fraudulently concealed from his ward and the court.

2. Money received by a guardian from the sale of both real and personal property constitutes but one fund, and a single action lies for its recovery.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 338, subd. 4, which provides that an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake must be commenced within three years, but the cause of action in such case is not deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake, an action against a guardian for an accounting will lie where it appeared that defendant at all times fraudulently concealed the fact that he had received and appropriated to his own use moneys belonging to plaintiff, if brought within three years from the discovery by plaintiff of his right.

4. In an action for an accounting the complaint showed that plaintiff's father purchased two ranchos, and paid for them with his own funds, but directed conveyances to be made to his wife, plaintiff's mother, who accepted the same for the benefit of her husband; that at the time of his death, in 1849, plaintiff's father also owned a large number of cattle; that for several years prior to 1849 defendant, as decedent's agent, had the management of the ranchos and cattle, in which he afterwards continued with the consent of plaintiff's mother; that in 1854 defendant married plaintiff's mother, and thereafter, during plaintiff's minority, and until July, 1885, plaintiff was a member of defendant's family, and was treated as his own child; that defendant was the guardian of plaintiff's person and estate; that from time to time, after the death of plaintiff's father, defendant sold all of the cattle owned by plaintiff's father, and in 1868 sold the ranchos, and induced plaintiff's mother to execute deeds thereof to the purchaser; that defendant received all the money paid for the cattle and ranchos, and mingled the same with his own funds, and wrongfully and fraudulently converted the same to his own use, with intent to deprive plaintiff of his lawful share thereof; that defendant knew that the cattle and ranchos were owned by plaintiff's father, and that plaintiff, as heir, was owner of an interest therein, but this fact defendant concealed from plaintiff, and always represented to him that his father died insolvent; that in July, 1885, disputes arose between them, and plaintiff left the household of defendant, and, in interviews with persons who had been servants of plaintiff's father, for the first time ascertained that his father was owner of the cattle and ranchos left in the custody and management of defendant, and plaintiff was then for the first time directed to one J., who then for the first time showed plaintiff, by entries in his books, regularly kept in his business, wherein his daily transactions were entered at the time they took place, that he had acted as agent for plaintiff's father in the purchase of the ranchos; that plaintiff then learned for the first time that his father was the real owner of said ranchos, and the owner of the cattle. Held, that the complaint sufficiently shows when the discovery of fraud was made, what it was, how it was made, and why it was not made sooner.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

Action by C. E. Lataillade against Gaspar Orena for an accounting. From a judgment sustaining the demurrer to his third amended complaint plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

R. B. Canfield and John J. Boyce, for appellant. Messrs. Garber, Boalt, Bishop and W. C. Stratton, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff commenced this action to obtain an accounting, and the appeal is from a judgment entered against him after demurrer sustained to his third amended complaint.

The facts stated in the complaint are in substance as follows: On the 12th day of April, 1849, Casario Lataillade, plaintiff's father, died intestate in the town of Santa Barbara, where he was residing, leaving a widow and three minor children, of whom plaintiff, who was born December 2, 1849, was one. After his marriage to plaintiff's mother the decedent purchased two ranchos, situated in what is now the county of Santa Barbara, and paid for them with his own funds, but at his request the conveyances were executed to his wife as grantee, and were accepted by her for the benefit of her husband, and thereafter the ranchos were owned and possessed as the community property of the two. At the time of his death the decedent was also the owner of a large number of cattle, then grazing upon the ranchos. For several years prior to 1849 defendant had the care and management of the ranchos and cattle as the agent of the decedent, and afterwards, with the consent of plaintiff's mother, he continued to have the same care and management, until the property was sold and disposed of, as hereinafter stated. In 1854 the defendant married the plaintiff's mother, who is still his wife, and thereafter, during his minority, and until July, 1885, plaintiff continuously lived in defendant's family, and was brought up and treated as his own child. In the same year defendant was duly appointed the guardian of plaintiff's person and estate, and continued to act as such until the latter became of age. From time to time after April, 1849, defendant sold all of the said cattle, but for what sum or sums of money plaintiff is not advised; and in 1868 he negotiated a sale of the ranchos for the sum of $27,000 or thereabouts, and induced the plaintiff's mother to execute deeds thereof to the purchasers, and to permit him to receive the entire purchase money. The defendant received all the money paid for the cattle and ranchos, and mingled the same with his own funds, and wrongfully and fraudulently converted the same to his own use, with the intent to deprive plaintiff of his lawful share thereof. At all the times mentioned defendant knew that the cattle and ranchos were owned by the plaintiff's father at the time of his death, and that plaintiff became the owner of an interest therein as his heir; but he always concealed this fact from the plaintiff, and wrongfully and fraudulently represented to him that his father died insolvent, and that he had no interest in the cattle or ranchos. When defendant was appointed guardian of plaintiff he filed in court an inventory purporting to show all the estate of his ward, but he did not, in that inventory, or in any inventory, or otherwise, at any time, include any of the aforesaid property; and when he applied for and obtained a final discharge from his trust he falsely stated in his petition and represented to the court that he had returned a full and true inventory of all the estate of plaintiff which had come into his hands as guardian, and paid over and delivered the same to the plaintiff. This condition of things continued until July, 1885, the plaintiff all the time during his minority and afterwards relying implicitly on the statements and representations of defendant concerning plaintiff's property rights and the condition of his father's estate, and having no means of ascertaining the falsity of such statements and representations. In the last-named month difficulties and disputes arose between the parties, and the plaintiff then left the household of defendant, and ceased to be a member of his family, or to have friendly or confidential relations with him. "Thereupon this plaintiff, in interviews with persons who had acted in the capacity of servants upon the ranchos belonging to his said father, for the first time ascertained that his father during his lifetime had the interests in said real and personal property as particularly herein above set forth, and that said property was in the custody, care, and management of the defendant at the time of the death of his said father; and this plaintiff was then for the first time directed to one Augustin Janssens, who carried on business in the said county of Santa Barbara during the married life-time of the said Cäsario Lataillade, deceased, and at the time of the purchase of the said ranchos, who then for the first time showed this plaintiff by entries in his commercial books, regularly kept in his business, wherein his daily transactions were entered at the time they took place, that he had acted as the agent of the said Cäsario Lataillade in respect to the payment of the purchase money of said ranchos; and plaintiff avers that said account-books and the statements of said Janssens then and there disclosed to this plaintiff that his father was the owner of said ranchos, and that he was the real purchaser thereof, and the owner of the said cattle thereon." Shortly after these discoveries plaintiff demanded of defendant a full accounting of all his dealings with the property of the deceased, Lataillade, since his death, and the increase thereof; but defendant refused, and still refuses, to render to plaintiff any such account, or any account whatever, in relation to the said property. The proceeds of the cattle and lands disposed of by defendant as aforesaid are still in his hands, and plaintiff is the owner of and entitled to the one-sixth part thereof, together with the increase and profits arising therefrom. The complaint was filed on the 21st day of February, 1887, and the prayer was that defendant be compelled to account for all his dealings and transactions with the said property and the proceeds and increase thereof; that he be charged interest on all sums of money received by him from the sales of the property, compounded annually; and that plaintiff have judgment for such amount as he may be found entitled to. The demurrer was upon the grounds that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action; that several causes of action were improperly united, and not separately stated; that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a case of action, for the reason that it appeared on the face thereof that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations and by the plaintiff's laches; and that the complaint was ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain in several particulars. It does not appear upon what ground the demurrer was sustained.

1. The respondent contends that the probate court had exclusive jurisdiction to compel defendant to account as guardian, and that its decree, settling his accounts and discharging him from his trust, was final and conclusive; and in support of this position numerous authorities are cited. This is undoubtedly the general rule applicable to the settlement of the accounts of guardians, executors, and administrators, but we do not think it applicable to a case like this. Here, if the averments of the complaint are true,—and they must be assumed to be so for the purposes of this decision,—none of the matters now in controversy were passed upon in the settlement, for the reason that the guardian intentionally and fraudulently concealed from the court and his ward the fact that the latter had then, or ever had, any interest in the property in question. The cases cited state and apply the general rule, but, so far as we have discovered, no one of them goes to the extent of holding that such a settlement can shield a guardian from afterwards being called upon in a court of equity to account for the property so concealed. The rule applicable to the case is correctly stated in Griffith v. Godey, 113 U. S. 89, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383. In that case Mr. Justice FIELD, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is well established that a settlement of an administrator's account by the decree of a probate court does not conclude as to property accidentally or fraudulently withheld from the account. If the property be omitted by mistake, or be subsequently discovered, a court of equity may exercise its jurisdiction in the premises, and take such action as justice to the heirs of the deceased or to the creditors of the estate may require, even if the probate court might, in such case, open its decree, and administer upon the omitted property; and a fraudulent concealment of property, or a fraudulent disposition of it, is a general and always existing ground for the interposition of equity." And see Estate of Hudson, 63 Cal. 454; Dean v. Superior Court, Id. 473; In re Cahalan, 70 Cal. 604, 12 Pac. Rep. 427; Tobleman v. Hildebrandt, 72 Cal. 316, 14 Pac. Rep. 20.

2. In support of the second ground of demurrer it is claimed that the transactions in regard to the land and cattle were entirely distinct, and involved different facts, and that they constituted two distinct causes of action, which should have been separately stated; but as we read the complaint it states only one cause of action, namely, for an accounting as to moneys received by defendant and in part held by him in trust for plaintiff. The money received constituted in defendant's hands a single fund, though derived from sales of real and personal property, and received at different times.

3. The third ground of demurrer seems to be the one mainly relied upon as justifying the ruling of the court, and it is very elaborately discussed by counsel. The Code provides that an action for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake must be commenced within three years, but the cause of action in such case is not deemed to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake. Section 338, subd. 4, Code Civil Proc. Was the cause of action in this case saved from the bar of the statute by this section? Counsel for respondent earnestly contend that it was not, for several reasons: (a) It is urged that the action was not one for relief on the ground of fraud. It is true, the action was for an accounting, but the grievance complained of was that defendant knowingly received and held moneys in trust for plaintiff, and appropriated the same to his own use, and at all times fraudulently concealed from plaintiff the fact that he had ever received or held any such moneys or any money in which plaintiff had any interest. It seems to us, therefore, that the averments make a case of the class provided for in the section of the Code above cited. (b) It is urged that the averments respecting the discovery of the fraud are wholly insufficient. It is said that a party seeking to avoid the bar of the statute on account of fraud must show that he used due diligence to detect it, and, if he made any particular discovery, should state when it was made, what it was, how it was made, and why it was not made sooner; and, further, that one will be presumed to have known whatever with reasonable diligence he might have ascertained concerning the fraud of which he complains. The foregoing propositions seem to be well supported by the authorities, (Wood v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 140; Badger v. Badger, 2 Wall. 94; Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 367, 14 Pac. Rep. 88;) and the question is whether or not, in view of them, the averments of the complaint are sufficient. It must be observed that the relations of the parties were such as would naturally inspire trust and confidence on the part of the plaintiff in the defendant. The defendant was plaintiff's step-father and guardian, and brought him up in his own family, and as his own son. Plaintiff always, up to the time of the rupture in 1885, placed implicit confidence in whatever defendant told him, and never doubted its truth. He had no knowledge, and no reason to suspect, that a fraud was being practiced upon him. There was nothing, therefore, to put him upon inquiry; and, under such circumstances, we do not see how it can be said that he failed to use due diligence to detect the fraud, or how he can be presumed to have known anything concerning it. The complaint does state, we think, when the discovery was made, and what it was, and how it was made, and why it was not made sooner. It is claimed, however, that the averments as to the discovery were of mere conclusions of law, and not of the facts. It is true that pleadings should state the ultimate facts, and not the probative facts, or conclusions of law; but what are ultimate facts and what conclusions of law are often mixed and uncertain questions. Levins v. Rovegno, 71 Cal. 273, 12 Pac. Rep. 161; Turner v. White, 73 Cal. 299, 14 Pac. Rep. 794. The same averment may be of a fact or of a conclusion of law according to the context. We think the averments here complained of should be held sufficient as statements of fact. (c) Conceding all that has been said to be true, it is further contended that no cause of action against the defendant respecting the two ranchos or their proceeds is shown. The argument on this point, briefly stated, is as follows: According to the averments of the complaint, plaintiff's father purchased the ranchos with his own funds; but at his request the conveyances thereof were made to his wife, who thereafter held the same as community property. Being community property, the title to the ranchos, under the Mexican law then in force, upon the death of the husband immediately descended to and became vested in the widow and children, without the necessity of any administration. De La Guerra v. Packard, 17 Cal. 183; Scott v. Ward, 13 Cal. 459. The plaintiff and his mother became tenants in common of the property, and weresuch at the time of the alleged sale thereof. The mother had no power to sell or convey the plaintiff's interest, and there is nothing to show that she attempted to do so; and, if she did, the deeds did not pass or affect his interest in any way. He could afterwards have asserted his right thereto just as well as if no deeds had been made, and possibly could do so now. The purchase money received was therefore the money of the mother, in which the plaintiff had no interest. This argument seems to be sound, and the conclusions reached correct. A similar claim is made in regard to the cattle and their proceeds, but we do not think it can be sustained. The defendant sold all the cattle, and received all of the purchase money, and converted the same to his own use. As to the plaintiff's interest, the sale was a conversion, but he could waive the tort, and sue in assumpsit for his share of the purchase money, or, under the circumstances shown here, for an accounting. Pom. Rem. § 110.

4. We see nothing in the fourth ground of demurrer calling for special consideration. As we read the complaint, it is not ambiguous, unintelligible, or uncertain in any material respect. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

MARRINER v. DENNISON. (No. 14,154.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 20, 1891.)

BREACH OF CONTRACT—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES—EVIDENCE—GAMBLING VERDICT.

1. Defendant contracted to convey 6 lots to plaintiff, and induced him to accept a contract for other lots in lieu thereof. Plaintiff rescinded the latter contract, and sued for breach of the first contract. To show the value of the first lots, a witness for plaintiff testified that he had bargained for the lots at $6,500 before the contract with plaintiff, but that he did not think them worth over $500 each. Plaintiff's testimony showed that lots similar to those in the second contract had been sold for from $300 to $1,000 each. Held, that a verdict for plaintiff for $2,500 was unauthorized.

2. Plaintiff offered in evidence deeds of certain land which he was to convey to defendant in exchange for the lots named in the former contract, which deeds he claimed to have tendered to defendant. The deeds contained restrictions as to defendant's right to use the land. Plaintiff's contract with defendant to convey the property was silent as to any restrictions. Held, that the deeds were insufficient to show compliance with the contract.

3. Where the jurors placed different amounts upon their ballots, and added them together, and divided the sum by 12, the verdict was not reached by a resort to the determination of chance, and therefore it could not be impeached by affidavits of the jurors. Hunt v. Elliott, (Cal.) 20 Pac. Rep. 132, followed.

Department 1. Commissioners' decision. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Jacob U. Marriner against Gilbert L. Dennison to recover damages for a breach of a contract to convey land. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from the order denying the motion he appeals. Reversed.

E. C. Bowers, for appellant. M. C. Hester and Judson, Hester & Woods, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is the second appeal in this case. The decision on the first appeal is reported in 78 Cal. 202, 20 Pac. Rep. 386. After the case was sent back for a new trial, the pleadings were amended so as to conform to that decision. The case was then tried before a jury, and the result was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $2,500 damages. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and has appealed from the order denying his motion. We think a new trial should have been granted.

1. It was held on the former appeal that the plaintiff could not rescind the contract of March 14, 1887, and recover for a breach of the contract of January 13, 1887, even though he was induced to make the change by fraud, unless he was damaged by the change; and it was said: "It was necessary for the plaintiff to allege and prove that the last property contracted for was of less value than the first, or other facts sufficient to show that he was damaged by the making of the last contract." And on the new trial the court instructed the jury that they could not find for the plaintiff, unless he had proved by a preponderance of evidence that he was damaged by the agreement to take the lots last contracted for in lieu of those first contracted for. It is clear, we think, that the plaintiff did not prove by a preponderance of evidence, if at all, that he was damaged by the making of the last contract in the sum of $2,500, or in any appreciable sum, and if this be so, the damages allowed should at most have been only nominal. To prove the value of the six McGee lots which were to be conveyed to him under the first contract, plaintiff called as a witness one Scott, who testified that on the 9th of March, 1887, defendant executed a written agreement to sell him the Dennison subdivision of the McGee tract in Pasadena, containing 10 acres, and subdivided into 60 lots; that he was to pay for the 6 lots in question in the aggregate $6,500; that in making the purchase he was acting for other parties who represented the Santa Fe Railroad Company, and that the company wanted the property for railroad purposes. He then went on to testify that he did not think the lots were worth what he agreed to give, and told the parties he was buying for, at the time, that they were wild to give any such price for the property, that it was not worth half of it, that the inside lots were really worth about $400, and the corner lots about $450. Plaintiff also called another witness, one Evans, who testified that he was in the real-estate business in Pasadena in 1887, and knew the lots, and that he considered them worth in March, 1887, $400 to $500 per lot. The above was all the testimony introduced by the plaintiff as to the value of the lots. The defendant called two witnesses, Wilson and Phillips, to show the value of the McGee lots. Wilson testified that he was in the real-estate business at Pasadena, and knew the lots, and that they were worth in March, 1887, about $400 to $500 each; and Phillips testified that he owned adjoining land, and that in March, 1887, the inside lots were worth $300, and the corner lots $450. The respondent claims that the price at which Scott agreed to take the lots is controlling as to their value, but, in view of the other testimony upon the subject, we do not think this can be so. It is true that the price at which a thing is sold may be shown as tending to prove its value, but property is sometimes sold for more and sometimes for less than its market value, and it is the market value—that is, the price at which an equivalent thing might be bought—that is controlling in a case like this. Civil Code, § 3354. The plaintiff wanted the lots to build a residence on for himself, and the evidence shows that he could have purchased as good, if not better, lots for that purpose, in the immediate vicinity, for much less than Scott agreed to pay. As to the value of the lots in the Banta tract, on Fair Oaks avenue, which the plaintiff was to take under the second contract, the decided preponderance of the evidence was that they were in March, 1887, worth much more than the McGee lots. The plaintiff himself testified that he sold some lots on that avenue in July, 1887, for $800 each, and one for $1,000. Under the showing made, the verdict seems to have been clearly contrary to the instructions of the court, and should have been set aside for that reason.

2. By the first contract the plaintiff agreed to convey to the defendant, in exchange for the McGee lots, certain real property in California, "and lot No. 52 of building lots in Malden, Mass., bought of E. L. Converse, size of lot 6,440 square feet, viz., 57½ by 115 deep." Plaintiff offered in evidence two deeds of the Malden lot, one to his wife, and the other executed by himself and wife to the defendant, and he proved that he tendered the last-named deed to the defendant under the contract, and the latter refused to receive it. Both the deeds described the lot as bounded on one side on Converse avenue, and then stated that "said lot is sold subject to the following restrictions, to-wit: That no building shall ever be erected within 20 feet of said Converse avenue, and no building shall ever be erected or used as a livery stable, slaughter-house, currier-shop, soap factory, or for any offensive or nauseous purpose or use, on any part of said lot and premises." The contract required the plaintiff to convey the lot, and was silent as to any restrictions or limitations in regard to its use. The defendant had a right to a clear deed conveying an unincumbered and unrestricted title. The deed offered to defendant evidently did not convey such title, and therefore did not meet the requirements of the contract. It does not appear what objections to the deed were made when it was tendered, the only evidence being that on the part of the plaintiff, that defendant refused to accept it. But the burden was upon the plaintiff to show that he had complied with his contract, and this could only be done by proof that he had tendered a proper deed, or of other facts from which it could be seen that defendant waived the objection now urged.

3. One of the grounds on which the defendant asked for a new trial was that more than one of the jurors trying the cause were induced to assent to the verdict by a resort to the determination of chance. At the hearing of the motion the defendant was permitted to read the affidavits of two of the jurors, one of whom was the foreman of the jury. The affidavits stated that after the jury retired to the jury-room a foreman was elected, and "a ballot was then taken to see how the jury stood, which resulted in four for the defendant and eight for the plaintiff. It was then proposed by a member of the jury that another ballot be taken, and for each juror to write on this ballot the amount he was in favor of giving the plaintiff as damages; but before that motion was put to the vote of the jury it was moved to amend that resolution (motion) as follows: That the amounts voted on the ballots be added together, and the aggregate be divided by twelve, and that the result be the verdict of the jury. This motion, as amended, was voted on, and carried by a majority of the jury. The jury took the vote as described by the motion, each voting a ballot with the amount written thereon that he was in favor of giving the plaintiff. Some voted for the defendant, one voted $1, others, various amounts, and one voted $10,000. The amounts voted were all added together, and divided by twelve, which made $2,600. One member of the jury then moved that $100 be knocked off, making the amount $2,500, which was carried by a majority of the jury, and they then returned that amount to the court as their verdict." There were no counter-affidavits, and we may assume, therefore, that the affidavits read stated the facts correctly. Under these facts, the verdict was undoubtedly vicious, and ought to be set aside. The method of finding it and the result were determined by a majority of the jurors, and it does not appear that three-fourths of them ever assented to it. Moreover, the complaint asked damages only in the sum of $3,500, and it appears that one of the jurors put down $10,000, and that sum was used to increase the average. The only question is, can the affidavits of jurors be used to impeach such a verdict? It seems to be settled law in this state that a verdict found as this one is shown to have been, is not reached "by a resort to the determination of chance," and hence that the affidavits of jurors cannot be received to show the facts. See Turner v. Tuolumne Co. W. Co., 25 Cal. 398; Boyce v. Stage Co., 25 Cal. 475; Hunt v. Elliott, 77 Cal. 588, 20 Pac. Rep. 132. These cases we consider controlling, and the contention of appellant on this point cannot, therefore, be sustained. We advise that the order appealed from be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CITY OF SAN LUIS OBISPO et al. v. HASKIN, City Treasurer. (No. 14,755.)

MUNICIPAL BONDS—ELECTION NOTICE.

Act Cal. March 19, 1889, relative to the issuance of bonds for municipal improvements, provides (section 3) that the board of trustees shall give notice of proposed improvements to the electors, stating "the number and character of the bonds to be issued, the rate of interest to be paid, and the amount of levy to be made for the payment thereof." Held, that where the board passed and published ordinances determining that it was necessary to make certain municipal improvements, estimating the exact cost of each, and providing that each should be voted on separately, a notice of a special election, which specified the number and amount of bonds to be issued for each purpose, and the rate of interest, and stated that one-twentieth should be payable each year till all was paid, and that the tax levy for each year would be one-twentieth of the amount that might be voted, was sufficiently definite. People v. Baker, (Cal.) 23 Pac. Rep. 364, distinguished.

In bank.

Original petition for writ of mandate by the city of San Luis Obispo and another against Haskin, city treasurer, to compel the issuance of bonds for municipal improvements. Granted.

Wm. Shipsey, for petitioners.

PATERSON, J. It is admitted that the plaintiffs are entitled to the writ prayed for, if the notice required by section 3 of the act of March 19, 1889, and published by order of the board of trustees, sufficiently states the amount of tax levy which is to be made for the payment of the bonds and interest for each year during the existence of the debt. The act provides that the notice shall state "the number and character of the bonds to be issued, the rate of interest to be paid, and the amount of tax levy to be made for the payment thereof." Amend. Codes 1889, p. 400. The board passed and published ordinances determining that it was necessary to make certain municipal improvements, and estimated therein the cost thereof as follows: Bridges, $14,628.50; grading, filling, etc., of Higuera street, $16,929.73; widening Chorro street, $2,500; Pacific street, $1,500; sewers, $9,431.77; total, $45,000; and calling a special election submitting to the qualified voters of the city the question of incurring an indebtedness, and bonding the city for said improvements. The latter ordinance provided that each proposition above stated should be voted on separately. Thereafter a notice was published calling a special election to determine whether an indebtedness should be incurred in the amounts and for the purposes above set forth. The notice specified that the number of bonds to be issued was as follows: For said bridges, 20 bonds, of $731.43 each; for improving Higuera street, 20 bonds, of $847 each; improving Chorro street, 20 bonds, of $125 each; improving Pacific street, 20 bonds, of $75 each; for sewers, 20 bonds, of $471.60. It was further stated in the notice that the bonds should be payable as follows: "One-twentieth part of the whole amount of indebtedness shall be paid each year till all is paid, payable on a day and place to be hereafter fixed by the city council, together with interest on all sums unpaid at such date. The rate of interest to be paid on said debt will be five per cent. per annum; and the amount of the tax levy for payment of such bonds and interest for each year during the existence of said debt will be one-twentieth of the amount that may be voted and created as above specified, and sufficient to pay the yearly interest as above set forth." This notice was as definite as it could be made under the circumstances. The trustees could not determine with certainty the amount of tax levy necessary to be made for the payment of the indebtedness until the result of the election on the five separate propositions submitted to the voters was known. The best it could do was to fix the proportion of the indebtedness which should be paid each year. The notice gave to each voter all the information which could be reasonably required under the circumstances. It gave him sufficient data upon which to calculate with certainty the amount of tax levy which would be required each year to pay the indebtedness which he proposed by his vote to incur. The case of People v. Baker, 83 Cal. 149, 23 Pac. Rep. 1112, does not support the defendant's contention. In that case it appears that the proposed improvements consisted of bridges, highways, a jail, a poor-house, and a hospital, but the notice failed to specify how much money the supervisors proposed to devote to each improvement. The bonds were held to be invalid for this reason. It is ordered that the writ issue as prayed for.

PEOPLE V. SCOTT. (No. 20,842.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 29, 1891.)

APPEAL IN CRIMINAL CASES—EXCLUDING EXCEPTIONS FROM RECORD—HARMLESS ERROR.

On a trial for assault with intent to murder, the trial court excluded a question put to the person assaulted, "Did you ever threaten this man's life?" and an exception was taken, but afterwards the court allowed the question, and in preparing the bill of exceptions excluded the exception. Held, that defendant's application to the supreme court for leave to prove the exception would be denied, since, though the first ruling and the exception should have been inserted, no real injustice was done to defendant.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Napa county; E. D. HAM, Judge.

This is an application to the supreme court by J. W. Scott, who was convicted of assault with intent to murder, for leave to prove certain exceptions. Dismissed.

Chas. S. Harker, for appellant. Henry C. Gesford, for the People.

McFARLAND, J. This is an application by appellant to this court for leave to prove certain exceptions alleged to have been taken by him at the trial, and which, it is alleged, the judge of the trial court refused to allow in the bill of exceptions settled by him. The alleged crime for which petitioner was tried was an assault with intent to commit murder upon the person of one Vaughn; and it is averred in the petition, first, that upon cross-examination petitioner's counsel asked Vaughn this question, "Did you ever threaten this man's life?" that counsel for the people objected to the question; that the objection was sustained, and that petitioner excepted to the ruling; and that the court refused to put said exception into the bill, but, on the contrary, settled said bill so as to show that said objection was overruled. It appears, however, by the answer of the judge and the admissions of the parties on the argument of this petition, that the facts about the matter were these: The judge did first sustain said objection, but soon afterwards, becoming satisfied that his ruling was wrong, he reversed it, and allowed the question, and others of a substantially similar character, to be asked. The presiding judge would no doubt have been more strictly accurate if he had complied with petitioner's motion, and have put into the bill, first his ruling sustaining the objection, and then his subsequent ruling denying it, (and he would have saved thereby a good deal of trouble;) but, conceding everything petitioner contends for, no real injustice was done to him, and the matter is not of sufficient importance to require further action in the premises. As to the other matters set forth in the petition, it is not averred that the court refused to allow the exceptions mentioned. It merely appears that there are slight differences between the presiding judge and petitioner as to the precise circumstances under which the exceptions were taken, which do not seem to us to be material. The prayer of the petition is denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

CAVANAUGH v. JACKSON. (No. 14,256.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1891.)

BOUNDARIES — ESTABLISHMENT BY AGREEMENT —
RATIFICATION.

1. The fact that a purchaser of land, holding and claiming ownership thereof, has not yet paid the consideration therefor, does not invalidate a parol agreement made by him with an adjoining land-owner fixing the boundaries between their land.

2. Where fences were erected by the parties on the dividing line thus determined, and the adjoining land-owner paid taxes on all the land occupied by him, the acquiescence of said purchaser in the boundaries for six years, and his failure to claim title to any of the land held by his neighbor, constitute a ratification of the agreement sufficient to take it out of the statute of frauds.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; EDWIN SHEARER, Judge.

Action by Cavanaugh against Jackson. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

John V. Brown and Jas. F. Farraher, for appellant. H. B. Gillis and H. B. Warren, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The record shows that in December, 1880, and long prior thereto, the plaintiff was in possession of the Coats place, which he now owns, and the defendant, Jackson, was in possession of an adjoining ranch, known as the "Beaughan Place." A dispute having arisen as to the boundary line between the two ranches, a surveyor was employed by plaintiff and defendant to make a survey, and establish the true line. Such survey was made in December, 1880. The plaintiff testified as follows: "Jackson had this land fenced up for a long time prior to the 1st day of September, 1886,—may be four or five years before that date,—along with other lands of his. * * * Jackson and I established a line of fence between the Coats place, which I now own, and the Beaughan place, now owned by Jackson. We had the land surveyed from the center of section 28, west to the road. We established the line on the quarter section line, and when we established the line Jackson moved his fence out to the road, and enclosed this strip in controversy. That strip is narrower at the west end than at the east end. I bought the Coats place from Mr. Orr, but the deed did not include this strip, and Mr. Warren discovered that I had no deed, and that I must have a deed. I have exercised no acts of ownership over this strip of land. * * * I had A. M. Jones survey this tract in about 1872. That strip is one hundred yards wider at the east end than at the west end. Dan Sullivan assisted Davidson in making the last survey. * * * Jackson and I put up our fences on the line as determined by Mr. Davidson. I did not object to Mr. Jackson putting up fence on line from center of section 28 west to the road, and inclosing this tract in dispute. He fenced it right after the survey made by Mr. Davidson. That line never was inclosed, except a small portion thereof inclosed by appellant, until Mr. Jackson fenced it after the Davidson survey. We built the fences on the lines agreed on. We ran one line west from center of section 28 to the road, and on this line Mr. Jackson was to build his fence, and I was to build as much on the north and south line as he was to build on the east and west line,—we were to and did build equal portions of said fence. Jackson moved out his fence, and inclosed this strip of land. * * * I never asked Mr. Jackson for the land, nor to be let into possession of it." The defendant testified that he had occupied and used the land exclusively since 1880, and paid taxes on it ever since 1878, when he paid his proportion for the Whitmire patent for the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 28; that he took all the wood he needed off the land in controversy since the establishment of the boundary line, and had prohibited others from cutting wood there for eight or ten years past. The assessment rolls offered in evidence showed that the land in controversy had been assessed to defendant every year from 1878 to 1887, and that defendant had regularly paid said taxes. The defendant testified that in 1872 a survey was made by one Jones on behalf of Mr. Wholey, Mr. Cavanaugh, and himself, the object being to determine how much Mr. Wholey and defendant were each to pay for the patent for the land granted by the state to Whitmire. In rebuttal, the plaintiff proved by the records of the assessor and tax collector that he had had the lands in controversy assessed to him for the years 1885 and 1887, and had paid the tax for the year 1885.

We think that on this evidence the defendant was entitled to judgment. The parties entered into an express agreement fixing the dividing line between their lands; fences were built upon the line so established; and the parties have ever since acquiesced therein. It is well settled that where the owners of contiguous lots by parol agreement mutually establish a dividing line, and thereafter use and occupy their respective tracts according to it for any period of time, such agreement is not within the statute of frauds, and it cannot afterwards be controverted by the parties or their successors in interest. White v. Spreckels, 75 Cal. 610, 17 Pac. Rep. 715; Helm v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 485, 18 Pac. Rep. 604; Blair v. Smith, 16 Mo. 273; Orr v. Hadley, 36 N. H. 575; Lavery v. Moore, 32 Barb. 347; Houston v. Sued, 15 Tex. 307. It is the policy of the law to give stability to such an agreement, because it is the most satisfactory way of determining the true boundary, and tends to prevent litigation. Houston v. Matthews, 1 Yerg. 118; Fisher v. Bennehoff, 121 Ill. 435, 13 N. E. Rep. 150.

It is claimed by respondent that, as the payment was made several years prior to the time when he received his deed from Coats for the land in controversy, it is not binding upon him, but the evidence shows that the plaintiff was in possession of the Coats place, and claiming to be the owner up to the line established. The evident meaning of his testimony is that he had paid for the land, but had failed to secure the legal title thereto. It has been held that such an agreement, made by an occupant of public land, was binding upon him after he acquired legal title from the government. Jordan v. Deaton, 23 Ark. 704. See, also, Orr v. Hadley, supra; Silverer v. Hansen, 77 Cal. 586, 20 Pac. Rep. 136. In many states it is held that, in the absence of any express agreement, where the boundary line has been recognized, and parties have used and occupied according to it for a considerable period, although less than the period which would be a bar under the statute of limitations, they and all claiming under them will be estopped from afterwards claiming a different boundary. Blair v. Smith, supra; Smith v. Hamilton, 20 Mich. 438.

The agreement establishing a dividing line between the plaintiff and the defendant was made in 1881. Coats conveyed to Cavanaugh, April 30, 1884. From the time the agreement was made until the commencement of this action on April 15, 1887, plaintiff never exercised any acts of ownership over the land in controversy. This long-continued acquiescence by the plaintiff in the line previously established we think is a ratification of the agreement made in 1881. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HARRISON, J; GAROUTTE, J.

A rule of the trial court provides "that on any Monday either party may on motion have, without notice, any case set down for trial, * * * and for such purpose the opposite party is deemed to have received notice that such action would be taken." Held, where a case was on the 4th day of the month set for trial on the 13th, and defendant's attorney received notice of such action on the 7th, a new trial will not be granted on the ground that defendant's attorney did not have sufficient notice that the case had been set for trial.

2. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 634, provides that "findings of fact may be waived by the several parties to an issue of fact (1) by failing to appear at the trial," etc. Held, where defendant, by attorney, appeared specially, to move for a continuance of the case, and, on the motion being denied, withdrew from the trial, defendant thereby waived the findings of fact.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1029, which provides that when for any reason a postponement of a trial is asked the court may, in its discretion, make the payment of costs occasioned by such continuance a condition of granting the same, where defendant refused to pay the costs the denial of the motion for a continuance is not error.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Action to quiet title by David Eltzroth against Patrick Ryan and J. H. Wythe. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Welles Whitmore and David Stoddart, for appellants. Lamberson & Taylor, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action against Patrick Ryan and J. H. Wythe to quiet his title to a quarter section of land in Tulare county. The defendants answered separately. The case as against Wythe was tried, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff. From that judgment and an order refusing a new trial an appeal was taken to this court, where the judgment and order were affirmed. 89 Cal. 135, 26 Pac. Rep. 647. The case as against Ryan was, on the 4th day of March, 1889, set down for trial on the 13th day of that month. Ryan resided at Portland, Or., and his attorney at Oakland, in this state. The attorney received notice on the 7th of the month that the case had been set for trial on the 13th, and immediately telegraphed his client to that effect. The defendant started for Oakland, and arrived there on the 10th, which was Sunday. On the next day he saw his attorney, and then for the first time learned that he was too sick to attend the trial at the time set for it. He advised with his attorney as to the best course to pursue, and attempted to procure other counsel in Oakland to go with him to Visalia, and try the case, but was unable to do so. The attorney and his attending physician then made affidavits showing the attorney's sickness and inability to be present at the trial, and that there was not sufficient time to engage other counsel to conduct it, and also that the attorney was familiar with all the facts of the case, and believed that his client had a meritorious defense. These affidavits were given to defendant, and he then started for Visalia, where he arrived on the 12th. Immediately on his arrival he consulted E. O. Larkins, an attorney at law residing there, and engaged him to appear in court the next day and move for a continuance. When the case was called on the 13th Larkins appeared and moved for a continuance on the affidavits which defendant had brought from Oakland. The court asked the attorney if his client was prepared to pay the costs of the continuance, and he answered that he was not. The court then denied the motion, and Larkins withdrew from the case. The trial was thereupon commenced, and, after the introduction of oral and documentary evidence by the plaintiff, the cause was submitted, and judgment rendered in his favor, but no findings were filed. The defendant moved for a new trial upon a bill of exceptions and upon new affidavits, made by himself and his attorney, setting up, among other things, that after defendant arrived in Visalia he had not sufficient time to procure the attendance of his witnesses or familiarize Larkins or any attorney with the facts of the case. The court denied the motion, and the defendant appeals from the judgment and order. All the points urged for a reversal of the judgment except three were decided against appellant's contention on Wythe's appeal. The three remaining points are: First, that defendant's attorney had no sufficient notice that the case had been set for trial; second, that the court erred in not making and filing findings of fact and its conclusions of law therefrom; and, third, that the court erred in not granting defendant's motion for a continuance.

1. It is claimed that the attorney for defendant was notified that the case had been set out for trial by a letter written by the attorney for plaintiff, and sent by rail from Visalia to Oakland; that, the distance between the two places being 260 miles, he was entitled, under section 1013 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to 21 days' notice, commencing with the time the letter was deposited in the post-office at Visalia, before a legal trial could be had; and that, no such notice having been given, defendant was deprived of a statutory right, and thereby prevented from having a fair trial. We do not think this position can be maintained. It does not appear from the record how or by whom the attorney was notified that the case had been set. He only states in his affidavit that he received the notice on or about March 7, 1889. But, however the notice may have been given, the section of the Code cited has nothing to do with it. No notice of the setting of a case for trial is required by statute. One having a lawsuit pending must, by himself or his attorney, whether they reside in the county where the case is or elsewhere, watch its progress, and he can only be heard to complain that a proceeding is taken against him in his absence when it is taken through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Section 473, Code Civil Proc. Ordinarily the time when demurrers and motions may be heard and cases set down for trial is regulated by rules of court; and in the court below there seems to have been a rule reading as follows: "It is by the court ordered that on any Monday either party may on motion have, without notice, any case set down for trial, and dispose of any motion on file to settle the pleadings and dispose of a demurrer which has been on file three days previous to such Mondays; and for any of such purposes the opposite party is deemed to have received notice that such action would be taken."

2. It is contended that findings were not waived, and that, as no findings were filed, the judgment should be reversed; but we think the record conclusively shows that findings were waived. The Code (section 634, Code Civil Proc.) provides: "Findings of fact may be waived by the several parties to an issue of fact (1) by failing to appear at the trial." It appears that Larkins appeared only for the special purpose of moving for a short postponement of the trial, and that, when his motion was denied, he withdrew from the case. And the judgment recites that the cause came on regularly for trial, the plaintiff appearing by his attorney, "and the said defendant, Patrick Ryan, not appearing either in person or by attorney, and thereby waiving findings in said cause." The judgment cannot, therefore, be reversed on this ground.

3. Every attorney is supposed to examine the facts and study up the law of a case before he enters upon the trial of it. And where, as here, an attorney suddenly becomes sick, and is thereby prevented from being present at the time set for trial, a postponement should undoubtedly be granted for such time, at least, as will enable the litigant to procure another attorney, and have him become familiar with the facts and law which he is expected to present. But under our Code, whenever a postponement of a trial is asked on any ground, the court is authorized, in its discretion, to make the payment of costs occasioned by the postponement a condition of granting the same. Section 1029, Code Civil Proc. This condition was imposed by the court below, and not accepted by the defendant. Under these circumstances, we cannot say that the refusal to grant the postponement was a reversible error. It follows, in our opinion, that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

Ex parte TUTTLE. (No. 20,835.)

VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE—POOL-SELLING.

Under Const. Cal. art. 11, §§ 7, 11, authorizing the city and county of San Francisco to make and enforce within its limits such police regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, an ordinance prohibiting the sale of pools, etc., on horse races, "except within the inclosure of a race track where such trial or contest is to take place," is valid, since, though its incidental effect may be to confer special privileges on the owners of race tracks, its purpose is to restrain gambling of the character mentioned, which is a proper subject of police regulation.

In bank. Petition for writ of habeas corpus on behalf of ——— Tuttle to the chief of police of San Francisco. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

W. W. Foote, George A. Knight, and Garret W. McEnerney, for petitioner. Davis Louderback, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The return to the writ issued herein shows that the petitioner was at the date of its service in the custody of the chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco, under arrest upon a charge of violating an ordinance of that city, which prohibits selling pools on horse-races, or holding money or other thing as a stake upon any wager as to the result of such race, "except within the inclosure of a race track where such trial or contest is to take place." The preamble to this ordinance, which gives the reason for its enactment, is as follows: "Whereas, it has become apparent that the practice of gambling on horse-races has become alarmingly prevalent, and is the cause of debauching many of our boys and young men, rendering them unfit for the honorable occupations of life; and whereas, this discreditable occupation, with all its vicious results, is allowed in all its alluring features to occupy places in the business portion of our city, enticing our youths into habits which ultimately effect their ruin and degradation; and whereas, it is asserted that there is no legislation prohibitory of this nefarious and demoralizing pursuit being conducted and carried on, the present legislature having failed to pass any of the bills introduced for that purpose: Now, therefore, the people of the city and county of San Francisco do ordain," etc. It is claimed by the petitioner that the ordinance is void, for the reason that it in effect gives to the proprietor of the race-course the right to determine who shall enjoy the privilege of indulging in this species of betting, as he has the power to admit and exclude whom he pleases, and only those admitted to the track are permitted to wager upon the result of the race; and, further, that a monopoly is created in favor of such proprietor, as those who desire to engage in the business of pool-selling will necessarily be compelled to pay him for the privilege. We do not think these objections have sufficient force to render the ordinance invalid. Under sections 7 and 11 of article 11 of the constitution of this state the city and county of San Francisco is authorized to make and enforce within its limits such police regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, and the ordinance in question is clearly a police regulation. Any practice or business, the tendency of which, as shown by experience, is to weaken or corrupt the morals of those who follow it, or to encourage idleness instead of habits of industry, is a legitimate subject for regulation or prohibition by the state; and that gambling, in the various modes in which it is practiced, is thus demoralizing in its tendencies, and therefore an evil which the law may rightfully suppress without interfering with any of those inherent rights of citizenship which it is the object of government to protect and secure, is no longer an open question. The measures needful or appropriate to be taken in the exercise of this police power are determined by legislative policy, and for this purpose a wide discretion is committed to the law-making body. Whether it shall entirely prohibit, or only regulate by confining such practices within prescribed limits; whether the law shall apply to every kind of gambling, or only to those games or wagers in which evil effects appear with greatest prominence,—must be determined primarily by the legislative department of the state or of the municipality authorized to exercise this great power, which is conferred for the purpose of securing the public safety and welfare; and unless it clearly appears that a statute or ordinance ostensibly enacted for this purpose has no real or substantial relation to these objects, and that the fundamental rights of the citizen are assailed under the guise of a police regulation, the action of that department is conclusive. Mugler v. State, 123 U. S. 661, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; In re Jacobs, 98 N. Y. 98; Watertown v. Mayo, 109 Mass. 315; Ex parte Keating, 38 Cal. 702. It is manifest, we think, under this rule, that the ordinance in question cannot be declared invalid. Whatever may be its incidental effect, it is apparent that it is not the object or purpose of the ordinance to confer any special privilege or benefit upon those who own or control race-courses, by giving them the exclusive right to carry on the business, or of selling to others the privilege of pool-selling on horse-races, and therefore we need not stop to consider whether a law or ordinance having only such an effect, or plainly intended to accomplish such an object under the mere pretense of establishing a police regulation, could be upheld. As already stated, a large discretion is vested in the legislative branch of the municipal government, in dealing with questions of this character, in determining not only what games or wagers should be made the subject of legislation, but, if permitted at all, under what regulations they should be allowed to exist. It seems to have been the judgment of that department that the existing evils consequent upon selling pools on horse-races, as declared in the preamble to the ordinance under review, would be sufficiently restrained by confining the business to the inclosure where the race is to be run, and, as the object sought to be accomplished is lawful, and the mode of regulation not clearly inappropriate to effect it, the ordinance is valid. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

BANBURY v. ARNOLD. (No. 14,163.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 5, 1891.)

WAIVER OF ERROR—CONTRACTS BY MARRIED WOMEN—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

1. The fact that appellant's demurrer to the complaint was overruled by consent does not preclude him from attacking its sufficiency in the appellate court.

2. Under Civil Code Cal. § 1093, providing that no estate in the land of a married woman shall pass except by a grant or instrument acknowledged by her, and section 1187, providing that a conveyance by a married woman has no validity until acknowledged, an unacknowledged contract by a married woman for the sale of her land is void, and cannot be enforced by her, and is not one which she can avoid or not, at her option.

3. The vendor's failure to demand the purchase money, and tender a deed, upon the vendee's default of payment, under a contract for the sale of land, does not estop the vendor from enforcing the contract, although time is of the essence thereof. Wilcoxson v. Stitt, 65 Cal. 596, 4 Pac. Rep. 629, and Smith v. Mohn, 87 Cal. 489, 25 Pac. Rep. 696, followed.

4. The certificate of acknowledgment of a notary public to a conveyance by a married woman is not a part thereof, under Civil Code Cal. § 1188, making the indorsement on the instrument, or attaching thereto a certificate of acknowledgment, a purely ministerial duty, and sections 1093 and 1187, providing that her conveyance, when executed and acknowledged, has the same effect as the deed of an unmarried woman, and is sufficient to pass her estate; and the fact that a married woman's contract for the sale of land, as set out in her complaint, in an action for its enforcement, contains no certificate of acknowledgment, does not make it appear to have been unacknowledged, and control allegations that she "entered into a contract with the defendant," etc., whereby she "agreed to sell to the defendant," etc., and "the said defendant agreed to purchase," etc.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Catherine Banbury against Delos Arnold to enforce a contract for the sale of land. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals.

Metcalfe & McLachlan and Delos Arnold, for appellant. H. C. Carr, W. S. Wright, and John Haynes, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This action is brought by respondent, who was the vendor in a contract for the sale of certain real estate, to enforce specific performance of the contract on the part of the appellant, who was the vendee. There is an appeal by defendant from the judgment. A copy of the contract is attached to the complaint, and made part of it. The contract shows that the plaintiff was a married woman and the wife of T. Banbury at the time she entered into it. There is no certificate of acknowledgment attached thereto, and no express allegation in the complaint that it was acknowledged. For grounds of reversal appellant insists that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The fact that appellant's demurrer was overruled by consent does not preclude him from attacking the judgment in this court upon the ground that it rests upon a complaint inherently defective, and it is upon the sufficiency of that complaint that the merits of this appeal must be determined. Section 1093 of the Civil Code provides: "No estate in the real property of a married woman passes by any grant purporting to be executed or acknowledged by her, unless the grant or instrument is acknowledged by her in the manner prescribed by sections 1186 and 1191." Section 1187 of the Civil Code provides that a conveyance by a married woman has no validity until acknowledged according to the requirements of section 1186. In the case of Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 521, 23 Pac. Rep. 695, it was held under these provisions of the Code that specific performance of an unacknowledged executory contract of a married woman to convey her separate real property could not be compelled. In the case at bar, assuming that this contract was not acknowledged, we have a married woman attempting to enforce against the vendee her unacknowledged executory contract for the sale of real estate. As we have seen, the vendee could not have enforced the contract against her, and there is no principle of equity that gives, or should give, her rights under the contract not accorded to the defendant vendee. This principle is clearly declared in Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 412; and in Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 466, the court said: "There is no exception to the rule, at least none now occurs to us, that the contract, though signed by both parties, will not be specifically executed at the instance of one party, unless performance on his part could also be compelled. The proposition that specific performance of the contract would not be decreed when the party asking its enforcement could not be compelled to perform it was decisive of the case, (referring to Cooper v. Pena,) and upon it the case was in fact decided; and, in our opinion, the decision is sustained by the overwhelming weight of the authorities." Appellant concedes the rule, but insists that this cause is an exception thereto, and similar in principle to those cases which hold that a minor may enforce his contract after arriving at majority, or that a beneficiary may enforce a contract against his trustee although the trustee had no enforceable rights against him. The principles there involved are not analogous. Such contracts for just and proper reasons are made voidable at the option of the infant or beneficiary; but in this state a married woman, in dealing with her separate property, stands upon no such plane, and is hampered in her transactions relating to her property in no such manner. The contract in this case is not one, and certainly should not be construed as one, voidable at plaintiff's option. The consideration actuating the vendee in entering into the contract was her agreement to convey the land to him. Her acknowledgment of the contract was an essential part of the execution of it, (Joseph v. Dougherty, 60 Cal. 360,) and, not being acknowledged, it was not executed; and, the consideration actuating the vendee having totally failed, the contract was absolutely void, and became nudum pactum for all purposes.

Appellant contends that time was of the essence of the contract, and that plaintiff did not tender a deed and demand the purchase price until some months subsequent to the date fixed by the contract for final payment, and that, therefore, it will not support the action. While the authorities in this state are not as explicit and uniform upon this question as they should be, yet the true rule is laid down in Wilcoxson v. Stitt, 65 Cal. 596, 4 Pac. Rep. 629, and Smith v. Mohn, 87 Cal. 489, 25 Pac. Rep. 696, and as there found is opposed to appellant's contention in this regard. Respondent insists that it does not appear from the record that the contract was not acknowledged, and, consequently, the judgment must be affirmed. The allegation of the complaint in this regard is: "On the 6th day of May, 1887, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant, whereby the plaintiff agreed to sell to the defendant," etc., "and the said defendant agreed to purchase," etc. In Kays v. Phelan, 19 Cal. 128, in construing a similar allegation of a complaint, the court said: "Upon the allegation of the complaint, the deed must be presumed to have been such as passed the estate of the plaintiff in the premises." Appellant concedes this principle of law, but says that a copy of the contract is made part of the complaint, and controls the allegations thereof as to its contents, and it appears therefrom that the certificate of acknowledgment was not attached, and that, therefore, it affirmatively appears that the contract was not acknowledged. The proper solution of this question depends upon the fact as to whether or not the certificate of acknowledgment of a notary public to a conveyance of a married woman is a part of the conveyance. If the certificate of acknowledgment is no part of the conveyance, then the absence of such certificate upon the copy of the contract attached to the complaint would in no way affirmatively indicate that the contract was not executed and acknowledged according to law, and the allegation of the complaint heretofore quoted would be quite sufficient to show such to be the fact. Prior to the adoption of the Codes, under a line of authorities cited in Leonis v. Lazzarovich, 55 Cal. 52, it would appear that the certificate of acknowledgment of a married woman was an essential part of the execution of her deed, and even in that case, though not necessary to its determination, there is found language supporting such views. In Wedel v. Herman, 59 Cal. 511, this very question was under discussion; and, while the case may not be deemed authority by reason of the remaining justices of the department simply concurring in the judgment, yet the views there expressed by Justice McKee seem to indicate the true rule. He said: "But execution, acknowledgment, and certification of acknowledgment were no longer necessary to the validity of her conveyance. It was sufficient to pass her estate if she executed and acknowledged a conveyance thereof according to the requirements of the Code. Section 1093, Civil Code. When thus executed and acknowledged, her conveyance had the same legal effect as the deed of a feme sole. Section 1187, Id. Therefore the certificate of acknowledgment is not an essential part of her conveyance. That, under the Code, is regarded simply as record proof of the fact of acknowledgment. When acknowledgment has been made according to law, before an officer qualified by law to take it, the party making it has done all that the law requires to make the instrument her act and deed. Her deed thus executed and acknowledged may be valid, though defectively certified. The embodiment of the fact of acknowledgment in the form of the certificate prescribed by law devolves upon the officer who has taken the proof of it, and not upon the party making it." Under section 1188 of the Civil Code, the duty of the officer in indorsing upon the instrument or attaching thereto a certificate of acknowledgment in the form required by law is purely ministerial, and it is impossible to comprehend how the ministerial act of such officer can be construed to form a part of the execution of an instrument by a married woman conveying realty. In Joseph v. Dougherty, 60 Cal. 360, it was held that when an instrument was signed and acknowledged by a married woman it was executed; and in Hutchinson v. Ainsworth, 73 Cal. 458, 15 Pac. Rep. 82, the court clearly indicates that the notary's certificate is no part of the conveyance, where it is said: "The conveyance, then, having been properly executed and acknowledged, (though not properly certified,) was valid as between the parties to it and all the world, except subsequent bona fide purchasers," etc. We therefore conclude that the record before us does not show that the contract involved in this case was not acknowledged by the plaintiff. Let the judgment be affirmed.

FITZGERALD v. NEUSTADT. (No. 14,390.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 5, 1891.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—REVIEW OF EVIDENCE—CONTINUANCE—ACTION BY ASSIGNEE OF INSOLVENT.

1. In an action by an assignee to recover goods sold by one G., an insolvent, within 30 days of his insolvency, the complaint alleged "that at the time of the attempted sale, * * * and for a long time prior thereto, the said G. was, and ever since has been, indebted to various persons in large sums of money; and during all said times was, and still is, unable to pay his debts from his own means, as said debts become due, and then was, and still is, an insolvent debtor," etc. Held, that the allegations sufficiently showed G.'s financial condition when the sale was made.

2. As there was a conflict in the evidence as to defendant's knowledge of G.'s financial condition when the goods were purchased, the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed.

3. A trial court may, in its discretion, allow parties to amend their pleadings, and such action will be sustained, unless there is gross abuse of discretion.

4. Insolvent Act Cal. § 18, provides that, "in suits prosecuted by an assignee, a certified copy of the assignment made to him shall be conclusive evidence of his authority to sue." Held immaterial that the bond of the assignee was only signed by the sureties.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Action by J. E. Fitzgerald, assignee, etc., against Sarah Neustadt, to recover goods sold by an insolvent contrary to rights of creditors. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Justin Jacobs, for appellant. Rothschild & Ach and Brown & Daggett, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action of claim and delivery brought by respondent, as assignee in the matter of Joseph Goodman, in insolvency, against appellant, to recover a stock of merchandise of the value of $3,000. Appellant claims title to the goods by virtue of purchase from Goodman made within 30 days next preceding his adjudication in insolvency. This is an appeal from the judgment and order denying her motion for a new trial.

1. The following allegation of the complaint, which was not denied, is sufficient to establish the insolvent's financial condition at the time of the alleged sale to appellant: "That at the time of the attempted sale of his said stock of goods, wares, merchandise, and fixtures above described, as hereinafter stated, and for a long time prior thereto, the said Joseph Goodman was, and ever since then he has been, indebted to various persons in large sums of money; and during all said times was, and still is, unable to pay his debts from his own means as said debts became due, and then was, and still is, an insolvent debtor," etc.

2. There is a substantial conflict in the testimony as to the appellant's knowledge of Goodman's insolvency at the date of the transfer to her, and the finding in that regard will not be disturbed. Neither do we think the court was not justified in concluding from all the evidence that such transfer was made in violation of the provisions of section 55 of the insolvent act of 1880.

3. There was no error in denying the motion for judgment upon the pleadings, and allowing the plaintiff to amend his complaint. Such action of the lower court will always be sustained, unless there is a gross abuse of discretion.

4. Appellant contends that it was error to admit the bond of the assignee in evidence as against her objections, such bond not being signed by the assignee, but by the sureties only. Section 18 of the insolvent act of this state is as follows: "In suits prosecuted by an assignee, a certified copy of an assignment made to him shall be conclusive evidence of his authority to sue." In this case the assignment to the plaintiff from the county clerk was introduced in evidence, and under this provision of law it seems its validity cannot be questioned by a collateral attack. There is no reason why the legislature had not the power to make such a rule of evidence, and such rule has been recognized and applied in many cases. Cone v. Purcell, 56 N. Y. 649; Herndon v. Howard, 9 Wall. 664; Rogers v. Stevenson, 16 Minn. 68, (Gil. 56); Dambmann v. White, 48 Cal. 439; Luhrs v. Kelly, 67 Cal. 291, 7 Pac. Rep. 696. In the case of Luhrs v. Kelly the court said: "The creditors and debtor were alone interested in the amount and sufficiency of the bond." We see no error in the record. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

DAVIS v. BROWNING (No. 14,107.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 5, 1891.)

CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE—SUFFICIENCY OF AFFIDAVIT.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1494, provides that a claim against an estate must be "supported by an affidavit of the claimant, or some one in his behalf, that the amount is justly due; that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited; and that there are no offsets to the same to the knowledge of the affiant," etc. Held, that an affidavit to a claim made by an executrix, in her representative capacity, which states "that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to the same to the knowledge of said claimant," etc., is sufficient.

Action by Sebia Davis, executrix, etc., against Browning, administrator, etc. From a judgment for plaintiff defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John T. Harrington, for appellant. H. M. Albery, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The only question involved in this appeal is the sufficiency of an affidavit to a claim against the estate of the defendant's intestate. Plaintiff's testator, prior to his death, had prepared and properly verified a claim against said estate, but, having died before its presentation, the plaintiff herein, after her appointment as executrix of his last will and testament, added to the claim that had been so prepared and verified by him her own verification, in the following words, viz.: "State of California, county of Colusa—ss.: Sebia Davis, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that she is the executrix of the estate of Howell Davis, deceased, whose foregoing claim is herewith presented to the administrator of the estate of R. S. Browning, deceased; and Sebia Davis, being duly sworn, says that the amount thereof, to-wit, the sum of fifteen hundred and four and forty-seven one-hundredths dollars, is justly due to the said Sebia Davis, as executrix of the estate of Howell Davis, deceased; that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to the same to the knowledge of said claimant; that the reason said affiant makes this affidavit is that said Howell Davis is dead, and she is executrix of said estate of Howell Davis, deceased. SEBIA DAVIS. Subscribed and sworn to before me this 25th day of June, A. D., 1888. S. M. BISHOP, County Clerk. By S. S. RUSSELL, Depy." The claim, so verified, was presented by her to the defendant, and by him rejected. Suit was thereupon brought upon the demand, and at the trial the above-named claim with the foregoing verification was admitted in evidence against the objection of the defendant. This ruling of the court is now presented as error. It is contended by the appellant that the affidavit of the plaintiff "that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to the same to the knowledge of said claimant," is not a sufficient compliance with the statute, (Code Civil Proc. § 1494,) which requires that the claim must be "supported by the affidavit of the claimant, or some one in his behalf, that the amount is justly due; that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to the same to the knowledge of the affiant;" that, inasmuch as it appears from the affidavit that the "claimant" is the estate of Howell Davis, deceased, and as the affidavit is made by the plaintiff, a denial of the existence of any offsets or credits to the knowledge of the "claimant" is insufficient, but that such denial should be according to the knowledge of the "affiant." We think, however, that in this case the "claimant" and the "affiant" are the same person, and that the use of the word "claimant" instead of "affiant" in the clause referred to in the affidavit is immaterial. It is true that the demand is in behalf of the estate which she represents, and that the moneys that may be received by her will not be her individual property; but she is nevertheless the proper individual to make, and the one who has made, the claim, and to whom the money is to be paid. It would be giving too much attention to mere form and shadow to hold that the affidavit made by her is not a substantial as well as a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the statute. Judgment affirmed.

EJECTMENT—TITLE OBTAINED AFTER ANSWER FILED—RES JUDICATA.

Where defendant in ejectment acquires a good title between the time of filing the answer and the judgment, a judgment for plaintiffs does not estop defendant from setting up this after-acquired title in another suit, it not having been set up in the first suit by supplemental answer.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Suit by the People's Savings Bank and others against Wadsworth Hodgdon to quiet title. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

A. C. Freeman and Geo. E. Bates, for appellants. M. L. G. O'Brien, Matt. F. Johnson, and T. G. Hodgdon, for respondent.

ROSS, J. Action to quiet title. It is conceded on both sides that one Gass was the owner in fee of the property in controversy on the 29th day of June, 1855. Being such owner, he, on the 17th day of December, 1858, mortgaged the property to Morse and English, trustees, etc. April 21, 1863, a complaint was filed for the foreclosure of the mortgage, and the proceedings were regularly conducted to judgment, under which the property was duly sold by the sheriff on the 6th of July, 1863, to Morse and English, who received a certificate of purchase, which, in the year 1869, they assigned to Laidley, Hickox, and Dale. After the execution of the mortgage to Morse and English, and on the 22d of November, 1860, Gass conveyed the property by deed to Jane Griffin, who thereupon entered into its possession. In the year 1868 the present defendant Hodgdon commenced an action of ejectment against Jane Griffin and other persons to recover the possession of a block of land, including the land here in question. In that action Jane Griffin, on the 13th of July, 1869, answered, denying that Hodgdon had any right or title to this land, and alleging herself to be the owner in fee thereof. This answer was filed prior to the execution of the sheriff's deed to Laidley, Hickox, and Dale pursuant to the sale made under the decree of foreclosure of the Gass mortgage. The sheriff's deed was, however, executed subsequently in the same year; that, is to say, in the year 1869. In 1870, Laidley, Hickox, and Dale executed to Jane Griffin a deed conveying the said property to her. In 1872 the ejectment suit of Hodgdon v. Griffin et al. was regularly tried upon its merits, and judgment was rendered therein in favor of Hodgdon, and against the said Griffin and others, for the recovery of the land involved therein, including that here in controversy, under which judgment Jane Griffin was dispossessed, and Hodgdon placed in possession. The single question in the present case is whether Jane Griffin and her co-plaintiff, who claims under her, are concluded by the judgment rendered against her in the ejectment suit. When Hodgdon commenced his action of ejectment, and when Jane Griffin filed her answer therein, the legal title to the property in controversy was in Jane Griffin, because of the deed executed to her by Gass. The title was, however, subject to be divested by the culminating step in the foreclosure proceedings, to-wit, by the execution of the sheriff's deed. The title was so divested in the year 1869. When Laidley, Hickox, and Dale received the deed from the sheriff they took the title as of December 17, 1858, the date of the mortgage by virtue of which the foreclosure proceedings were had. McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 412. They thus became vested with the legal title to the property as of a date anterior to the deed from Gass to Jane Griffin, and anterior to the ejectment suit of Hodgdon; and, not being parties to that suit, they were, of course, unaffected by it. They could, therefore, undoubtedly have asserted their title against both Hodgdon and Jane Griffin. In 1870 they conveyed their title to Jane Griffin. It is true that that conveyance was made intermediate the filing of her answer in the ejectment suit and the trial of the action, but the title she got by the conveyance was not the same title she had when the suit was commenced, and when her answer was filed for the title she had at those dates was subject to the mortgage, and therefore subject to be, as it was, divested by the execution of the sheriff's deed in pursuance of the sale made by virtue of the decree of foreclosure. The title she got by the deed from Laidley, Hickox, and Dale conveyed to her the absolute fee of the property as of date December 17, 1858, unaffected by any subsequent conveyance or action. This title Jane Griffin did not hold at the time she joined issue in the action brought against her by Hodgdon, but it was acquired by her intermediate that time and the entry of judgment in that case, and was not set up by supplemental answer. It was therefore not involved in that action, and was therefore unaffected by the judgment therein rendered. Valentine v. Mahoney, 37 Cal. 396; Thompson v. McKay, 41 Cal. 221; Bagley v. Ward, 37 Cal. 121. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE ex rel. STODDARD v. WILLIAMS.¹
(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 22, 1883.)
COUNTIES—CLASSIFICATION BY CENSUS—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

1. The census referred to in Pol. Code Cal. § 4007, providing that "whenever a new census is taken the counties, on the 1st day of July thereafter, are, by operation of law, classified under such census," is the census taken by the United States.

2. A copy of the census returns, or any part thereof, certified to by the superintendent of the census, is admissible in evidence to show the results of the census.

3. The courts will take judicial notice of the results of the census, as shown by the returns.

4. An order of the county board of supervisors consolidating county offices, must, under Pol. Code Cal. §§ 4106, 4107, be published by order of the board, and the publication of the proceedings of the board containing the order, in a newspaper, is insufficient.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county.

Action by the people at the relation of Henry Stoddard against A. B. Williams for usurping the office of recorder of Santa Barbara county. Judgment for relator. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Stratton, for appellant. Jarrett T. Richards and Atty. Gen. Marshall, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. This is an action for alleged usurpation of the office of recorder of Santa Barbara county by defendant Williams. The relator was elected recorder of Santa Barbara county at the election in 1882, and defendant was elected at the same time county clerk of said county. Defendant claims by virtue of his election as county clerk to be ex officio recorder. By section 4006 of the Political Code, the counties of this state, for purposes other than for roads and highways, are classified as follows: (1) Those containing 20,000 inhabitants or over constitute the first class; (2) those containing 8,000 inhabitants and under 20,000 are the second class; and (3) those containing less than 8,000 inhabitants constitute the third class. By section 4007 of same Code, "Whenever a new census is taken, the counties, on the 1st day of July next thereafter, are, by operation of law, classified under such census." Each county must have a board of supervisors, consisting of seven members, in counties of the first class, of five members in those of the second class, and of three in those of the third class. Pol. Code, § 4022. Under the provisions of section 4025 of the Political Code, whenever, under the classification above stated, the number of supervisors of any county is either increased or diminished, the board of supervisors must redistrict the county into supervisors' districts, to correspond with the number of supervisors to which it is, under the new classification, entitled. When the number is increased, at the first general election thereafter supervisors must be elected for such new districts in which no supervisors then acting reside.

The sections of the Code heretofore referred to, as well as those hereinafter referred to, were in force when the events occurred out of which the controversy in this case arose. Prior to the 1st day of July, 1881, the county of Santa Barbara was, by operation of law, a county of the second class; and on the 11th day of August, 1882, the board of supervisors thereof passed an order redistricting the county into supervisors' districts, so as to form five such districts, upon the ground that it had become, by an increase of population, a county of the second class, and thus entitled to have five members in its board of supervisors. In making this order, the board acted upon the census taken in 1880 by the authorities of the United States, under the provisions of the act of congress of March 3, 1879, entitled "An act to provide for taking the tenth and subsequent census." The census (the tenth) was to be taken on or for the date of June 1, 1880. Section 1, 20 St. at Large, p. 473. The enumeration to be made under the act of congress was to commence on the first Monday of June, 1880, and be made by enumerators appointed under the act, and it was required of each enumerator to complete the enumeration of his district, and to prepare the returns required by the act to be made, and to forward the same to the supervisor of his district on or before the 1st day of July, 1880; and, in any city having over 10,000 inhabitants under the census of 1870, the enumeration of population was to be taken within two weeks from the first Monday of June. Section 10 of Act. The returns of the enumerators were to be sent to the supervisors of the census, who were to scrutinize the same to see whether they were taken in compliance with law, and to forward the completed returns to the superintendent of the census at Washington city. Sections 2, 3, 5. By the census it appeared from a certificate of the superintendent of the census, which was offered in evidence on the trial, the population of Santa Barbara county was on the 1st day of June, 1880, 9,513, sufficient to raise it to a second-class county. It is argued that the census referred to in section 4007 of the Political Code above quoted is not the census of the United States. But in this contention the counsel for appellant has gone astray. We think it clear the reference is to such census. The census of the United States is a census of each particular state as well as of all the states. The enumeration taken under the act will show the inhabitants of each political division of the state. Section 11. In ordinary parlance, when we speak of a census of the inhabitants of a state or any of its political divisions, we mean the United States census; for that is the only census in this state which is regularly and periodically taken. The board of supervisors had the authority to act on this census, and it did act by authority when it redistricted the county in August, 1882.

It is contended that the court erred in admitting in evidence the certificate of the superintendent above mentioned. We do not think so. The records of this census were under the care and in the custody of that officer, and on common-law principles, as the record could not be taken from his custody, a copy of such census, or any part of it, could be proved by a copy certified by him. But, if this is not so, the court below and this court can take judicial notice of the results of such census, (section 1875, Code Civil Proc.,) and resort for information to appropriate documents of reference, (section 1875, Id.) That the census was complete when the board of supervisors acted on the 11th of August, 1882, and long before that period, we have no doubt. The most conclusive proof of it is found in the act of congress passed February 25, 1882, by which an apportionment of the representatives in congress among the several states under the tenth census was made. St. U. S. 1881-82, p. 5. Congress would certainly not have legislated, in so important a matter as the apportionment of representatives among the several states, upon an incomplete census. But it is urged that the relator could not have been legally elected recorder in 1882, for there was no such officer, the office of recorder having been in August, 1880, consolidated with that of county clerk, which consolidation the board of supervisors had authority to make, and defendant had been, at the election in 1882, elected county clerk, by which he became ex officio county recorder. Conceding that the board of supervisors had power to consolidate the offices, as contended for, in 1880, still, in order to effect such consolidation, the order passed by the board for such purpose must have been published by order of the board. Sections 4106, 4107, Pol. Code. The publication in a newspaper of the proceedings of the board in which such order appeared was not sufficient. The board made no order for any publication, and therefore the publication above mentioned amounted to nothing, and the consolidation was not effected. Such was the ruling of this court in People v. Bailhache, 52 Cal. 310, and we see no reason to doubt its correctness. Judgment affirmed.

BROWN v. BURBANK *et al.*¹

CANCELLATION OF DEED—FRAUD—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Where plaintiff, a girl of 19, who has resided with her grandparents as their ward since she was 9, conveyed to her grandmother all of her property, on the representations of her grandmother that the property really belonged to her grandfather, and that she (the grandmother) would devise it to plaintiff, the conveyance will be set aside for fraud and undue influence.

Department I. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Suit by Clara L. Brown against P. D. Burbank and others to annul a conveyance on the ground of fraud. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. H. Beatty, for appellant. L. S. Taylor, for respondents.

Ross, J. Action to annul a deed of conveyance. The plaintiff's maiden name was Burbank. Her father, George W. Burbank, who died in August, 1866, when she was but nine years of age, was the son of the defendants. Plaintiff's mother died when she was but three years old. From the time of her father's death until her marriage she resided with her grandparents, the defendants, and was under their care and control. She had no other home, and was treated by them in all respects as their own child, and she regarded them as the only persons to whom she owed filial duty, or from whom she had support and protection. When George W. Burbank died, in August, 1866, he was the owner of a house and lot in the city of Sacramento. The plaintiff was left his sole heir. In October, 1866, the defendant P. D. Burbank obtained letters of administration upon his son's estate, and as such administrator took possession of the house and lot, and, with his wife,—his co-defendant herein,—has ever since occupied a portion of the house as a residence, and received the rents of the remaining portion. In his petition for letters of administration upon his son's estate, in the inventory of the estate filed by him, and in his verified accounts filed in the probate court and confirmed on his petition, P. D. Burbank invariably described the house and lot as the property of the estate of George W. Burbank. He made no claim upon the property, nor pretended that the estate was indebted to him. On the contrary, he charged himself in his accounts with the value of the use of that portion of the premises occupied by him, and with the rents of the remaining portion. On his petition he was allowed the use and rents of the property for the maintenance and education of the plaintiff. The order making this allowance was made in December, 1868, and from that time until May 17, 1877, P. D. Burbank continued to enjoy the same. His administration was never closed. On the day last mentioned the property was worth $5,000, and its annual rental value was $750. It constituted the only property of the plaintiff. She was at that time 19 years and 8 months old, but was still residing with the defendants, and under their care and protection. She had never been informed by them, or either of them, of her rights with respect to the property. Such being the situation and relations of the parties, the defendant Irene H. Burbank represented to the plaintiff that the property never really belonged to her deceased father, but was rightfully and in fact the property of P. D. Burbank, and thereupon requested the plaintiff to convey it to her, promising at the same time to make a will devising it to plaintiff, so that it would be hers after the death of the grandmother. The plaintiff, acting solely upon these representations and in obedience to the will and request of her grandmother, without other information, counsel, or advice, and in ignorance of the real motive of the defendants, executed a deed conveying the property to her grandmother, the defendant Irene. The real motive of the defendants in obtaining the deed the court below found to be this: "The defendants claimed to be the equitable owners of the property, and were afraid that the plaintiff, who was young and giddy-minded, might marry some designing person, who would deprive her and them of the property, and they desired the property conveyed to the defendant Irene, in order to prevent such a misfortune." The court further found that at the time of the execution of the deed the defendant Irene executed a will, by which she devised to the plaintiff all the property of which she might die seised. The facts above stated are established by the findings. They show, as is well said for the appellant, "that the plaintiff, while still an inexperienced girl, still under the care and control of her grandparents, still subject to the influence acquired by them in the double relation of parents and guardians of her person and estate, accustomed to consult their wishes and obey their commands, ignorant of her rights, purposely misled and kept in ignorance by those to whom she naturally looked for the protection of her interests, without the aid of legal advice or time for reflection, made a conveyance of her whole estate without any valuable consideration to one standing in loco parentis." That a deed obtained under such circumstances cannot be permitted to stand is one of the clearest of propositions. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 309, 317, et seq.; Kerr, Fraud & M. pp. 150-153, 177-179; Bigelow, Fraud, pp. 250-253, 263, 264. In view of the testimony of the defendants it is useless to order a new trial. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiff on the findings.

(Supreme Court of California. July 20, 1883.)

APPEAL—CASE INVOLVING TITLE TO REAL ESTATE.

Plaintiff brought in justice's court trespass for entry and cutting timber on his land. On defendant's alleging that he was the owner of the land, the cause was transferred to the superior court by an order permitting the filing of an amended complaint. Plaintiff filed an amended complaint alleging ownership and possession of certain land, and that defendant entered thereon at a certain time and cut timber. No answer was filed, and there was judgment by default. Held that, it not appearing that the trespass alleged in the amended complaint was the same as that alleged in the original complaint, or that the same premises were referred to in the two complaints, an appeal would not lie from an order in the case tried, as being in a case involving title to or possession of real estate.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Amador county.

Trespass by Gilman Gorton against L. Ferdinando. From an order recalling an execution for costs plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

A. C. Brown and John A. Eagon, for appellant. Charles R. Gray, for respondent

SHARPSTEIN, J. The appellant commenced an action in a justice's court against the respondent for the recovery of $100 damages, which appellant alleged he had sustained by reason of the respondent's entering upon appellant's land and cutting timber thereon. The respondent in his answer alleged that he was the owner of the premises upon which appellant alleged that said timber was cut, and thereupon the justice made an order transferring the case to the superior court, which permitted appellant to file an amended complaint, in which it was alleged that he was the owner, in the possession, and entitled to the possession, of certain described land, and that respondent entered upon it at a certain date, and without leave of appellant cut down and converted to his own use 100 trees, of the value of $50, standing on said land, and demanded judgment for $299.25. To this complaint respondent neither demurred nor answered, and judgment by default was entered against him for $299.25. Afterwards the court made an order setting aside said judgment, and remanding the case to the justice's court, on condition that appellant should serve and file his cost bill, and respondent should pay the costs within 20 days. Afterwards the defendant made a motion, which the court denied, to have the condition of the order relating to the payment of the costs stricken out. At some time between the 14th day of December, 1881, and the 27th of December, 1882, the clerk of said court issued an execution for said costs, which on motion of the defendant was recalled by an order of the court made and entered on the 6th day of January, 1883; and from that order this appeal is taken; and the first question to be determined is whether an appeal will lie in a case like this. The damages claimed were less than $300. The case, as stated in the complaint, does not involve the title or possession of real estate any more than an action of trespass quare clausum must necessarily involve such title or possession. As before stated, the defendant made no answer to the complaint, and the judgment, exclusive of costs, was for less than $300. It is by no means certain that the cause of action set out in the complaint filed in the superior court is the same as that set out in the complaint filed in the justice's court. It does not appear that the trespass alleged in the one was the same as that alleged in the other. For anything that appears on the face of said complaints, the premises on which it is alleged a trespass was committed may not be the same. The cause was tried upon the complaint filed in the superior court which took the place of the original complaint, which then ceased to perform any further function as a pleading. Barber v. Reynolds, 33 Cal. 497. Therefore the case transferred from the justice's to the superior court, on the ground that it involved the title or possession of real property, has never been tried. The case tried involved no such question; and, as the amount in controversy was less than $300, neither the judgment nor any order made after the judgment can be reviewed on appeal in this court. Appeal dismissed.

EJECTMENT—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING—ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

In ejectment in the superior court an application to amend the answer by setting up a judgment of a county court as a bar is properly denied, such courts having jurisdiction of no action, judgment in which would bar ejectment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Ejectment by Michael C. Kirsch and others against Josiah Smith. Defendant's application to amend his answer was denied and he appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Griffiths, for appellant. George A. Nourse, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The questions raised by appellant's counsel, with a single exception, were considered and decided adversely to his views in Kirsch v. Brigard, 63 Cal. 319. The question which distinguishes this case from that arises out of the ruling of the court upon an application of the defendant to amend his answer. The application was made more than three years after the filing of the original answer, and within five days of the commencement of the trial. The application was denied, and the ruling excepted to. The provision of the Code applicable to this subject is as follows. "The court may likewise, in its discretion, after notice to the adverse party, allow, upon such terms as may be just, an amendment to any pleading or proceeding." Code Civil Proc. § 473. When the law gives to a lower court discretion, we will not reverse its order or ruling unless there appears to have been an abuse of discretion. The amendment which the defendant asked leave to file set up a judgment of a county court as a bar to this action. As this was an action of ejectment, and the county court had no jurisdiction of an action of ejectment, nor of any other action in which its judgment would be a bar to an action of ejectment, we do not think there was an abuse of discretion in denying the motion to file the amendment. Judgment affirmed.

EJECTMENT—VENDEE IN POSSESSION—EVIDENCE AT FORMER TRIAL.

1. Where a vendee in possession, under a contract of purchase on which he has made part payment, refuses to further comply with the terms and conditions thereof, or to quit and surrender possession, the vendor is not obliged to stand on his contract, and sue for a breach, or seek specific performance, but he may maintain ejectment.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1870, subd. 8, providing that the testimony of a witness out of the state, given in a former trial between the parties relating to the same matter, may be given in evidence, there is no error in overruling an objection to the official reporter's transcript of testimony given on a former trial, the only grounds of objection raised being that the testimony was not signed by the witness, that it was not his deposition, and that it was secondary evidence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Ejectment by John J. Hicks against D. J. Lovell. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

M. A. Luce and Will M. Smith, for appellant. Leach & Parker, for respondent.

McKEE, J. Ejectment to recover several parcels of land in San Diego county. The answer to the complaint in the case contained a general denial, the defense of a former recovery, and of an equitable title to the land, and also a cross-complaint in equity. The statement of the cause of action in the cross-complaint showed that the defendant was in possession of the lands in controversy under two agreements in writing,—one dated September 10, 1879, and the other March 1, 1880,—by which he and one Wheeler had agreed to purchase the lands from the plaintiff, according to the terms and conditions of said agreements. Both vendees entered and occupied, under said agreements, until the fall of 1880, when Wheeler sold and transferred all his right under the agreements to the defendant, who has since occupied the lands solely for himself. Neither of the agreements have been performed; but the defendant averred in his cross-complaint that he was ready, able, and willing to perform the agreement of September 10, 1879, according to its terms and conditions, but had been prevented from performance by the plaintiff; and that, after prevention and before the commencement of the action, he had also offered to pay the plaintiff the purchase money due on the agreements, but the plaintiff refused to accept the same; and that as to the lands referred to and described in the agreement of March 1, 1880, he was also ready and able to perform his agreement whenever he could have a good and sufficient deed of conveyance of said lands; but as the plaintiff had no title to the same he could not comply with the agreement on his part. Therefore the defendant asked, as equitable relief, that the plaintiff's action at law be dismissed; that the contract of March 1, 1880, be canceled; and that the contract of September 10, 1879, be specifically performed. In his answer the plaintiff admitted the entry and occupation by the defendant under the agreements as stated in the cross-complaint; but he denied the readiness and ability of the defendant to perform any of the agreements, or that he had offered to perform any of them, or had been prevented from performing by the plaintiff. He also averred that the defendant had absolutely refused to perform, and had failed and refused to pay any portion of the purchase money due for the lands according to the terms and conditions of the agreements, except the sum of about $116, which he admitted having received on the agreements in the fall of 1880.

Before trial a motion was made for judgment on the pleadings, upon the ground that they admitted the defendant was in possession of the lands under agreements of purchase and part performance. The motion was denied, and the ruling is assigned as error. But as the defendant denied the plaintiff's cause of action at law, and as the plaintiff denied the defendant's cause of action in equity, there were issues raised by the pleadings in both actions to be tried and determined before judgment could be rendered in either; there was therefore no error in denying the motion. It is only where an answer admits, or leaves undenied, the material facts stated in the complaint, that a judgment can be rendered on the pleadings. Prost v. More, 40 Cal. 347.

By consent, the issues in the action at law and in the cross-action in equity were tried together. At the trial the plaintiff rested his case upon proof, which established a legal title in himself to the lands in dispute, possession by the defendant at the commencement of the action, and an absolute refusal by the defendant to comply with the terms and conditions of the agreements of purchase under which he was in possession, or to quit and surrender possession to the plaintiff. When the plaintiff rested the defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon the ground that the proofs and the pleadings in the case showed that the defendant was in possession under contracts of purchase which had been in part performed. The motion was denied, and that ruling is also assigned as error. But the ruling was correct, because, the legal title to the lands being in the plaintiff, he was in law entitled to judgment, unless the agreements of purchase under which the defendant entered and was in possession gave him an equitable right to the possession. But, according to the plaintiff's proofs, that right had ceased to exist because the defendant had refused to comply with the terms and conditions of the agreements, and repudiated them. A vendee in possession of land cannot repudiate his contract of purchase and at the same time hold the possession under it and by virtue of it. A repudiated contract is no protection to an intending vendee in possession against the legal title. If the defendant denied repudiation, and relied upon readiness and ability to perform, which was prevented by the plaintiff, or an offer to perform, which was rejected, those were matters in defense to the action at law, or for the consideration of the court sitting as a court in equity, in the equitable cross-action. Clark v. Quinn, 41 Cal. 325.

Upon the trial the court found that defendant had never performed, or in good faith offered to perform, either of the agreements, according to their terms and conditions; that he had not been prevented from performance by any act of the plaintiff; that plaintiff had tendered a deed and demanded performance, but defendant had absolutely refused, and that both he and Wheeler had wholly failed and refused to perform the agreements, or any part thereof, except to deliver to the plaintiff about 136 sacks of wheat, of the average weight of 135 pounds each, which the plaintiff received from them in the fall of 1880; and because of the delivery to the plaintiff of that quantity of wheat, in part performance of the agreements, and of the entry and possession by the defendant under the agreements, it is contended that ejectment is not maintainable by the plaintiff as vendor, against his vendee in possession, who has refused to comply with the terms and conditions of the agreements, or to quit and surrender possession of the lands, and that his only remedy is in equity to foreclose his vendor's lien for the purchase money. Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 614, and Bohall v. Diller, 41 Cal. 532, are cited to sustain the contention. But neither of those cases is analogous to the case in hand, nor does either sustain the contention of the appellant. In Willis v. Wozencraft the vendor and vendee had been in possession in common, each "having a 'full right' to an undivided half of the rents and profits." Being thus in possession, the vendee agreed to purchase the undivided interest of his co-tenant, who had the legal title to the entire estate in his name, and took from him a bond for a deed, upon payment of the purchase money, in which it was especially stipulated that the vendee had the right of possession to an undivided one-half of the premises. Against the vendee thus in possession in his own right, and under the contract of purchase, a grantee of the vendor brought ejectment, solely upon the ground that he had acquired the legal title to the land. But before suit she had made no demand to be let into possession of her share with the defendant, and there was no proof in the case of any special facts tending to show either an actual or constructive ouster of the plaintiff, nor was there any evidence tending to show the tender of a deed and demand and refusal to pay the purchase money after it became due, or that the purchase money had not been paid, or that the defendant had abandoned the purchase, or refused to complete it according to the terms of his contract. The defendant had therefore done nothing to forfeit the benefit of his contract; and, being rightfully in possession under his equitable title, he could not be disturbed. The defendant in Bohall v. Diller had also entered into possession of the land in dispute under a contract of purchase. The purchase money had become due and was unpaid at the commencement of the action, and, relying solely upon that fact, the vendor, without having put the vendee in default, brought a peculiar action against the vendee to recover damages for an alleged breach of the contract, possession of the land, and also the purchase money. But the supreme court held that he could not recover damages, because he had not alleged any; nor the purchase money, because, although it had become due before the commencement of the suit, yet, as there was no allegation of tender of a deed and of demand and refusal to pay, the defendant was not in fault; nor could he recover the land, because there was no evidence tending to show that the contract had been rescinded by the parties, therefore the right of possession was in the defendant, and must prevail.

The doctrine deducible from those cases, as well as from others in this state, is that ejectment is not maintainable by a vendor of real property against his vendee in possession under an executory contract of sale, who is not in default in the performance of his contract, or who has performed it and is in a position to demand a deed, or who seasonably and in good faith offers to comply with the terms of his purchase, and continues ready to comply with them. To a vendee in possession under such circumstances, the contract will avail him as an equitable defense to an action of ejectment brought against him by his vendor, or as a cross-action in equity to enforce a trust against his vendor, or to obtain a specific performance of the contract. Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 548; Gerdes v. Moody, 41 Cal. 336; Talbert v. Singleton, 42 Cal. 395; Willis v. Wozencraft, and Bohall v. Diller, supra; Railroad Co. v. Mudd, 59 Cal. 585. But if after maturity of the purchase money the vendor tenders a deed, and demands payment, which the vendee refuses to make, or if the vendee has abandoned the purchase, and repudiates the title of his vendor, in such case the vendee forfeits the benefit of the contract, and he cannot avail himself of it as a defense to an action of ejectment by his vendor, (Pearis v. Covillaud, 6 Cal. 617; Whittier v. Stege, 61 Cal. 239; Thorne v. Hammond, 46 Cal. 530;) nor by way of a cross-action for specific performance. For it is well settled that a court of equity, in the exercise of its judicial discretion, will not decree specific performance of a contract for the sale of land in favor of a party who, by his own negligence or default, has prevented or unreasonably delayed the full execution of the contract. Conrad v. Lindley, 2 Cal. 173; Brown v. Covillaud, 6 Cal. 566; Green v. Covillaud, 10 Cal. 317; Willard v. Tayloe, 8 Wall. 557. That was the position of the defendant on his cross-complaint. By his own showing, he abandoned the purchase of one of the contracts, and disclaimed the title of his vendor; but having entered into possession under the title, and in subordination to it, he was estopped from denying it.

Hoen v. Simmons, 1 Cal. 119; Salmon v. Hoffman, 2 Cal. 139; Walker v. Sedgwick, 8 Cal. 403. And as to the other contract, he neither averred a tender of the purchase money nor offered to pay it. Marshall v. Caldwell, 41 Cal. 611; Englander v. Rogers, Id. 420. One who appeals to a court of equity to defend him against the legal title to land, of which he is in possession, must do equity by paying the price which he agreed to pay. The maxim, "he who seeks equity must do equity," applies to him in full force. Eastman v. Plumer, 46 N. H. 464. The cross-complaint of the defendant, therefore, lacked the essential element of a complaint in equity. Nor had the defendant any equitable title which would serve as a defense to an action of ejectment. Having abandoned his purchase and repudiated his contracts, he was not a purchaser clothed with right, and his vendor was not bound to resort to a court of equity for relief; he may sue in ejectment. Keller v. Lewis, 53 Cal. 118. "The refusal of one party to perform his contract," says the supreme court of New York in Graves v. White, 87 N. Y. 465, "amounts on his part to an abandonment of it. The other party, therefore, has a choice of remedies. He may stand upon his contract, refusing assent to his adversary's attempt to rescind it, and sue for a breach, or in a proper case for a specific performance, or he may assent to its abandonment, and so effect dissolution of the contract by the mutual and concurring assent of both parties. In that event he is simply restored to his original position, and can neither sue for a breach nor compel a specific performance, because the contract itself has been dissolved. * * *

An absolute refusal, a deliberate repudiation of the stipulations of the contract, gives to the other party as an alternative remedy the right to assent to such abandonment, and treat the contract as dissolved." In the present case such refusal was proved. The defendant undertook to repudiate the contract, and at the same time held the possession under and by virtue of it. If the plaintiff could have stood upon the contract, and compelled performance or recovered damages for the breach, he was not bound to adopt that remedy, but had the right to bring ejectment to recover back his land. In so doing, and giving the preliminary notice to surrender possession, he, too, gave his assent to the abandonment of the contract; and the parties who made it having thus by mutual assent rescinded it, its validity was gone and it ceased to exist. Neither party thereafter could invoke its terms or protection as against the other, and the plaintiff was at liberty to maintain ejectment to recover the possession of the land to which he had a legal title. Jackson v. Moncrief, 5 Wend. 26; Wright v. Moore, 21 Wend. 230; Pierce v. Tuttle, 53 Barb. 167.

The court found that the former trial and judgment between the parties was not an adjudication of the matters contained in this action. The finding is sustained by the record of that case, which shows on its face that the questions involved in this were not raised, tried, and determined in that; and also by the evidence which the defendant gave, under his pleadings, as to the facts upon which that decision was based. Megerle v. Ashe, 33 Cal. 84. The former adjudication was therefore no bar to the action in hand.

Lastly, it is assigned as error that the court overruled the objections taken by the defendant to the official reporter's transcript of the testimony of a witness given on the former trial and offered in evidence by the plaintiff. No objection was made that the witness was not shown to be beyond the jurisdiction of the court, nor as to the mode of proving his testimony. The only objections were that the testimony itself was not signed by the witness, that it was not his deposition, and that it was secondary evidence. But by subdivision 8, § 1870, Code Civil Proc., it is provided that "the testimony of a witness deceased, or out of the jurisdiction, or unable to testify, given in a former action between the same parties, relating to the same matter," may be given in evidence. And as it was proved that the witness was out of the state, and no objection was made to the transcript as evidence of his testimony, there was no prejudicial error in the ruling. Judgment and order affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1883.)

DEMURRER TO PART OF ANSWER—APPEAL—HARM LESS ERROR.

1. In an action by a husband against his wife for services in the management of her separate estate, a demurrer to a subdivision of the defense was properly overruled, where the subdivision only stated that plaintiff was the husband of defendant at the time the services were rendered, and was merely preliminary to a further averment that the services were rendered at plaintiff's own instance, in consideration of the benefits derived from his relation to defendant, as the sufficiency of a defense is to be tested by considering it as a whole.

2. The statement of a fact in an assignment of error will not be accepted as true when that fact does not appear in the record.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 475, which provides that the court must, in every stage of an action, disregard any error or defect in the pleadings or proceedings which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties, and no judgment shall be reversed or affected by reason of such error or defect, the fact that the record fails to show that the trial court made any disposition of a demurrer to a cross-complaint will not be adjudged prejudicial error when plaintiff, without objection, went to trial on the merits, and no relief was granted defendant on the cross-complaint, nor was any order adverse to plaintiff made by reason thereof.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county.

Action by George Ferrier against Catharine Ferrier for personal services. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. F. Thomas, for appellant. Hall & Requa, for respondent.

Ross, J. There is no merit in this appeal. The action is by a husband against his wife for the value of his services alleged to have been rendered, under employment by the wife, in and about the management and cultivation of the wife's separate estate. There was a verdict and a judgment for the defendant. It is contended for the appellant that the court below erred in overruling his demurrer to the first subdivision of the second defense set up in the amended answer. But this subdivision only set forth the fact, not alleged in the complaint, that the plaintiff was, at the time stated in the complaint, the husband of defendant, and this only as preliminary to the further averment contained in the second defense set up, to the effect that any and all services rendered by plaintiff for which he sues were rendered at his own instance, without request, solicitation, or employment by the defendant, and in consideration alone of his relation to defendant, and of the benefits received by him by reason of that relation. The sufficiency of the defense is not to be tested by one of its subdivisions, but as a whole; and, considered as a whole, it put in issue the fact of employment, without which it is certain no cause of action was vested in the plaintiff.

It is also contended that the court below erred in refusing to make an order precluding the defendant from giving any evidence in support of the matters set up in and by the third defense contained in the amended answer, because of the defendant's failure to furnish the bill of items demanded. If it be admitted that the court was in error in this respect, no injury to appellant appears to have resulted, for it does not appear that the defendant gave any evidence on the trial in support of the matters set up in the third defense. We observe that it is stated by counsel in their assignment of errors that such was the fact; but, of course, we cannot accept that statement as true. If such was the rule, there would be few, if any, cases in which an assignment of errors appears that would not have to be reversed.

Another point made for appellant is that it does not appear from the record that the plaintiff's demurrer to the cross-complaint filed by the defendant was disposed of by the court. This is true; but it is also true that the defendant went to trial upon the merits of the case without making any objection of this nature in the court below. No relief was awarded the defendant by reason of the cross-complaint, nor does it appear that there was any order or judgment made adverse to the appellant based on or in any manner growing out of that pleading. Moreover, upon looking into the cross-complaint, we do not see that it has any relation whatever to the alleged contract upon which the plaintiff's action was brought, for which reason it was probably abandoned in the court below. At all events, no possible injury could have resulted to appellant by reason of the failure of the court, if failure there was, to rule upon the demurrer; and, that being the case, the judgment should not be reversed. Code Civil Proc. § 475.¹ Judgment affirmed.

DENNIS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (No. ———.)

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE — JURISDICTION — STOCKHOLDER'S LIABILITY.

The personal liability of a stockholder of a corporation, for his proportion of the indebtedness of the corporation, is an obligation arising on contract, within Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 112, giving original jurisdiction to justices' courts in actions on contract for the recovery of money when the amount claimed is less than $300.

Application for writ of review directed to superior court, Los Angeles county.

Petitioner, Dennis, was sued by John Rebman in justice's court, to enforce petitioner's liability as a stockholder in the San Gabriel Valley Land & Water Company, on a debt contracted by said company. Rebman recovered a judgment for $299, and petitioner appealed to the superior court of Los Angeles county, where said judgment was affirmed. He now applies for this writ of review, alleging that the justice had no jurisdiction of the action, that the superior court had none on appeal, and that he objected to the jurisdiction in both courts. Writ denied.

Hourx & Haynes, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. We think that the personal liability of a stockholder of a corporation, for his proportion of the indebtedness of the corporation, is an obligation arising upon contract, within the meaning of section 112 of the Code of Civil Procedure, giving original jurisdiction to a justice's court in actions arising upon contract for the recovery of money, when the amount claimed is less than $300. The court of appeals of Maryland had before it the question of the nature of such a liability upon the part of a stockholder, in Norris v. Wrenschall, 34 Md. 492, and in that case it was held to be an obligation so far ex contractu as fairly to come within the spirit and intent of a statute intended to facilitate the recovery of judgments in suits "when the cause of action is a contract, whether in writing or not, or whether express or implied." We are satisfied with the conclusion there reached. It follows that the application for the writ applied for herein must be denied, and it is so ordered.

FLYNN v. DOUGHERTY. (No. 13,032.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 19, 1891.)

STATUTE OF FRAUDS—AGREEMENT TO CUT STONE
—NONSUIT.

1. Civil Code Cal. § 1739, provides that no agreement to buy or sell personal property of the value of $200 or more is valid unless the same be in writing. Section 1740 provides that an agreement to manufacture a thing from material furnished by the manufacturer is not within the provisions of the last section. Held, that plaintiff's contract to cut and deliver to defendant stone for a building according to certain specifications, though not in writing, was valid.

2. The grounds of a motion for a nonsuit must be stated at the time the motion is made.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; FRs. E. SPENCER, Judge.

Action by one Flynn against one Dougherty on contract. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for appellant. Chas. F. Wilcox, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The only question involved in this appeal is whether the contract of the plaintiff "to cut, furnish, and deliver" to defendant "the stone-work of the asylum to be built at Agnew station, according to the plans and specifications of Mr. Jacob Leuzen & Son, architects," is within the statute of frauds. Section 1739, Civil Code. There is no doubt that it is within the provisions of the statute, unless excepted therefrom by section 1740, Id., which is as follows: "An agreement to manufacture a thing from materials furnished by the manufacturer or by another person is not within the provisions of the last section." The plaintiff testified that, "if the stone had been cut according to his bid and the specifications, and had not been used in the construction of the asylum, it would not have been available for other purposes, or have been salable in the general market." On the subject of contracts of sale and contracts for labor there is much conflict of decision, but the weight of authority in this country supports the proposition that, where the seller is to furnish materials and fashion them according to specifications furnished by the purchaser, or according to some model selected, and when, without the special contract entered into by the parties, the thing furnished would never have been put in the particular shape or condition in which it was furnished, then the contract is essentially one for labor, and is not within the statute of frauds. The subject is carefully treated and the authorities fully reviewed in 1 Reed, St. Frauds, c. 9. The evidence in the case before us shows that the work which was to be performed by the plaintiff would have left the material unfit for the general market. The contract is one for labor,—work and labor were the main things. The material upon which the work and labor were to be done was simply the incident. The stone to be furnished was of no value to the defendant until shaped and carved according to the plans and specifications of the architect. Upon the authorities referred to above, we think the court erred in granting the defendant's motion for a nonsuit. The only grounds stated by the defendant in his motion for a nonsuit were that the contract was one for the sale of goods and chattels, "and that there was no note or memorandum thereof signed by the defendants, nor any acceptance or receipt of the goods, or any part thereof, nor any payment of purchase money, or any part thereof, as required by the provisions of section 1624, subd. 4, of the Civil Code; and on the further ground that plaintiff has failed to show that he has sustained any damage in any sum whatever." The rule is well settled here that a nonsuit cannot stand unless the ground upon which it is supported was called to the attention of the court and the plaintiffs at the time the motion was made. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

COOK v. RICE et al. (No. 13,062.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 19, 1891.)

RES JUDICATA—PARTIES.

1. A judgment, though liable to be appealed from, is in force as final, unless suspended by appeal, and is competent evidence in support of a plea in estoppel.

2. In an action against a husband and wife, where the wife had no interest aside from that of her husband, defendants sought to introduce a judgment roll of a prior action in relation to the same controversy by plaintiff against the husband. Held, that the objection that the action was not between the same parties was untenable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Action in trespass by John Cook against D. M. Rice and another. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Webb & Sherwood, for appellant. Gell & Morehouse, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. The plaintiff in his complaint avers that on the 2d day of February, 1888, he was lawfully possessed of the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 4, township 21 S., range 9 E., Mt. Diablo meridian; that he had fencing on the same to the value of \$50, which the defendants on said day maliciously destroyed, to his damage in the sum of \$50. As a separate cause of action, that he has planted and sown on the same tract a crop of grain, in extent about 80 acres, of the value of \$500, which he had fenced and inclosed; that defendants cut down and destroyed his fence, and drove their stock in and upon his grain, to his great and irreparable damage; that they threaten to tear down any fence which he has or shall construct to protect said grain, and, if not restrained, will tear down and destroy his fences, and drive their stock upon his grain, and destroy the same, to his damage in the sum of \$500; that they are wholly insolvent. He therefore demands judgment for \$300 damages, and that they be enjoined from cutting down or destroying his fences or from wasting his premises. The complaint does not aver any title in the plaintiff, but possession only; and does not deny that the respondents have title to the land, or that their entry was rightful. The answer denies the possession of plaintiff, the alleged trespass, and the damage. In the answer to the last cause of action, defendants admit the possession of plaintiff as to 10 acres of land, which is specifically described, and deny that they have ever in any way entered or trespassed upon the same. They aver, as to the remainder of the land, that the defendants have been in occupation and possession thereof since May, 1886, and that a large portion thereof had been plowed and sown by them, and that plaintiff, while they were so in possession, wrongfully and unlawfully entered with threats, force, and violence, and replowed and resowed and attempted to inclose the same, and to drive the defendants from the premises; and, except as to the said 10 acres, plaintiff has no possession, except the said forcible occupation. They also plead as an estoppel a judgment in favor of D. M. Rice against plaintiff, wherein it was duly adjudged that plaintiff was not possessed or entitled to the possession of any part of the land except the 10 acres specifically described; that plaintiff has, since the institution of said action, acquired no new or further right or title to said land; that the defendant Mrs. D. M. Rice is the wife of the said D. M. Rice, and claims no interest in the land, and her acts are those of a member of the family of the other defendant, and in privity with his title. The appeal is from the judgment and an order refusing plaintiff a new trial.

The land is public land of the United States, and both parties claim as pre-emptioners. The question is whether there was evidence to sustain the verdict and the findings in favor of the defendants. On the trial the defendant D. M. Rice testified that he moved upon the land in May, 1886, with his family, and built a good, comfortable house, barn, and chicken-house. That there was then no one living upon it, and no house or improvement except the small inclosure. There was a volunteer crop of barley on a long strip. In January, 1887, he commenced plowing, and had plowed 8 or 10 acres, when he was enjoined by Mr. Cook, who moved upon the land about 6 months after defendant. He never permitted his stock to run on the small inclosure, nor did he or his wife ever interfere with it. Mr. Cook, while defendant was enjoined from plowing, proceeded to fence and plow a large part of the land, leaving defendant's house outside of his inclosure, by extending to and round it a sort of cul de sac. Defendant filed his declaratory statement as a pre-emptioner May 25, 1886. It was shown that both plaintiff and defendant were qualified pre-emptioners; that Mrs. D. M. Rice tore down a portion of the fence with the knowledge of her husband, and without objection made by him. A judgment roll was put in evidence by defendants in the case of John Cook v. D. M. Rice, dated December 27, 1887. It avers possession on the part of plaintiff; that he had growing upon the land a volunteer crop of grain; that defendant unlawfully entered, and ejected plaintiff, and commenced to plow, dig up, and destroy the grain; that, although plaintiff had forbid him so to do, he continued to plow, dig up, and destroy the grain, and, unless enjoined, would continue so to do, to his great and irreparable damage. He demands judgment for $500 damages, to be restored to the possession of the demanded premises, and for an injunction. The answers specifically denies the possession of plaintiff, the various alleged trespasses and damage, and avers that defendant entered upon the land when unoccupied and uninclosed, as a qualified pre-emptor, under the laws of the United States, and while peacefully in possession he duly made his application to purchase the same. The case was tried September 28, 1887, and the court found that plaintiff was in the actual possession only of the tract specifically described in the answer in this case; that on the 23d of May, 1886, while all the land, except the 10 acres, was unoccupied, the defendant D. M. Rice entered upon the same, and, while in the peaceable possession of all, except the 10-acre tract, filed in the land-office his declaratory statement. It was adjudged that plaintiff recover the 10-acre tract, with damages, and that the restraining order be dissolved. The action was to recover possession, and admitted the possession of defendants, claiming that it was wrongful, because an intrusion upon the prior possession of plaintiff. It was adjudged that, except as to the small inclosure, defendants' possession was rightful, and that plaintiff had not been in possession before the entry of defendants. It must follow that when plaintiff entered, taking advantage of an injunction wrongfully restraining defendants from cultivating the land, he was intruding upon the possession of the defendants, and could not by such entry acquire a new right as against the defendants. Plaintiff objected to the introduction of the judgment roll, and now claims that the court erred in overruling his objections—

1. Because the judgment was not final, as the time for taking an appeal had not expired, and the cause was therefore still pending. It was not necessary that it should be final, in the sense that it was not liable to be reversed on appeal. It was enough that the judgment was in force, not suspended by an appeal or otherwise, and that, while in force, it finally disposed of the controversy. And—

2. It was objected that it was not between the same parties. Substantially it was between the same parties. Mrs. Rice made no claim to the land, and all she did was under the claim of her husband. Had she by her acts taken possession, the right, if any, thus acquired would have been common property, and the right to control and manage in her husband.

The question being whether there was evidence to support the findings, it is not necessary to consider the plaintiffs' evidence. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

LUCO v. DE TORO. (No. 12,566.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1891.)

EXPRESS TRUSTS — REPUDIATION — LIMITATIONS — SUIT FOR PARTITION—EVIDENCE—CONTRACT WITH ATTORNEY.

1. Where O., owning an equitable interest in an undivided tract of unpatented land, employed an attorney to procure a patent thereto for the person through whom O. derived his interest, and agreed to give the attorney a certain portion of the land if he succeeded, the fact that another person employed by O. rendered valuable assistance in obtaining the patent did not affect the attorney's rights under the contract.

2. Such contract creates an express trust, and, when completed, vests in the attorney an equitable interest to his proportion of the land, and renders O. a trustee of the attorney to the extent of such interest. BEATTY, C. J., and McFARLAND and DE HAVEN, JJ., dissenting. 18 Pac. Rep. 866, overruled.

3. The statute of limitations does not begin to run in favor of such trustee till after an unequivocal repudiation of the trust by him, with notice thereof to the attorney. Brennan v. Ford, 46 Cal. 8, distinguished.

4. Where O. became administrator for the patentee, his mere refusal to convey to the attorney the interest due the latter is not a repudiation of the trust, since it was impossible for O. to make any conveyance without an order of the probate court, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 1597, 1598, 1600, which provide that, when a person who is bound by contract in writing to convey any real estate dies before making the conveyance, the court, on presentation of a verified petition, must appoint a time for hearing, and, if satisfied that the petitioner is entitled to a conveyance, must make a decree authorizing and directing the executor or administrator to make a conveyance to the petitioner.

5. Where O. had both actual and constructive notice that the attorney had assigned all his interest in the trust, O.'s refusal to convey to the attorney, if conceded to be a sufficient notice of repudiation of the trust as to the latter, will not be adjudged sufficient notice to the assignee.

6. Where, in an action by the assignee against the personal representative of O. to recover the attorney's interest, defendant contended that both attorney and assignee had abandoned the contract, evidence that until the procurement of the patent the assignee continued to expend large sums of money for that purpose was admissible.

7. In partition, plaintiff may assert any title he may have, legal or equitable. Watson v. Sutro, 24 Pac. Rep. 172, 25 Pac. Rep. 64, and 86 Cal. 527, followed.

The original complaint, which was filed August 8, 1882, contained all the allegations required by chapter 4, pt. 2, tit. 10, Code Civil Proc. On December 13, 1886, —after the cause was reversed on the former appeal, (70 Cal. 339, 11 Pac. Rep. 650,) —plaintiffs, by leave of the court, filed an amendment to the complaint, inserting between paragraphs 21 and 22 thereof the following: "Plaintiffs allege that the plaintiff Juan M. Lucio owns an undivided equitable interest in the said rancho of Ex-Mission of San Diego, by reason that on and before the 3d day of February, 1869, said Augustin Olvera was the owner and in possession of an undivided share or interest of more than one-half of said rancho, and that on said day the said Augustin Olvera made and entered into a contract in writing with the said Isaac Hartman, now deceased, in the words and figures, to-wit: 'This agreement, made and entered into this 3d day of February, A. D. 1869, between Isaac Hartman, party of the first part, and Augustin Olvera, party of the second part, witnesseth as follows, to-wit: That the party of the first part, as attorney and counselor at law, undertakes and agrees with the party of the second part to procure a patent from the United States for the lands of the Ex-Mission of San Diego of San Diego county, bounded and described as follows: [Giving the specific boundaries of said rancho.] In consideration whereof the party of the second part agrees to pay the said party of the first part as follows: The sum of one thousand dollars for personal expenses incurred by the party of the first part in said business, but not to exceed in any case said sum of one thousand dollars. In addition to which the party of the second part is also to pay the costs of proceedings to obtain said patent, and to convey to the party of the first part an undivided interest in the lands to be patented of said Ex-Mission as follows: If the patent issues for five leagues, one-half league; if for six leagues, one league; if for seven leagues, one league; if for eight leagues, one and one-half leagues; if for nine leagues, one and one-half leagues; if for ten leagues, one and one-half leagues; if for eleven leagues, two leagues; and whatever amount is patented over and above eleven leagues is to be equally divided between the parties of the first and second parts; that is to say, that the party of the first part is to be entitled to the one undivided one-half of the excess over and above eleven leagues, and the four leagues of land in the immediate vicinity of said Ex-Mission are to remain exclusively for the parties of the second part. In testimony whereof the parties have hereunto, and to another instrument of same tenor and date, set their hands and seals the date first above written. [Seal.] ISAAC HARTMAN. AUGUSTIN OLVERA. Acknowledged in Los Angeles county, February 3, 1869, before JAMES F. LANDER, Notary Public. Filed for record in the recorder's office of San Diego county, February 20, 1871.' That the said contract was fully performed by the said Hartman on his part, so that on the 1st day of September, 1876, he procured to be issued a patent from the United States for the rancho of the said Ex-Mission of San Diego, as described in said contract, and to the extent of 58,875.38 acres. That theretofore, to-wit, on or about the 23d day of March, 1869, by his deed of that date, said Isaac Hartman, for a good and valuable consideration, conveyed all his right, title, and interest in said rancho, acquired under and by virtue of the aforesaid contract made by said Olvera with said Hartman, and of said conveyance from said Hartman to said Lucio, he, the said Lucio, became the owner, and was and is entitled to an interest or share, of ——— acres, undivided, in said rancho; and that he has now, and has had since the date of said conveyance, the just and equitable title thereto. That said Lucio, as tenant in common for more than five years prior to the commencement of this suit, had been in possession of said premises, and has paid his proportionate share of all the costs and expenses attending the proceedings taken herein, for the partition of said rancho. That at the time of the death of the said Augustin Olvera, as aforesaid, he held the legal title to more than one-half, undivided, of said rancho, subject to the aforesaid equitable interest of the said Lucio. Wherefore plaintiffs pray that by the decree of this court there be set off to the said Lucio, in severalty, the said 6,083.2743 acres derived to him as aforesaid."

To this amended complaint an answer was filed, in which it is alleged that Augustin Olvera died on the 6th day of October, 1876, and that in June, 1882, the defendant Juan de Toro was duly appointed administrator of the estate of said Olvera, deceased, and that said decedent was at the time of his death seised in fee of 30,000 acres undivided of said Rancho Ex-Mission San Diego, and that his heirs and representatives have ever since been seised in fee of said interest. Further answering, said defendant Toro alleges that the plaintiff's cause of action is barred by the provisions of sections 318, 319, 337, 343, Code Civil Proc. He denies all the allegations of the complaint not admitted by said answer. By this all the material allegations of the complaint were denied, among which is the allegation of full performance by Hartman, on his part, of the contract between him and Olvera. Upon that issue the finding of the court is as follows: "That immediately after the execution of the agreement between Augustin Olvera and Isaac Hartman said Hartman entered upon the performance of the stipulations in said agreement contained on his part to be performed, and after his sale to plaintiff Lucio, as found in finding 2, said Lucio and Hartman continued in the performance of said stipulations, and did so continue by themselves, or their agents and attorneys, to prosecute to a final conclusion the agreements and stipulations in said agreement contained on the part of said Hartman to be performed. That owing to a quarrel between Hartman and Olvera, about the year 1874, Olvera became dissatisfied with Hartman, and, on behalf of himself and the heirs of Santiago Arguello, the confirmee of said Ex-Mission rancho, employed one A. St. Clair Denver, an attorney at law of Washington city, District of Columbia, to prosecute the claims of said heirs, and of the interest of said Augustin Olvera in and to the Rancho Ex-Mission of San Diego, before the proper department, at Washington city aforesaid; and thereafter, by the joint exertions of said A. St. Clair Denver and the Honorable Cornelius Cole, acting as attorney for Hartman and Lucio, a patent was duly obtained, as alleged in the complaint, on the 1st day of September, 1876. That owing to the death of the principal parties to the said agreement, to-wit, Hartman and Olvera, the great lapse of time and uncertainty of recollection of surviving witnesses, under the evidence in this case, it is impossible to determine and measure the extent of performance of plaintiff or his vendor, Hartman, under the agreement aforesaid, and the court finds only that up to the time of the issuance of the patent aforesaid, there had not been a full and complete or substantial performance of that agreement on the part of Hartman or Lucio as vendee, but only a partial performance thereof." Finding 5.

The appellant contends that a correct reading of this finding shows that Hartman fully performed, and that upon such performance his estate in equity became indefeasible. Respondent claims that the concluding sentence is a finding of the ultimate fact that there was not a full and complete or substantial performance of the agreement on the part of Hartman or Lucio. The finding, in our opinion, is ambiguous and uncertain. Appellant was entitled to an unequivocal finding on the question of performance. If, however, the finding can be construed as a finding in favor of respondent on that subject, it is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, it is not supported by the evidence. We think it is clearly shown that Hartman and Lucio fully performed the stipulations to be performed under the agreement. There is no substantial conflict in the evidence as to what was done by Hartman and his assignee, Lucio, in procuring the patent. They did all that was necessary to be done in order that the patent might issue for the quantity of land which was finally granted. The fact that Olvera, in conjunction with other parties not parties to the contract with Hartman, deemed it proper to employ Denver to assist in procuring the patent, and that Denver did render valuable services in that connection, in no way affects the right of Hartman or Lucio under the contract. Olvera could not by employing other persons defeat the rights of Hartman and Lucio under the contract.

Whether the finding be regarded as contradictory and uncertain, or a finding that there was no substantial performance of the agreement on the part of Hartman and Lucio, the judgment will have to be reversed, unless the finding that the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations can be sustained. In their answer the defendants allege that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the provisions of sections 318, 319, 337, 343, Code Civil Proc., and upon the issues thus raised the court found that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of sections 337 and 343, but made no reference to sections 318 and 319. We cannot agree with appellant in his contention that the findings of the court on these issues are not findings of ultimate facts, but are conclusions of law. It is necessary, therefore, to consider the question as to whether these findings are supported by the evidence. We think they are not.

The court found (finding 7) that after the issuance of letters testamentary to Olvera, and before they were revoked, to-wit, November 5, 1877, the plaintiff demanded of Olvera, as executor, a conveyance to him, Lucio, as tenant in common, of 13,904.31 acres of the Mission rancho, under and in accordance with the terms of the contract between Olvera and Hartman; and also found (finding 14) that Olvera in his lifetime, "after the year 1874, and his representatives after his death, always repudiated any obligation under said contract to Hartman, or his assignee, Lucio, and claimed to have and hold the whole interest to which he (Olvera) held the legal title when he died, adversely to Hartman or his assignee, free from any claim on the part of either under said contract." But these findings do not show a disavowal of the trust relations created by the contract, and notice to the plaintiff of such disavowal. We are left in ignorance as to the reason why Olvera refused to make the deed requested. It is not found that he refused to make the deed because he denied the existence of such relation of trustee and cestui que trust, nor is it found that he so stated to Lucio, or that Lucio so understood his refusal. Olvera was under no obligation, in fact had no authority, to make the conveyance demanded without an order of the probate court, and it was the duty of the party demanding the deed to apply to the court for the necessary order. Sections 1597,¹ 1598,² 1600,³ 1606, 1607, Code Civil Proc. A repudiation of the trust by Olvera, and notice thereof, cannot, therefore, be predicated upon the facts found. It certainly cannot be said that the mere fact of refusal under the circumstances is sufficient to show notice to the beneficiary of such repudiation, and time begins to run against a trust only from the time it is openly disavowed by the trustee, and the adverse claim is clearly and unequivocally made known to the cestui que trust. Finding 14 we think is not supported by the evidence; but, assuming that it is, it simply shows a repudiation of any obligation under the contract, and an adverse claim without notice thereof to Hartman, or Luco, his assignee. The testimony of Forbes shows that there was a quarrel between Hartman and Olvera in 1874, and the court finds that about that time Olvera became dissatisfied with Hartman, but the nature of the quarrel is not stated. The trouble between Hartman and Olvera seems to have been caused by the attempt on the part of the former to have Olvera removed as administrator of the estate. Olvera claimed that Hartman was working against him. This claim could not have referred to the matter of procuring a patent, and the court has found as a fact that Hartman and Luco continued in the prosecution of the stipulations contained in the agreement. If it be assumed, however, that the quarrel related to and arose out of the matters referred to in the contract, the action of Olvera could not bind Luco. Hartman had assigned his interest in the contract to Luco long prior to the time of the conversation referred to, and of this fact Olvera had both actual and constructive notice. Olvera's repudiation could not affect the rights of Luco unless the latter had notice thereof, and there is nothing in the record to show that he ever gave notice to Luco of his intention to repudiate the claims of Hartman under the contract. Luco and Hartman continued to perform the stipulations of the contract on their part to be performed up to the time of the issuance of the patent. Luco made large expenditures in prosecuting the claim and in procuring the patent. He expended about $6,000, and gave Bolton, for the assistance rendered in the surveyor general's office, 500 acres of land.

Section 1597 provides that when a person who is bound by contract in writing to convey any real estate dies before making the conveyance, and in all cases when such decedent, if living, might be compelled to make such conveyance, the court may make a decree authorizing and directing his executor or administrator to convey such real estate to the person entitled thereto.

²Section 1598 provides that on presentation of a verified petition by any person claiming to be entitled to such conveyance, setting forth the facts upon which the claim is predicated, the court, or judge thereof, must appoint a time and place for hearing the petition, etc.

By the terms of the contract between Hartman and Olvera an express trust was created. It is not necessary in the creation of an express trust to use any particular form of words. The relation of trustee and cestui que trust is established, and an express trust created, if the language used in the instrument creating the trust expresses the intention that one party shall hold the legal title and the other shall have the beneficial interest. The language of the contract before us is a clear declaration on the part of Olvera that thereafter he would hold the legal title in trust for Hartman, to the extent of the latter's beneficial interest under the contract. Full performance by Hartman created an indefeasible estate in equity, which could not be defeated or divested by Olvera without positive and unequivocal repudiation of the trust relation, and notice of such repudiation to the beneficiary. Miles v. Thorne, 38 Cal. 338; Love v. Watkins, 40 Cal. 547; Hearst v. Pujol, 44 Cal. 235; Hoffman v. Vallejo, 45 Cal.

572; Janey v. Throckmorton, 57 Cal. 388. In Hoffman v. Vallejo, supra, it was held that an agreement like the one before us is not against public policy, and constitutes the attorney the equitable owner of an undivided interest in the lands, and creates the relation of trustee and cestui que trust. The statute begins to run against the trust "as soon as it is openly disavowed by the trustee insisting upon an adverse right and interest, which is clearly and unequivocally made known to the cestui que trust"; and when, for instance, such transactions take place between the trustee and cestui que trust as would, in the case of tenants in common, amount to an ouster of one of them by the other." Speidel v. Henrici, 120 U. S. 377, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 610. Where there has been full performance by the vendee under a contract to convey the land, an indefeasible estate in equity vests in the vendee, and the possession of the vendor is presumed to be the possession of his cestui que trust, the vendee. The statute cannot run against one's own possession. Wright v. Ross, 36 Cal. 433. There can be no adverse holding "until the trustee denude himself of his trust by assuming to hold for himself, and notifies the cestui que trust of his treachery." Haynie v. Hall, 42 Amer. Dec. 427. Respondent claims that the word "repudiate," as used in finding 14, is equivalent to and implies notice. In the case cited (Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 366, 14 Pac. Rep. 88) it was held simply that denial or repudiation is not necessary in order to set the statute of limitations in motion in cases of implied trust. There may be disavowal and repudiation of the trust without knowledge or notice of the same being brought home to the beneficiary. Miles v. Thorne, supra. In Bennett v. Morrison, 120 Pa. St. 390, 14 Atl. Rep. 264, it was held that "the vendor of land sold under articles of agreement must not only in some way repudiate the agreement, but must take actual possession of the premises, either in person, by an agent, a tenant, or another vendee, in order to break the relation his vendee sustains to him under the agreement, before the statute will commence to run." In Love v. Watkins, supra, Mr. Justice TEMPLE said: "The conveyance from the trustee to the cestui que trust in such cases is but the execution of the trust; the right to obtain the legal title is but an incident to the estate of the cestui que trust. So long, therefore, as the estate exists, so long will the right to acquire the legal title subsist. It is like the right of a tenant in common to compel partition, and is not a cause of action which accrues in the sense of the statute of limitations, and which may be lost by the lapse of time. The trustee and cestui que trust have the same title, and do not hold adversely so long as the rights of neither are denied." Although the question presented for consideration in that case was whether a vendee in possession under an executory contract, who had fully performed the agreement on his part, but had not obtained a deed, could compel a specific performance after the lapse of four years from the time when he might have demanded a deed, yet the doctrine announced by the learned judge is sound in principle and supported by authority. In Harris v. King, 16 Ark. 122, it was held that a vendor who had received the purchase money became the trustee of the vendee, and, although actually in possession of the land, held the naked legal title in trust for him, and the statute of limitations was no bar to an action for a specific performance of the contract, if the vendor had done no act inconsistent with the vendee's title, other than simply holding possession. In Graham v. Nelson, 5 Humph. 605, it was held that the possession of the vendor before conveyance would be construed for the benefit of the cestui que trust where it could be reasonably presumed to be in accordance with the trust, and the statute would not run. In that case none of the parties was in possession of the land. See, also, Ang. Lim. §§ 137, 138; Hemming v. Zimmerschitte, 4 Tex. 159; Lewis v. Hawkins, 23 Wall, 119; Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 105, 147, 155, 368, 1010, 1046. In Rush v. Barr, 1 Watts, 110, the court said: "The statute of limitations is a most useful one, and ought not lightly to be frittered away; but there are cases to which it does not apply. Whenever the legal title is in one, and the real interest in another, these form but one title, and the statute does not run between them until the trustee disclaims and acts adversely to the cestui que trust. * * * And so in all cases where two persons have each an interest in a tract of land of such kind that both their interests form but one title, and by their agreement one is to possess for his own use and the use of the other. In such cases the statute does not run until he in possession disclaims the right and interest of the other, denies his right and refuses possession, and such disclaimer and denial must be such that the other has notice of it. It is not sufficient that it is denied secretly, or an agreement inconsistent with it is made and concealed." See, also, Hill, Trustees, 264, note 3; Huntly v. Huntly, 8 Ired. Eq. 250; Tiff. & B. Trusts, 715-717. In Hemming v. Zimmerschitte, supra, Chief Justice HEMPHILL, speaking for the court, said: "It is an acknowledged principle that vendor and vendee, under an executory contract for the sale of lands, occupy, mutually and respectively, the relation of trustee towards each other, (Sugd. Vend. 160,) so long as they do not indicate by their acts an intention to refuse compliance with the obligations imposed by their contract. In this case, the vendee having performed his obligations, the vendor's subsequent possession or interest in the land was held in trust, and in subordination to the superior equitable right of the vendee; and this possession would continue to maintain its fiduciary character, until the vendor would manifest an intention to claim and enjoy the land as his own." In Holman v. Criswell, 15 Tex. 394, the court applied the same rule. In that case, like the one at bar, there had been no actual possession by either party. The court said: "The obligations of the vendee having been already discharged, limitation would not run against the vendee, until the vendor manifested an intention, by adverse possession or some hostile act, to claim and hold the land as his own."

In this case the transcript shows no words or conduct on the part of Olvera indicating an intention to repudiate the trust; at least, there is nothing in the record to show that Luco had any notice of such an intention. After the assignment by Hartman to the plaintiff, the former could not by any statement to Olvera prejudice the rights of Luco, unless thereafter there was a failure by him and plaintiff to perform the work required by the contract. At the time it was alleged and found that Hartman said he would have nothing further to do with the matter, no cause of action had accrued against which the statute of limitations could be put in motion, and, as we have seen, Hartman and Luco fully performed the conditions of the contract, and the estate of Olvera received the benefit of their work. Nearly all of the cases relied on by respondent are cases of resulting or implied trusts. In such cases it is uniformly held that possession is necessary to prevent the running of the statute. In cases of express trust cited by respondent, it is true the courts rested their decisions upon the ground that the possession of the cestui que trust was sufficient to prevent the bar. No authority has been cited holding that in case of an express trust the statute will run against the vendee after full performance because he is out of possession, except Brennan v. Ford, 46 Cal. 8; and what was said there on the subject was unnecessary to the decision, which went upon the ground that Brennan's cause of action did not accrue until the delivery of the deed, January 31, 1867, (within four years prior to the commencement of the action.) The actual possession of the vendor, or non-possession of the vendee, is a circumstance, of course, to be considered in determining whether there has been a repudiation of the trust and notice thereof to the vendee. But it is not controlling. The relations existing between vendor and vendee, after full performance, are governed by the same rules as those which exist between ordinary tenants in common, so far as repudiation of title and ouster are concerned. Speidel v. Henrici, supra.

Upon the issuance of the patent in September, 1876, the plaintiff became vested with an equitable estate in the land, and not merely a right to the land, as fully as if he had made a contract of purchase, and had paid the full amount of the purchase price. The defendant thereafter held the legal title in trust for him, and the constructive possession which followed the legal title inured to the benefit of the plaintiff, as well as to the benefit of the defendant. The plaintiff could be divested of this estate in the land by transfer or adverse possession, but not by mere lapse of time. The court did not base its decision upon any adverse holding of the defendant, but upon the ground that the action should have been commenced within four years after the plaintiff had acquired the right to a conveyance, or within four years after the repudiation of his claim by the defendant. It may be conceded that, if the action were merely to procure a deed of conveyance in accordance with the terms of the agreement, the statute of limitations would be a defense, upon the ground that such action, being purely personal, would be barred by lapse of time. It would not follow, however, that even upon such failure the plaintiff would be unable to maintain his action in partition. The deed of conveyance would be only additional evidence of his rights in the land. It is not necessary that the plaintiff in an action for partition should have the legal title to the land. Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 527, 24 Pac. Rep. 172, and 25 Pac. Rep. 64. The facts establishing his right to the land can be shown in the suit for partition, and the same result must follow therefrom without regard to the character of evidence by which they are shown. Under our system of procedure, the form of action is disregarded, and the plaintiff seeking relief is required to state only the facts constituting his cause of action. This, however, is not an action "upon" the contract between Hartman and Olvera. That contract is simply a piece of evidence which the plaintiff uses in establishing his right to the land as he would a deed or any other evidence of title. A finding of the court that the contract had been completely executed on the part of Hartman would of itself be a determination that the plaintiff is entitled to the land provided for in the contract. The contract would then cease to be an element in the case, and such finding of complete performance would throw upon the defendant the burden of showing some act upon his part subsequent thereto sufficient in law to divest the plaintiff of his right to the land.

We do not think the amendment to the complaint filed December 13, 1886, stated a new cause of action. The action was originally commenced for a partition of the rancho. The amendment merely stated more particularly the source and evidence of plaintiff's title. That evidence does not constitute the cause of action. We think that in this action for a partition there can be no doubt that the parties may assert any title which they have, legal or equitable. Gates v. Salmon, 35 Cal. 593; Martin v. Walker, 58 Cal. 596; Watson v. Sutro, supra. In equity the plaintiff has a perfect title. At the time this action was commenced he had the legal title to several thousand acres of land, besides the equitable title to the lands in controversy. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and acquired jurisdiction of the parties.

It is claimed by respondent that the specifications of insufficiency of the evidence are not made with sufficient particularity to entitle appellant to question the findings of the court. We think this point is not well taken.

A number of errors are assigned by appellant, but in one only we think there is merit. The plaintiff offered to prove that he and Hartman expended large sums of money to preserve the estate of Arguello. The offer was rejected, and plaintiff excepted. In view of the fact that defendant claimed Hartman had abandoned his demand under the contract, it was material and relevant, we think, to show that Hartman and Luco were performing services and spending large sums of money to preserve the estate of Arguello, in order that there would be something to divide after payment of the debts and expenses of administration, and after the patent should be issued. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. There was nothing in the contract between Olvera and plaintiff's assignor, Hartman, to distinguish it from any other executory contract to sell land. A right of action to enforce specific performance of Olvera's contract to convey accrued, if ever, upon the issuance of the patent in September, 1876, and was barred in four years. This action, as between Luco and De Toro, is in effect nothing more nor less than an action on that contract,—to specifically enforce it,—and it was not commenced until more than six years after the statute had begun to run, and two years after the bar had attached. As to other points discussed in the opinion of the court I express no opinion.

DE HAVEN, J. I dissent from the judgment, and concur in the foregoing opinion of Chief Justice BEATTY.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent from the judgment of reversal, and adhere to former opinion. 18 Pac. Rep. 866.

MOORE v. EARL et al. (No. 14,106.)

WILLS—PROBATE—CITATION TO HEIRS—EXECUTOR'S BOND—SURETY—ESTOPPEL.

1. Recitals, in an order admitting a will to probate, that due proof was made to the satisfaction of the court that notice had been given of the time appointed for proving the will and hearing the petition, and that citations were duly issued and served as required by the previous order of the court, and that notice had been given according to law to all persons interested, warrants the presumption that an order had been regularly made directing the issuance of a citation to the heirs residing in the county, as required by Probate Act Cal. 1851, § 14, providing that, if the heirs reside in the county, the court shall direct citations to be issued and served on them to appear and contest the probate of the will at the time appointed.

2. A recital in an executor's bond that, "by order of the probate court * * * duly made and entered, * * * the above-bounden H. was appointed executor," etc., estops the surety to deny that the order appointing the executor was duly made and entered.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge. Action by F. J. Moore on the bond of C. W. Hathaway as executor and D. W. Earl as surety. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Earl appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. Catlin & Blanchard, for respondent.

VANCLIFF, C. This is an action upon the bond of an executor for the faithful execution of his trust according to law. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant Earl, who is a surety on the bond, appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The defendant Hathaway was appointed executor in May, 1868, and, upon the execution of the bond in suit, letters testamentary were issued to him, upon which he indorsed his official oath as required by law, and thereupon took possession of the estate of the testator of the value of $16,637, and returned and filed an inventory thereof on May 11, 1868. Upon a final settlement of his accounts in September, 1889, the court found in his hands a balance of $12,577. This balance, by the decree of distribution, was given to the plaintiff, who brought this suit on the executor's bond to recover the full penalty thereof, which is $6,000. The only point made for the appellant is that the probate court acquired no jurisdiction to probate the will, or to issue letters testamentary, and therefore that, as to the surety, the executor's bond is void. The only alleged defect in the proceedings, by reason of which it is claimed that the probate court failed to acquire jurisdiction, is that no order of that court, directing the issuance of a citation to the heirs residing in the county, as required by section 14 of the probate act of 1851, is found upon the records or files of the court, except so far as it appears by recital in the order admitting the will to probate. Section 14 of the act of 1851 provides: "If the heirs of the testator reside in the county, the court shall also direct citations to be issued and served upon them to appear and contest the probate of the will at the time appointed." The order admitting the will to probate, and appointing Hathaway executor, recites, among other things, that due proof was made, to the satisfaction of the court, "that notice has been given of the time appointed for proving said will, and for hearing said petition, and that citations have been duly issued and served, as required by the previous order of this court, and it appearing to this court that notice has been given according to law to all parties interested," etc. In the absence of any other record, evidence of an order that a citation issue to the heirs residing in the county, or of its service, I think these recitals sufficient to warrant the presumption that such order had been regularly made, and that the citations had been duly issued and served. It might be otherwise if it appeared of record that an insufficient order relating to the citation had been made, or that the citation issued was not in substantial compliance with the order, or that the mode of service was fatally defective, as, in such case, it would not be presumed that a different order had been made or a different citation issued, or that service had been made in a different mode; but the record does not show, or purport to show, the form or substance of the order, or of the citation, nor the mode of service; and therefore the presumption that the order to issue and serve the citation was regularly made, and that the citation was regularly issued and served, does not contradict the record in any respect, but is in perfect accord with the recitals of the order admitting the will to probate. Freem. Judgm. §§ 125, 180; Black, Judgm. § 277; Irwin v. Backus, 25 Cal. 214; Fox v. Minor, 32 Cal. 120. HARMS V. SILVA et al. (No. 13,801.)

MORTGAGES—CERTIFICATE OF ACKNOWLEDGMENT—SUBSEQUENT INCUMBRANCERS.

Civil Code Cal. § 2957, provides that a mortgage on growing crops is void "as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers for value and in good faith, unless" accompanied by a certain affidavit and acknowledgment, proved, certified, and recorded in like manner as grants of real property. Held that, where plaintiff took a mortgage on growing crops, knowing that defendants held a prior mortgage thereon, but without knowledge that such mortgage was defective for want of the prescribed certificate, plaintiff is not a subsequent incumbrancer in good faith, and defendants' mortgage is valid as against plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Action by George Harms against M. Bruno Silva and L. B. Keating to recover 100 tons of baled hay, or its value. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geil & Morehouse and G. W. Roadhouse, for appellant. Dorn & Parker and Fredrick Sherwood, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. This action is to recover 100 tons of baled hay, or the value. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiff appeals from it and the order refusing a new trial. The hay was raised by Silva, who on January 21, 1889, mortgaged the same, then a growing crop, to Keating, to secure the sum of $350, with interest; also "whatever further necessary costs that may be needed to guard and care for said crops." The mortgage was duly executed, and had attached to it the affidavit required by section 2957 of the Civil Code; but the officer neglected to certify the acknowledgment, and Keating had the mortgage recorded by the county recorder, without the certificate. Afterwards, March 29, 1889, Silva mortgaged the same crop to plaintiff to secure a debt due from Silva to him. Plaintiff took his mortgage with full knowledge of Keating's mortgage, and expecting at the time to obtain a second lien, being unaware of any defect. Plaintiff's mortgage was duly executed, and was recorded on the day it was executed. Each mortgage contains a stipulation giving the mortgagee a right to take possession of the crop when harvested. June 12, 1889, the hay having been cut and baled, the plaintiff attempted to take possession, and did receive and haul away eight bales. Returning for more, he found defendant Keating in possession, whereupon he commenced this action.

The only question in the case is whether Keating's mortgage is void as to plaintiff. Section 2955 of the Civil Code prescribes that chattel mortgages may be made upon certain personal property therein enumerated, and including growing crops. Section 2956 provides a form with which such mortgage must substantially comply. Keating's mortgage does substantially comply with the prescribed form. The next section makes such mortgage void, "as against creditors of the mortgagor and subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers of the property in good faith and for value, unless" accompanied by a certain affidavit and acknowledgment, proved, certified, and recorded in like manner as grants of real property. The fact that the mortgage, in the absence of a proper record, is expressly made void as to purchasers and incumbrancers for value and in good faith, implies that it is valid as to all others without such record. Plaintiff, having taken his mortgage with full knowledge of Keating's mortgage, is not an incumbrancer in good faith. Gassner v. Patterson, 23 Cal. 299, is not in point. As the statute then stood, (St. 1861, p. 197,) it provided that no chattel mortgage should be valid (except as between the parties thereto) unless made, executed, and recorded according to the provisions of that act. As the statute then stood, it might well be said that a chattel mortgage was a privilege to be secured only by a strict conformity to the act. The Code provisions as to those chattels on which a mortgage is permitted puts them, except as to certain specified conditions, on the same basis as mortgages upon real estate. It matters not that plaintiff was a creditor, admitting that he is shown to have been such. He is here claiming as a subsequent incumbrancer only, and has no rights in this matter unless he acquired them by his mortgage. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

STEVENSON v. COLGAN. (No. 14,605.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 16, 1891.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—LEGISLATIVE POWERS—INVASION BY THE JUDICIARY.

Where an act of the legislature appropriating money to an individual for services rendered the state is valid on its face, courts cannot look into evidence abundant to determine whether it was a gift in violation of Const. Cal. art. 4, § 31, providing that the legislature shall have no power to make any gift of any public money.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Petition by Jonathan D. Stevenson for mandamus to compel one Colgan, as state comptroller, to draw a warrant on the state treasurer. Judgment for petitioner. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Barham & Bolton, (Atty. Gen. Hart, amicus curiæ,) for appellant. Geo. A. Wentworth and A. P. Van Duzer, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an application for a writ of mandamus to be directed to the defendant as state comptroller, and commanding him to draw a warrant on the state treasurer for the sum of $125, to which amount petitioner claims that he is entitled by virtue of the provisions of an act of the legislature approved March 31, 1891. The act is entitled "An act for the relief of Jonathan D. Stevenson, and to appropriate money therefor," and, so far as necessary to be stated here, it is as follows: "Section 1. The sum of one hundred and twenty-five dollars per month, payable monthly, for the period of twenty-one months, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of Col. Jonathan D. Stevenson: provided, however, that said appropriation shall cease upon the death of said Stevenson, if he shall die before said period has elapsed; the sums paid under the provisions of this act to be accepted by the said Stevenson in full payment and satisfaction of all claims of every kind and nature that he may have, or claim to have, against said state for services or otherwise." The answer of the defendant alleges that petitioner never at any time had or has "any claim of any kind or nature whatsoever against the state of California for services rendered, or for any other thing done, had, or performed by the said Jonathan Stevenson, or for anything of value furnished to the state of California;" and that the appropriation made by the said act of the legislature was intended as a gift to the petitioner. The answer then proceeds in an informal way to allege that, prior to the admission of California as a state, the petitioner expended money and performed services "in surveying and preparing charts of the bay of Suisun and the Sacramento and San Joaquin rivers," and, in substance, avers that this service and expenditure of money constitute the foundation of petitioner's alleged claim against the state, and for which the appropriation contained in the act referred to was made. A demurrer to the answer was sustained by the court below, and thereupon judgment was rendered in favor of petitioner, as demanded in his petition. The defendant appeals.

Section 31, art. 4, of the constitution, provides that the legislature shall have no power "to make any gift, or authorize the making of any gift, of any public money or thing of value, to any individual;" and section 32 of the same article also declares: "The legislature shall have no power to grant, or authorize any county or municipal authority to grant, any extra compensation or allowance to any public officer, agent, servant, or contractor after service has been rendered or a contract has been entered into and performed in whole or in part." By these provisions of the constitution there is denied to the legislature the right to make direct appropriations to individuals from general considerations of charity or gratitude, or because of some supposed moral obligation resting upon the people of the state, and such as a just and generous man, although under no legal liability so to do, might be willing to recognize in his dealings with others less fortunate than himself. It was because of abuses which had crept into legislation by reason of the unlimited power theretofore exercised by the legislature in determining what individual claims should be recognized by private act, and to relieve in some degree legislators from the importunities of persons interested in securing such appropriations, that the power of the legislature was thus limited by the present constitution of this state. In this view there can be no doubt that if the facts are as alleged in the answer of defendant the act under consideration ought never to have been passed. But these facts do not appear upon the face of the act itself, and the question is thus presented whether it is competent for the court in this or any form of action to receive evidence aliunde to establish such facts, and thus to impeach and overthrow a law which, upon its face and independent of proof, is presumptively valid. This case, as thus presented, is to be distinguished from those in which it has been held that the court may look into the journals of the legislature for the purpose of determining whether a statute was in fact passed by the requisite votes required by the constitution. In such cases the question is whether the law was in fact enacted, and not whether the legislature in passing the statute properly discharged its duty by the preliminary ascertainment of facts which alone would justify such legislative action.

In our opinion, the question which we have stated as the one for decision here must be answered in the negative. While the courts have undoubted power to declare a statute invalid, when it appears to them in the course of judicial action to be in conflict with the constitution, yet they can only do so when the question arises as a pure question of law, unmixed with matters of fact, the existence of which must be determined upon a trial, and as the result of, it may be, conflicting evidence. When the right to enact a law depends upon the existence of facts, it is the duty of the legislature before passing the bill, and of the governor before approving it, to become satisfied, in some appropriate way, that the facts exist; and no authority is conferred upon the courts to hear evidence and determine, as a question of fact, whether these co-ordinate departments of the state government have properly discharged such duty. The authority and duty to ascertain the facts which ought to control legislative action are, from the necessity of the case, devolved by the constitution upon those to whom it has given the power to legislate, and their decision that the facts exist is conclusive upon the courts, in the absence of an explicit provision in the constitution giving the judiciary the right to review such action. We therefore hold that, in passing upon the constitutionality of a statute, the court must confine itself to a consideration of those matters which appear upon the face of the law, and those facts of which it can take judicial notice. If the law, when thus considered, does not appear to be unconstitutional, the court will not go behind it, and by a resort to evidence undertake to ascertain whether the legislature in its enactment observed the restrictions which the constitution imposed upon it as a duty to do, and to the performance of which its members were bound by their oaths of office. "If evidence was required, it must be supposed that it was before the legislature when the act was passed; and, if any special finding was required to warrant the passage of the particular act, it would seem that the passage of the act itself might be equivalent to such finding." Cooley, Const. Lim. *187. This view seems to be sustained by the decisions of the highest courts of other states, and is in harmony with the central idea of the constitution in prescribing the independence and equality of the three great departments of the state. The following are some of the cases which in principle sustain the conclusion we have reached: Manufacturing Co. v. Shanahan, (N. Y. App.) 28 N. E. Rep. 358; Rumsey v. People, 19 N. Y. 41; Hovey v. Foster, 118 Ind. 502, 21 N. E. Rep. 39; Lusher v. Scites, 4 W. Va. 11; De Camp v. Eveland, 19 Barb. 81.

If experience shall demonstrate that further restriction upon legislative power over the subject of appropriations of public money is necessary, it is within the power of the people to so amend the constitution as to provide that, notwithstanding an appropriation made by the legislature for its payment, the legality of every claim against the state shall or may be the subject of judicial investigation as to the facts upon which it rests. But, in the absence of a plain direction to that effect, the courts are not authorized to institute such an inquiry. As already stated, the act in question does not show upon its face the nature of the claim which the petitioner made against the state, or that the appropriation thereby made is a gift. The statute is unusual in form, and it may be difficult to assign any good reason for the singular provision that the state shall discharge by monthly installments the indebtedness which the act admits, and, in the event of petitioner's death before it is fully paid, shall be released from the payment of any balance then due; but this does not affect the question of the power of the legislature to so provide, nor authorize the court to declare that the act was enacted in absolute disregard of the constitution. Judgment affirmed.

OPINION EVIDENCE—MEDICAL BOOKS.

On trial of an action for damages for negligence and unskillfulness of a physician in setting plaintiff's broken arm, it is error to permit plaintiff to read to her medical witnesses, in their examination in chief, extracts from a standard work on surgery, and then to ask them if what was so read corresponds with their own judgment.

Action by Sarah E. Lilley against Dr. Parkinson for damages. Judgment for plaintiff. The defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. A. Knight and A. C. Hartley, (Knight & Heggerty, of counsel,) for appellant. Elī R. Chuse, (C. Ed. Miller, of counsel,) for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant is a physician and surgeon, and this action is to recover damages for his alleged negligence and unskillfulness in setting a broken arm of the plaintiff, Sarah E. Lilley. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for $1,000. The defendant appeals. Upon the trial the plaintiff was permitted, in the examination in chief of medical witnesses called by herself, to read extracts from Agnew's Surgery, shown to be a standard work and authority on that subject, and then to ask the witnesses if what was so read corresponded with their own judgment. The decision of the court in overruling the objection of defendant to this mode of examination was erroneous. The only effect of these questions and answers was to place before the jury the opinion of the author of the book referred to, and it is also apparent that this was the object sought. But it is not permissible, in this manner, to evade the general rule of evidence, which excludes medical books and opinions found therein as incompetent. Com. v. Sturtivant, 117 Mass. 122; Gallagher v. Railway Co., 67 Cal. 17, 6 Pac. Rep. 869. In the cases of Marshall v. Brown, 50 Mich. 148, 15 N. W. Rep. 55; Fisher v.

Railroad Co., 89 Cal. 399, 26 Pac. Rep. 894; City of Bloomington v. Shroch, 110 Ill. 219,—it was held not competent, upon cross-examination of a witness, to read to him extracts from medical books, and ask him whether he agreed in opinion with the author, when it was apparent that the sole object of so doing was to get before the jury the extracts so read as original evidence to sustain the theory of the party so cross-examining the witness. The principle upon which those cases were decided applies with even more force to the facts of this case, where the same forbidden result was accomplished by the manner in which the direct examination of the witnesses for plaintiff was conducted. Judgment and order reversed.

RIGHTS OF HEIRS—RECOVERY OF LAND.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1452, providing that an executor or administrator is entitled to the possession of all the real and personal estate of his decedent, and the rents and profits of the real estate until the estate is settled, or until delivered over by order of the court to the heirs or devisees, and that the heirs or devisees may themselves, or jointly with the executor or administrator, maintain an action for the possession of the real estate, or for the purpose of quieting title to the same against any one except the executor or administrator, an heir at law may maintain an action against one not the executor to recover possession and rents of real estate of which the testator died seised in fee, and which his will directed should be converted into money by his executrix as soon as practicable in her judgment, since such direction does not vest title to the land in the executor.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; RODNEY J. HUDSON, Judge.

Action of ejectment by Amanda C. Estep against James B. Armstrong. Judgment for defendant. The plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. H. Osment and J. H. Gove, for appellant. R. W. Crump and Woods Crawford, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered against the plaintiff and in favor of the defendant in an action of ejectment. The record consists of the pleadings, findings, judgment, and a bill of exceptions. The court found that the plaintiff, Amanda C. Estep, is the daughter and heir at law of Joseph H. Estep, deceased. That the said Joseph H. Estep was, at the time of his death, seised in fee and possessed of those certain lands and premises in the complaint mentioned known as the "Fitzgerald Tract," describing the same according to the United States survey. That at the time of his death said Joseph H. Estep was the owner of the undivided one-half of all the remainder of the land described, as a tenant in common with the defendant James B. Armstrong, who owned the other undivided half thereof. That the defendant, at the time of the commencement of this action, was, and still is, in possession of certain of the lands in the complaint described, which lands are fully and particularly described in said finding. That said Joseph H. Estep left a last will and testament, of which a copy is set out in said finding, one clause of which only is material in this case, and that is as follows: "It is my will that, so soon after my decease as practicable in the judgment of my executrix hereinafter mentioned, all my property, whether real, personal, or mixed, be converted into money." That said will was duly admitted to probate by the probate court of Lake county on the 21st day of February, 1876. That plaintiff has never at any time been the owner, or seised in fee or otherwise, or possessed or entitled to the possession, of the lands described in the amended complaint herein, or in any cause or causes of action herein, or of any interest in said lands, or any part thereof, or of any of them. That defendant never at any time did oust or eject plaintiff from any of the lands described in said amended complaint, or in any cause or causes of action set out in said complaint. The bill of exceptions shows that the facts found by the court in the 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th findings were admitted, and plaintiff then offered evidence to show the value of the rents of the premises, admitted to have been in defendant's possession at the commencement of this action, to which defendant objected, on the ground that such evidence was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, for the reason that plaintiff had shown by her own evidence that she was never at any time the owner of any right to or interest in the land. The court sustained the objection, and plaintiff excepted.

An heir may maintain an action for the possession of the real estate, or for the purpose of quieting title to the same, against any one except the executor or administrator. Code Civil Proc. § 1452.¹ Does the direction contained in the will, to have all his property converted into money as soon as practicable after the death of the testator, deprive the heir of the right to maintain an action for the possession of the real estate of which the testator died seised in fee? There is no express devise in the will of any of the real estate of which the testator died seised in fee. In Bergen v. Bennett, 1 Caines, Cas. 1, KENT, J., said: "If a man by his will directs his executors to sell his land, this is but a bare authority, without interest; for the land in the mean time descends to the heir at law, who, until the sale, would at common law be entitled to the profits." It was as well settled when this was said, as it is now, that where there is a direction in a will to have land converted into money the conversion takes place as from the death of the testator. The provision of the Code that, "where a will directs the conversion of real property into money, such property and all its proceeds must be deemed personal property from the time of the death of the testator," is simply declaratory of the common law. It was said by the chancellor in Haxton v. Corse, 2 Barb. Ch. 521, that, "to deprive an heir or distributee of the property which the law gives him in case of intestacy, the testator must make valid and effectual disposition thereof to some other person." "We think," says the supreme court of Indiana, that "it is well settled by the current of American as well as of English decisions that mere direction to an executor to sell lands for the purpose of paying legacies or making distributions does not vest any title to the land in the executor. To cut off the heir at law the estate must be devised expressly or by implication to some other person." Clendenning v. Lanus, 3 Ind. 441. The Code, in our opinion, has not changed the law in this respect. The Code does not declare that a direction to convert land into money shall vest the title to the land in the executor. It leaves the law, as it always has been, that the direction in wills to convert land into money, or money into land, is for the benefit of those for whose use the conversion is intended to be made, and that, as to them, it is deemed to have been made from the death of the testator. But the Code does not provide that such a direction in a will shall operate as a devise of the land directed to be converted to the executor. In the absence of any devise of the land, the title vests in the heir on the death of the ancestor, and the heir may maintain an action to recover the possession of it against any person other than the administrator or executor. The findings that the plaintiff is the heir at law of Joseph H. Estep, deceased, and that he died seised in fee of certain of the demanded premises, are in conflict with the finding "that plaintiff has never been the owner, or seised in fee or otherwise, or possessed or entitled to the possession, of the lands described in the amended complaint herein, or in any cause or causes of action herein, or of any interest in said lands, or any part thereof, or of any of them." That is a sufficient ground for reversing the judgment. The court erred in excluding evidence of the value of the rents of the demanded premises while in the defendant's possession. As the heir at law, she was entitled to the rents, issues, and profits of the land so long as she was wrongfully kept out of the possession thereof. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order made in an action for divorce, allowing the plaintiff therein alimony. The order is as follows: "The order to show cause having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and now, the court having fully considered the same, it is ordered that the defendant pay to the plaintiff the sum of twenty-five dollars ($25) per month alimony."

1. This order was made before any issue of fact was joined in the said action for divorce, and while there was pending a demurrer to the complaint, which demurrer was afterwards sustained. The order is not erroneous for this reason. The action for divorce was pending at the time it was made, and the court had undoubted jurisdiction to make it.

2. The order is not erroneous because the requirement to pay the amount fixed by it is not expressly limited to such time as the action in which it is made shall be pending. By necessary implication it ceases to have any operation after the entry of judgment.

3. We cannot say that in making the order upon the facts before it the court committed any abuse of discretion. Order affirmed.

BYRUM v. STOCKTON COMBINED HARVESTER & AGRICULTURAL WORKS. (No. 14,183.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 18, 1891.)

CHANGE OF VENUE.

In an action for breach of warranty of a harvesting-machine sold plaintiff by defendant, and which plaintiff alleged failed to work, defendant moved for a change of venue to S. county on an affidavit alleging that its principal place of business was in said county, that the contract sued on was made there, and that the breach, if any, did not occur in the county in which the action was brought. On the hearing of the motion plaintiff merely read his verified complaint, showing that he was a resident of the county in which suit was brought, and alleging that the breach of contract occurred there, but not stating where the contract was made or was to have been performed. Held, that the change of venue should have been granted.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; W. O. MINOR, Judge.

Action by Martin Byrum against the Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works. Defendant appeals from an order refusing a change of venue. Reversed.

W. L. Dudley, for appellant. W. E. Turner and L. J. Maddox, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from an order refusing a change of venue. The plaintiff resides in Stanislaus county, where the action was brought, and is a farmer. He purchased from defendant a Shippee Combined Harvester, which, as he avers, defendant guaranteed would do good and satisfactory work, but which wholly failed to perform as guaranteed, by reason whereof he was damaged. Defendant moved for a change of venue to San Joaquin county, upon an affidavit showing that the principal place of business of defendant is in Stockton, San Joaquin county, and that the contract sued upon was made at defendant's said principal place of business; also that the breach of said contract, if any, did not occur in Stanislaus county. There was also an affidavit of merits. On the hearing of the motion the plaintiff read in answer only his verified complaint. It is there averred that defendant is doing business in the state of California, and, among other counties, in the county of Stanislaus; that, among other things, the business of the corporation was to manufacture and sell a certain kind of machinery, known as the Shippee Combined Harvester, with Shippee and Grattan improvements. A contract is set out whereby defendant sold a machine to plaintiff with a guaranty as to performance, to wit, that said harvester would do and perform good and satisfactory work in the harvesting, cutting, and saving of grain, and would harvest plaintiff's grain in Stanislaus county at a greatly reduced expense, etc. It is shown that, relying upon the representations and guaranty, he purchased the machine, took it to his farm in Stanislaus county, where it wholly failed to perform; that the failure was owing wholly to the faulty manufacture and construction of said machine: "that this action is brought to recover damages sustained by plaintiff, growing out of the breach of contract of defendant as aforesaid; and that said breach occurred in the county of Stanislaus, and the liability of defendant thereon occurred in said county." The complaint does not state where the contract was made, or was to have been performed. The affidavit of defendant states that the contract was made in the county of San Joaquin, where the principal place of business of the corporation is. It is quite immaterial whether the corporation did business in Stanislaus county, if this contract was not made or was not to have been performed there. The affidavit of the moving party is positive to the effect that the contract, the breach of which is the subject of the action, was made in San Joaquin county. This fact is not controverted in the complaint, but it is there stated that the breach occurred in Stanislaus county. This is, however, a mere legal conclusion, probably drawn by the pleader from the fact that the failure of the machine to perform was in that county. It is merely an erroneous opinion. It is not stated on either side where the machine was delivered to plaintiff, but as the sale was at Stockton, defendant's principal place of business, the presumption is that it was delivered there. If the machine was, as charged, wholly inadequate and unadapted to perform according to the guaranty, the breach was there and then, and not when it failed to perform on plaintiff's farm in Stanislaus. The order appealed from should therefore be reversed, and defendant's motion to change the place of trial should be granted.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed, and defendant's motion to change the place of trial is granted.

HOMESTEAD—RESIDENCE ON LAND.

Defendants, husband and wife, were living in S. until August 21, 1883, when they and their children left the city with part of their furniture, and went to the homestead claimed, where they stayed that night. The following morning the husband returned to S., and telegraphed his wife to meet him at O., which she did, and there had executed and recorded a declaration of homestead, when she returned to the alleged homestead. The day following, the wife returned with her children to her husband at S., where they all remained. Held, that there was no actual residence on the land, within the homestead law, (Civil Code Cal. § 1263.)

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; NOBLE HAMILTON, Judge.

Action by Joseph Tromans against Henry Mahlman and Mary Jane Mahlman to recover the possession of a house and lot claimed by defendants as a homestead. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Metcalfe & Metcalfe and Benj. Williams, for appellant. R. Percy Wright, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. In June, 1882, one Lee conveyed to the defendant Henry Mahlman a lot of land in the town of Haywards, Alameda county. In May, 1883, Mahlman conveyed the lot as a gift to his wife, the defendant Mary Jane Mahlman. When these conveyances were executed, one Fisk held a mortgage made by Lee on the lot, and both conveyances were made subject to the mortgage. On the 22d day of August, 1883, Mrs. Mahlman executed and caused to be recorded a declaration of homestead on the lot, which was in all respects in accordance with the provisions of section 1263 of the Civil Code. In January, 1884, Fisk commenced an action against the mortgagor, Lee, and Mrs. Mahlman to foreclose his mortgage, and such proceedings were subsequently had that a decree of foreclosure was duly made and entered against the defendants therein. Under this decree an order of sale was issued, and the property was regularly sold to the plaintiff herein, who in August, 1887, received the sheriff's deed therefor. In December, 1887, the plaintiff commenced this action to recover possession of the lot, alleging in his complaint that he was the owner of the same in fee-simple absolute. The defendants, by their answer, denied that plaintiff was the owner of the lot, or of any part thereof, in fee-simple absolute, or at all. After trial the court found the facts as follows: "(1) That the plaintiff, Joseph Tromans, is not the owner of the tract of land mentioned and described in the complaint herein, or of any part thereof, either in fee-simple absolute or at all. (2) That the defendants, Henry Mahlman and Mary Jane Mahlman, are the owners of said tract of land, and of every part thereof." Judgment was accordingly entered in favor of the defendants, from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

It is admitted by counsel for appellant that, since Henry Mahlman was not made a party to the foreclosure suit, the judgment should be affirmed if the demanded premises had become the homestead of defendants before that suit was commenced; but it is contended that the declaration of homestead, which was executed and filed for record by Mrs. Mahlman, did not create a valid homestead, for the reason that she was not at the time actually residing upon the premises. It is objected by respondents that the statement on motion for new trial contains no sufficient specifications of the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to justify the decision of the court, and hence that this point cannot be considered; but we think the specifications should be held sufficient. "The purpose of the statute is apparent. It was to direct the attention of the court and counsel to the particulars relied on by the moving party, to the end that the evidence bearing on the specifications of error might be inserted in the statement, and considered by the court." Eddelbuttel v. Durrell, 55 Cal. 279. In Pralus v. Mining Co., 35 Cal. 37, a specification similar to that found here was admitted to be sufficient.

The evidence as to the homestead was as follows: Mrs. Mahlman testified: "I am one of the defendants in this case, and was residing on the land in controversy in this action, which is situated at Haywards, Alameda county, at the time the declaration of homestead which has been spoken of was made and filed for record. There was a dwelling-house on the land then. My father and all the family I had in August, 1883, were living there with me at the time. Cross-examined: My husband was living with me on the place at Haywards on the 22d day of August, 1883. Before that time we were living at 717 Stockton street, in San Francisco. Was not living at 717 Stockton street on the 22d of August, 1883. That is a rooming-house. My furniture was not all there. Took part of the furniture to the place at Haywards. I took all household utensils; everything up to a broom. The furniture was there long before. It was sent over in January, 1883. My husband, my father, and all my four children went to Haywards on the 21st of August, 1883. My husband stayed there one night, and went to San Francisco the following morning. I stayed there two nights, and then went back to San Francisco. We did not live in the house at Haywards before we went on the 21st of August, 1883. After August 23, 1883, resided continually in San Francisco, until about November, 1886. * * * My husband went to San Francisco by the morning train on the 22d of August, 1883, and sent me a telegram to meet him at Oakland that day, and I met him there. The declaration of homestead was signed and acknowledged by me at Oakland, and after it was taken to the recorder's office my husband put me into the Haywards train, and he went to San Francisco. I returned to the house at Haywards, and remained there until the following day. I and my children and my father slept in the house at Haywards on the night of the 22d of August, 1883. We all left and returned to San Francisco on the 23d of August, 1883. I took the blankets, sheets, pillow-cases, and pillows back with me to San Francisco. I had no other property but that at Haywards at the time the declaration of homestead was filed. My husband had not filed a declaration of homestead at that time. All the land except that on which the housestands was used as a garden and orchard, and it was all inclosed with a fence. Redirect examination: My idea in making the declaration of homestead was that my children should have a home."

Henry Mahlman testified: "I am one of the defendants in this case. Remember the declaration of homestead, which has been spoken of here, being filed. On the night of the day before it was filed I was stopping in the house at Haywards, with my wife and family. Went there on the 21st of August, 1883. I went alone. My wife and children went the same day, along with her father, Mr. Miller. Went next morning to San Francisco, to attend to business. Had a declaration of homestead made out there, and telegraphed my wife to come to Oakland. She came in the afternoon, and signed and acknowledged the declaration of homestead, which was recorded, and then my wife returned to Haywards. Cross-examination: I rented the house 717 Stockton street, San Francisco, about 1879. Paid the rent to Madison & Burke for the months of August and September, 1883, and right along for two or three years after that. My furniture and things were there in August, 1883. In January, 1883, sent part of the furniture over to the house in Haywards. Only stayed one night there in August, 1883; that was the night between the 21st and 22d of August."

George W. Miller also testified: "I am the father of the defendant Mary Jane Mahlman. Remember going with her to Haywards, and taking the children. I remember Mahlman went there the same evening. Remember going to Haywards before that with an expressman. When I went with my daughter and the children we took supper at the house of a man named Geary, who lived close by. I went over to the house from Geary's, and made it as comfortable as possible. It was a small house, about 24x12, with two rooms. We all slept there that night. The next day my daughter got a dispatch, and went to Oakland. I remained there with the children. She came back, and stayed with the children and me at the house that night."

It is settled law in this state that to constitute a valid homestead, the claimant must actually reside on the premises when the declaration is filed. Prescott v. Prescott, 45 Cal. 58; Babcock v. Gibbs, 52 Cal. 629; Aucker v. McCoy, 56 Cal. 524; Pfister v. Dasey, 68 Cal. 572, 10 Pac. Rep. 117; Lubbock v. McMann, 82 Cal. 228, 22 Pac. Rep. 1145. The question, then, is, does the evidence show that Mrs. Mahlman was actually residing on the premises in controversy when she filed her declaration of homestead? We are unable to see how this question can be answered otherwise than in the negative. The obvious purpose of the statute in providing for the selection of a homestead was to thereby make a home for the family, which neither of the spouses could incur or dispose of without the consent of the other, and which should at all times be protected against creditors. To effect its purpose the statute has been liberally construed in some respects, but the requirement as to residence at the time the declaration is filed has been strictly construed. Thus this court has many times used and emphasized the word "actually," to show that the residence must be real, and not sham or pretended. In Babcock v. Gibbs, supra, the homestead claimants went to their lot in the evening, and spread a blanket for a roof, and slept under it. The next day they filed a declaration of homestead, and commenced the erection of a house, which they completed and moved into in about a month. It was held that they were not actually residing on the premises when the declaration was filed, and hence that no homestead was thereby selected. Here it clearly appears from the evidence that the respondents went to Haywards, not to make their home or place of abode there, but only to spend a night or two, and then return to their home in San Francisco. This was not enough to constitute an actual residence. In our opinion, the judgment and order should be reversed, and we so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed.

ANDERSON v. STRASSBURGER. (No. 13,519.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 21, 1891.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—CONTRACT TO PURCHASE—RECOVERY OF PART PAYMENT.

Where one who has a contract by which he can at any time acquire the legal title to land, sells to another who knows of such contract, giving him 10 days to examine the title, and agreeing to refund a part payment if the title does not prove satisfactory, the failure of the vendor to obtain a conveyance within the 10 days, so that he can convey to the vendee, will not entitle the vendee to rescind the contract and recover the money paid, in the absence of any demand on the vendor for a deed, or offer to complete the purchase, or notice of objection to the title.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by one Anderson against one Strassburger. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Rogers, for appellant. E. F. Preston, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This action is to recover $500, received by defendant from plaintiff, "as a deposit and in part payment" for a block of land in the city of San Francisco, which plaintiff agreed to purchase from defendant. The contract contained the following stipulations: "Title to prove satisfactory, or the money to be refunded. * * * Ten days allowed for examination of title and completion of purchase." The court below found, among other things, that at the date of the contract the title to the property agreed to be sold was in the defendant, and was a satisfactory title, and that the plaintiff was not, during the 10 days named in the contract, nor at any other time, ready or willing to pay the remainder of the purchase price; and that, immediately after making the contract, he left San Francisco, where the contract was made, and where the defendant kept a business office, "and during all of said ten days thereafter the plaintiff avoided the defendant for the purpose of preventing and defeating the completion of said contract, and a tender of a deed to him by defendant in pursuance of said contract." Upon these findings judgment was entered for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

The findings are sufficient to support the judgment, and the evidence sustains the findings. It appears that at the date of the contract the legal title to the property which plaintiff thereby agreed to purchase was in one Lees, the defendant being entitled by contract with Lees to a conveyance of the same at any time upon the payment of a certain balance upon the purchase price. This fact was known to plaintiff at the time when he made the purchase. The defendant did not in fact acquire the legal title to the property he agreed to sell plaintiff until more than 10 days after the date of plaintiff's contract to purchase, and because of this fact plaintiff claims the right to rescind the contract and recover his deposit, but we do not think so. The title was at all times potentially in the defendant, and he was not in default, simply because no formal conveyance was made to him by his grantor within the time allowed plaintiff for examination of the title, nor was there any necessity for him to acquire such title in order to carry out his agreement, until plaintiff notified him that he was ready to complete the contract upon his part. The plaintiff was allowed 10 days within which to examine the title, and the agreement, in view of all the facts surrounding the parties at the time it was made, contemplated that defendant should receive notice of the approval of the title he was to obtain from Lees, or, if not approved as satisfactory, that he should be informed of any objection which after such examination plaintiff might have to the same, and he was entitled to a reasonable time thereafter within which to perfect his title or remedy any defects discovered by plaintiff; and not until the giving of such notice, and an offer by plaintiff to fully perform the contract on his part upon receiving a perfect title, and the refusal of defendant thereafter to convey in accordance with the terms of his agreement, would plaintiff have the right to rescind the agreement and recover the amount paid by him thereon. These views are fully sustained by the cases of Englander v. Rogers, 41 Cal. 420; Dennis v. Strassburger, 89 Cal. 583, 26 Pac. Rep. 1070; and Easton v. Montgomery, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 280,—and are decisive of all questions involved in this appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HONG QUIN MOON. (No. 20,820.)

FALSE PRETENSES — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE — NEW TRIAL.

1. On a prosecution for obtaining money under false pretenses the prosecuting witness did not testify that he believed the alleged false statements, or that they induced him to pay over the money. There was a substantial conflict in the other evidence, but it seemed to preponderate in favor of defendant. Held, that a verdict of guilty should not be disturbed on appeal. PATERSON, J., dissenting.

2. A new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence is properly refused where substantially the same matters set forth in the affidavit were testified to by the witnesses at the trial, the only difference being that a certain statement made by defendant was testified to by witnesses as having been made before the trial, while the affidavit referred to statements made subsequent to the trial.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCANN, Judge.

Information against Hong Quin Moon for obtaining money under false pretenses. Judgment of conviction. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lucas F. Smith, for appellant. Carl E. Lindsay and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was charged with having obtained from one Dong Toy the sum of $150 by means of false and fraudulent pretenses and representations. The information is sufficient, and there were no errors in the instructions of the court. The jury were instructed that before the defendant could be convicted it must be shown beyond a reasonable doubt that the representations alleged were false, and made with intent to defraud Dong Toy, and that they induced him to part with his money. Dong Toy did not testify that he believed the alleged statement of the defendant, or that it induced him to pay over the money; but in cases of this kind, while the testimony of the prosecutor is ordinarily the best evidence of the effect which the alleged statements had upon him, it is not essential to a conviction that he should testify expressly that the false pretenses induced him to act as he did. The jury may be fully satisfied on the testimony of others, and from all the circumstances in the case, that the representations did induce him to turn over the property to the defendant. State v. Thatcher, 35 N. J. Law, 449. Although the evidence seems to preponderate in favor of the defendant, there is a substantial conflict, and it cannot, therefore, be said that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict.

The court did not err in its refusal to grant a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. The witnesses for the defendant testified at the trial to substantially the same matters set forth in the affidavit on motion for a new trial; the only difference being that the statement of the defendant, testified to by the witnesses at the trial, were made in November, 1890, and those referred to in the affidavits were made subsequent to the trial. The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

PATERSON, J., (dissenting.) I am unable to concur in the order affirming the judgment. While it is true that in cases of this kind the jury may be satisfied from the testimony of witnesses other than the prosecutor, or from all the circumstances in the case, that the representations induced the injured party to part with his property, yet the fact is one which, like every other element in a criminal offense, must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. In this case the evidence is so overwhelmingly in favor of the defendant, not only upon that matter, but upon the question as to whether or not the representations alleged were in fact made, that I think the judgment of conviction ought not to be permitted to stand. There are no circumstances, except the fact that money was paid to the defendant, tending to show that he was induced by defendant's representations to pay the money. The evidence tended strongly to show that Dong Toy had lent the defendant the sum of $40, and, upon the refusal of the latter to pay him that amount, had resorted to criminal proceedings to coerce payment. He sued the defendant in the justice's court for $150, and attached the laundry he claims to have purchased. Although he visited the laundry at the time he claims to have made the purchase,—December 6th,—and again, several days after the purchase, when he conversed with Hong Sing, one of the proprietors of the laundry, he made no claim thereto. I do not lose sight of the rule, so often applied here, that this court will not interfere where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence; but, after reading the statement of the evidence contained in the record several times, I am unable to see how the jurors, giving to the evidence that fair and impartial consideration which is due in every criminal case, could say they had an abiding conviction as to the guilt of the defendant,—that his guilt was established to a moral certainty, beyond a reasonable doubt.

SHIRLEY v. SHIRLEY et al. (No. 14,216.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1891.)

ADVISORY VERDICT—FINDING BY COURT.

Where the evidence as to whether there was a parol gift is conflicting, the court does not abuse its discretion in disregarding the advisory verdict of a jury, and finding that there was not.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Ejectment by L. F. Shirley against Kate Shirley and H. M. Kutchin. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for appellants. Collier & Watson, (Works, Gibson & Titus, of counsel,) for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action in ejectment was brought by Mrs. L. F. Shirley, the mother of one Frank B. Shirley, deceased, against his widow and her tenant, H. M. Kutchin. An answer and cross-complaint were filed by the defendants, alleging a parol gift of the premises in controversy by the plaintiff to her son, Frank B. Shirley; that he was dead, and had left by will all his property to his said wife; that he had before his death complied with all the conditions of the parol gift and promise made by his mother; and asking for a specific performance thereof. The contentions thus raised were submitted to a jury upon special issues, all of which were found in favor of the defendant Kate Shirley. The court below declined to accept the advisory verdict of the jury, and rendered a decision upon the issues made directly contrary thereto, and judgment was entered accordingly. The appeal here is taken from that judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial.

The only real contentions here are whether the court was guilty of an abuse of discretion in finding, as it did, upon the allegations of the cross-complaint, and in refusing to admit certain evidence. In a contest of this kind, to establish and enforce a parol gift of land, "the evidence must be clear and definite; and, if there is such a conflict of evidence as makes it uncertain what the material terms of the agreement were, the court will refuse to interfere." Wat. Spec. Perf. § 291. The court below adhered to the belief, from the evidence that no such parol gift, as asserted to have been made, and of which specific performance was claimed in the cross-complaint, was intended, and, there having been a conflict of evidence as to the matter, we cannot say that the legal discretion vested in that tribunal was abused.

Neither do we perceive any error in refusing to permit answers to the interrogatories propounded to the witness Morris about a certain letter. It was written by the son of the plaintiff to his sister, and related to matters entirely foreign to those here involved, and even conceding that the alteration was made by the plaintiff, which is not made perfectly clear, yet we do not see how it could affect the issues here made. Suppose the plaintiff did think that her son had put money into "Silver Terrace" property, instead of loaning it to her, and she had made this addition of the words above quoted in the letter, as expressing her dissent from what he had written, how could that have anything to do with the case here? Certainly it does not relate to her alleged promise and agreement, nor does it touch her credibility as a witness; and even if it had gone to her credibility, in view of all the other evidence in the case, we are unable to perceive that it could have affected the result. The legal title to the property in dispute was, without question, in the plaintiff. There was certainly some evidence that the party under whom the defendant claimed was a tenant at will only, and that he was dead. We cannot say, therefore, that the court below erred in the course pursued. For these reasons we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

DOBINSON et al. v. McDONALD. (No. 14,354.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 20, 1891.)

RELEASE OF CONTRACT—FRAUD—RESCISSION.

1. Defendant appointed plaintiffs his agents to sell land, and agreed to pay them $5,000 if they should make a sale, and to pay said commission if he (defendant) should sell within a year. Before the year expired defendant sold through another agent, without plaintiffs' knowledge, and procured from them a release of the contract for $1,000, by fraudulently representing that he had not sold, and had determined not to sell. Held that, on defendant's sale of the land, he became obligated to pay plaintiffs $5,000, and, on their discovery of the fraud by which he procured the release, they were entitled to rescind it, and recover the balance of $4,000.

2. In an action by plaintiffs against defendant for such balance, defendant cannot deduct therefrom the commission paid by him to the agent who made the sale, even though plaintiffs are liable to such agent under an agreement between them and such agent made after their agreement with defendant, since the agent's right to part of plaintiffs' commission could not be established in an action to which he is not a party.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by G. A. Dobinson and others against E. N. McDonald. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stephen M. White and Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. Lee & Scott, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. In March, 1886, the defendant executed to the plaintiffs the following instrument: "Los Angeles, Cal., 20 Mar., 1886. To Messrs. G. A. Dobinson, J. A. Fairchild, and T. E. Rowan: I hereby appoint you sole agents for the sale of my ranch, containing about four thousand two hundred (4,200) acres, situate in Los Angeles county, California, and being part of the San Pedro ranch. I will sell said ranch for one hundred and twenty-six thousand ($126,000) dollars, payable one-third cash, and balance in deferred payments at one, two, and three years, secured by mortgage on land, and drawing interest at 8 per cent. per annum net to me. You will advertise and push the sale of said property at your own expense, and in consideration of your services I will pay you a commission of five thousand ($5,000) dollars, in the event of a sale of the whole of the ranch at above price, or by your procuring a customer who will buy on said terms. * * * I agree to pay you the commission as above if I should sell or agree to sell said ranch, or part of it, to any one in the twelve months next ensuing, and afterwards until you are notified that this agreement is at an end. You are authorized to accept a deposit and to give a binding receipt to a purchaser on the above terms, and I will furnish abstract of title at my expense. E. N. McDONALD." After the execution of this instrument the plaintiffs under its authority, and until December 1, 1886, acted as the agents for the defendant in endeavoring to effect a sale of said property, expending money, and carrying on negotiations therefor, and used reasonable diligence therein. On the 24th of November, 1886, the defendant gave to one Frye written authority to sell the same property, under which, on the same day, Frye effected a sale thereof to one Boyce, which the defendant by his written agreement ratified and confirmed on the 26th of November, 1886. After this sale had been so ratified and confirmed by him, viz., December 1, 1886, the defendant represented and stated to the plaintiffs that he had changed his intention as to selling said land, and no longer desired or intended to sell the same, but had withdrawn it from market; and also stated and represented to them that he had not sold said land, and did not intend or expect to sell the same, and offered to pay them $1,000 for the surrender of the above agreement. The plaintiffs, relying upon these representations and statements, and not knowing that he had already sold the land, accepted his offer, surrendered the agreement to him, and received from him $1,000 as the consideration therefor. The court, in addition to the above facts, finds that these representations and statements by the defendant were false and fraudulent, and were made by him with the intent to deceive and defraud the plaintiffs, and that he fraudulently concealed from them the fact that he had already sold the land; and also finds that the plaintiffs relied upon the said statements and representations, and were induced thereby to accept his said offer of a thousand dollars, and to surrender said agreement. In September, 1888, the plaintiffs learned that, at the time of the said statements and representations, the defendant had already sold the land, and that his representations to them in reference thereto were false, and thereupon they rescinded said surrender, and gave him notice thereof, and demanded from him the remainder of the $5,000 specified in the agreement, and also offered to repay to him the $1,000 received from him, on condition that he redeliver to them said agreement. Upon the refusal to pay said sum or accept said offer this action was commenced to recover from the defendant the sum of $4,000, with interest from December 1, 1886. The action was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiffs. From this judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

The issues determined by the court below depended almost entirely upon the weight to be given to contradictory and conflicting evidence, and the counsel for the respective parties have presented to this court elaborate briefs, in which that evidence is reviewed, and wherein we are asked to weigh the same, and determine the conflict between the testimony of the plaintiffs and of the defendant, and the corroboration given to either. It would seem hardly necessary at this day to repeat the oft-asserted rule that the determination of the trial court upon such evidence is conclusive in this court, and that after that court, upon a motion for a new trial, has affirmed its former decision, it is a needless consumption of time and labor, as well of counsel as of the members of this court, to attempt here a review of the correctness of such determination, or to ask of us to determine the relative weight to be given to the respective statements of the witnesses.

By the terms of the agreement between the defendant and the plaintiffs, they became entitled to receive from him the sum of $5,000, if he "should sell or agree to sell said ranch, or part of it, to any one, in the twelve months next ensuing" after March 20, 1886. When, therefore, on the 26th of November, 1886, the defendant sold the ranch through Frye to Boyce, an obligation was created against him, by virtue of his aforesaid contract, to pay to the plaintiffs the sum of $5,000, for which they had an immediate right of action against him. This obligation could not be extinguished by part performance on the part of the defendant, unless such part performance was expressly accepted by the creditor in writing in satisfaction, or rendered in pursuance of an agreement in writing for that purpose. Civil Code, § 1524. The obligation could, however, be extinguished by an agreement on the part of the plaintiffs to accept less than that to which they were entitled, provided such agreement was executed on the part of the defendant. Civil Code, §§ 1521-1523. Such an agreement is, however, subject to all the rules applicable to other agreements. If the consent of the plaintiffs thereto was obtained through fraud, exercised by the defendant, they had the right to rescind the agreement, (Civil Code, § 1689;) provided such rescission was made promptly upon discovering the facts which entitled them to rescind, coupled with an offer to restore to him what they had received from him, (Civil Code, § 1691.) Any false representation, or affirmation of any matter which was material, as an existing fact, distinguished from mere opinion, or intention, or promise, as an inducement to enter into the agreement, was such a fraud as would authorize a rescission. Marriner v. Dennison, 78 Cal. 211, 20 Pac. Rep. 386. Within these principles the facts found by the court below fully sustain the judgment. The false statement by the defendant to the plaintiffs, that he had not sold the property at the time he offered to give them the thousand dollars for a surrender of his agreement, was such a fraud upon them as to entitle them to a rescission of their agreement to surrender it; for it is not to be supposed that, if he had then told them the truth, and informed them that he had already sold the land, they would have accepted the thousand dollars in satisfaction of an obligation against him, which had already matured in their behalf, for the sum of $5,000.

The claim on the part of the appellant, that he is entitled to a deduction of $1,250, paid by him to Frye, cannot be maintained. It is conceded by counsel upon both sides, in their briefs, that this amount of money was paid by him to Frye, although we have been unable to find in the record any evidence of more than an agreement on his part to pay it. But, assuming that it was paid by him, he paid it upon an independent agreement between himself and Frye, and not in pursuance of his agreement with the plaintiffs. Whatever right Frye had to a portion of the $5,000 agreed to be paid to plaintiffs by the defendant was derived under an agreement with them subsequent to their agreement with the defendant, and could be established only in an action to which Frye was himself a party. The defendant was not authorized to administer upon the assets of the plaintiffs in his hands, and disburse the same in payment of such claims against them as he might consider just. The judgment and order are affirmed.

Order No. 1589 of the city of San Francisco, as amended by order No. 1845, relative to liquor licenses, provides for the payment of a specified license fee, and declares a violation of the order a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for not more than six months, or both. Pen. Code Cal. § 435, provides that any person carrying on a business for which a license is required by the laws of the state, without the license so prescribed, is guilty of a misdemeanor. Section 19 prescribes, as a punishment for misdemeanors not otherwise provided for, imprisonment for not more than six months, or a fine not exceeding $500, or both. Held that, though the punishment provided by the ordinance conflicted with that prescribed by the statute, this portion of the ordinance could be rejected, and that providing for the license could stand, as they were not dependent on each other.

2. So, too, portions of the ordinance in conflict with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relative to evidence may be rejected.

3. The provisions of the ordinance making the issuance of a license dependent upon the permission of a majority of the board of police commissioners, and the approval of adjacent property owners, is not in violation of the federal constitution, there being no question of interstate commerce.

JANIN v. LONDON & SAN FRANCISCO BANK.
(No. 13,387.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 19, 1891.)

BANKS—PAYMENT OF FORGED CHECK — LIABILITY TO DEPOSITOR.

1. Where a bank allowed over three months to elapse before it returned to a depositor a forged check drawn on his account and payable to "currency or bearer," that it had paid without requiring the bearer's indorsement or identification, and there was no evidence that the bank could have retrieved its loss if notified of the forgery, the depositor's neglect within a reasonable time after the return of his canceled checks to examine them, and give notice of the forgery, was not a defense to an action to recover the money paid on such check; and hence the bank was not prejudiced by an erroneous instruction to the effect that the depositor was not guilty of negligence in failing to examine the checks and bank-book, and that he became bound to give notice of the forgery only after he had discovered it. PATERSON, J., dissenting.

2. The jury were properly instructed to find for plaintiff unless defendant was deprived of an opportunity to save himself from loss by his failure to examine the checks and bank-book, and to give notice of the forgery.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Janin against the London & San Francisco Bank to recover money deposited by plaintiff with defendant, and paid by the latter on a forged check. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Winans, Belknap & Godoy and John B. Harmon, (Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, of counsel,) for appellant. W. H. L. Barnes, (H. L. Gear, of counsel,) for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff was a depositor in the bank of defendant, and the controversy in this action grows out of the payment by defendant of a check for $16,700, purporting to have been signed by plaintiff, and for which amount defendant claims that it is entitled to debit the account of plaintiff. The complaint alleges that this check was a forgery. This is denied in the answer; and as another and separate defense it is averred, in substance, that the plaintiff is estopped to deny the genuineness of said check, because of his negligence in not examining his balanced pass-book and returned checks, including the one in dispute, within a reasonable time, and giving notice that such check was forged, "by reason of which laches defendant was prevented from tracing out the forger of said check or said signature, if it was a forgery, and proceeding against him, for a period of nearly five months, and until all trace of said forger was lost." The defendant also avers that the account between itself and plaintiff had become a stated one. The check was paid on May 29, 1878, and on September 4, 1878, the defendant returned to plaintiff his pass-book, showing the statement of his account at that date, and that he was charged with the amount of this check, which was also returned to him as one of the vouchers. On December 11, 1878, another statement of plaintiff's account was rendered by defendant, in which appeared the balance shown by the previous account. The evidence also tended to show that plaintiff did not at once examine the check in dispute when it was returned to him with his balanced pass-book on September 4, 1878, nor until some time in the month of December, 1878, and that he first intimated to defendant a doubt of its genuineness about December 28, 1878, but did not give notice that he actually claimed it to be a forgery until February 1, 1879. The verdict of the jury in favor of plaintiff must be deemed, on this appeal, to have conclusively established the fact that the check was a forgery, as there was evidence sufficient to establish such a finding, and it is not claimed that there was any error in the instructions of the court, so far as they relate to that particular point. It is well settled that a bank in receiving ordinary deposits becomes the debtor of the depositor, and its implied contract with him is to discharge this indebtedness by honoring such checks as he may draw upon it, and it is not entitled to debit his account with any payments except such as are made by his order or direction. Crawford v. Bank, 100 N. Y. 50, 2 N. E. Rep. 881; Bank v. Risley, 111 U. S. 125, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 322. All unauthorized payments, such as upon forged checks, are therefore made at the peril of the bank, and it is not justified in charging them against the depositor's account unless some negligent act of his in some way contributed to induce such payment in the first instance, or unless by his subsequent conduct in relation to the matter he is upon equitable principles estopped to deny the correctness of such payments. This view of the law cannot be well questioned, and finds abundant support in the decisions of courts. Shipman v. Bank, 126 N. Y. 318, 27 N. E. Rep. 371; Hardy v. Bank, 51 Md. 562; Weinstein v. Bank, 69 Tex. 38, 6 S. W. Rep. 171; Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657.

It is not claimed in this case that plaintiff was guilty of any prior negligence which induced the defendant to pay the check in dispute, and we are therefore to consider only the one general question, whether, upon the evidence before it, the court committed any error to the prejudice of the defendant in giving or refusing instructions relating to the defense of estoppel, and this we proceed to do. The plaintiff was in no manner responsible for the action of the defendant in paying the check. In making such payment it parted with its own money, and not that of plaintiff; and the loss consequent thereon was its own, and should not be transferred to the plaintiff, unless, from all the circumstances in the case, it appears reasonably probable that, but for his alleged negligence, the defendant could have protected itself. The defendant has not in fact discharged its indebtedness to plaintiff, and should not be permitted to debit him with any amount as an offset there-to unless it appears that by reason of the negligent conduct of plaintiff it has omitted to take proceedings which it otherwise would and could have taken to indemnify itself from loss. This seems to us clear upon the plainest principles of justice. The balancing of the pass-book in September, and charging the plaintiff therein with the amount of this check, and its return to him at the same time, constituted a statement of the account between himself and the defendant; and it thereupon became the duty of the plaintiff to examine the same within a reasonable time, and give to defendant, without unreasonable delay, notice of any objection which he had to it; and, unless such objection was made within a reasonable time, it became an account stated, and there was imposed upon the plaintiff the burden of showing that the check with which he was debited was a forgery; and, in addition to this, if the circumstances attending the entire transaction were such as to make it reasonably probable that the bank had suffered prejudice by plaintiff's unreasonable acquiescence in the account as stated, he would not be permitted to open the account by proof of its incorrectness.

Upon the trial the court instructed the jury, in substance, that, if they found that the check in dispute was a forged one, they must find for the plaintiff, unless it was shown that plaintiff's failure to examine his checks deprived the defendant of an opportunity to save itself from loss on account of the money paid thereon; and they were further instructed that, if "the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in respect to his treatment of his checks, including the disputed check, after he received them at the September balancing and the December balancing, or by reason of his making the discovery of the forgery, or of the facts which put him on inquiry respecting it some months before he gave any notice to the bank of such discovery, whereby the bank was or may have been injured, they may find for the defendant." So far, this was a correct statement of the law, and, with other instructions given, conveyed to the jury with sufficient clearness the law as we have declared it. But the court also gave the following: "In considering the fact that Mr. Janin's bank-book was balanced, and that the bank's statement of the balance was apparently acquiesced in for a considerable length of time, I instruct you that the plaintiff was under no contract to the bank to examine with diligence his returned checks and bank-book. In contemplation of law, the book was balanced and the checks returned for the protection of the depositor, not for the protection of the bank; and when Mr. Janin failed to examine it, the only consequence was that the burden of proof was shifted. Mr. Janin then became bound to show that the account was wrongly stated. This right he has preserved so long as the claim was not barred by the statute of limitations." This instruction, although supported by the authority of Weisser v. Denison, 10 N. Y. 68, is not, in our opinion, entirely correct, and is in conflict with other instructions referred to. When considered in connection with a portion of another instruction given, to the effect that it "was sufficient to give notice when the forgery was discovered," this clearly implied that plaintiff could not be charged with negligence in not examining his checks within a reasonable time, and that the jury were only to consider whether he was guilty of unreasonable delay in giving notice after he made the examination and discovered the forgery. This is not the true rule. This error, however, will not, in view of the undisputed evidence, justify a reversal of the judgment. Conceding that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence in not earlier examining his checks, discovering the forgery, and giving notice thereof, there is nothing in the evidence from which it can be reasonably inferred that the defendant sustained any loss thereby, or that its position with reference to the check, because of not having earlier notice, was in any manner changed to its disadvantage, and the court would have been justified in so charging the jury. The check was paid on May 29, 1878; and it was not until September 4, 1878, that it was returned to plaintiff. The check was payable to "currency or bearer," and when paid the person who presented it was not identified, or required to indorse it. This case was tried in 1885, and there is nothing in the evidence pointing to the fact that, if notice had been given on the very day the check was returned, the defendant would have been in any better position to discover the forger, or the person who uttered it, or to avail itself of any of the coercive measures known to the law by which to retrieve its loss, than it was at the time it received notice. If plaintiff was negligent, it was not shown that the defendant suffered any damage thereby, and for that reason such negligence cannot be allowed as a defense to plaintiff's right to recover in this action.

There may be some general language in the case of Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 115, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657, which would seem to imply that it is not necessary that the evidence should tend to show that any pecuniary benefit would have accrued to the defendant if reasonable notice had been given it; but this general language is limited by the facts of that case, and the more specific rule which the court announced, viz.: "Still further, if the depositor was guilty of negligence in not discovering and giving notice of the fraud of his clerk, then the bank was thereby prejudiced, because it was thereby prevented from taking steps, by the arrest of the criminal, or by an attachment of his property, or other form of proceeding, to compel restitution." In the case of Continental Nat. Bank v. National Bank, 50 N. Y. 576, cited by appellant, it is said that the arrest and detention of a swindler are powerful means of coercing restoration of property, and that the loss of this means in relying upon the declaration of another would estop such person from denying the truth of the statement upon which reliance was made. But this language is to be considered in connection with the particular facts then before the court, from which it appears that the declaration held to be an estoppel was the direct admission of the genuineness of the check afterwards claimed to be forged, and that, "had the teller of the certifying bank disclaimed the forged certificate and pronounced it a forgery when presented, the holder of the check would have had ample time to arrest the swindler at the Bank of the State of New York before he had received the money on the gold checks, and before he went to the subtreasury with his gold certificates." White v. Bank, 64 N. Y. 322. The distinction between such a case as that and one like this, in which there is nothing in the evidence to indicate that all trace of the forger was not lost before the check in controversy was returned to plaintiff, months after its payment, is a marked one; and in White v. Bank, just cited, what we conceive to be the rule applicable to the facts in this record is thus stated. "In the case at bar it is the merest conjecture, with scarcely a possibility to support it, that the defendant, or those from whom it received the bill, could at any time after the transmission of the foreign bill of exchange to Baltimore have taken any effectual measures either for arresting the swindler or reclaiming the bill bought and paid for upon the credit of the bill. Estoppels cannot be based upon mere conjectures, even if a proper foundation is laid for them in other respects." There is nothing in Bank v. Keene, 53 Me. 103, in conflict with this. In that case, and upon its peculiar facts, it was held proper to instruct the jury "that, if the plaintiffs, relying on the defendant's admission, were induced to refrain from obtaining security from Judson by his arrest or by an attachment of his property, and they thereby sustained an injury, then the defendant would be estopped from denying his signature." But, of course, to justify such an instruction, there must be some evidence tending to show the facts upon which it is predicated. In this case the burden of proof to show that i^a sustained damage or injury by the negligence of plaintiff was upon the defendant, and this it was required to show by evidence having some reasonable tendency to establish such fact. In order to justify the submission of any question of fact to the jury the proof must be sufficient to raise more than a mere conjecture or surmise that the fact is as alleged. It must be such that a rational, well-constructed mind can reasonably draw from it the conclusion that the fact exists, and when the evidence is not sufficient to justify such an inference the court may properly refuse to submit the question to the jury, and in our opinion the evidence in this case was not such as would have warranted the jury in finding as a fact that the delay of plaintiff in giving it notice that the check in question was a forgery, lost to it any rights or remedies which otherwise it might have resorted to, in order to save itself from the loss incurred by its own mistake or negligence in the first instance, and which it now asks the plaintiff to bear, and therefore the error we have pointed out in the instruction of the court was without prejudice to the defendant. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; MCFARLAND, J.

HARRISON, J., being disqualified, did not participate in the foregoing opinion.

PATERSON, J., (dissenting.) I concur in the views of Mr. Justice DE HAVEN on the main questions of law discussed in the opinion, but think that the question whether the defendant sustained any loss by reason of the plaintiff's failure to notify the defendant earlier of the discovery of the forgery should have been left to the jury. The evidence shows that the plaintiff had notice of the forgery several months prior to the time when he informed the officers of the bank of the fact, and, when asked why he had not before spoken of the matter, he replied that he had been working up the case himself. It seems to me that, whatever may be said of the duty of a depositor to examine his checks promptly, it must be conceded that when he has discovered the fact that his signature has been forged, or is informed of circumstances which would put him upon inquiry as to the fact, it is his duty to report the matter immediately to the officers of the bank. If he has willfully withheld from the bank any information he may have had, he ought to be estopped from claiming that the bank could not have protected itself. Under the decision of the majority it seems to me a dishonest depositor will be enabled without peril to himself to perpetrate a fraud upon the bank. If he discover that he has been negligent in examining his checks he will nevertheless be entitled to recover unless the bank can show that it was prejudiced by his negligence. Now he will know that the longer he withholds notice of the forgery from the bank, the more difficult it will be for the bank to prove that it could have detected and arrested the forger, and therefore the easier it will be for him to recover. This, it seems to me, is putting a premium upon laches, and encouraging a dishonest depositor even to assist the forger in covering up his tracks. There is no doubt in my mind that Mr. Janin acted in the utmost good faith, but it is a question of fact which should be left to the jury whether his long delay in giving the bank notice of the forgery did or did not prejudice the bank. The latter was entitled to immediate notice of plaintiff's discovery, and it does not follow that because plaintiff failed to detect the forger the officers of the bank also would have failed to do so. The arrest and detention of a forger is often a strong and effectual means for the restoration of the money, and, although it may be a difficult question to determine in certain cases whether the injured party has been deprived of or delayed in the exercise of this coercive power by the negligence of the depositor, it is for the jury, reasoning to practical results from all the circumstances, to say whether it is fairly probable that the defendant could and would have taken effective measures to protect itself. Continental Nat. Bank v. National Bank, 50 N. Y. 575; Voorhis v. Olmstead, 46 N. Y. 113. In Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 96, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 657, the court said: "If the depositor was guilty of negligence in not discovering and giving notice of the fraud of his clerk, then the bank was thereby prejudiced, because it was prevented from taking steps, by the arrest of the criminal, or by an attachment of his property, or other form of proceeding, to compel restitution. It is not necessary that it should be made to appear by evidence that benefit would certainly have accrued to the bank from an attempt to secure payment from the criminal. Whether the depositor is to be held as having ratified what his clerk did, or to have adopted the checks paid by the bank and charged to him, cannot be made, in this action, to depend upon a calculation whether the criminal had at the time the forgeries were committed, or subsequently, property sufficient to meet the demands of the bank. An inquiry as to the damages in money actually sustained by the bank by reason of the neglect of the depositor to give notice of the forgeries might be proper if this were an action by it to recover damages for a violation of his duty; but it is a suit by the depositor, in effect, to falsify a stated account, to the injury of the bank, whose defense is that the depositor has, by his conduct, ratified or adopted the payment of the altered checks, and thereby induced it to forbear taking steps for its protection against the person committing the forgeries. As the right to seek and compel restoration and payment from the person committing the forgeries was in itself a valuable one, it is sufficient if it appears that the bank, by reason of the negligence of the depositor, was prevented from promptly, and, it may be, effectively, exercising it. * * * It seems to us that if the case had been submitted to the jury, and they had found such negligence upon the part of the depositor as precluded him from disputing the correctness of the account rendered by the bank, the verdict could not have been set aside as wholly unsupported by the evidence. In their relations with depositors, banks are held, as they ought to be, to a rigid responsibility; but the principles governing those relations ought not to be so extended as to invite or encourage such negligence by depositors in the examination of their bank-accounts as is inconsistent with the relations of the parties, or with those established rules and usages sanctioned by business men of ordinary prudence and sagacity, which are, or ought to be, known to depositors." See, also, Hardy v. Bank, 51 Md. 562; Bank v. Keene, 53 Me. 103. It is true that was the case of an altered check, and this is a case of forged signature, but the principles announced by Mr. Justice HARLAN are as applicable on the question before us to one case as to the other. A banker is not bound to know the handwriting of the body of the check, but is bound to know the depositor's signature. He is not bound to detect a skillful alteration, which can only be known to the drawer of the check; and the latter is therefore bound to detect the alteration at the earliest opportunity, and inform the bank thereof. In these and many other respects the principles applicable to the two cases are different; but when it appears that the plaintiff's negligence contributed to the injury the question whether the bank was prejudiced by the failure of the plaintiff to exercise ordinary care is as material in one case as in the other, and must be determined by the same rules. I do not claim, as intimated in the opinion above quoted, that the law would presume the bank was prejudiced by the long delay and negligence of the depositor in failing to detect and report the forgery. That is a question, I think, which should be left to the jury. Dana v. Bank, 132 Mass. 156.

It is claimed by respondent that there is no evidence tending to show that the bank was prevented from tracing and discovering the forger, or from exercising its right to recover the money, through reliance on plaintiff's implied admission of the correctness of the account rendered. On the other hand, it is claimed by appellant to be clearly shown by the evidence that the bank was misled to its prejudice through such negligence. The fact that the bank did not require the signature of the stranger to whom the money was paid, that it took no evidence as to his identity, and made no effort to detect the forgery at any time, but constantly insisted that the check was genuine, although possessed of evidence tending to show that Hooper was the forger, are matters for the consideration of the jury. So also the fact that the plaintiff allowed long periods of time to elapse between the occasions when he presented his bank-book to be balanced, and that he frequently asked the teller of the bank for his balance, instead of consulting his bank-book; that he neglected to examine the book with the return checks for several months after September 4, 1878; that he had expressed surprise at the smallness of the balance, as shown by the books of the bank; and his failure to notify the bank until February, 1879, eight months after he began to doubt the genuineness of the check,—are all matters to be considered by the jury in determining the questions at issue. The court cannot say, it seems to me, that as a matter of law, under such circumstances, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. I am unable to see any force in the suggestion that the officers of the bank took no steps at the time the check was paid to identify the person who presented it. Unless the paying teller has a suspicion as to the genuineness of the signature of a check payable to bearer, he is not called upon to make and preserve evidence as to such identity, and, if such precautions had been taken in this case, that fact would have been conclusive evidence that the bank had notice of facts which put it upon inquiry. In such a case, of course, the bank would have no defense, even if the depositor was guilty of negligence. It is said that there is no evidence from which it can be reasonably inferred that the plaintiff's delay prejudiced the defendant; but the inability of the defendant to produce such evidence may have been caused by the lapse of time between the time when plaintiff, acting as a prudent man, ought to have discovered and given notice of the forgery, and the time when such notice was in fact given. This is peculiarly a question for the jury under proper instructions from the court.

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1883.)

LARCENY—VERDICT—DEGREE OF CRIME—PRELIMINARY HEARING—EVIDENCE.

1. A verdict finding a defendant "guilty as charged" is a sufficient finding of the degree of the crime when she is charged with grand larceny.

2. On an appeal from a conviction of grand larceny, the fact that the record contains a commitment signed, "James Lawler, Judge of the Police Judge's Court No. 2 of the City and County of San Francisco," is sufficient to show that an examination was had before a police magistrate.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Information for grand larceny against Adeline Whitely. Verdict of guilty, judgment thereon, and order refusing new trial. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. H. Wolff and H. M. Swain, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the People.

PER CURIAM. We think it appears that the examination was before a police magistrate. The commitment is signed by "James Lawler, Judge of the Police Judge's Court No. 2, of the City and County of San Francisco." The defendant was charged with the crime of grand larceny, and the jury, by their verdict, found her "guilty as charged." This was a sufficient finding of the degree. Judgment and orders appealed from affirmed.

RES ADJUDICATA—STRIKING OUT EVIDENCE—APPEAL—BOND.

1. A judgment in an action of ejectment, to which the holder of the legal title was not a party, is not a bar to an action by him to quiet title.

²This case, filed July 27, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

2. Unless evidence is clearly immaterial and irrelevant, a motion to strike it out on that ground should not be granted.

3. One undertaking is sufficient upon an appeal, both from the judgment and order denying a new trial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county.

Action by George H. Chester against the Bakersfield Town-Hall Association to quiet title to land. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant had previously obtained judgment against Julius Chester in an action of ejectment (55 Cal. 98) to recover possession of land of which the premises in controversy formed part, but to which action the plaintiff herein was not a party.

Flournoy, Mhoon & Flournoy and W. J. Tuska, for appellant. Stetson & Houghton and C. C. Cowgill, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that he is the owner in fee-simple of certain premises described in his complaint, and that at the time of the filing of said complaint he is, and for more than three years immediately preceding the filing thereof has been, in the actual, quiet, and exclusive possession of said premises, and that the defendant claims some right, title, or interest therein adverse to the plaintiff, and that said claim of the defendant is without any right, etc.; wherefore plaintiff prays to have said claim determined, etc. The defendant in its answer denies that the plaintiff is the owner, or that he and those under whom he claims have been for more than three years, or then were, in actual, peaceable, quiet possession of said premises, but alleges that the defendant has been in the open, notorious, exclusive, and adverse possession, with claim of title, ever since the 9th day of November, 1871. The defendant also alleges that the plaintiff is estopped both by judgment and in pais. The facts which it is claimed constitute said alleged estoppels are set out at length in said answer. The court found, upon sufficient evidence, that on the 23d day of October, 1869, one Thomas Baker, who then claimed to own said premises, conveyed the same by deed to the plaintiff, who, on the 3d day of January, 1872, conveyed to Julius Chester, who, on the 18th day of September, 1878, conveyed to one Fisher, who, on the 29th day of June, 1880, conveyed to the plaintiff. On the 12th day of December, 1877, said Baker obtained a patent of said premises from the state. The findings as to the foregoing facts are not attacked. But counsel for appellant in their brief rely (1) on an estoppel in pais; (2) by judgment; and (3) on the statute of limitations as a bar to the action. Upon each of these issues it is claimed that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings of the court.

We are satisfied that there are not controverted facts sufficient to constitute an estoppel in pais.

The judgment in the case of Association v. Chester, 55 Cal. 98, which was commenced more than a month after said Julius had conveyed the premises to Fisher, who subsequently conveyed to the plaintiff herein, cannot operate as a bar to this action.

As to the bar of the statute of limitations, it is sufficient to say it was not established by evidence free from substantial conflict. No objection was made to the testimony of Julius Chester until after it was all in, and then a motion was made to strike out a part of it on the ground that it was irrelevant and immaterial. A motion to strike out on that ground ought not to be granted unless the evidence is clearly irrelevant and immaterial. The evidence which the court refused to strike out is not, in our opinion, clearly of that character. The court seems to have found the facts which the counsel for defendant sought to elicit from the witness Brundage, by questions to which objections were made by plaintiff's counsel and sustained by the court. It is therefore clear that if said rulings were erroneous, the defendant was not prejudiced thereby. The practice of filing but one undertaking where appeals are taken, as in this case, both from the judgment and order denying a new trial, is about as well settled as any question of that kind can be, and we do not think that it should now be treated as an open one. Judgment and order affirmed.

Hearing in bank denied.

AFFIRMANCE ON APPEAL.

Where, in the absence of findings, the record does not show that they were not waived, a judgment granting no relief in excess of that demanded in the complaint, which states a cause of action, will be affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action of unlawful detainer by Lee Chuck against Quan Wo Chong & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Smith & Murasky, for appellants. Chas. S. Wheeler, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment, and the case comes before us on the judgment roll alone. The complaint states a cause of action. We have to presume, in the absence of findings, that they were waived, there being nothing in the record to show affirmatively that they were not waived, and the judgment does not grant any relief in excess of that which was demanded in the complaint. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

3. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 384, which provides that any number less than all of the tenants in common may jointly or severally prosecute or defend any action for the enforcement or protection of their rights, one co-tenant can maintain an action of unlawful detainer.

4. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 633, provides that, in unlawful detainer, "in giving the decision, the facts found and conclusions of law must be separately stated;" and section 634 provides how findings of fact may be waived, which are made applicable to proceedings in unlawful detainer by section 1177; and section 1174 requires the court, when such proceeding is tried without a jury, to "assess the damages." Held, that where the complaint alleged that the monthly value of rents and profits was $125, and the answer denied that it was more than $75, and the record showed that findings of fact were not waived, the court's failure to determine the monthly value of the premises was error.

5. Where such action was commenced three days after the alleged expiration of defendants' term, a judgment for $375, "being trebled rent for said premises," which was based upon said pleadings, without evidence of value, was erroneous.

6. Where the complaint alleged that plaintiff and another were tenants in common, and defendants were in possession with the consent of plaintiff's co-tenant, in the absence of evidence that defendants refused to allow plaintiff to enjoy the premises with them plaintiff cannot recover from defendants the restitution and possession of the premises.

7. Where the facts upon which is based a contention that a notice of a motion for a new trial was served too late were considered on a petition for a writ of mandate to compel the settling of appellants' statement on motion for a new trial, and a peremptory writ was issued therein, the regularity of the notice cannot be controverted on appeal.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action of unlawful detainer by Lee Chuck against Quan Wo Chong & Co. From an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, an order made after final judgment, denying defendants' motion to vacate and set aside a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order refusing defendants' motion to strike out plaintiff's cost-bill, defendants appeal.

Smith & Murasky, for appellants. Chas. S. Wheeler, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action of unlawful detainer. It is the same case as No.

13,088, 28 Pac. Rep. 44, (decision this day filed.) but the appeal herein is from an order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial, from an order made after final judgment denying the defendants' motion to vacate and set aside the judgment from which an appeal was taken in No. 13,088, and from an order refusing defendants' motion to strike out the plaintiff's cost-bill. The last two orders referred to are non-appealable. The appeal therefrom is, therefore, dismissed. Railroad Co. v. McGrath, 74 Cal. 49, 15 Pac. Rep. 360.

It is claimed by the appellants that the complaint does not state a cause of action against the defendants, because there is no allegation that the defendants were given the three-days notice required by section 1161, Code Civil Proc.¹ But the tenancy alleged in the complaint is a tenancy at sufferance, and not at will; and, as the action is based upon the first subdivision of the section referred to, no notice was required. Canning v. Fibush, 77 Cal. 196, 19 Pac. Rep. 376; Stoppelkamp v. Mangot, 42 Cal. 322. It is also claimed by appellants that Chay Yune should have been made a party plaintiff, because it is shown in the complaint that he and the plaintiff are co-tenants. Section 384, Code Civil Proc., answers this objection. It provides that any number less than all of the tenants in common may jointly or severally prosecute or defend any action for the enforcement or protection of their rights.

There are several grounds, however, upon which the judgment must be reversed. The complaint alleges that the monthly value of the rents and profits of the premises was the sum of $125. The answer denied that the rental value of the premises was the sum of $125, or any sum greater than the sum of $75. There is no finding upon this issue, and the record shows affirmatively that findings were not waived. There was an issue also—and it seems to have been the only question inquired into at the trial—as to whether the defendants were holding possession of the premises by and with the consent of Chay Yune. Upon this issue, also, there was no finding. It is claimed by respondent that findings in actions of this kind are not required. This position, however, is manifestly untenable. Sections 633, 634, 1174, 1177, Code Civil Proc.²

The evidence does not support the judgment. It is expressly alleged in the complaint that "this plaintiff and one Chay

Yune are successors in interest of said E. L. Goldstein, and to said building on the north-west corner of Dupont and Clay streets, and in and to said lease executed to Pee Han, and that they hold title to the same as tenants in common." The uncontradicted evidence shows that the defendants were in possession of the property, with the consent of said Chay Yune. All that the plaintiff was entitled to, therefore, was to be let into possession with the defendants,—to enjoy their moiety. Freem. Co-Ten. §§ 180, 220; Pickard v. Perley, 45 N. H. 191; Ord v. Chester, 18 Cal. 80. One tenant in common may, "by either lease or license, * * * confer upon another person the right to occupy and use the property of the co-tenancy as fully as such lessor or licensor himself might have used or occupied it if such lease or license had not been granted. If either co-tenant expel such licensee or lessee, he is guilty of a trespass. If the lessee has the exclusive possession of the premises, he is not liable to any one but his lessor for the rent, unless the other co-tenants attempt to enter, and he resists or forbids their entry, or unless, being in possession with them, he ousts or excludes some or all of them." Freem. Co-Ten. § 253. There is no evidence tending to show that the defendants ever refused to allow the plaintiff to enjoy the use of the premises with them. The judgment does not confine the plaintiff's right of recovery to his own moiety, but provides that the plaintiff shall have and recover from defendants the restitution and possession of the premises described in the complaint.

The judgment is erroneous in another regard. As stated before, there was an issue as to the rental value of the premises. The court gave the plaintiff judgment for the sum of $375, "being treble rent for said premises." The record fails to show that any evidence on the question of rental value was offered by either party. The action was commenced three days after the alleged expiration of the defendants' term. It is difficult to see, therefore, how any evidence under the allegation as to rental value could have justified the allowance of $375. Even as against a trespasser, a tenant in common cannot recover all the rents and profits. Muller v. Boggs, 25 Cal. 175. There is evidence tending to show that the plaintiff and his co-tenant had entered into an agreement by the terms of which each was to collect the rents for every alternate period of six months. Perhaps, under this agreement, the plaintiff, in a proper action, would be entitled to recover all rents and profits due for the periods allotted to him.

It is claimed by respondent that the order denying the motion for a new trial should be affirmed, because the notice of intention was served too late. The facts upon which this contention is based were considered in Quan Wo Chong v. Superior Court,¹ (No. 13,237,) upon a petition by the defendant for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court to settle the appellant's statement on motion for a new trial. A peremptory writ was issued therein on

MOISANT v. MCPHEE. (No. 13,957.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1891.)

MORTGAGES—LIEN—GROWING TREES.

1. A deed of land absolute in form, but intended merely to secure a debt to the grantee, is, in effect, a mortgage, and does not convey title to the land, or vest in the grantee the ownership of bark cut from trees on the land by the grantor, and sold to a third person, after the execution of the deed.

2. A contract by which the grantor was to cut bark from trees on the land at the expense of the mortgagee, who agreed to sell it, and apply the proceeds in paying the expenses and the debt secured by the deed, the balance to go to the grantor, is not sufficient to create a lien on the bark, after it has been severed from the trees, in favor of the grantee, and against a purchaser from the grantor for value without notice.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. McGARVEY, Judge. Affirmed.

An action to recover the value of tanbark. Judgment for plaintiff.

J. A. Cooper and T. L. Carothers, for appellant. Yell & Seawell and R. P. Clement, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover the value of 156 cords of oak tanbark, alleged to have been in the possession of and owned by the plaintiff, and to have been wrongfully taken by the defendant, and converted to his own use, on the 5th day of June, 1888. It appears from the findings and evidence that on the 11th day of January, 1884, one Warren was the owner of a tract of land in Mendocino county, and on that day conveyed the same to the defendant and one Markle, who were partners doing business under the firm name of McPhee & Markle. The conveyance was by a deed absolute in form, but was intended as a mortgage to secure the payment of about $200, then owing by the grantor to the grantees for goods, wares, and merchandise. In May, 1886, the $200 being still unpaid, Warren made a contract with McPhee & Markle, by the terms of which he was to go upon the land conveyed, and peel tanbark thereon, and put it on the road; and they were to advance to him, to pay the expenses of preparing the bark, not exceeding $5.50 per cord; and when the bark was ready for shipment, they were to ship it to San Francisco, and sell it, and, after deducting from the proceeds expenses of hauling, freight, and all advances, were to apply the balance in payment of his indebtedness, and, if any surplus remained, pay it over to him. During the year 1886, Warren peeled 183 cords of bark, and delivered it over to McPhee & Markle, and McPhee subsequently, having assumed the bark contract as between himself and Markle, sold it, and applied the proceeds as agreed. During the summer of 1887, Warren peeled and prepared the bark in controversy on the deeded land, and, while doing so, defendant furnished him supplies and money to meet his expenses. In the fall of the year, at the request of Warren, defendant sent and paid a teamster to haul the bark to Bear Harbor landing. One Keller was foreman at the landing, and Warren asked him where he should pile the bark, and a space was allotted him for that purpose. The bark was piled by Warren on the space allotted, and, after it was all delivered, was shedded in by him to protect it from the rains. In December, 1887, plaintiff, Warren, and Keller met at the landing, and, after measuring the pile of bark, Warren sold it to plaintiff for $1,404, and executed to him a bill of sale of it. Plaintiff then put Keller in charge of the bark for him, and subsequently put up notices on it that he was the owner. Plaintiff paid the purchase price in full, and at the time of his purchase had no notice that defendant had or made any claim to it. At the time of this sale Warren was indebted to the defendant for supplies furnished and money paid out and advanced, as before stated, in about the sum of $1,000. This sum not being paid, defendant, on June 5, 1888, shipped the bark to San Francisco, and converted it to his own use. Upon these facts the court below gave judgment for the plaintiff, from which, and from an order refusing him a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The principal contention of appellant is that the title and right to the possession of the bark were in him at the time of the alleged conversion, and hence that the judgment should be reversed. At the trial both Warren and appellant testified that the deed put in evidence was given only to secure the payment of an indebtedness on account. The deed was therefore a mortgage, and did not pass the title to the land which it purported to convey, (Taylor v. McLain, 64 Cal. 514, 2 Pac. Rep. 399; Healy v. O'Brien, 66 Cal. 519, 6 Pac. Rep. 386; Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 309, 13 Pac. Rep. 866;) and when the bark was severed from the trees, and moved away, it was freed from the lien of the mortgage, (Buckout v. Swift, 27 Cal. 433; Hill v. Gwin, 51 Cal. 47.) The contention that appellant had title to the bark cannot, therefore, be sustained. The only question then is, did appellant acquire a valid lien upon the bark after it was severed from the trees? We are unable to see under what statute or rule of law it can be said that he did. A lien is created by contract or by operation of law. Civil Code, § 2881. Appellant was not a mortgagee or pledgee of the bark, and the evidence fails to show that any contract was made which would create a lien of any kind. But, if it be admitted that he had a lien, still the possession of the bark was not taken by him, and hence his lien was void as against the plaintiff, who purchased the property in good faith and for value. Civil Code, § 3440. Some other minor points are presented, but we do not think they need be discussed. We see no prejudicial error in the rulings or findings of the court, and therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

Ex parte NICHOLAS. (No. 20,870.)

FILING INFORMATION—EXAMINATION AND COMMITMENT—PRESUMPTION.

1. Under Const. Cal. art. 1, § 8, permitting prosecution by information "after examination and commitment by a magistrate," and Pen. Code Cal. § 1165, imposing on the court the duty of ordering the detention of the defendant, that a new information may be preferred, where he is acquitted on the ground of a variance between the charge as alleged and the proof, one who has been examined and committed on the charge of grand larceny may, after a trial and disagreement, by direction of the court be charged by a new information with embezzlement, without any new examination and commitment, if the evidence taken on the first examination justifies an information for embezzlement. PATERSON, J., dissenting.

2. On application for writ of habeas corpus alleging the filing of the new information without a new examination and commitment, it will be presumed that the depositions taken at the original examination justified the information for embezzlement.

In bank.

Petition of Chris Nicholas for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged.

John O'Byrne, for petitioner. Wm. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The petition filed on behalf of the said Nicholas alleges, in substance, that his detention is illegal, because he has been charged by information with the crime of embezzlement without any previous examination and commitment by a magistrate for such crime, and because the superior court has denied his motion to dismiss the information, which motion, he says, was based upon the ground that said information had not been found and filed according to law. In my opinion, the petition is upon its face wholly insufficient to justify the issuance of the writ. Construed with the utmost liberality in favor of the petitioner, all that it shows is that an information has been filed in the superior court charging him with an offense within the jurisdiction of that court; that he has moved the court on one of the grounds enumerated in the statute (Pen. Code, § 995) to set aside the information; and that the court has erroneously denied his motion. But the error of the superior court in denying his motion does not make his imprisonment illegal in a sense which will entitle him to be discharged, or to raise the question on habeas corpus. The superior court had jurisdiction to hear and determine whatever questions of law or fact were involved in his motion, and its decision, although it may be erroneous, is not void. On the contrary, it is valid and binding until reversed on appeal.

But I need not dwell upon this aspect of the case. A writ was issued, a hearing has been had, and the case may now be determined upon the sheriff's return, the petitioner's traverse of the return, and the facts disclosed at the hearing. From these it appears that on the 6th of April, 1891, the petitioner had an examination in the police court of the city and county of San Francisco on a charge of larceny of property exceeding $200 in value; that as a result of such examination he was regularly committed upon the charge made, viz., grand larceny. Thereupon, and within due time, an information was filed in the superior court charging him with the crime of grand larceny. Upon this information he was brought to trial, but the jury failed to agree upon a verdict, and were discharged. After the jury had been so discharged, the district attorney, by direction of the court, dismissed the information for larceny, and, without bringing the petitioner again before a committing magistrate for examination, filed a new information, charging him with the crime of embezzlement. Upon this state of affairs the petitioner contends that his constitutional rights have been violated by the filing of an information without any previous examination and commitment upon the charge set forth in the information. But this does not appear to us to be so. He has been examined upon a charge which the committing magistrate has denominated "larceny," but it may well be that the depositions prove embezzlement. It not unfrequently happens that the facts of a particular case leave it extremely doubtful under which definition the offense falls, that of larceny or embezzlement, and if the committing magistrate should give it a wrong designation in his order of commitment that would not prevent the district attorney from charging it correctly in the information. On the contrary, it would be his duty so to do. People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 66 Cal. 662, 6 Pac. Rep. 859; People v. Vierra, 67 Cal. 231, 7 Pac. Rep. 640; Ex parte Keil, 85 Cal. 312, 24 Pac. Rep. 742. And if the district attorney should fail to discover and correct the mistake of the committing magistrate before filing an information, we know of no reason why, under leave of the court, he could not correct it subsequently by withdrawing the first information and filing an amended one. If he did not, the only result would be that the defendant would have to be acquitted on the ground of a variance between the charge as alleged and the proofs offered to sustain it, in which case the statute expressly imposes upon the court the duty of ordering the detention of the defendant, to the end that a new information or indictment may be preferred. Pen. Code, § 1165.

But surely it could never be held that the court and the district attorney, although they can clearly see from an inspection of the depositions that a trial of the defendant on the information, as framed, can only result in his acquittal on the ground of variance, must nevertheless go through the form of a trial and acquittal in order to bring the case within the literal terms of section 1165, before making the amendment that is inevitable at the end in order to prevent a ridiculous miscarriage of justice. Courts, even in criminal proceedings, are not rendered quite so impotent as this. Lex

And again, if the variance between the charge and the proofs is not disclosed until the trial, and if the case is so doubtful that the court does not become satisfied, until after a failure of the jury to agree, that the information should be corrected in order to avoid a variance, (which is the case here,) can it be pretended that the power of the court to order the filing of another information is less ample after a mistrial, by a failure of the jury to agree, than it is after they have agreed to acquit? Surely not. It must be true that if, upon an acquittal of the defendant upon the ground of variance, the court may order the filing of another information, it may make such order at any earlier stage of the proceeding when the necessity for it becomes apparent.

The superior court, therefore, did not exceed its power in directing the filing of a new information against this petitioner after the mistrial. Nor does it follow that it was necessary to bring the petitioner again before the committing magistrate for the purpose of a new examination and commitment before filing a new information. If the evidence taken on the first examination was in the possession of the district attorney,—as it must have been,—and was such as to justify an information for embezzlement, it would have been a vain and useless thing to go through the form of taking the same testimony over again, and neither the statute nor the constitution require that this should be done. The petitioner had been examined once in a manner to conserve all his legal and constitutional rights, and there are neither substantial nor formal grounds for saying that he had not been examined and committed before information filed. It is true it does not appear in this proceeding that the depositions taken at the original examination justify the present information, but it is sufficient to sustain our conclusion that they may justify it. The superior court has decided that they do, in passing upon petitioner's motion to dismiss the information, and, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, it must be presumed that the ruling was correct. It does not appear, therefore, that the superior court has even erred in the ruling complained of, much less that it has in any manner exceeded its jurisdiction. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded.

We concur: DE HAVEN, ..; HARRISON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

PATERSON, J., (dissenting.) I concur in the order discharging the writ, but am unable to concur in the views expressed by the majority. Our constitution provides that "offenses heretofore required to be prosecuted by indictment shall be prosecuted by information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or by indictment, with or without such examination and commitment, as may be prescribed by law." Section 8, art. 1. It was for a long time claimed by many that the proceeding by information was in conflict with the provision of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States, that no state should deprive any person of liberty without "due process of law." The question was finally settled by the supreme court of the United States in the Hurtado Case, 110 U. S. 516, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111, 292. It was there held that a proceeding under the provisions of our constitution and Penal Code, resulting in a conviction of murder, was not in violation of any provision of the fourteenth amendment, it appearing that the party convicted had been examined before a magistrate, who, after the accused had been heard, (with the aid of counsel and the right of cross-examination of witnesses, whose testimony was reduced to writing,) had filed the proper certificate that the offense described in the complaint had been committed, and that there was sufficient cause to believe the accused guilty thereof, and it appearing that the offense charged in the information was the same as that set forth in the affidavits, and for which the accused was committed. After full consideration of the opinion in that case, and the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice HARLAN, I am satisfied that the supreme court of the United States would hold, in a case like the one before us, that the words, "due process of law," necessarily require that the accused, before being put upon trial under an information charging him with felony, must have had the opportunity to be heard, with the aid of counsel and the right of cross-examination, before the committing magistrate examining into the same charge. No other construction of the provision of our constitution, that the information can be filed only "after examination and commitment by a magistrate," can afford any protection to a person accused of a felony. In People v. Parker, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 537, I was constrained to concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice GAROUTTE because the question had been settled by the decisions of our own court. A review of all the cases, however, will show that they are not entirely consistent. Thus, while it is held in People v. Lee Ah Chuck, supra, that the judgment of the district attorney must be exercised on the testimony found in the depositions, and that he may proceed by information against the defendant for any offense appearing by the depositions, regardless of the judgment of the magistrate, thus exercising judicial functions, it is held in Ex parte Sternes, 82 Cal. 248, 23 Pac. Rep. 38, that the district attorney is a mere ministerial officer, and can exercise no judicial functions whatever, so far as an inquiry into the question of probable cause is concerned. If he is a ministerial officer for one purpose, he is for the other, and it is difficult to see why he has not as much power to disregard the opinion of the magistrate, and inquire into the question of probable cause, as he has to determine what offense the evidence shows to have been committed. It is said in People v. Vierra, supra, that "it would be a strange requirement which permitted the justice to determine the offense for which the defendant should be prosecuted, instead of the district attorney, who was selected on account of his learning in the law, and especially charged with duties requiring an acquaintance with the criminal law." But it may be that the framers of the constitution thought that it would be safer to intrust the liberty of the citizen and the rights of the people to a judicial officer, selected for the exercise of judicial functions, than it would be to intrust them to an attorney employed expressly to prosecute persons charged with crime. If the framers of the constitution had intended the discretion of the district attorney to be superadded to that of the committing magistrate, it would have been easy to say so. Under the construction which is given to the provisions of section 8, art. 1, a person charged with grand larceny, and committed by the magistrate for that offense, may be informed against and tried upon that charge; and then, without any further preliminary hearing, upon a charge of robbery; then upon a charge of burglary; then upon a charge of obtaining property under false pretenses; then upon a charge of embezzlement,—if it appear from the depositions on the examination upon the charge of grand larceny that witnesses have said anything which would authorize the district attorney to say there had been shown reasonable cause to believe that the defendant had at some time committed such offenses. A person charged with robbery, after an examination upon that charge alone, may be prosecuted without any preliminary hearing upon an information for an assault with intent to commit murder, or any other offense, although the question as to whether such offense had been committed by the defendant never arose in the mind of anybody until after he was acquitted on the charge of robbery. Such, surely, cannot be "due process of law." A person charged with crime has no right to be heard before the grand jury; that is a tribunal selected from the people, and consisting "of so large a body as to be supposed to be beyond the influence of prejudice or passion, and whose judgment" has for centuries been held conclusive. While the people have provided an alternative of a more speedy character, they have carefully provided that, before a man can be put upon his trial, there must be an investigation before a judicial officer, and the accused must be given the right to be heard by himself and his witnesses, with the aid of counsel. Of what avail is this right if, after a hearing and a determination by the judicial officer selected for that purpose, a mere ministerial officer—and he one employed and paid to prosecute persons charged with crime, and one who we all know is often overzealous in his efforts to secure conviction—can put a man upon trial for an offense which he has never had an opportunity to meet? (Of course, there has been no attempt to unduly press this petitioner, and I refer simply to what may occur.) No one is more desirous of adhering to our own decisions than myself, and, if it were a case involving a construction upon which property rights may have been built up, I should not depart from prior decisions; but in a case like this, involving the construction of a provision of the constitution which is intended to preserve the liberty of the citizen, I do not feel bound by what may have been said in prior cases. Furthermore, as this is a question which must be ultimately decided by the supreme court of the United States, it is our duty to follow the decisions of that court, as we understand them. Another point: Section 809 of the Penal Code expressly provides that, "when a defendant has been examined and committed, * * * it shall be the duty of the district attorney, within thirty days thereafter, to file in the superior court * * * an information charging the defendant with such offense." If it be true that the district attorney may, after a trial upon the charge for which the defendant has been committed, file an information and put him upon trial for another offense, I think his authority to do so should affirmatively appear.

SHANAHAN v. CRAMPTON et al. (No. 14,167.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 19, 1891.)

QUIETING TITLE.

Where land, paid for out of a husband's savings since his marriage, was conveyed to his wife "as her separate property and estate," without his knowledge, and contrary to his intention to take a conveyance to himself and wife, he could not assert his equitable rights in an action to quiet his title against his wife's grantee, founded upon Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 738, which provides that any person may bring an action against another "who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claim." Swain v. Duane, 48 Cal. 359, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2.

Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

Action to quiet title to land by Shanahan against Crampton et al. From a judgment of nonsuit plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. Isaac Joseph, A. L. Hart, and Matt. F. Johnson, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an action founded upon section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure to quiet plaintiff's alleged title to a block of land in the city of Sacramento.¹ The plaintiff brings this appeal from a judgment of nonsuit against him, rendered upon the evidence on which he rested his case. The substance of the complaint is that the plaintiff is, and for a long time has been, the owner of the land in question, and that the defendants, without any right or title whatever, claim and assert an interest therein adverse to the plaintiff. Prayer that the adverse claims of defendants may be determined; that plaintiff be adjudged to be the exclusive owner of the land, etc. The complaint was not verified. The separate answers of the defendants each specifically denies the alleged ownership of the plaintiff, and claims an interest in a portion of the land, derived from Coleman and Bates through a conveyance from Julia K. Shanahan, the wife of the plaintiff; and further alleges that the plaintiff is estopped from denying defendants' title, and specially sets forth the grounds of the alleged estoppel. At the commencement of the trial it was admitted by all the parties that Coleman and Bates were the owners of the land on February 27, 1884. The plaintiff then put in evidence the following deed from Coleman and Bates to plaintiff's wife: "We, William P. Coleman and Geo. E. Bates, of the county of Sacramento, state of California, grant to Julia K. Shanahan, of the same place, as her separate property and estate, all that real property situate in the city of Sacramento, state of California, and designated as lots Nos. one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, and eight, in square bounded by S and T and Twenty-Ninth and Thirtieth streets, (29th and 30th streets.) City taxes now due to be paid by the grantee. Consideration, $400. Witness our hands this 27th day of February, 1884. [Seal.] GEO. E. BATES, [Seal.] W. P. COLEMAN." This deed was duly recorded on the 18th day of June, 1884. The plaintiff next put in evidence his own deposition, in which he deposed that he and Julia K. Shanahan were husband and wife, having been married in October, 1882, and having lived together as such ever since; that his wife never had any separate property; that the whole consideration for the deed of Coleman and Bates to his wife was paid from his earnings since his marriage; that it was his intention to have said deed executed to himself and wife, and he did not know that it was executed to her alone until about three months after it was executed; that he had never sold or disposed of the land, nor authorized any other person to do so; and that he had made and paid for improvements on the land, and had paid the taxes thereon until July, 1887. On cross-examination he deposed that his wife had sold the land to the defendant Crampton in July, 1887, without his knowledge or consent, but that he had notice of such sale about one month thereafter, and more than two years before the commencement of this action, yet had never asked his wife to convey the land to him, because he thought it was all right; that he had never notified Crampton that he (plaintiff) claimed any interest in the land, nor that his wife had no authority to sell it, until he did so by the commencement of this action; that he had never restored, or offered to restore, to Crampton any part of the purchase money paid by the latter to his wife; that he had never received any part of that purchase money; that his wife had always claimed the land as her separate property, and claimed the right to do as she pleased with it and the purchase money received for it; that he did not notify Crampton of his claim to the land before the commencement of this action because he did not know that he was entitled to any remedy until a short time before this suit was commenced; and he further deposed that his wife, without his knowledge or consent, executed a mortgage on the land in June, 1885, to the Germania Building & Loan Association, to secure a loan of $550, of which he had no notice until eight months thereafter. Plaintiff next put in evidence a deposition of Maurice Dwyer, who deposed that he was the father of plaintiff's wife; that she had no separate property when she married, and had acquired none since to his knowledge; and that the sale of the land in question by plaintiff's wife has caused much trouble between her and the plaintiff. The foregoing is the substance of all the evidence on which plaintiff rested his case.

The motion for nonsuit was made on the following and other grounds: (1) That it appears by the deed from Coleman and Bates to Mrs. Shanahan that it was the intention of the grantors to convey the property to her as her separate property, and that it was so conveyed, and, if plaintiff has any equitable rights to the property, he cannot assert them in this action to quiet his title; (2) that the plaintiff has not restored, or offered to restore, to Crampton the purchase money paid by him to plaintiff's wife; and (3) that, under the circumstances appearing, the plaintiff is estopped from denying that the land was the separate property of his wife. I think the nonsuit is justifiable on the ground first above stated. The legal title was conveyed to the wife. Swain v. Duane, 43 Cal. 359. If, as testified by the plaintiff, the purchase money was paid from community property, (his earnings after marriage,) and the wife took the title in her name, without his knowledge or consent, and held it adversely to him, she took and held it in trust for the marital community. The trust resulted from the fact that the purchase money was community property. Civil Code, § 853; Hill v. Bugg, 52 Miss. 401; Bent v. Bent, 44 Vt. 555. Having at least the legal title, she could convey it to the defendants; and, if the plaintiff is entitled to any relief against them, it can be only an adjudication that they hold the legal title in trust for the benefit of the marriage community. But it is well settled that such relief is not appropriate in an action merely to quiet plaintiff's title under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Learned v. Welton, 40 Cal. 349; Von Drachenfels v. Doolittle, 77 Cal. 295, 19 Pac. Rep. 518; Brewer v. Houston, 58 Cal. 345; Harrigan v. Mowry, 84 Cal. 457, 22 Pac. Rep. 658, and 24 Pac. Rep. 48. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

WE CONCUR: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment solely upon the ground of Swain v. Duane, 48 Cal. 359. If the question were an open one, I should be of opinion that land conveyed to a wife for a money consideration is presumptively community property, subject to the control of the husband, and that its character could not be changed by any language which the grantor might choose to put into the deed.

DAGGETT et al. v. COLGAN. (No. 14,630.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1891.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—APPROPRIATIONS—"WORLD'S FAIR."

1. Act Leg. Cal. March 6, 1891, providing for the appointment by the governor of a commission to control the expenditure of all moneys appropriated by the state for constructing buildings and collecting and maintaining an exhibit of the products of the state at the World's Fair Columbian Exposition, to be held in Chicago in 1893, and appropriating $300,000 for this purpose, is not unconstitutional as conflicting with Const. Cal. art. 4, § 22, which declares that no money shall ever be appropriated for the use or benefit of any institution not controlled by the state, since it appears from the act itself that the appropriation is to be expended by the state itself, and used for state purposes.

2. Such act is not unconstitutional on the ground that the appropriation is not for a public use, since the legislature is the sole judge of what is for a public use.

In bank.

Original application by Daggett and others for a writ of mandamus against one Colgan. Granted.

E. W. McKinstry, for plaintiff. Barham & Bolton and Wm. R. Davis, for defendant. Atty. Gen. Hart, amicus curiæ.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an original application to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, as comptroller, to draw his warrant on the state treasurer, in payment of a claim contracted and audited by the petitioners, as members of the California World's Fair commission, in pursuance of the authority given such commission by an act of the legislature of this state, approved March 6, 1891. St. 1891, p. 24. The act provides for the appointment by the governor of a commission who "shall have the exclusive charge and control of the expenditure of all moneys appropriated by the state of California for the construction of buildings and maintaining an exhibit of the products of the state of California at the World's Fair Columbian Exposition, to be held in the city of Chicago, state of Illinois, in eighteen hundred and ninety-three." By section 3 of the act the sum of $300,000 is appropriated "to meet the expenses of erecting buildings and maintaining an exhibit of the products of the state of California at the World's Fair Columbian Exposition" at Chicago, and the comptroller is directed to draw his warrant on the treasury from time to time in favor of such persons as the majority of the commissioners provided for by the act shall direct. The defendant demurs to the petition, upon the general ground that the facts therein stated do not entitle petitioners to the writ demanded, and in support of this demurrer contends:

1. That the act of the legislature referred to is in conflict with that provision of section 22 of article 4 of the constitution which declares that "no money shall ever be appropriated or drawn from the state treasury for the use or benefit of any corporation, association, asylum, hospital, or any other institution not under the exclusive management and control of the state as a state institution, nor shall any grant or donation of property ever be made thereto by the state."

In considering the question thus presented the court will take judicial notice of the fact that the World's Fair Columbian Exposition, referred to in the statute under consideration, is to be held under and by virtue of the provisions of an act of congress approved April 25, 1890, (27 U. S. St. at Large, 62,) and that such exposition will not be conducted under the exclusive management and control of this state as a state institution, but, on the contrary, that the same will be under the general management of the national commission, created by that act; and that the chief agency relied upon to effect the design of congress is a private corporation of the state of Illinois, which is authorized by the act of congress to charge such entrance and admission fee to such exhibition "as shall be fixed and established by said corporation, subject, however, to such modification, if any, as may be imposed by a majority of said commissioners." But, while conceding these to be the facts, unless the act under consideration makes an appropriation for the use and benefit of the national commission, or in aid of a private corporation, through the instrumentality of which the exposition is in great part to be conducted, and from the success of which that corporation expects to derive a pecuniary profit, it is clear that the provision of the constitution, above quoted, and relied upon by defendant, can have no application. It is claimed by the defendant that the statute under consideration does in effect make such an appropriation, but we are not able to find anything in its language which would justify the contention of defendant on this point. On the contrary, it appears from the act itself that the appropriation is to be expended by the state itself, disbursed by its own agents or officers, and is to be used only for the purpose of "erecting buildings and collecting and maintaining an exhibit of the products of the state of California." Even if it could be said with any degree of certainty that the private corporation referred to in the act of congress will increase its receipts because of the fact that the state is to place its products on exhibition, or that it may derive a benefit from the rent of its grounds to the state, or realize other profits, still this would not affect the question we are considering, or bring the appropriation within the prohibition of the section of the constitution above quoted, as it is apparent that the main object of the statute is not to confer such incidental benefit, but rather to promote what is assumed to be a matter of public concern, and for the public good. In every public expenditure, individuals derive incidental aid and benefit, in the sense that they are paid for services rendered or articles furnished to the state in the prosecution of the public improvement or business of the state, and the expenditure contemplated by this act will not be exceptional in this respect; but there is nothing upon the face of the statute to indicate that the private corporation referred to, or any individual, will or can, if the appropriation is honestly expended, receive one dollar as a gratuity, or by way of assistance, or except in return for something of value which the officers charged with its disbursement shall deem necessary to secure, in order to effect the general purpose and object of the act.

2. The defendant further contends that the statute is unconstitutional, for the reason that the appropriation thereby made is not for a public use, such as the state is authorized to make; that the maintenance of an exhibition of the products of the state in the manner contemplated does not fall within the legitimate authority of the state government.

In passing upon this proposition it is necessary to bear in mind that what is for the public good and what are public purposes "are questions which the legislature must decide upon its own judgment, in respect to which it is vested with a large discretion which cannot be controlled by the courts, except, perhaps, where its action is clearly evasive. * * * Where the power which is exercised is legislative in its character, the courts can enforce only those limitations which the constitution imposes; not those implied restrictions, which, resting in theory only, the people have been satisfied to leave to the judgment, patriotism, and sense of justice of their representatives." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 154. It is undoubtedly true that public money can be rightfully expended only for public purposes, but, as was well said by that eminent jurist, Judge COOLEY, in delivering the opinion of the court in People v. Salem, 20 Mich. 452: "Necessity alone is not the test by which the limits of state authority in this direction are to be defined, but a wise statesmanship must look beyond the expenditures which are absolutely needful to the continued existence of organized government, and embrace others which may tend to make that government subserve the general well-being of society, and advance the present and prospective happiness and prosperity of the people." In view of these principles of constitutional law, which are so well settled as to be placed beyond discussion or dispute, it is manifest, we think, that the court is not authorized to declare the act under consideration void upon the theory that the expenditure thereby authorized can in no manner be considered as tending to promote the public welfare, which it is one great object of government to secure. The question whether the public interests of the state would be at all advanced by an exhibition of its products such as is contemplated by the act was an appropriate one for discussion in the halls of the legislature before its enactment, and for the consideration of the governor before approving it, but it is not one for this court to decide, upon the individual views of its members concerning the wisdom or expediency of such legislation. There is no difference, except in degree, between the appropriation contained in this act and those which for years have been made, without any question as to their validity, for the support of the state agricultural fair and the various district agricultural societies throughout the state. The fact that this exhibit of the products of the state is to be made without the limits of the state does not change its essential character, or make it any less an occasion or purpose in which, in an enlarged sense, it may be said that the people of the state have an interest. So, also, it would be hard to distinguish this appropriation in principle from those appropriations which have been made from time to time for the maintenance of horticultural, viticultural, and other similar commissions. None of these, strictly speaking, are required for the proper administration of the government of the state, and possibly, in the opinion of many, call for an unjustifiable and useless expenditure of money. But the power of the legislature to create such commissions has never been doubted. We know from the express declaration of the act of congress authorizing the Columbian Exposition that the purpose of the exposition is to commemorate the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America, "by an exhibition of the resources of the United States of America, their development, and of the progress of civilization in the new world;" and that such exhibition is to be of a "national and international character, so that not only the people of the Union and of this continent, but those of all nations as well, can participate." We have no doubt that it was fairly a matter within the power of the legislature to determine whether this state should join with its sister states, and with the government of the United States, in celebrating in the way suggested the historical event referred to. It has been held in many cases that a municipal corporation has no authority, under the general powers usually given such corporations, to appropriate money for the celebration of the anniversary of important events in the history of our country, such as the Fourth of July, (Hodges v. Buffalo, 2 Denio, 110; Hood v. Lynn, 1 Allen, 103.) and the surrender of Cornwallis, (Tash v. Adams, 10 Cush. 252.) See, also, The Liberty Bell, 23 Fed. Rep. 844. These decisions, however, all rest upon the principle that municipal corporations have no powers except such as are specifically granted by the act of incorporation, or are necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the powers expressly granted. But it has never been doubted that the state could confer upon a city or town the authority to celebrate such important events in the history of the country as appeal to the patriotism or higher sentiments of the people, and to tax their citizens to pay the expense thereof. Thus it was held that the city of Philadelphia had the power under its charter to provide for the entertainment of distinguished visitors upon the occasion of the celebration of the Centennial Anniversary of American Independence. Tatham v. Philadelphia, 11 Phila. 276. So, also, in Massachusetts, by general statutes, the power has been conferred upon towns to celebrate the centennial anniversary of their incorporation, (Hill v. Easthampton, 140 Mass. 381, 4 N. E. Rep. 811,) and also to appropriate money for the celebration of holidays, and for other public purposes, (Hubbard v. Taunton, 140 Mass. 467, 5 N. E. Rep. 157.) These cases are authority for the proposition that the state itself, unless restrained by its constitution, has the power to make appropriations for such purposes, because, unless it possesses the power, it could not confer it upon its municipal corporations. Such expenditures are justified under the general power which the state has to provide for the public welfare, the limits of which are perhaps not capable of exact definition, and are the same in principle as appropriations made for the building of monuments to commemorate great historical events, or for the erection in public places of the statues of those who by common consent are classed among the patriots or benefactors of the nation. Undoubtedly this power may be the subject of great abuse, but this is no argument against its existence. The only protection against reckless and improvident appropriations for public purposes must be found in the character of those intrusted with the power of legislation, and in the integrity and firmness of the chief executive of the state. The demurrer of defendant is overruled, and a peremptory writ of mandamus ordered in accordance with the prayer of petitioners.

STEEN v. WILLIAMSON. (No. 13,590.)

NEGLECTANCE OF SERVANT—LIABILITY OF MASTER.

In an action against a master for personal injury, caused by the negligence of his servant, it is not error to instruct the jury that, "if you believe that the injury sustained was occasioned by an unavoidable accident on the part of the agents of defendant without negligence on their part, you should render a verdict for defendant," where the evidence failed to show negligence or carelessness on the part of the defendant's servants.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action for personal injury by one Steen against Williamson. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ferral & Payson, for appellant. E. F. Preston, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This appeal is from a judgment and order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial in an action to recover damages sustained by plaintiff by reason of the falling of a piece of gas-pipe from the hands of defendant's employe while engaged in screwing it into another pipe. The cause was tried by a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of the defendant. The court, at the request of the defendant, instructed the jury as follows: "If you believe that the injury sustained by the plaintiff was occasioned by an unavoidable accident on the part of the agents of the defendant, without negligence on their part, you should render a verdict for the defendant." Plaintiff expected on the ground that there was no evidence of unavoidable accident. We think there was. The witness Robert Brown, on cross-examination, testified as follows: "I was attending to my business. I have been in the plumbing business going on three years. I have done this kind of work before. I was accustomed to it. I was screwing this pipe in a T-joint. This piece of pipe was about six or eight feet long. It was not very heavy. It was a half-inch pipe, and not very heavy. Question. Could you have stopped it from falling? Answer. No; it accidentally slipped. I was trying to screw this pipe into the other pipe, and the pipe was between the two joists, and I had a piece nailed across the two joists, and the end of the pipe lay right in the joist, and I was leaning over the joist trying to screw this piece of pipe into the T, and it accidentally slipped. I was on the edge of the joists, leaning over the joist. The joists were about thirty inches apart. The joists were about 2 by 4 inch, and the two-inch edge turned up. It was attending to my business. There were no other boys up there. There was nothing to attract my attention particularly, more than at any other time. I was doing the best I could. I could not stop the pipe. I certainly would not have let it fall if I could have stopped it. I do not think I saw Mr. Steen under methen. He was not directly under me. He was two floors below, and the pipe went through both stories. Steen was working at the folding doors on the ground floor, while I was putting in the center drop of the second story, and that is nearer the front of the house than the center drop in the room below. The accident was not caused by my pushing a pipe. It was the one I was trying to fix into the T-joint. It accidentally slipped and fell. The pipe that fell was lying parallel with the floor joists." This evidence tends to prove that the injury sustained by the plaintiff was the result of unavoidable accident, and there is no evidence tending in any degree to prove that it was the result of negligence or carelessness. Therefore the exception is based upon an untenable ground; and there is no other ground upon which it could be based. Judgment and order affirmed.

EATON V. MALATESTA. (No. 13,848.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—ENFORCEMENT—VARIANCE.

In an action to enforce a mechanic's lien, the contract alleged was to furnish materials and erect a certain building on defendant's land, while the proofs showed that the work done was to raise up, move back, and repair two houses. Held, that plaintiff could not recover.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; FRANCIS E. SPENCER, Judge.

Action by William Eaton against Antonio Malatesta to enforce a mechanic's lien for materials furnished and labor performed. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. P. Veuve, for appellant. Lamar & Castle, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was to enforce a mechanic's lien upon certain property belonging to the defendant, by an original contractor, for work done and materials furnished and used in the construction and erection of a certain building of the defendant. The complaint sets up that the contract upon which the lien is sought to be enforced is that the plaintiff agreed to furnish the material and erect for the defendant a certain building, upon certain land, within a reasonable time, and that the defendant agreed to pay therefor $150 upon the completion of the work. The notice of lien leaves it uncertain whether the contract was to erect and furnish materials for one building or two. In the bill of exceptions the evidence shows, without conflict, that the real nature of the contract, and the work actually performed, was to raise up, move back, and repair two houses, and furnish material therefor. It is therefore evident that the proof made neither conforms to the nature of the contract, as averred in the complaint or in the notice of lien, and that the decision is not supported by the evidence in most important respects. For these reasons we advise that the judgment be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed.

ARROYO DITCH & WATER CO. V. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (No. 14,441.)

SUPERIOR COURT—JURISDICTION—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

1. Under Const. Cal. art. 6, § 5, which declares that "the superior court shall have original jurisdiction * * * in all cases at law which involve the * * * legality of any tax, impost, assessment, toll, or municipal fine," the term "assessment" does not include installments or "calls" which are made under Civil Code Cal. § 315, by a private corporation on its stockholders, and the superior court acquires no jurisdiction of an action on a note given for such installment, where the justice of the peace, before whom the action was brought certifies it to the superior court, under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 838, which provides that the justice shall so certify a case involving such question, whereupon "the superior court shall have over the action the same jurisdiction as if it had been commenced therein."

2. The fact that a party, after his objection to the jurisdiction of a court has been overruled, proceeds to try the cause, does not preclude him from thereafter questioning the jurisdiction.

In bank.

Writ of review by Arroyo Ditch & Water Company, a corporation, to superior court of Los Angeles county. Proceedings annulled.

Holloway & Kendrick, for petitioner. Robinson, Willis & Appel, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff, a private corporation, brought an action against one E. J. Standlee in the justice's court for Downey township, in Los Angeles county, upon a promissory note for $21 executed to it by him. The defendant filed a verified answer to the complaint, alleging that the sole consideration for which the note had been given was a pretended assessment by the plaintiff upon its capital stock, of which he held a certain number of shares, and that the said assessment was illegal and void. Upon filing the answer the defendant moved the court to transfer the action to the superior court upon the ground that it necessarily involved the question of the legality of an assessment, and thereupon the court suspended all further proceedings in the action, and certified the pleadings to the county clerk of Los Angeles county. After the pleadings had been filed with the county clerk the plaintiff moved the superior court to remand the cause to the justice's court upon the grounds that that court erred in transferring the cause to the superior court, and that the superior court had no jurisdiction of the matter. This motion was denied, and the court thereafter tried the cause, and rendered a judgment in favor of the defendant. At the instance of the plaintiff a writ of review was issued out of this court to the superior court, and in obedience thereto a transcript of the records and proceedings of that court in the matter has been certified to this court. The constitution, art. 6, § 5, declares that "the superior court shall have original jurisdiction * * * in all cases at law which involve the * * * legality of any tax, impost, assessment, toll, or municipal fine." The term "assessment" used in this provision does not include the installments or "calls" which are sometimes termed "assessments," made under the provisions of section 315 of the Civil Code, by a private corporation upon its stockholders, in accordance with an agreement on their part, express or implied, to pay into its treasury the amount subscribed by them to its capital stock. It has reference to such assessments as are authorized by those provisions of the constitution which relate to revenue and taxation, and to such as may be made under the authority of a municipal or other public corporation for the purpose of meeting the cost or expense of some public improvement. Taylor v. Palmer, 31 Cal. 241. The other words in the clause, in connection with which the term is associated, serve to illustrate its meaning, and resolve any doubt that might otherwise be raised respecting the sense in which it is to be interpreted. Each of these subjects, viz., tax, impost, toll, municipal fine, of which jurisdiction is thus conferred upon the superior court, implies a charge imposed by public authority for some public purpose, and, under the rules by which the maxim poscitur a sociis is applied, it is clear that the "assessment" referred to is of a kindred nature. Inasmuch, therefore, as the constitution has not conferred upon the superior court any original jurisdiction to determine the legality of the assessment alleged in the answer of the defendant, it follows that the justice's court had full jurisdiction to determine all questions relating to such assessment that might be presented upon the trial of the cause, and had no authority to certify the pleadings to the superior court. The proposition of the respondent that the determination of this question by the justice was conclusive cannot be maintained. While a justice of the peace has jurisdiction to pass upon any question of fact or of law which is involved in the trial of an issue properly before him, so that his judgment in the cause will be binding upon the parties in the absence of any appeal or review, yet he has not the jurisdiction in this summary mode to divest himself of jurisdiction, or to transfer a cause which is within his jurisdiction to a tribunal which has no jurisdiction to determine it. If, in the present case, he had tried the cause, and rendered judgment therein for the defendant upon the ground that the justice's court had no jurisdiction to determine the subject-matter presented by the defense, or to try the cause, an appeal could have been taken from that judgment to the superior court, and the superior court would then have had the power, under its appellate jurisdiction, to pass definitively upon the question. He could not, however, determine the question in advance of trying the cause, and give to such determination the effect of a judgment.

Nor did the superior court acquire jurisdiction of the cause by the fact that the justice had certified the pleadings to the county clerk. The constitution has given to it original and appellate jurisdiction, but it can exercise its original jurisdiction only in those cases provided by the constitution, and its appellate jurisdiction only in such cases as may be prescribed by law. It cannot exercise original jurisdiction in those matters in which its jurisdiction is only appellate. The jurisdiction that it exercises under the provisions of section 838, Code Civil Proc., is original, and not appellate, and the provision in that section, that "from the time of filing such pleadings or transcript with the clerk the superior court shall have over the action the same jurisdiction as if it had been commenced therein," implies that, if it would have had no jurisdiction over the action if it had been commenced therein, it can have no jurisdiction by the filing of the pleadings certified by the justice. Although the exercise of jurisdiction by the superior court will be presumed to have been rightful, yet if it appears upon its own records of its action in any matter that it had not acquired jurisdiction either of the subject-matter, or of the parties, this presumption is destroyed. It cannot exercise jurisdiction in any instance until after it has acquired it, and it can acquire it only in the mode prescribed by statute. Merely certifying to the county clerk by a justice of the peace the pleadings in a case pending before him does not confer jurisdiction upon the superior court of a matter of which jurisdiction has not been conferred upon it by the constitution.

Nor does it acquire jurisdiction of the parties to that cause by thereafter determining that it has jurisdiction, and by proceeding in the trial of the cause and rendering judgment therein. The fact that a party, after his objection to the jurisdiction of a court has been overruled, proceeds, under such objection, to try the cause, does not preclude him from thereafter questioning the power of the court to take any steps in the matter. Lyman v. Milton, 44 Cal. 630; Harkness v. Hyde, 98 U. S. 479. If the court never acquired jurisdiction over him, it does not acquire it because he may have chanced to be in the court-room when the case was called for trial, and, while protesting against the trial, endeavors to protect his rights against the claims of his adversary. "The jurisdiction of the [superior] court, under section 838, was special, and that court could hear and determine the cause only after the pleadings before the justice were filed with its clerk. The [superior] court had jurisdiction only because the pleadings had before the justice and filed with its clerk presented the issue of the legality or validity of the tax or impost, and could then take jurisdiction only for the purpose of trying the issue as to the legality of the tax or impost; since, the amount being less than three hundred dollars, the justice's court had jurisdiction to pass upon every other issue." City of Santa Cruz v. Railroad Co., 56 Cal. 147. Inasmuch as the only mode in which it is claimed that the superior court acquired any jurisdiction of the action brought by the plaintiff against Standlee was from the act of the justice of the peace in certifying the pleadings therein to the county clerk, and as we have seen that such act was unauthorized, it follows that the action was never legally before the superior court for determination, and that it was without any jurisdiction to render a judgment in the case. It is therefore ordered that the judgment of the superior court, and all orders and proceedings by it taken in the case, be and they are hereby annulled.

WHARTENBY v. REAY et al. (No. 14,577.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 25, 1891.)

SUBSTITUTION OF PARTIES.

The attorney of a deceased plaintiff's executors is not deprived of authority to move to dismiss an appeal, though the executors were not substituted as plaintiffs until the motion came on for hearing.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; A. A. SANDERSON, Judge. Granted.

Action by James Whartenby against James W. Reay and others. Motion to dismiss appeal.

George E. Lawrence, for appellants. A. N. Drown, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal upon the ground that no transcript of the record has been filed in this court. It is conceded by appellant that the time allowed by law for filing the transcript expired long since, but he insists that the attorney who filed the moving papers has no authority to act in the matter. The attorney in the lower court was A. N. Drown, and the motion to dismiss the appeal is signed by A. N. Drown as attorney for plaintiff; but it appears by affidavit that the plaintiff Whartenby died in the year 1890, and at the time this motion was noticed for hearing the executors of deceased had not been substituted in this court as parties plaintiff. At the time the notice of motion was given, executors of the estate of said deceased, Whartenby, had been appointed by the lower court, had qualified, and said Drown was acting as their attorney. When appointed, all rights and interests in this litigation vested in them; they were the real parties in interest, and the fact that the order of this substitution pro forma as plaintiffs had not been made in this court at that time (and which was made upon the hearing of the motion) is not sufficient to deprive the executors' attorney of the authority to make the motion. Let the appeal be dismissed.

GRUHN v. STANLEY et al. (No. 13,253.)

JOINT ACTION—RECOVERY AGAINST ONE DEFENDANT.

Where defendants in an action to recover money deny that they are both indebted, but one avers in his separate answer that he is indebted as set forth in the complaint, and no misjoinder of defendants is pleaded, it is error for the court to give judgment in favor of both defendants.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

Action by William Gruhn against Bertha Stanley and William H. M. Stanley to recover money loaned. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals.

H. H. Lowenthal, for appellant. Ferral & Payson, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an action to recover $1,000 "for money loaned and advanced" by plaintiff to defendants, in which the trial court gave judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The complaint avers that the "defendants * * * are indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000 for and on account of moneys loaned and advanced by said plaintiff to said defendants;" and "that defendants promised and agreed to pay said sum to plaintiff upon demand," etc. By her separate answer, the defendant Bertha, for herself alone, specifically denies each allegation of the complaint, so far as it applies to her; but she does not plead any misjoinder of defendants. The separate answer of the defendant William denies that the defendants are indebted, etc., for moneys loaned or advanced to the defendants; denies that defendants promised or agreed to pay, etc.; but "averts that he is individually indebted to plaintiff for money loaned to this defendant personally by said plaintiff, but that said defendant Bertha Stanley was not a party to said last-mentioned transaction." The court found as facts that the defendants were not indebted to plaintiff for money loaned or advanced by plaintiff to defendants; that defendants did not agree or promise to pay said sum or any sum; and that there was no sum of money due from defendants to plaintiff by reason of money loaned by plaintiff to defendants; and, as a conclusion of law, found "that defendants are entitled to judgment, and for their costs," taxed at $11.50. These findings must be construed to mean merely that the defendants were not jointly indebted, because the defendant Bertha was not indebted at all; since there was no issue as to the indebtedness or liability of the defendant William. His answer conclusively admits that he, individually, contracted the debt, and denies only that Bertha was a party to the contract. The same issue, and no other, is made by the answer of Bertha, who denies that she, individually, or jointly with William, contracted the debt or promised to pay it. The findings simply negative the alleged indebtedness and liability of the defendant Bertha; and, so understood, they are justified by the evidence, which tends to prove that the loan was made to William alone. It is admitted that he applied for the loan to himself, and that the money loaned was delivered to him. There is no evidence that the defendant Bertha received any part of the money or any benefit therefrom. There was no necessity for any finding as to the separate individual liability of William, for that was admitted, and conclusively established by the pleadings, to the full extent of the sum demanded, (Walker v. Brem, 67 Cal. 599, 8 Pac. Rep. 320; Taylor v. Railroad Co., 67 Cal. 615, 8 Pac. Rep. 436;) and this is consistent with the finding that the defendants were not jointly liable. The motion for new trial was therefore properly denied. But, since no misjoinder of the defendants was specially pleaded, if any there was, it was waived; and the court erred in giving judgment in favor of both defendants, as the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment, on the pleadings, against the defendant William for the full sum demanded in the complaint. Code Civil Proc. §§ 433, 434; Rutenburg v. Main, 47 Cal. 213; Gillam v. Sigman, 29 Cal. 637; Pom. Rem. §§ 289-292. I think the order denying a new trial, and the judgment in favor of the defendant Bertha Stanley, should be affirmed, but that the judgment in favor of William H. M. Stanley should be reversed, and that the court below should be directed to render judgment for plaintiff against William H. M. Stanley, on the pleadings, for the full sum demanded in the complaint.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order denying a new trial, and the judgment in favor of the defendant Bertha Stanley, are affirmed, and the judgment in favor of William H. M. Stanley is reversed, and the court below is directed to render judgment for plaintiff against William H. M. Stanley, on the pleadings, for the full sum demanded in the complaint.

BURKE v. BOURS et al. (No. 13,912.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1891.)

PURCHASE OF PRINCIPAL'S LAND BY AGENT—EQUITABLE TITLE.

In ejectment defendant claimed an equitable title. Plaintiff's testator, A., formerly owned the land, and placed it with F. to sell, who intrusted it, with A.'s consent, to defendant. In a short time defendant wrote to F. that he had an offer, and inclosed a deed for A. to sign with the name of the grantee omitted. On return of the deed signed and acknowledged, defendant inserted his name as grantee, and forwarded a check to F. for the price, who cashed the check, and credited A.'s account. The deed was void because of the failure to insert the grantee's name before delivery. Held that, on account of defendant's fiduciary relation to A., he took no equitable title.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. SWINNERTON, Judge. Reversed.

Action in ejectment by W. G. Burke, administrator, against B. W. Bours and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals.

Geo. D. Collins, for appellant. Jas. H. Budd, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action in ejectment. Defendant claims to be in possession under a perfect equitable title, and this appeal is taken by plaintiff from the judgment upon a bill of exceptions. The cause has been in this court before, (67 Cal. 447, 8 Pac. Rep. 49,) and it was there held that the deed to defendant to the realty in dispute, made by plaintiff's predecessor in interest, was void, by reason of the fact that the grantee's name was not inserted therein until after it was signed and acknowledged. At the time of the alleged sale of this land, which is situated in the city of Stockton, one Arguello, who resided at Santa Clara, was the owner thereof, and Faulkner, Bell & Co., residing in San Francisco, were his agents in attending to his property interests. Respondent Bours resided in the city of Stockton, and, as the agent of Faulkner, Bell & Co., had charge of this property, collecting rents, etc. Bours and Arguello were strangers to each other. Upon August 19, 1876, the following letter was written to Bours: "Mr. Arguello thinks of selling his real estate in your town, and requests us to ascertain the price it would probably realize. Yours, FAULKNER, BELL & Co." In answer Bours replied that business was dull, and he did not think the property would sell for over $5,000. This letter was forwarded by F., B. & Co. to Arguello, to which he replied to F., B. & Co., among other things: "Needing some money, I wish you would communicate with Mr. Bours, and try to sell this property at a price as near $5,000 as possible." This letter was forwarded to Bours by F., B. & Co., with the statement: "Trusting you will soon be able to advise the disposal of this property, we are, Yours, FAULKNER, BELL & Co." To this Bours wrote to F., B. & Co. that he had ordered an abstract of title to the property, had placed the matter in the hands of a competent broker, and hoped soon to report the sale of the property. This letter was also forwarded by F., B., & Co. to Arguello. Shortly afterwards Bours wrote to F., B. & Co. that he had received an offer of $4,500, free of all commissions, etc., for the property, and had accepted the offer, subject to the approval of the owner, and inclosed in the letter a deed to the property, to be signed and returned to him if Arguello approved the sale. The name of the grantee in the deed was omitted. This letter and deed were forwarded to Arguello by F., B. & Co., he signed the deed and returned it to them. It was then sent to Bours, who inserted his name as grantee therein, and thereupon forwarded his personal check to F., B. & Co. for the amount of the purchase price, and they credited Arguello's account to that extent.

The foregoing deed was declared void in 67 Cal. 447, 8 Pac. Rep. 49, for the reason heretofore stated.

If the business relations existing between Arguello, F., B. & Co., and Bours, as indicated by the foregoing facts, were not such as in equity prohibited Bours from purchasing this property, then he undoubtedly has a perfect equity, which must prevail in this action as against plaintiff's legal title. In section 959, Pom. Eq. Jur., the author says that "equity regards and treats the relation of principal and agent in the same general manner, and with nearly the same strictness, as that of trustee and beneficiary," and this rule is even more rigidly recognized by section 2322 of the Civil Code, which provides that "an authority expressed in general terms, however broad, does not authorize an agent to do any act which a trustee is forbidden to do by article 2, c. 1, tit. 8, of this Code." These provisions define the duties and obligations of trustees towards their beneficiaries fully and clearly, and are strictly in line with the principles laid down in Pom. Eq. Jur. § 959, where it is said: "The underlying thought is that an agent should not unite his personal and representative characters in the same transaction; and equity will not permit him to be exposed to the temptation, or brought into a situation where his own personal interests conflict with the interests of his principal, and with the duties which he owes to his principal." And, referring to a sale made under these circumstances by an agent to himself, the author says: "It will always be set aside at the option of the principal; the amount of consideration, the absence of undue advantage, and other similar features are wholly immaterial." This principle is elementary, and supported by authority both numerous and uniform. Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. 554; Gardner v. Ogden, 22 N. Y. 343.

The law being established, let us see from the evidence what position defendant Bours occupied as to the property and as to Arguello and F., B. & Co. Section 2349 of the Civil Code provides that "an agent, unless specially forbidden by his principal to do so, can delegate his powers to another person in any of the following cases, and in no others: "Subd. 4. When such delegation is specially authorized by the principal." It is unnecessary to pass upon the question as to whether Bours became the subagent of Arguello, under the foregoing provision of law, taken in connection with the letter written by Arguello to F., B. & Co., which was forwarded by them to Bours, wherein he said: "Needing some money, I wish you would communicate with Mr. Bours, and try to sell the property at a price as near as possible to $5,000." Neither is it necessary, in order to justify a reversal of the judgment, to hold that Bours was the direct agent of Arguello, although the evidence would probably sustain findings to that extent. There cannot be the slightest question but that Bours, in the transaction of finding a purchaser for this real estate, was either the agent or subagent of Arguello, or the agent of F., B. & Co., and, as the law reads, his position from either standpoint is fatal to his claims, whenever and wherever judicially viewed by a court of equity. If he was the agent or subagent of Arguello in assisting in the consummation of a sale of his land, then, by becoming a purchaser thereof, he placed himself in a position which would naturally create a conflict between self-interest and integrity of his principal. Where a person buys from himself as the agent of his principal, danger surrounds the best interests of the principal, and it is the policy of equity to remove every temptation from the agent, by rigidly discountenancing all such transactions; and, under the broad principles heretofore referred to, relating to the duties and obligations of trustees and agents, defendant's purchase of the realty cannot be sanctioned.

If we assume that defendant was simply the agent of F., B. & Co. in this matter, then he is equally unfortunate in resting upon unstable ground. If the purchase in this case had been made by F., B. & Co., as we have seen, no court would countenance it. The same principle must necessarily apply to a purchase made by their agent; no substantial distinction can be discerned in the status of the two parties. His duties and obligations to Arguello are required to fill the same measure as is demanded of his employer, and such should emphatically be the requirement in this case; for, as the agent of F., B. & Co., he had the possession of all correspondence of Arguello relating to this matter, whereby he became acquainted with his anxiety to sell; the objects and motives actuating him in such desire; indeed, by this correspondence he became possessed of a knowledge of all the facts and circumstances pertaining to the property. If Faulkner, Bell & Co. could do by their agent what they were forbidden to do themselves, all the mischievous results would be present which the law we have adverted to was designed to prevent. In Sugd. Vend. p. 887, it is said: "Any persons who, by being employed or concerned in the affairs of another, have acquired a knowledge of his property, are incapable of purchasing such property themselves." In Gardner v. Ogden, 22 N. Y. 350, this question was directly involved, and the court said: "The defendant Smith was the clerk or assistant of his principals. * * * Whatever disabilities they labored under equally attached to him. It would work an entire abrogation of the rule to hold the principal subject to the operation of this rule, and exempt his clerks and agents from its effect. It would be opening the door to its evasion, so that it would lose all its vitality and virtue." Continuing, the learned justice writing the opinion said: "I think this is the spirit of all the authorities, and that the honesty and fairness of transactions between principals and their agents demand a firm adherence to these rules, and to bring within their operation, not only the agent himself, but those in his immediate employ, and who are engaged in the transaction of his business, which is, necessarily, the business of the agent's principal."

As we have already seen, it matters not that there was no fraud in this transaction, or that no injury resulted to Arguello from the sale. The rule is intended to prevent the possibility of wrong; and, assuming that Bours paid full value for the property, and even acted in entire good faith throughout the transaction, still such facts form no defense, where the purchase was made by the agent without knowledge of his principal. While a trustee may purchase the trust property where he deals openly with his beneficiary in the sale, and the transaction is in all respects fair and just, and the consideration full and adequate, yet that is not this case. Neither does the evidence disclose that Arguello ratified and confirmed the sale to Bours after a full knowledge of all the facts. Aside from the fact that Bours sent his personal check to F., B. & Co. for the amount of the purchase price, there is nothing in the record to indicate that Arguello had any knowledge whatever that Bours was the purchaser; and, as to that matter, it appears that the check was payable to F., B. & Co., cashed by them, and the amount credited to Arguello's account, and nothing is disclosed by the record to indicate that Arguello ever saw the check, or even imagined such a check was ever drawn. In ejectment the legal title must prevail, unless overcome by a paramount equity. Having decided that defendant occupied such relations towards Arguello that he would not be allowed to become a purchaser of this real estate, unless the sale was made with the full knowledge and consent of Arguello, or ratified and confirmed by him after a full knowledge of all the facts, neither of which conditions exists in this case, it necessarily follows that he is not the vendee under an executed contract of sale, is not in a position to enforce specific performance, and possesses no equity sufficient to defeat plaintiff's right to the recovery of the possession of this tract of land. Let the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

LARCENY—INDICTMENT—FORM.

In an indictment for grand larceny, where the formal conclusion, "contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute," is immediately preceded by an allegation of a prior conviction for a similar offense, the defect of form is without prejudice to defendant, and does not invalidate the indictment or affect the conviction thereunder.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

This was an indictment against John O'Brien for grand larceny. There was judgment of conviction, an order denying a motion for new trial, and an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment, from which defendant appeals. Judgment and orders affirmed.

Charles B. Darwin, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall, for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The indictment charges the defendant with grand larceny, and then alleges a previous conviction of a similar offense, winding up with the words, "contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute," etc. Counsel for appellant suggests that as these words directly follow the allegation of a prior conviction, which follows the clause containing the charge on which he was tried, there is a material departure from the form prescribed in the Code. Any defect or imperfection in matter of form,—and that relied on here is nothing more,—which does not tend to the prejudice, which this defect does not, of a substantial right of the defendant upon the merits, does not render the indictment insufficient, nor affect the trial, judgment, or other proceedings thereon. Pen. Code, § 960. The Code provides that an indictment may be substantially in a given form. But the pleader is not limited to that form, although we would advise a strict compliance with it; particularly in a matter of form, such as the concluding stereotyped phrase, which, in this instance, the pleader seems to have misplaced. Judgment and orders affirmed.

Appeal from superior court, El Dorado county.

Petition by Louisa M. Chalmers, widow of Robert Chalmers, against Stockton Building & Loan Society and Hugh Chalmers, to set apart a homestead. Decree setting apart homestead, subject to lien of mortgages held by defendants. Petitioner appeals. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

Charles F. Irwin, for appellant. George G. Blanchard and W. L. Dudley, for respondents.

MYRICK, J. The widow of deceased petitioned that certain real estate be set apart to her as a homestead. Opposition thereto was made by persons holding mortgages of the real estate executed by the deceased in his life-time. The court found, as facts, the execution of the mortgages, adjudged that the mortgagees are entitled to have the mortgages foreclosed, and that the mortgages are subsisting liens and incumbrances upon the property, and made a decree setting apart to the widow as a homestead the premises described in the petition, "subject, however, to the lien and payment of each of the said mortgages in the findings herein set forth." From the clause of the decree above quoted the widow appealed. Doubtless the court below, sitting as a probate court, would have power to consider the existence or non-existence of a mortgage upon a specific parcel of real estate of the deceased, for the purpose of determining what parcel should be set aside, in case of a selection to be made by the court; but where, as in this case, the declaration of homestead was made during the life-time of the deceased, (the mortgages being executed prior to the declaration,) we find nothing in the statute which requires the adjudication of the court as to the mortgages, or which authorizes the court to set apart the property subject to the lien. Whatever remedy might exist under section 1241, Civil Code, would be for application in proceedings for foreclosure, not in the probate proceedings for setting apart. It is barely necessary to remark that the provisions of section 1475, Code Civil Proc., are not for consideration on this appeal.

The cause is remanded, with instructions to strike from the decree the clause above quoted; in other respects the decree is not appealed from.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—SALE WITHOUT CHANGE OF POSSESSION.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 3440, provides that a transfer of personal property, not accompanied by immediate delivery, and followed by change of possession, is fraudulent and void as against the seller's creditors while he retains possession. Held that, where a sale of cattle was made without delivery of possession, the seller and purchaser thereafter intermarrying, and the seller, — the husband, — with his wife's consent, branded the cattle with his recorded brand, and subsequently, under his wife's directions, though without her joining in the bill of sale, again sold the same, but still retained possession, neither the wife nor the last purchaser had any title as against an execution creditor.

MYRICK, J. Action against a constable and his sureties for an alleged unlawful seizure of 29 head of cattle and a bay filly. Judgment went for defendants, and plaintiff appealed. On the 28th of August, 1876, one Swift was the owner of the property in question. On that day he sold the property to Mary Crowder, but no delivery or effort of delivery of possession was then or at any subsequent time had. A few days after the sale Swift and Mary Crowder intermarried, and have been ever since, and are, husband and wife. Swift had possession and control of the property, with the knowledge and consent of his wife, until the seizure by the constable, March 26, 1881. While so in his possession the cattle were branded with the recorded brand of said Swift, with the knowledge and consent of his wife. On the 1st of March, 1880, Swift, with the knowledge and consent of his wife, in his own name, executed to plaintiff a bill of sale of the cattle. Mrs. Swift did not sign the bill of sale, but directed the transaction, and her husband acted fully and solely under her directions. Plaintiff paid $540 for the cattle. He did not take possession, but they remained, as before, in the possession of Swift. The debt on which the constable seized the property was created in 1880 and 1881. Under such circumstances, neither the plaintiff nor Mrs. Swift could be heard to say the property was not the property of Swift, and liable to seizure for his debt. Mary Crowder, while single, and subsequently when Mrs. Swift, permitted the property to remain in the possession and control of Swift, permitted him to place his brand upon it, and to execute a bill of sale of it in his own name. The plaintiff took the bill of sale from Swift as of his property. Section 3440, Code Civil Proc., reads: "Every transfer of personal property * * * is conclusively presumed if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred, to be fraudulent, and therefore void, against those who are his creditors while he remains in Action by J. D. Byers and others against Oliver Bourret. There was judgment for plaintiffs, from which defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. W. Kellogg and E. T. Hogan, for appellant. R. H. F. Variel, for respondents.

MYRICK, J. The plaintiffs, J. D. Byers and J. O. Hemler, allege themselves to be partners under the firm name of J. D. Byers & Co., and sue to recover the amount due on a promissory note executed by the defendant to them as such partners, which note was made payable to J. D. Byers & Co. The answer of defendant, in the nature of a plea in abatement, alleged that the plaintiffs had no right to maintain the action, for the reason that they had not complied with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code, regulating the filing and publishing a certificate of the partnership. The case was tried on the issue thus presented on the 15th of December, 1882, and on the same day findings were filed and a judgment rendered for plaintiffs for the amount of the note, with interest and costs. The court found that at the time the action was commenced the plaintiffs had not filed or published the certificate of partnership required by the sections above referred to, but that on the 7th of December, 1882, and prior to the day of the trial, the plaintiffs did file a certificate in due form, and commenced the publication thereof in a weekly newspaper, and that publication thereof had been made once before the trial; and as conclusion of law the court held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. This was error. Section 2468 of the Civil Code declares that persons transacting business in this state under a fictitious name, or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners in such business, shall not maintain any action upon or on account of any contracts or transactions had in their partnership name, in any court of this state, until they have first filed the certificate and made the publication required by section 2466. The certificate must state the names in full of all the members of the partnership, and their places of residence, and must be published once a week for four successive weeks in a newspaper. The commencement of an action is a part of the maintaining of it. In this case it was incumbent on the plaintiffs to have shown that the certificate had been filed, and published once a week for four successive weeks before the commencement of the action. We find the law very plainly written, and must hold accordingly. The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with instructions to render judgment for the defendant; such judgment, however, not to be a bar to another ac-

Action by Hannibal Flint, assignee, against J. Cadenasso and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

MYRICK, J. The facts of this case, as presented by the complaint, and as found by the court, may be briefly stated thus: Joel Wood, being the owner of a tract of land, and being indebted to Flint, (the plaintiff,) executed his promissory note, and a mortgage upon the land to secure the payment thereof. Subsequently Joel Wood conveyed the premises to Albert Wood, by deed expressing a money consideration, while the consideration, in fact, was an agreement that Albert Wood should pay for Joel Wood the amount of the note and mortgage. Thereafter Albert Wood conveyed to the defendants, by deed also expressing a money consideration, while, in fact, a part of the consideration was the agreement of the defendants to pay to said Flint for said Joel Wood the amount due and unpaid, and to become due, from said Joel Wood to said Flint, as secured by the mortgage above mentioned. The note being unpaid, plaintiff brought suit thereon against Joel Wood, and recovered judgment, which judgment he (Joel Wood) paid. Joel Wood then assigned to plaintiff his right of action against defendants to recover the amount so paid by him, and this suit is brought by plaintiff, assignee of Joel Wood, to recover of the defendants the said amount. We have no doubt of the liability of the defendants on their agreement. It is true, they made no agreement to and with Joel Wood, but their agreement was for his benefit, and, upon their failure to perform, he had a right of action against them. We think the complaint properly states a cause of action. Whether or not the agreement was made, as alleged, was a question of fact, upon which the evidence was conflicting, and the court found in favor of plaintiff. Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PERAZZO.²

PERJURY—MATERIALITY OF TESTIMONY.

In an action to recover personal property by one claiming title through an execution sale, where the defense was that the note on which the judgment was rendered was given to defraud the makers' creditors, the payee of the note testified that he loaned the makers a sum of money at a time subsequent to the institution of his suit. Held, that this testimony was immaterial, and, though false, did not constitute perjury.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Information against Giuseppe Perazzo for perjury. Verdict of guilty, and judgment thereon. Defendant appeals therefrom, and from orders overruling motions for new trial and in arrest of judgment. Reversed.

Charles B. Darwin and L. Quint, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall and W. H. Payson, for the People.

ROSS, J. The allegations in the information upon which the defendant was convicted are that on the trial of a certain action entitled Sherwood and Meyers v. Desmond it became and was material to its determination to know whether the defendant, Perazzo, had, on or about the 9th day of September, 1880, or at any other time, loaned to M. Grossini and John Tiscornia the sum of $3,000 in United States gold coin; and that Perazzo on said trial testified that he did, on or about the 9th day of September, 1880, loan to the said Grossini and Tiscornia the sum of $3,000 in such coin; whereas in truth and in fact he did not, on or about the 9th day of September, 1880, or at any other time, make such loan, or any other loan of money, to the said Grossini and Tiscornia. It is plain that the negation of the pleader cannot add to the testimony assigned as false, which is that defendant swore falsely in testifying that he loaned to Grossini and Tiscornia $3,000 in United States gold coin, on or about the 9th day of September, 1880. If such testimony could not have been material to any issue involved in the action entitled Sherwood and Meyers v. Desmond, its falsity could not amount to perjury in law, because to constitute perjury the false testimony must be upon a matter material to the issue involved in the inquiry. Sherwood and Meyers v. Desmond was an action of claim and delivery, brought for the recovery of certain articles of personal property. Upon the trial of that action the plaintiffs deraigned title through a sale under execution based on a judgment rendered in an action entitled Perazzo v. Grossini and Tiscornia, which last-named action was commenced in August, 1880, and was brought upon a promissory note for $4,000, alleged to have been executed to Perazzo by Grossini and Tiscornia. The defendant to the suit of Sherwood and Meyers v. Desmond sought to avoid the judgment in Perazzo v. Grossini and Tiscornia, and the sale made thereunder, by showing that that action was founded upon a simulated note executed for the purpose of withdrawing the property of the makers from the reach of their creditors by means of the judgment and execution sale. From this statement it will be seen that in no aspect of the case of Sherwood and Meyers v. Desmond could it have been material to inquire whether Perazzo did or did not loan to Grossini and Tiscornia the sum of $3,000, at any time during the month of September, 1880, because the making or non-making of such a loan could not have affected to any extent the action of Perazzo v. Grossini and Tiscornia; the complaint in which, as has already been said, was filed in August, 1880, and was based on an alleged cause of action theretofore arising. As, therefore, the false swearing charged in the information was not material to any issue involved in the action on the trial of which it is alleged to have been committed, it could not amount to perjury, and the judgment of conviction cannot be permitted to stand. Nothing is better settled or more rational than that an indictment for one crime cannot be supported by proof of another; the crime charged must be proven. A case somewhat similar to the present one will be found reported in 9 Gray, p. 119, entitled Com. v. Monahan. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

the findings it appears that on the 17th of May, 1880, James H. Harris was the owner and in possession of the band of horses which is the subject of controversy, and that on that day he conveyed the band by a bill of sale, which he signed, executed, and delivered to the defendant E. A. Harris, who afterwards, on November 1, 1880, sold and delivered the horses to his co-defendants, Moulton and Myers. But the court also found as follows: "That for several days prior to the said 17th day of May, and up to his death, on the 18th day of May, 1880, the deceased was completely paralyzed in his body and limbs, so as to be utterly and entirely helpless, and incapable of doing any act or thing, and was so affected in his mind and reasoning faculties as to be incompetent to transact any business whatever. That while deceased was so helpless, and without understanding of the nature and quality of his acts, and but a few hours before his death, the defendant E. A. Harris procured to be made the said bill of sale, purporting to convey all of the said band of horses to E. A. Harris for the consideration of one thousand dollars, and that the deceased was induced to sign, execute, and deliver said bill of sale without understanding or comprehending the nature, scope, or extent thereof, he, the deceased, being at the time without mind, without reason, and without will, either to act or not to act." And upon the findings judgment was entered in favor of the defendants Moulton and Myers, and against the defendant E. A. Harris. The findings are ambiguous. If the court meant to find as a fact that the original vendor, James H. Harris, sold and delivered the property to his vendee, E. A. Harris, by a bill of sale, duly executed and delivered, then the title to the property passed to the vendee, and his subsequent vendees became the owners of the property. But if there was no such transfer, by reason of the mental incapacity of James H. Harris to execute the bill of sale, then the transaction was absolutely void. (section 1550, Civil Code;) the title of the owner did not pass either to the defendant E. A. Harris, or his co-defendants, Moulton and Myers, (Boggs v. Hargrave, 16 Cal. 560; Robinson v. Haas, 40 Cal. 474; Mitchell v. Hockett, 25 Cal. 538;) and the plaintiff was entitled to recover. Construing, however, the findings as a whole (as they are entitled to be construed) to mean that the execution and delivery of the bill of sale was mere form, which only purported to transfer, but did not in fact transfer, the property, because of the mental incapacity of James H. Harris to execute such a document, or to enter into a contract of sale, the decision of the court is erroneous. The judgment must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. So ordered.

BURGLARY—EVIDENCE—OTHER CRIMES.

On an indictment for burglary alleged to have been committed on November 19, 1882, the admission of evidence tending to show larceny committed by defendant on the same premises on December 12, 1882, is prejudicial error.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

This was an indictment charging Miller McNutt with having committed burglary on November 19, 1882, at the room of one Frank Scott, in the city and county of San Francisco. Scott testified that on the night of the above date a suit of clothes and other articles were taken from his room, and his testimony tended to show that defendant was the thief. Scott's wife testified that on December 12, 1882, some of her jewelry was stolen from her room. Defendant was convicted, and from the judgment and an order refusing a new trial he appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

John D. Whaley, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall, for the People.

THORNTON, J. The evidence of Mrs. Louisa Scott as to the jewelry which she says she lost, and was stolen, on the 12th of December, 1882, was clearly inadmissible. It had no proper relevancy to the burglary charged in the indictment, as committed on the 19th of the preceding month. It is urged that no injury was done to the defendant by the ruling of the court; that it is a case of error without injury. We cannot so view it. Evidence tending to prove a larceny by the defendant on the 12th of December, 1882, might well have had an effect on the minds of the jury prejudicial to the defendant. For this error we think the cause should go back for a new trial. We find no other error in the record. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

ELECTIONS—BALLOTS.

The words "Regular Prohibition Ticket," printed at the head and on the face of a ballot, are not such part of the ticket as renders it illegal under Pol. Code Cal. § 1191, providing that the word "For" shall comprise the top line of all tickets used at an election, as the ticket consists merely of the words showing for whom and for what office the ballot is cast. Coffey v. Edmonds, 53 Cal. 521, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sutter county; P. O. HUNDLY, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by A. B. Coffey against G. B. Lyman to settle the result of an election. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

W. H. H. Hart and M. E. Sanborn, for appellant. W. T. Phipps and K. S. Mahon, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an election contest. The parties were opposing candidates for the office of superintendent of schools in the county of Sutter. The sole question here is whether the court ruled correctly in counting for contestant 42 votes cast for him upon the Prohibition ticket, and, as they were alike, one ruling will dispose of them all. If contestant was entitled to them, he was elected; if not, the respondent rightfully holds the certificate. It was admitted that the Prohibition party did not adopt a vignette or caption, or file one in Sutter county; and neither of the tickets had the name or number of the precinct or district in which the same was to have been or might be voted. Thirty-nine ballots each contained the words "Regular Prohibition Ticket" underscored, printed at the head on its face.

The other three had the same heading, with the addition of two stars over the words. It is contended that these ballots should be rejected, because they do not conform to the provisions of the Political Code upon the subject. In 1878 was passed what is called the "Vignette Law," expressly allowing a heading upon the face of ballots. Prior to that time, it is contended, no heading whatever was allowed, for section 1191 of the Political Code prescribes that the word "For" shall constitute the top line; and section 1208, that all ballots which do not conform to that section shall be rejected. Therefore it is plausibly contended no heading is allowed now except in strict conformity with the vignette law. That act prescribes with great particularity under what conditions a heading can be placed upon a ticket. (1) It must be regularly adopted by the managing committee of a regular party; (2) it must show the district, ward, or precinct; (3) it must state that it is the regular ticket of the party, and must be that ticket, and be of certain fixed dimensions, and have certain prescribed spaces; and (4) it should be sealed up in an envelope, and filed with the county clerk at least 10 days before the election. None of these requirements were complied with in this case, and it is contended that, as these provisions make an exception to the general rule, it necessarily follows that a heading not so made is contrary to the law, and fatal to the validity of the ballot. It is illegally marked, calculated to distinguish the persons or class of persons voting it, and particularly is a violation of section 1191 of the Political Code. A good part of the argument of appellant is answered by the recent case of Rutledge v. Crawford, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 779, in which it was held that it must appear that the mark was designed for the purpose of distinguishing the ballots from others, and thus destroy the secrecy of the ballot. It is evident that these ballots were not designed for that purpose. That such a device might have been used with that intention does not justify their rejection. Inasmuch as it is expressly enacted that any ticket not conforming to section 1191 shall be rejected, there would seem to be some force in the objection that they do not conform to that section if it is necessary to hold that the words "Regular Prohibition Ticket" constitute a part of the ticket; for then it is evident the word "For" does not constitute the first line of the ticket, as required by that section, and the heading, not being within any authorized exception, would make the ticket illegal. But, although on the ballot, these words are not a part of the ticket, which consists of the words showing for whom and for what offices the ballot was cast. And the point has been expressly decided in Coffey v. Edmonds, 58 Cal. 521. Some ballots had written at the top, under the vignette, "For President, Hancock and English." This court held they were properly counted. So far as the contention is concerned that these tickets do not conform to section 1191 of the Political Code, this case seems in point. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

FULMORE v. McGEORGE. (No. 13,775.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 6, 1891.)

ARBITRATION AND AWARD.

1. Under an agreement to arbitrate partnership differences between two partners, an award containing an itemized statement of the partnership accounts, and finding a balance due by one partner to the other, secured by a pledge on the debtor's interest in a specified partition of the partnership property, in all of which the partners are equally interested, subject only to the lien of the pledge, is sufficiently definite to be enforced.

2. An award is conclusive as to matters submitted when no transcript of the testimony given before the arbitrators, which was reduced to writing, is filed with the court, and the affidavits of the parties as to what the testimony was are contradictory.

3. An award that a certain agreement constituted a pledge for a debt, and not a bill of sale to one partner by the other of his interest in certain partnership property, is proper, under a submission of "partnership matters and accounts."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge. Affirmed.

Smith Fulmore and Peter McGeorge agreed to submit their partnership differences to arbitration. Fulmore's motion to vacate or modify the award in the superior court was denied.

P. F. Hart and E. W. Wilson, for appellant. J. D. H. Chamberlin, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This is a matter of arbitration between the parties, and the appeal is from an order of the superior court denying appellant's motions to vacate or to modify the award. The written agreement of the parties to submit to arbitration, which had been entered as an order of the court, is as follows: "Whereas, differences are now existing between Smith Fulmore, of the county of Humboldt, and Peter McGeorge, of the same place, in relation to divers partnership matters and accounts: Now, therefore, we, the undersigned, Smith Fulmore and Peter McGeorge, do hereby agree that James Smith, of Ferndale, J. D. Ferrill, of Ferndale, and C. M. Wheeler, of Eureka, or any two of them, shall arbitrate, award, judge, and determine of and concerning all said differences now existing between us in relation to our said partnership matters and accounts. And we do hereby mutually covenant and agree to and with each other that the award to be made by the said arbitrators, or any two of them, shall in all things by us, and each of us, be well and faithfully kept and observed: provided, however, that the said award be made in writing under the hands of the said arbitrators, or any two of them, and ready to be delivered to the said parties in differences, or such of them as shall desire the same, on the 12th day of June, 1888. It is hereby further stipulated and agreed, by and between the parties hereto, that this submission to arbitration shall be entered as an order of the superior court of the county of Humboldt, state of California. In witness whereof the above-named parties have hereunto set their hands and seals this 21st day of May, 1888. SMITH FULMORE. [L. s.] PETER McGEORGE. [L. s.] The award contains an itemized statement of the partnership accounts, showing a balance in favor of Fulmore and against McGeorge of $302.70, to secure the payment of which it is found that the former has a lien by pledge upon the latter's interest in a specified portion of the partnership property. The award also contains a complete schedule of the existing partnership property, in which it is awarded that the parties are equally interested, subject to said lien upon McGeorge's interest in a specified portion thereof.

1. It is contended for appellant that the award is too indefinite to be enforced. Upon its face the award seems to be perfectly definite, to settle the partnership accounts, and to determine the respective rights of the parties as to all existing partnership property. Why it cannot be performed, if the parties are disposed to abide by it, is not perceived. Under this head it is said that it does not provide that either party shall have or recover any sum or any thing from the other party; nor that any disposition, sale, or division of the existing partnership property shall be made. These, however, are not valid objections on the ground of indefiniteness of the award. But it does award that McGeorge owes, and consequently that he should pay, to Fulmore, the definite sum of $302.70. The agreement submitted to arbitration only all differences existing between the parties "in relation to partnership matters and accounts." It does not appear that either party desired to divide or to dispose of the property, nor that there was any difference between them in that respect; much less that any such difference was submitted to the arbitrators. The award appears to determine all matters submitted. It does not appear that further inquiry is necessary to ascertain a sum of money to be paid, or any act to be done by either party in relation to the matters submitted. Porter v. Scott, 7 Cal. 313.

2. It is contended that the arbitrators committed gross error in charging appellant with three items, amounting to $42.86. But it does not appear upon what evidence these items were charged by the arbitrators. The contradictory affidavits of the parties as to what that evidence was cannot be considered here. It is stated in the affidavit of respondent, and not denied by appellant, that the testimony of the parties and their witnesses was reduced to writing by the arbitrators, but no part of it is contained in the transcript brought here; nor does it appear that it was introduced on the hearing of the motion in the court below. It is admitted that the items in question were submitted to the arbitrators. Under these circumstances, the award, as to them, is conclusive.

3. One of the differences settled by the award was whether certain instruments in writing constituted an absolute bill of sale of respondent's interest in a portion of the partnership property to appellant, and an agreement on the part of appellant to reconvey the same, or a mere pledge to secure the payment of a certain sum of money which appellant advanced to the partnership concern for the respondent. The award as to this was that the instruments constituted a mere pledge, and that the property remained partnership property subject to the lien of the pledge. The only objection made to this action of the arbitrators is that it was ultra vires, because the matter is not included in the submission of "partnership matters and accounts." The property was claimed by appellant to be his individual property, while the respondent contended that it was partnership property, his interest in which was subject to the lien of the pledge. To determine a difference between partners as to what is partnership property as distinguished from the individual property of one of the partners is clearly a partnership matter, and falls within the written submission in this case. Furthermore, it was necessary to determine this difference in order to adjust the partnership accounts. I think the order should be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

HEWITT v. DEAN et al. (No. 14,011.)

RESTITUTION ON APPEAL.

Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 957, providing that on reversal or modification of a judgment or order the appellate court may make complete restitution of all property and rights lost by the erroneous judgment, an order of the appellate court, reducing the amount of a judgment, is not such a modification as will entitle the judgment debtor to restitution, where the property taken in execution is not more than enough to satisfy the judgment as modified.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. TOWNER, Judge. Motion denied.

Motion by Dean and others to set aside a sale of property to Hewitt, the respondent, made under a judgment in his favor. For former reports, see 26 Pac. Rep. 1101; 27 Pac. Rep. 423.

Victor Montgomery, for appellants.
Ray Billingsley, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Motion on behalf of the appellants to set aside a sale of property made under the judgment at the instance of the respondent. The court below rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants for the sum of $3,149.60, the amount of the promissory note sued on, and $300 attorneys' fees, and directed that the lands mortgaged to secure the same be sold by the sheriff. From this judgment the defendants appealed to this court, but did not file an undertaking staying proceedings upon the judgment appealed from. After the appeal was taken, the plaintiff caused an order of sale to be issued upon the judgment, and at a sale thereunder made August 8, 1890, purchased the mortgaged premises for the sum of $3,000, which was credited upon the amount of the judgment. Upon the determination of the appeal in this court the court below was directed "to modify the judgment by reducing the amount allowed for attorneys' fees to $125 as of the date the judgment appealed from was entered," and, as so modified, the judgment was to stand affirmed. Section 957, Code Civil Proc. provides: "When the judgment or order is reversed or modified, the appellate court may make complete restitution of all property and rights lost by the erroneous judgment or order," etc. This provision has been a part of the rule of procedure in this state since June, 1853. St. 1853, p. 289; Prac. Act, § 345. In Farmer v. Rogers, 10 Cal. 335, the supreme court, construing this provision, say: "It applies only to those cases where the judgment operates upon specific property in such a manner that its title is not changed, as by directing the possession of real estate, or the delivery of documents, or of particular personal property in the hands of the defendant, and the like." In that case, however, the sale under the judgment appears to have been made to parties other than the plaintiffs in the action, and in that respect differs from the case under consideration, but the language of the court is general in its statement of the application of the provision. The provision of the Code under which the relief is sought authorizes this court to make restitution "of all property and rights lost by the erroneous judgment," in case the judgment appealed from is reversed or modified. The judgment in the present case was not reversed, nor was it modified to such an extent that the defendants can be said to have "lost" any property or rights thereby. The judgment as originally entered was for the sum of $3,492.50, besides costs of suit, and it was modified by the judgment of this court by merely striking therefrom the sum of $175, and in other respects was affirmed, whereas the sum for which the property was sold was only $3,000.

The rule under which property bid in by the plaintiff at an execution sale under his judgment is restored to the defendant if the judgment be afterwards reversed has no application. In such a case the reversal of the judgment is a judicial determination that the plaintiff was not entitled to the judgment, and it would be contrary to reason to hold that the defendant should not be restored to the estate which had been taken from him by the plaintiff under a process of law for the purpose of satisfying a demand which it was afterwards judicially determined he did not owe. If the judgment is reversed, there would be no foundation for the title under which the plaintiff claims to hold the property of the defendant, and he must surrender it. For such purpose, however, he must make application to the court out of which the process issued. That court is the custodian of the records in the suit, and is the proper tribunal to supervise the action of its officers in enforcing its judgments, or to cause restitution to be made of property improperly applied in satisfaction of its judgments. Unless, however, the judgment is reversed, the principle does not apply, and upon a modification of the judgment to such an extent merely that the defendant is thereby relieved from only a part of the judgment, it cannot be said that he has "lost" any property or rights "by the erroneous judgment," unless more of his property has been taken than the amount for which the judgment has been affirmed. In the present case, inasmuch as it appears from the affidavit on behalf of the defendants that property amounting to only $3,000 has been taken in part satisfaction of a judgment amounting to a much greater sum, it would be not in accordance with either equity or the provisions of the Code to order the property to be restored to them. The motion is denied.

VISHER v. SMITH. (No. 14,527.)

MANDAMUS TO JUDGE—RES JUDICATA.

Where application is made for a mandamus to compel a judge to settle a bill of exceptions, but the proceeding is dismissed for want of prosecution, a mandate will not issue against his successor to compel such settlement, since the original ruling of the judge is then a final determination.

In bank.

Application for a writ of mandamus by S. Visher against Ansel Smith. Denied.
L. W. Elliott, for petitioner. Baldwin & Campbell, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Petitioner asks for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as judge of the superior court of San Joaquin county, to settle a bill of exceptions in the case of Johnson v. Visher. That action was tried in said superior court before the Honorable J. G. SWINNERTON, judge of said court, and judgment was rendered therein in favor of the plaintiff, March 20, 1889. The petitioner, who was the defendant in said action, having within due time thereafter prepared a draft of a bill of exceptions, and no amendments having been proposed thereto, appeared before said judge for the purpose of settling the same on the 22d of June, when the attorney for the plaintiff moved to strike out the bill, for the reason that it was a "skeleton bill," and not a bill of exceptions. This motion was denied, but the defendant was allowed three days "in which to prepare and serve a bill of exceptions." No further extension of time was granted, either by order or stipulation, nor did the defendant prepare or serve any bill of exceptions in accordance with this order until December 26, 1889. In the mean time, however, the defendant's attorney prepared "amendments" to the original bill, and presented them with said original bill to the judge for settlement, but the judge directed that the bill and amendments be engrossed and served upon the plaintiff. The bill, as thus engrossed, was not, however, served upon the plaintiff until December 26th. When this bill was presented to the judge for settlement, the plaintiff's attorney objected to any settlement of the same on the ground that it had not been prepared or served within the time allowed by law or by the court, and upon this objection the judge refused to settle the same. Thereafter, to-wit, July 12, 1890, the petitioner obtained an alternative writ of mandate from this court, directed to said judge, commanding him to settle said bill, or show cause before this court why he should not do so. Upon the return-day of this writ the judge appeared and made answer thereto, and thereafter said petition was dismissed for want of prosecution. Said judge, having on the 5th day of January, 1891, ceased to hold his said office, the petitioner thereafter presented said bill of exceptions to the respondent herein, as the successor in office of said Swinnerton, with the request that he settle the same. The respondent thereupon appointed June 2, 1891, as the day for the settlement thereof, at which time counsel for plaintiff and Judge SWINNERTON were present; whereupon, upon ascertaining from an examination of the petitioner's counsel and Judge SWINNERTON the foregoing facts connected with the preparation of said bill, the respondent refused to settle the same, "upon the ground that the petitioner did not comply with the order of the court of June 22, 1889, in preparing and serving said bill of exceptions; and upon the further ground that the trial judge, with all of said facts before him, had refused to settle the same bill of exceptions for the same reason, to-wit, that the same had not been presented or served within the proper time." Upon this refusal of the respondent the petitioner made this application.

We must assume, upon the facts presented by the petition and answer herein, that the draft of the bill which was originally presented to Judge SWINNERTON for settlement was a "skeleton bill," and that his action in refusing to recognize it as entitled to settlement, and in directing a proper draft of a bill to be prepared and served within three days, was correct. People v. Sprague, 53 Cal. 422; Frazer v. Superior Court, 62 Cal. 49; Hearst v. Dennison, 72 Cal. 227, 13 Pac. Rep. 628. The permission of the judge to supply this defect, and to enable the petitioner to avoid the consequences of having no bill of exceptions in the case by preparing and serving another, was a favor which was to be accepted by the petitioner according to its terms. His neglect to do so placed him in the same position as if he had originally failed to prepare and serve a draft of his bill within the time allowed by law. After that time, and such additional time as the court might grant, had expired without his preparing and serving any draft, the judge had no authority to settle any bill, and the action of Judge SWINNERTON in refusing to settle the bill was correct. Bunell v. Stockton, 83 Cal. 319, 23 Pac. Rep. 301; Stonesifer v. Armstrong, 86 Cal. 594, 25 Pac. Rep. 50. If there were any circumstances connected with such neglect which would have afforded a legal excuse therefor, they should have been presented to Judge SWINNERTON for determination. If thereupon the judge had made an erroneous ruling, it could have been corrected under a mandamus from this court. The petitioner could not permit the ruling of Judge SWINNERTON to remain unquestioned, and afterwards present the same bill to his successor in office, and ask a different ruling upon the same state of facts. The refusal of Judge SWINNERTON was an adjudication that the bill ought not to be settled. The petitioner did make application to this court for a mandate compelling Judge SWINNERTON to settle said bill, and in that proceeding he had the opportunity to set aside his ruling, if the facts would have authorized it; but, instead of prosecuting that proceeding to such determination, it was dismissed for want of prosecution. This left the original ruling of the judge as a final determination that he was justified in refusing to settle the bill, and, if so, the respondent herein cannot be compelled to settle it. The application for the writ is denied, and the alternative writ heretofore issued is discharged.

VITORENO v. COREA. (No. 14,161.)

NONSUIT—STATEMENT BY ATTORNEY.

In replevin, the attorney for plaintiff stated that he would show that a brother of defendant represented to plaintiff that one of his creditors was about to attach plaintiff's property, and that he had better transfer it to defendant; that plaintiff was the owner of property much in excess of the debt; that the creditor had no intention of attaching; that from these representations plaintiff made a bill of sale, and delivered the property to defendant; that the consideration for the sale was immediately returned to defendant, according to agreement. A motion to nonsuit plaintiff on the ground that he had transferred the property in order to defraud his creditor was overruled. Held that, since plaintiff had other property to satisfy the debt, defendant alone was guilty of fraud, and that the motion was properly refused.

Department 2. Appeal from the superior court, Contra Costa county; JOSEPH P. JONES, Judge. Affirmed.

Action of replevin by one Vitoreno against one Corea. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Thomas Scott and J. E. McElrath, for appellant. Chase, Chase & Meller, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This is an action to recover the possession of personal property. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant moved for a new trial upon a statement. The motion was denied, and defendant appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

The statements show that after the jury had been sworn the plaintiff's attorney stated the issue and his case as follows: "Mr. Chase: I will first read to you the pleadings, which show the issues of this case, and then will state briefly the facts we expect to prove under those issues. [Reads the complaint and answer.] Now, these parties, the plaintiff and defendant, live over in the south-east part of the county beyond Clayton, and are farmers. The plaintiff is in very good circumstances, and owns the property which is described in the complaint and answer. The defendant's relative came to the plaintiff, and without any cause whatever made up a story,—a lie in fact,—and told the plaintiff that one Thomas Williams was about to attach him, the plaintiff. The plaintiff was owing him, and that he had better put his property over in his brother's hands. He had real estate there. He had hay. He had property a good many times the value of the property which the plaintiff was owing this Williams; but the defendant's brother worked upon the fears of the plaintiff in that way, telling him that Williams was about to attach him, and that he should put his property over in the defendant's hands, and keep it a while, and turn it back again. The facts are, right there, that Williams had no idea of attaching him. He did not intend to. He knew the plaintiff was perfectly good. He had plenty of property to pay his debts; and this story was manufactured out of whole cloth. But, after conversing a while, the plaintiff and defendant went to Antioch, and a pretended bill of sale of the property was made out, and the property was temporarily turned over to the hands of the defendant. At Antioch the pretended purchase money for the property was paid out to the plaintiff,—some two hundred odd dollars, I think $150 or $200,—and a bill of sale was signed; and then, when they got out, according to a previous agreement, the money was returned by the plaintiff to the defendant. A part of it was borrowed there in Antioch, and it was returned to the defendant and the parties it was borrowed from. Time passed along, and the defendant stated to confidential friends who lived in the community that this was only a sham sale, and the property did not belong to him, the defendant, at all; it belonged to the plaintiff and that it would soon be returned to him. He told several that fact. That subsequently the defendant got the impression that he could hold this property, and decided that he would keep it, and some discussion arose out of it,—some lawsuits arose out of it,—until the feeling between them became such that the defendant determined that he would hold the property, and the result was the bringing of this action for the recovery of the property or its value. These are substantially the facts we expect to prove." Mr. McElrath, attorney for defendant, said: "Upon the opening statement of Mr. Chase we move that he be nonsuited. If Mr. Chase's statement is correct, it is that the defendant's brother went to the plaintiff and informed the plaintiff that a man by the name of Williams, and who was a creditor of the plaintiff, was going to attach him, and the plaintiff, for the purpose of hindering, defrauding, and swindling this creditor, transferred his property, to the defendant. Of course, I don't admit such are the facts. I say upon the plaintiff's own statement, if those are the facts, the doors of this court-house are closed against him, and he is not entitled to come in here. He is in that condition of fraud that he does not come into court with clean hands. I refer your honor to the case in 25 Cal. p. 654,—Gregory v. Hawthorth. We move for a nonsuit, and ask a judgment for the value of the property, or for its return and for costs, after argument." The court, after hearing argument, overruled the motion, and defendant excepted.

According to this statement of plaintiff's attorney to the jury, the defendant obtained possession of the property sued for without giving any consideration therefor, by fraudulent misrepresentation. The misrepresentation consisted in defendant's representing to plaintiff that a creditor of his was intending to attach his property, when in fact the creditor named had no such intention, and plaintiff had plenty of other property to pay his debts. If the property had been placed by the plaintiff in the hands of the defendant for illegal purposes, and the defendant refused to return it, the plaintiff would have to abide the loss, for in pari delicto, melior est conditio possidentis. But courts, both of law and equity, have held that two persons may concur in an illegal act without being deemed to be in pari delicto. In this case the defendant alone was guilty of fraud. He cannot avail himself of his own fraud as a defense, "for no man shall set up his own iniquity as a defense, any more than as a cause of action." Per Lord MANSFIELD in Montefiori v. Montefiori, 1 W. Bl. 364. It does not appear that plaintiff consented to the transfer of the property with the intent to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor. If not, he was simply an innocent victim of the defendant's wiles. To permit the defendant to retain what he had thus fraudulently obtained the possession of, would be to enable him to take advantage of his own wrong, contrary to the maxim, nul-lus commodum capere potest de imperia sua propria. The maxim, in pari delicto, melior est conditio possidentis, is one of public policy, and public policy could not best be subserved by applying it to this case. The motion for a nonsuit was properly overruled. The evidence of the plaintiff tended to prove a stronger case than the statement of his attorney, which we have above considered. We cannot hold that his evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury, although it conflicts in many respects with the evidence of the defendant. Judgment and order affirmed.

I concur: MCFARLAND, J.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment. The evidence upon the trial was such as to bring the case fairly within the rule laid down in Bump, Fraud. Conv. pp. 441, 442.

ROGERS v. JONES. (No. 13,672.) 1

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1891.)

MORTGAGES—ABSOLUTE DEED—RATE OF INTEREST.

1. Where a deed is absolute on its face, but the parties at the time of its execution sign a memorandum reciting that "Jones [the grantor] is to have the land again by deed whenever he pays all the amount borrowed, and other debts due me," such memorandum proves the deed to be in fact a mortgage.

2. A stipulation that "on each item I am to have one per cent. interest," means 1 per cent. per annum, under Civil Code Cal. § 1916, providing that where a contract prescribes a rate of interest, "without specifying the period of time by which such rate is to be calculated, it is to be deemed an annual rate."

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; RODNEY J. HUDSON, Judge. Modified and affirmed.

Action by J. T. Rogers against David Jones to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Bond & Fishback, for appellant. J. T. Rogers, for respondent.

YANCLIEF, C. Action to foreclose an alleged mortgage. The instrument alleged to be a mortgage is, in form, an absolute conveyance of 40 acres of land, dated February 11, 1885; but it is averred in the complaint that at the time it was executed it was understood and agreed by the parties that it was to have the effect of a mortgage merely, to secure the payment of future advances of money by plaintiff, to and for the use of the defendant, not to exceed $750. It is further averred that, in accordance with such agreement, the plaintiff paid for and at the request of the defendant, to different persons, sums of money amounting in the aggregate to $267.72, which the defendant promised to repay to plaintiff, with interest at 1 per cent. per month. The prayer is that the mortgaged premises be sold, etc. The answer denies that it was agreed or understood that the instrument should be considered a mortgage, or that it was executed as security for any debt; denies three items of the alleged indebtedness, amounting to about $100; and denies that defendant promised to pay interest at any rate. The court found for the plaintiff upon all the issues, and rendered judgment accordingly. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and also from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. The court did not err in admitting in evidence the written memorandum signed by the parties contemporaneously with the execution of the deed, of which the following is a copy: "Memorandum, made February 11, 1885. David Jones deeds to me 40 acres. Still due the state, $52. J. T. Campbell is to deed me 120 acres, and I am to pay $130 (or thereabouts) to Campbell. Then I am to borrow on said 160 acres about $750, and I am to use said money for Jones: (1) Pay to J. J. Scrivner, attorney, 320 California St., S. F., $500; (2) J. T. Campbell, attorney, Santa Rosa, Cal., $130; (3) pay taxes of E. Davis and D. Jones,—$32.77; (4) pay balance to state on said 40 acres,—$52; (5) pay taxes on land hereafter. On each item I am to have one per cent. interest. Jones, in said matter, is to have the land again by deed whenever he pays all the amount borrowed, and any other debts due to me. If the money can be borrowed, the above is to be done. J. T. ROGERS. DAVID JONES.

2. This memorandum, under the circumstances appearing, sufficiently tended to prove that the deed was intended as mere security for debts, and was, therefore, a mortgage, to justify the finding of the court to that effect.

3. The evidence was also amply sufficient to justify the finding of the indebtedness of defendant to plaintiff in the principal sum of $267.72 for money paid to divers persons at the request of defendant, but was not sufficient to justify the finding of interest thereon at the rate of 1 per cent. per month, amounting to $122.46, as estimated by the court. The only competent evidence of the contract rate of interest is that afforded by the written memorandum, which states only that "on each item I am to have one per cent. interest." This, interpreted by the rule of the Civil Code, § 1916, means only 1 per cent. per annum; therefore, only 1 per cent. per annum should have been allowed. The amount of interest allowed by the court in excess of what should have been allowed is $112.

25. For this error I think the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, unless the respondent shall, within 20 days from date of the filing of this opinion, remit from the judgment and decree $112.25, in which case the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment will be reversed, and a new trial granted, unless the respondent shall, within 20 days from date of the filing of this opinion, remit from the judgment and decree $112.25, in which case the judgment and order shall stand affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK v. VILLEGIA. (No. 13,608.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1891.)

ADJOINING LAND-OWNERS—LATERAL SUPPORT.

Under Civil Code Cal. § 832, giving the owner of land the right to excavate for building purposes, taking due precautions to sustain the adjacent land, and giving notice to the owner of his intentions, the excavator cannot recover for money expended in sustaining the adjacent land. The notice required does not impose a duty upon the adjacent property owner, for the neglect of which a liability could be created in favor of the excavator.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge. Affirmed.

Action for money expended for the benefit of defendant by First National Bank of San Francisco against A. Villegia. Judgment for defendant on demurrer to an amended complaint.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the amended complaint. The parties own adjoining lots of land in the city of San Francisco. The plaintiff was about to excavate for the purpose of building. Upon defendant's lot is a brick building. Plaintiff, in accordance with the requirements of section 832 of the Civil Code, notified defendant of his intention to excavate for the purpose of laying the foundation of his building. Defendant neglected to take any action towards the protection of his property from the danger arising from such excavation, and plaintiff, in order to prevent said building from falling in and upon his lot, was compelled to expend $1,400 in the support of the adjacent walls of defendant's lot, which would not have been necessary had it not been for defendant's building. The action is brought to recover the amount of money thus expended.

Section 832 of the Civil Code is as follows: "Each coterminous owner is entitled to the lateral and subjacent support which his land receives from the adjacent land, subject to the right of the owner of the adjacent land to make proper and usual excavations on the same for the purposes of construction, on using ordinary care and skill, and taking reasonable precautions to sustain the land of the other, and giving previous reasonable notice to the other of his intention to make such excavations." If plaintiff's acts have created a liability against defendant to the extent of $1,400, it must be upon an obligation arising upon contract, or from some character of tort. There is nothing in the complaint indicating anything in the nature of a contract between these parties, and no tort is shown unless defendant has violated some provision of the section just quoted; but the service of the notice, as required by that section, did not cast any duty upon the defendant, for neglect in the performance of which a liability could be created in favor of the plaintiff. The purpose of the notice required was to give the adjacent land-owner an opportunity to protect his property from possible damage if he so desired. If he did not so desire, or was willing to assume the risk brought about by the threatened excavation, then, if dire results to his property should follow, the liability for such results would lie at his own door. The purpose of the section, in its broadest scope, was to enable the excavator to relieve himself from liability, not to create a liability in favor of himself upon the adjacent owner. It clearly appears that plaintiff expended this money for his own benefit and his own advantage, and not for the benefit and use of the defendant. A party cannot of his own volition create an obligation in his own favor by doing some act for his own interests, and the necessity for which was caused by himself. This is in no sense an action brought for the recovery of money advanced for and to the use of defendant. No legal duty rested upon the defendant to perform the work for which this money was expended, and plaintiff cannot create for himself the position of creditor against the will of the alleged debtor. It is unnecessary to pass upon other matters discussed in appellant's brief. Let the judgment be affirmed.

SUTRO et al. v. RHODES. (No. 13,916.)

COUNTY BONDS—OVERISSUE—SALE BY HOLDER—WARRANTY.

1. Where, under a statute, a county was authorized to issue bonds, "not to exceed in all one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars," and a record of the number, date, and amount of each bond was to be kept, and the county issues bonds in excess of the amount named in the statute, the "overissue" bonds are invalid. Sutro v. Pettit, 74 Cal. 332, 16 Pac. Rep. 7, followed.

2. Defendant sold plaintiffs nine of such "overissue" bonds in good faith, without any representations and without warranty. Held, that there was no implied warranty, under Civil Code, § 1764, providing that a mere contract of sale "does not imply a warranty," and section 1774, which provides that one who sells an instrument purporting to bind any one to the performance of an act thereby warrants good faith on his part.

GAROUTTE, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; JOSEPH H. BRDD, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by Charles Sutro and others against R. M. Rhodes to recover the purchase money paid for nine bonds. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal.

Baldwin & Campbell, for appellants. Hall & De Vries and August Muentzer, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. An act of the legislature was passed March 25, 1868, entitled "An act in relation to the funded indebtedness of Calaveras county, and to provide for the funding of unpaid claims against said county." By this act fund commissioners were created, and the board of supervisors were authorized to have prepared, executed, and issued bonds of the county in denominations of $100 and $500, but "not to exceed in all one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars." The bonds were to be signed and sealed in a certain prescribed manner, were to mature and bear interest (with interest coupons attached) as specially provided in the act; and a record of the number, date, and amount of each bond issued was to be entered upon the journal of the board. They were negotiable in form, being payable to a party named or holder. Under this act bonds were executed and issued in form as provided therein, to the amount of the said $115,000; and afterwards additional bonds, similar in form to the first ones, and executed in the same manner, were issued to the amount of about $40,000 in excess of said $115,000. Nine of these latter "overissued" bonds, each of the par value of $500, were sold by defendant to plaintiffs on July 18, 1888, for $4,675; and plaintiffs bring this action to recover said last-mentioned sum of money. The court below rendered judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

It is averred in the complaint that at the time of the sale defendant "falsely and fraudulently represented and warranted to plaintiffs that said pretended bonds were good, valid, and legal," and that such representation was made "for the express purpose of cheating and defrauding them;" and that the bonds were not good, valid, and legal bonds of Calaveras county, but were entirely worthless; and that these facts were known to defendant, and unknown to plaintiffs. It is further averred that "as soon as plaintiffs ascertained" the worthless character of said bonds they tendered them to defendant, and demanded the repayment of said money; but that defendant refused to accept them or repay the money. The answer admits the sale of the bonds, but denies nearly all the other material averments of the complaint. The court found that defendant did not make any false or fraudulent representations "as to the goodness, validity, or legality" of the bonds, and did not warrant the same, nor did he make any representations as to their value; but that he "made the sale of said bonds in good faith, without any representations whatsoever, and without warranty," and that "at no time did the plaintiffs act or rely upon any representations made to them by the defendant in the sale of said bonds by defendant to the plaintiffs." The court also found, in finding 2, "that the said bonds were not worthless, but are good, valid, and legal bonds of Calaveras county, in this state." The said last-named finding (No. 2) is clearly erroneous. The said bonds were issued, and purport upon their face to have been issued, under said act of March 25, 1868; and by said act the power to issue bonds is expressly limited to the amount of $115,000. It is not necessary to discuss the question at length, or to cite authorities to the point that the bonds involved in the case at bar, being an over-issue, are invalid; because the point was definitely settled in the recent case of Sutro v. Pettit, 74 Cal. 332, 16 Pac. Rep. 7, and the question presented there cannot be distinguished from the one presented here. The said bonds sold by defendant to plaintiffs were therefore invalid, as legal obligations of the county of Calaveras.

But we are satisfied that the judgment should be affirmed upon the other findings, notwithstanding the said erroneous finding of the validity of said bonds. We must take the other findings of the court to be supported by the evidence. The only witnesses examined were the defendant and the plaintiff Gustav Sutro, with whom the transaction occurred. There was a difference between them as to one or two material matters; but as to those matters it was for the trial court to determine which statement should be taken as correct. There was therefore no express warranty of the legal validity of the bonds. Neither was there any implied warranty. Section 1764 of the Civil Code provides that, "except as prescribed by this article, a mere contract of sale or agreement to sell does not imply a warranty;" and none of the other sections of the article applies to the case at bar except section 1774. And that section not only shuts out any claim of warranty in the present case, but it seems to exclude the authorities marshaled by appellant to the point that upon some principle of law, as, for instance, failure of consideration, he ought to recover in this action. The section is as follows: "One who sells or agrees to sell an instrument purporting to bind any one to the performance of an act thereby warrants that he has no knowledge of any facts which tend to prove it worthless, such as the insolvency of any of the parties thereto, where that is material, the extinction of its obligations, or its invalidity for any cause." The transaction between respondent and appellant was not the assignment of a debt, as the transfer of a non-negotiable obligation is sometimes construed to be; it was the sale of an instrument, within the meaning of the Code, and the section just quoted is the law upon the subject. It seems to be an express declaration and warning to purchasers of such instruments that the rule of caveat emptor applies, and that they must examine for themselves, and exercise their own judgment, or take a guaranty.

Outside of our Code, and among the general authorities, there is, no doubt, some conflict in the decisions on the question here involved; but the weight of them, we think, supports the conclusion above stated. The supreme court of the United States so held in Otis v. Cullum, 92 U. S. 447, and it was a case precisely like the one at bar. In that case the city of Topeka issued bonds under certain acts of the legislature, and sold them to a bank, which put them upon the market and disposed of them. Afterwards the courts held that the legislature had no power to pass the acts, and that the bonds were void; and thereupon the purchasers sued the bank to recover the money paid for them upon the ground of failure of consideration. But it was held that, "as the bank gave no warranty, it cannot be charged with a liability it did not assume." The court in its opinion says: "The plaintiffs in error got exactly what they intended to buy, and did buy. They took no guaranty. They are seeking to recover, as it were, upon one while none exists."

* * * Such securities through the channels of commerce which they are made to seek, and where they find their market. They pass from hand to hand like banknotes. The seller is liable ex delicto for bad faith; and ex contractu there is an implied warranty on his part that they belong to him, and that they are not forgeries. Where there is no express stipulation, there is no liability beyond this. If the buyer desires special protection, he must take a guaranty. He can dictate his own terms, and refuse to buy unless it be given. * * * It would be unreasonably harsh to hold all those through whose hands such instruments may have passed liable according to the principles which the plaintiffs in error insist shall be applied in this case." This is the highest authority upon the question, and we do not deem it necessary to review the many other cases cited by counsel for both parties.

In the case at bar, as in Otis v. Culum, the appellants "got exactly what they intended to buy, and did buy," that is, certain written instruments in form negotiable, made and signed by the persons, and in the manner, and under the law, as stated on their face. They purported to have been issued under said act of March 25, 1868. The statute provides for a public record of bonds issued under it, so that it could easily have been ascertained whether the said bonds sold were overissued; and, moreover, plaintiffs were bound to know the powers of the municipal corporation and its officers by whom the bonds were issued. Sutro v. Pettit, supra; Wallace v. Mayor, 29 Cal. 181; Anthony v. Jasper Co., 101 U. S. 697. It appears, also, that plaintiffs were bankers and dealers in "state, county, and municipal bonds of the state of California," and had the numbers of these bonds in their office to which they referred. And it is found that they did not rely upon any representations made by respondent. If, therefore, appellants made any mistake as to the validity of the bonds, it was a mistake of law. Indeed, the whole question involved—that is, whether the said bonds created a legal liability against the county of Calaveras—was a question of law. Upon that question lawyers and judges have differed; and plaintiffs, no doubt, had erroneous views upon the subject. Judgment and order affirmed.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; HARRISON, J.; DE HAVEN, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur. There is a conflict of authority upon the principal question involved in this case, but I think the best-considered decisions support the conclusions reached by Justice MCFARLAND. If a vendor contracts to deliver goods of a certain description, he must deliver sound articles of that description; and if he fails to do so there is a failure of consideration for the price paid. But if a vendor submits specific articles to the inspection and examination of the purchaser; if he conceals no fact within his knowledge and makes no false representation; if each party has equal knowledge, or means of knowledge, respecting every fact affecting the soundness and value of the article, —then, if a price is agreed upon, and a sale made, the purchaser cannot, upon the subsequent discovery that the articles sold were in fact worthless, recover the price paid upon the ground of failure of consideration. For, having got precisely what he bargained for, he cannot say that there has been any failure of consideration. If he can recover at all it must be upon the ground of a breach of some implied warranty by the vendor. Now, in this case, there was no executory contract for the sale of Calaveras county bonds issued under the act of 1868, which would have undoubtedly required the delivery of bonds regularly and lawfully issued under the act. On the contrary, certain specific bonds, purporting on their face to have been issued under the act, were offered for sale. The defendant concealed no fact within his knowledge touching their validity, nor did he misrepresent any fact. Everything he knew the plaintiff knew, and, if the plaintiff did not know that they were part of an overissue of bonds, it was only because he chose voluntarily to forego the means of knowledge open and easily accessible to him. He therefore got precisely what he bargained for, and he cannot recover the price paid upon the ground of failure of consideration; and, since there was no express warranty, he must rely upon such warranties as the law implies from the nature of the transaction. On this point it seems to me that section 1774 of the Civil Code, especially in view of the clause eliminated ex industria, by the amendments of 1874, is conclusive against the right to recover.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the views expressed by Mr. Justice MCFARLAND. Young v. Cole, 3 Bing. N. C. 724, is a case directly in point, and would support the contention of the appellants here unless a different rule has been established in this state. Section 1774, Civil Code, as originally enacted, provided as follows: "One who sells or agrees to sell an instrument purporting to bind any one to the performance of an act thereby warrants the instrument to be what it purports to be, and to be binding according to its purport upon all the parties thereto; and also warrants that he has no knowledge of any facts which tend to prove it worthless, such as the insolvency of any of the parties thereto, where that is material, the extinction of its obligations, or its invalidity for any cause." The Code commissioners, in their notes under this section, cite the case of Young v. Cole, supra. But in 1874 that section was modified by striking therefrom the following clause: "Thereby warrants the instrument to be what it purports to be, and to be binding according to its purport upon all the parties thereto." I cannot understand what purpose would be subserved by this amendment, unless the legislature intended to change the rule, and to declare that one who sells an instrument like the one in controversy should not thereby be held to have warranted the instrument to be what it purports to be, or binding according to its purport upon the parties thereto. Nearly all of the cases cited are cases of fraudulent misrepresentation, deceit, or forgery of non-negotiable instruments. As to the latter instruments, the courts seem to treat the assignment of them as an assignment of the indebtedness, and not the sale of an instrument like those referred to in section 1774.

GAROUTTE, J., (dissenting.) I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice MCFARLAND as to the invalidity of the bonds, but dissent wherein he concludes that plaintiff purchased at his peril, and is prevented, upon the principle of caveat emptor, from recovering the money paid defendant. In this case there is no question of fraud practiced by the seller, and no question of negligence involved upon the part of the buyer. Both parties thought these instruments were valid bonds of Calaveras county. It was an honest mistake of fact and caveat emptor never applies to a mistake of fact. If plaintiff's mistake had been a mistake of law, that is, if Surtro had known at the time of the purchase that these bonds were an overissue, such knowledge would have defeated his right of recovery, but there can be no mistake of law unless the facts are known. The question involved here is not a question of warranty, but a total failure of consideration, the existence of which fact is fatal to all contracts, and this principle has been fully and repeatedly recognized by this court. Keller v. Hicks, 22 Cal. 457; Fuel Co. v. Tuck, 53 Cal. 305; Redington v. Woods, 45 Cal. 429. As a case involving the legal principles involved here, we will suppose that one blind man should sell to another blind man a lump of clay, both believing at the time that it was gold. There was no express warranty, and, under the sections of the Code cited, there is no implied warranty, upon which to base a recovery of the price paid, yet it must be conceded that the right of recovery exists. If a plaintiff's right of recovery is to be limited only to those cases where there is a violation of an express or implied warranty, then there can be no recovery in this state where one innocent party sells another innocent party a forged or counterfeit bond or note; for, under the provisions of the Civil Code, there is no implied warranty that the instrument is genuine; yet no court, to my knowledge, either in this country or England, ever denied the right of recovery in such a case. In Redington v. Woods, supra, the principle was recognized and recovery had, not by reason of any warranty, but by reason of the fact that the money was paid without consideration, under an innocent mistake; and the court said: "The authorities in support of this view of the question are numerous and uniform, and we have been referred to none to the contrary." Story, Sales, § 377, says: "There is a class of cases which it may be well to notice in this connection, and which are usually included under the head of implied warranty, but to which the doctrine of warranty does not properly seem to be applicable; * * * that is, where the parties suppose themselves to be buying and selling one thing, when in point of fact they are contracting for the purchase and sale of an entirely different thing * * * But, where there is neither fraud nor an express warranty, the case seems to be one of pure mistake with reference to the subject-matter, and mistake is properly the ground of the seller's liability. But it does not seem that the doctrine of implied warranty would properly apply, nor is it at all necessary to found a right of recovery in the vendee, * * * for in matters of pure mistake the doctrine of caveat emptor would not seem to apply. * * * A vendee only warrants by implication the epithet or adjective, but not the substantive." This doctrine is sustained by Benj. Sales, §§ 77, 618, 619, 918, 1005; 4 Wait, Act. & Def. c. 98, §§ 18, 21; Wood v. Sheldon, 42 N. J. Law, 421; Whitney v. Bank, 45 N. Y. 304; Terry v. Bissell, 26 Conn. 23; Paul v. Kenosha, 22 Wis. 266;

Hurd v. Hall, 12 Wis. 136; and many other cases unnecessary to cite. In the case of Hurd v. Hall, supra, Chief Justice Dixon, having first decided that the vendor and vendee contracted under a mistake of fact, says: "I also think the action could be maintained upon the ground of a failure of consideration by reason of the plaintiff's not having obtained what he bargained for; that the instruments did not answer the description of those the defendant professed to sell or the plaintiff to buy. The instruments assigned, though resembling school-land certificates, were not such certificates at all. They were mere worthless pieces of paper, drawn up in the form of such certificates. The fact that they were signed by the commissioners in their official capacity can make no difference. So long as they were wholly unauthorized to do so their acts in signing and issuing them, under the circumstances, were wholly void, and the certificates in that respect were no better than if they had been signed by some other persons, and were sheer forgeries, except so far as recovering back the money already paid was concerned." The equities existing between the innocent vendor and vendee of invalid municipal bonds, whether those bonds are the skillful work of a forger or the illegal work of fund commissioners, would seem to stand upon the same plane. Such bonds are equally worthless to a vendee, whether conceived in crime or in illegality. Their nullity in both cases consists in want of legal capacity to make them. In this case the vendor thought that he was selling valid bonds of Calaveras county, and the vendee thought that he was buying valid bonds of Calaveras county; but both parties labored under a mistake of fact, as they were not valid bonds of Calaveras county, or bonds at all, but worthless pieces of paper. The consideration totally failed, and, both parties being equally innocent, they should be restored to their original condition prior to the sale, for the vendor has money which in equity and good conscience belongs to the vendee.

SHAINWALD et al. v. CADY. (No. 13,704.)
(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 21, 1891.)

REAL-ESTATE AGENTS—COMMISSIONS.

Defendant authorized plaintiffs to sell some real estate, and agreed that, if he (defendant) sold the property during the continuance of the agency, he would allow plaintiffs a commission on the amount of such sale. Defendant afterwards contracted to sell one M. the property at any time within a year. A part of the purchase money was paid, and defendant put M. in possession of the property, and granted him the privilege of selling any portion of it. M. failed to make the deferred payments, and thereupon surrendered the contract and the possession of the property to defendant. Held, that the transaction was a sale, sufficient in law to entitle plaintiffs to the commission agreed on in their contract with defendant, though no conveyance was made to M.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by Shainwald, Buckbee & Co. against M. K. Cady to recover commissions on a sale of real estate. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals.

C. K. Bonestell, for appellant. J. T. Rogers, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action by real-estate brokers to recover commissions upon a sale of real estate. Judgment in the lower court went for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals from that judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. There are no briefs on file, and upon the examination of the record there appears to be but one assignment of error requiring our consideration. In the written agreement given by appellant to respondents, authorizing them to find a purchaser for a certain tract of land, to-wit, the town-site of Agua Caliente, it was stipulated that, if appellant himself made sale of the property within the life of the agreement, the brokers were to be allowed 2 per cent. commissions upon the amount of such sale, and the cause of action in this case is based upon an alleged breach of that provision of the agreement; the brokers claiming that the appellant Cady made a sale of the property, while he insists that such is not the fact, and that the property has not been sold. The trial court found that appellant sold the property to one George H. Maxwell for the sum of $15,000, and it is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to support this finding that our attention is specially directed. There is no conflict in the evidence upon this point, and it is as follows: Appellant Cady and his wife, Gail Cady, entered into a written contract with one George H. Maxwell, whereby they agreed to sell said Maxwell at any time within one year from March 5, 1888, certain real estate, (including the aforesaid town-site,) together with all the personal property now on said premises, free and clear of all incumbrances, for the purchase price of $30,000, "provided that said Maxwell shall pay to said M. K. Cady $1,000 on the delivery of these presents, and a thousand dollars April 1, 1888, and $1,000 June 1, 1888, and shall pay to Ignatz Steinhart the interest accrued to March 1, 1888, amounting to $1,984 on mortgages held by said Steinhart on said property, the amount of all such payments to be deducted from said purchase price of $30,000; * * * and said parties of the first part agree that said party of the second part may sell any portion of said land at any time during the term of this agreement, and that, upon such sales being made, they will execute and deliver deeds," etc.; and it was further provided that all moneys received upon such sale should be first applied to the payment of certain mortgages, and that, when such mortgages were paid, all further moneys received from such sales were to be applied as payments upon the balance of the purchase price; and it was further provided that Maxwell should have exclusive possession of the property, with the right to make alterations and improvements thereon, and that he should have an extension of the agreement for the further term of two years, by paying interest in advance upon the purchase price, at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, etc. There are other provisions of this contract not necessary to notice. It was signed by all parties, and under its provisions Maxwell took possession of the property, paid the three installments of $1,000 each upon the purchase price when due under the contract, paid the interest upon the Steinhart mortgages as provided, and some months later failed to make additional payments as demanded by the agreement, and thereupon surrendered the contract and possession of the property to appellant, Cady, who continues to hold the same. By entering into this contract, appellant not only placed it beyond his power to transfer this property to any one save Maxwell for the period of three years, but absolutely placed it out of the power of respondents to make a sale of the property at all. Appellant received $5,000 on the purchase price, gave up possession of the property, granted Maxwell the privilege of selling any portion of it, and therefore we think it can be fairly said, from the provisions of the contract and from the acts of the parties, that a sale was consummated, sufficient in law to create a liability in favor of respondents under their agreement. In Eaton v. Richeri, 83 Cal. 185, 23 Pac. Rep. 286, the court said, "the word 'sold' does not necessarily and in all connections mean that a conveyance must be made or that the title must pass." And in Pettinger v. Fast, 87 Cal. 463, 25 Pac. Rep. 680, the case of Eaton v. Richeri was cited and approved, and, speaking of a contract of sale, the court said: "The fact that no money was received by appellant on the contract is immaterial. The transaction was none the less a sale, and by it the equitable title of the property sold passed to Culbert." As to the consideration of the sale of the Agua Caliente town-site, the evidence is conflicting, and the finding of the court will not be disturbed. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

RICHARDSON v. CITY OF EUREKA. (No. 14,475.)

APPEAL—RECORD—DISMISSAL.

1. An appeal will not be dismissed on the ground that appellant's transcript did not contain a copy of the judgment roll, as required by Code Civil Proc. Cal. §§ 661, 952, if the judgment roll is supplied before the motion is heard.

2. In California, the notice of intention to move for a new trial forms no part of the record on appeal. Pico v. Cohn, 20 Pac. Rep. 706, 78 Cal. 384, followed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Action by Charles Richardson against the city of Eureka, Cal. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal.

J. N. Gillett, for appellant. E. W. Wilson and J. W. Turner, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal herein from the judgment and order denying a new trial, upon the ground that appellant has not furnished this court with a transcript containing a copy of the judgment roll in said cause, as required by sections 661 and 952 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Respondent further insists that the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial should be dismissed, upon the grounds that (1) the transcript on appeal shows that appellant did not file with the clerk or serve any notice of his intention to move for a new trial in said cause; (2) that the transcript shows that appellant did not move for a new trial in said cause; (3) that the transcript shows that appellant did not prepare or serve upon respondent any draft of a statement of the case, etc.

Since the motion to dismiss this appeal was noticed for hearing, appellant has supplied the judgment roll with a certified copy of the verdict, and there now appears to be nothing wanting necessary to a complete determination of the appeal. In Paige v. Roeding, 89 Cal. 69, 26 Pac. Rep. 787, it was held that an appeal would not be dismissed by reason of a defective judgment roll, when all the portions of the roll are before this court, which are requisite to a full determination of the cause. In Pico v. Cohn, 78 Cal. 384, 20 Pac. Rep. 706, it was held that the notice of intention to move for a new trial was no part of the record on appeal. In that case the court said: "When the case comes to us, we must look to the statement or bill of exceptions and the specifications, in which the decision of the court below is not sustained by the evidence, and the specifications of error of law, as our guide in reviewing the case, and to this alone." Any defects alleged to exist in the statement of the case will be considered when the cause comes before us upon its merits. Let the motion to dismiss the appeal be denied.

LYFORD v. NORTH PAC. C. R. CO. (No. 13,527.)

COVENANTS RUNNING WITH THE LAND.

A railway company obtained a right of way through land owned by a married woman in consideration of one dollar, and the covenants to maintain a depot, run daily trains, etc. The road-bed was abandoned, but not until after title to the property was acquired by the husband. Held, that the covenants, not being "made for the direct benefit of the property, or some part of it," as required by Civil Code, § 1462, did not run with the land, and the husband, not showing an express assignment of his wife's interest in the contract, and his wife not having joined in the action, cannot recover for failure on the part of defendants to perform.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. MAHON, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by Benjamin F. Lyford against the North Pacific Coast Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant.

E. S. Lyspitt and T. J. Crowley, for appellant. H. Wilkins and W. H. L. Barnes, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. In January, 1873, Mrs. Lyford, wife of the plaintiff, owned, as her separate property, a tract of land in Marin county, known as "Strawberry Point." At that time plaintiff and his wife contracted with the defendant to convey to it a right of way for its railway along a designated line, in consideration of one dollar and the mutual covenants contained in said contract. Several covenants were contained in the contract to be performed by defendant. It would build its road within two years, and thereafter maintain and run regular daily passenger and freight trains to and from San Francisco to San Rafael; maintain a depot at a point designated; erect and maintain five passage-ways for cattle, four under the track and one by a bridge over it; and carry at all times upon its regular passenger trains and ferries, to and from San Francisco, said Lyford, his wife, and children free from charge during the life-time of said Lyford and wife, or either of them. The railroad was built and run as agreed until February 19, 1884, when the defendant ceased to use the right of way, took up the rails, and removed its road some distance from plaintiff's land, and since has declined to carry plaintiff or his family free of charge, and has finally and wholly abandoned the road along the right of way over plaintiff's land. Plaintiff claims that his land was suitable for suburban residence, and by the road was made accessible to San Francisco, and therefore valuable, but by the discontinuance of the road was rendered inaccessible, and was greatly damaged; and he avers that the sole consideration for the grant of the right of way was the personal advantage to himself and wife, and that the road would enhance the value of the land. In the answer the point is specially made that Mrs. Lyford was a necessary party, and should have been joined as plaintiff. On the trial plaintiff did not show an express assignment to himself from Mrs. Lyford of her interest in the contract, but he proved that on July 31, 1879, she conveyed the land to John J. Reed, who conveyed the same to plaintiff August 6, 1879. In each of these deeds was inserted this provision: "Together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in any wise appertaining, rents, issues, and profits thereof, and also all the estate, right, title, interest, property, possession, claim, and demand whatsoever, as well in law as in equity, of the said Hilarita Reed de Lyford."

It is obvious that the agreement to continue to operate the railway is not a covenant which, under the Code, would run with the land. It is not a covenant for the direct benefit of the property, i. e., the estate granted, as required by section 1462 of the Civil Code. The best that could be said would be that, like the agreement to maintain the cattle-ways, it was a condition in the grant of the easement. But the theory of plaintiff's case is that the easement has been abandoned. We think the covenant to continue to operate the road was a personal covenant, and plaintiff, not being the assignee of Mrs. Lyford, cannot maintain this action alone. We therefore think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIFF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

CALLAHAN v. EEL RIVER & E. R. Co. (No. 13,640.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 27, 1891.)

NEGLIGENCE—DANGEROUS PREMISES.

Where a child six years old was injured on a turn-table of a railway company while playing with other children, no employes being about, and the turn-table was only kept in place by an ordinary iron latch, which could be easily lifted, the company is liable for injuries received by the child while the table was turned by other boys, even though the employes of the company had always ordered children away when observed playing on the turn-table. Barrett v. Southern Pac. Co., 27 Pac. Rep. 666, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge. Affirmed.

Action of Timothy B. Callahan, by his guardian ad litem, against the Eel River & Eureka Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff.

Horace L. Smith and S. M. Buck, for appellant. Ernest Sevier and T. H. Selvage, for respondent.

BELCHER, J. The material facts of this case are very nearly the same as those of Barrett v. Southern Pac. Co., 27 Pac. Rep. 666, (decided by this court September 21, 1891.) It appears here that on the 5th of August, 1887, the defendant owned and was operating a railroad, one terminus of which was at the city of Eureka, in the county of Humboldt. At this terminus it had a turn-table, which was held in place by the customary fastening of an iron latch dropped in a slot. By lifting the latch from the slot the table could be revolved. The plaintiff was a child, six years old, whose parents lived a short distance from the turn-table. On the day above named he returned from school about 3 o'clock P. M., and thereafter was about the house and yard of his parents till he got his supper. His mother directed him not to leave the yard, but between 6 and 7 o'clock he, with some other boys, ran away down to the turn-table. He got onto the turn-table to have a ride, and sat down with his right leg over the side of it. The other boys turned the table, and as it went round his leg was caught between it and the timbers of the track, and so badly crushed that it had to be amputated above the knee. Before this, boys had frequently played around and ridden on the turn-table, and, when seen doing so by the employes of defendant, had been ordered away. At this time no employes were about. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for his injury, and asked judgment for the sum of $30,000. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict returned, on which judgment was entered for $5,000. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused, and has appealed from the judgment and order. The appellant contends that its motion for nonsuit should have been granted, and that numerous errors were committed by the court in its rulings and in giving and refusing certain instructions to the jury. We do not think it necessary to discuss the points presented at length. They are made upon the theory that the plaintiff was a trespasser, and that defendant was not guilty of negligence; and they all seem, in effect, to have been considered and decided against appellant's contention in the Barrett Case. Upon the authority of that case we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; VANCLIFF, J.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

BENNETT v. HYDE. (No. 14,159.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1891.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE — TIME OF THE ESSENCE OF THE CONTRACT.

Where a contract, sought to be specifically enforced, recites that, if plaintiff "fail to comply with any one of the agreements herein specified, and at the time specified, then this contract shall immediately become void," and defendant, in a letter extending the time for making the last payment under the contract, says that "time must be the special and essential ingredient in the extension, as it was intended to be in the original contract," the evidence is conclusive that time is of the essence of the contract.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by E. Bennett against J. D. Hyde for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

Lambertson & Taylor, for appellant. N. O. Bradley and G. E. Lawrence, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and an order refusing a new trial. The action is to enforce specific performance of a written contract for the sale of lands. There was no error in striking out portions of the complaint if the court correctly determined, as we think it did, that time was of the essence of the contract sued on. Furthermore, that ruling is not specified as an error upon which the plaintiff would rely on his motion for a new trial. There is abundant evidence to sustain all the findings excepted to. The only real question in the case is whether time was of the essence of the contract, and to consider this question it is not necessary to determine whether the specifications as to the alleged insufficiency of the evidence comply with the requirements of the Code or not. All the necessary facts appear in the pleadings and findings. The contract was made July 25, 1885. By its terms the purchaser was to pay $256 upon its execution, and the same sum on the 25th day of July in each year of the three succeeding years, and also all taxes. The residue, $3,200, was to be paid July 25, 1889; making $4,224 in all. The purchaser was let into immediate possession, and has paid all installments due and all taxes, but has not made the last payment of $3,200. July 16, 1889, the last payment not having been made, defendant voluntarily and without consideration extended the time until August 5th of the same year. In the contract the purchasers agreed to make the payments as specified, and further stipulated: "In the event the parties of the second part fail to comply with any one of the agreements herein specified, and at the time specified, then this contract shall immediately become void, and the party of the first part shall be released from all obligations at law or in equity to convey said land; and the parties of the second part agree that they will, upon failure by them to comply with any one of their agreements herein specified, at the time specified, forfeit all claim to said land, and will deliver up said land, peaceably and without process of law, to the party of the first part. The party of the first part, upon receiving the several payments herein specified, at the time specified, agrees," etc. In the letter extending the time, defendant said: "I would extend the time of payment required by said contract to August 5, 1889, but not longer; and that time must be the special and essential ingredient in the extension, as it was intended to be in the original contract." The case is almost the counterpart of Grey v. Tubbs, 43 Cal. 359. It differs from it only in that the parties seem to have taken even greater pains to show that they intended to make time of the essence of the contract, and, if they have failed to do so, it is simply because that cannot be done without inserting the very words in the contract, as was said in Grey v. Tubbs. Appellant seems to concede that such would be the effect of the language used but for section 1492 of the Civil Code, which he claims renders it necessary for the parties, in their contract, to declare, in so many words, that time is of the essence of the obligation to give it that effect. At law, time has always been considered of the essence of the contract. But equity, unwilling to permit a forfeiture if it can be avoided, has held otherwise, except when the parties have so expressed their intent, or it is clearly to be inferred. This rule, we think, it was intended to adopt in the Code provision, limiting it, however, where the delay is capable of exact compensation, by requiring that the intent shall expressly appear in the contract. But courts of equity have always held that such intention is expressed when the contract provides, as in this case, that performance must be on time, or the party or parties shall lose all rights under it. Time is of the essence of the contract when performance must be on time to entitle a party to its performance by the other party. Where this is expressed in the contract, the parties have expressly declared that time is of the essence of the obligation. The extension of time granted was voluntary, and upon the express condition that "time must be the special and essential ingredient in the extension." To avail himself of this privilege, plaintiff should have complied with the condition. He did not do so. In the contract it was, in effect, three times repeated that time was of the essence of the contract. It was emphasized in the extension. To compel the execution of the deed in this case would be to make a contract for the parties, and then to absolutely enforce it. The defendant is not attempting to recover upon the contract, and was not, therefore, required to prove performance, or an offer to perform. It was not necessary for him to tender a deed in order to put the plaintiff in default. Whether the plaintiff can recover the amount paid on the contract is not involved in this case. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

SANBORN v. DOE et al. (No. 13,580.)

INSOLVENCY—DISCHARGE—SETTING ASIDE DECREE.

A person who purchases claims against an insolvent after his discharge cannot sue to set aside the decree of discharge on the ground of fraud, under Insolvent Act Cal. 1880, § 53, providing that such action may be maintained by any creditor of the insolvent "whose debt was proved or provable against the estate in insolvency."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; ROBERT McGARVEY, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by one Sanborn against Doe and others to set aside a decree discharging defendants from all liabilities. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals.

A. E. Bolton and T. L. Carothers, for appellant. J. A. Cooper, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendants were copartners on November 11, 1886, and on that day filed in the superior court of Mendocino county their petition in insolvency, and such proceedings were had therein that on May 4, 1887, the court duly made and entered its decree discharging them from all their debts and liabilities. The plaintiff was not at that date a creditor of either of said defendants, but thereafter several of those who were such creditors, and whose claims were discharged by said decree, assigned their claims to plaintiff, and he thereupon commenced this action to set aside the said order or decree of discharge, upon the alleged ground that certain creditors were improperly influenced not to oppose the same, and that therefore the said decree was fraudulent. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment thereupon rendered in favor of defendants. The plaintiff appeals.

vides: "Any creditor of said debtor whose debt was proved or provable against the estate in insolvency, who shall see fit to contest the validity of such discharge on the ground that it was fraudulently obtained, and who has discovered the facts constituting the fraud subsequent to the discharge, may, at any time within two years after the date thereof, apply to the court which granted it to set aside and annul the same; or, if the same shall have been pleaded, the effect thereof may be avoided collaterally upon such ground." But the plaintiff, not being within the terms of this section, can derive no authority from it to maintain this action. He was not a creditor of defendants at the date of the rendition of the judgment which he now seeks to set aside, and was in no wise injured by it, and for that reason the complaint fails to state a cause of action, independently of the section of the insolvent act just quoted. It is true, the assignees of plaintiff would, upon the facts alleged, have the right to set aside the decree referred to, but this right was not the subject of transfer, either by direct assignment, or as an incident to the assignment of the claims which were affected by the decree of discharge. Dickinson v. Seaver, 44 Mich. 631;¹ Milwaukee & M. R. Co. v. Milwaukee & W. R. Co., 20 Wis. 183; Carroll v. Potter, Walk. Ch. 355; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1276. In Dickinson v. Seaver, supra, the supreme court of Michigan, in passing upon a state of facts not in principle different from those alleged in this complaint, say: "The present complainant, according to his own proofs, has merely purchased claims for the purpose of this litigation, or of some litigation. He was never defrauded. It would be against every rule of equity to allow a party to buy up stale claims, and then seek to establish fraud committed against his assignors. A right to complain of fraud is not assignable, and the claims in controversy have nothing involved which could keep them alive, unless fraud would do so. Being nothing more than an assignment of an action for fraud, it is well settled that it will not be enforced." The same rule was recognized by this court in Cross v. Bank, 66 Cal. 462, 6 Pac. Rep. 94, in which case it was said, quoting with approval from section 1040 of Story's Equity Jurisprudence: "An assignment of a bare right to file a bill in equity for a fraud committed on the assignor will be held void, as contrary to sound policy." It follows from these views that the judgment appealed from must be affirmed. So long as the decree discharging the defendants from their debts and liabilities remains in force, the claims assigned to plaintiff can have no validity; and as he did not by such assignment acquire the right to attack or set aside that decree, he really took nothing by such assignment, and has no cause of action against defendants. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE V. STANFORD.²

LARCENY—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE—INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION—DESCRIPTION OF PROPERTY.

1. On a trial for larceny of a hog, the prosecution introduced evidence that former ear-marks had been changed for the purpose of concealing the identity of the hog. Defendant showed that he had with witnesses, before the trial, called upon the prosecuting witness, who had possession of the hog, to examine the ear-marks, and was refused permission to do so. At the trial defendant asked that the hog be produced at his expense, but was refused. Defendant controverted the testimony of the prosecuting witness as to the ear-markings. After defendant's conviction, he moved for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, and produced affidavits of several persons who examined the hog after the trial, alleging that the ear-markings were not as testified by the prosecuting witness, but as represented by defendant. Held, that defendant was entitled to a new trial, since the point raised by the affidavits were material, and the defendant had been precluded by the prosecution from inquiring into the matter until after his conviction.

2. An information upon which the larceny of a hog is charged is sufficient in alleging that the property stolen was "a certain hog, said hog being the property and chattel of one L.," and it is not essential that the indictment should state the color, kind, weight, mark, or brand.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Shasta county.

Prosecution by the people against George N. Stanford for larceny. Defendant was convicted, and appeals from the judgment, and an order refusing a new trial. Reversed, and remanded for a new trial.

The defendant contended that the information in the indictment should have been specific in describing the stolen property by color, kind, name, weight, mark or brand, or by some description whereby the hog could be identified, the allegation being that the stolen property was a "certain hog, said hog being then and there the property and chattel of one Albert Long."

A. C. Ferguson, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall, for respondent.

Ross, J. Justice demands a new trial of this case. The defendant was charged by information with the larceny of a certain hog. That the hog was in defendant's possession was not denied by him, and the case shows that the main controversy on the trial was whether his possession was criminal, or whether it was an innocent possession, maintained under an honest belief of ownership in himself. For the purpose of showing that the former was the case, the prosecution introduced testimony tending to show that former ear-marks of the hog had been changed, and were then of a certain description. The purpose of this testimony was, of course, to show that the defendant had attempted to conceal the identity of the hog, and thus to establish a guilty circumstance. From the affidavits filed in support of a motion for a new trial it appears that after the arrest of the defendant on the charge in question, and before the trial, he went, with two other persons whom he desired as witnesses, to the premises of the prosecuting witness, where the hog was, for the purpose of seeing it and examining the ear-marks, and that the prosecuting witness refused to permit defendant or his witnesses to make the desired inspection. The bill of exceptions recites that, upon the closing of the case on the part of the prosecution, the defendant asked that the hog be produced, that the jury might see that the witnesses for the prosecution had not testified truly with respect to the marks, and offered to send for it at his own expense, and to deposit double the value of the hog as security for its safe return; but both the prosecuting witness and the court refused to accede to the proposition, and the offer was refused. It appears, further, from the affidavits, that immediately after the trial, which resulted in the conviction of the defendant, several persons (each of whom makes affidavit of the fact) went to the premises of the prosecuting witness for the purpose of inspecting the subject of the alleged larceny, and were then permitted to do so, and that the hog was not marked as testified on the part of the prosecution, but was marked as represented by the defendant. The case mainly turned upon the question of marks, and, under such circumstances, to permit the prosecution to withhold from the defendant the means of making counter-proof until after his conviction, and then to open the door to him, but to say, when he comes with affidavits of third persons tending to show the testimony given on the part of the prosecution at the trial was untrue, "You are too late; you did not use due diligence,"—would be gross injustice. The point to which the affidavits go was a material point in the trial of the case. The defendant was precluded by the attitude assumed by the prosecution from inquiring into the facts in relation to the matter until after he was convicted, and, upon the most obvious principles of right and justice, he ought to be allowed an opportunity to present his testimony thus subsequently discovered upon the point in question. The information we think sufficient. People v. Salazar, 6 Pac. Coast Law J. 569. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

Action for specific performance of an agreement to convey land, by Lucien L. Forrester and another against Juan Flores. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Hall & Requa, for appellants. A. A. Oglesby, Thomas McNulta, and W. C. Stratton, for respondent.

McKEE, J. Action in equity for specific performance. By the complaint it is claimed that about March 18, 1880, the defendant was the owner of the lot of land in dispute, and "agreed" to sell the same to the plaintiffs for a stipulated price, and, upon payment thereof, to execute and to deliver to the plaintiffs a good and sufficient deed to the land. The plaintiffs aver that they have fully performed the agreement on their part by paying the entire purchase money, but the defendant, although he has taken and kept the money, refuses to execute and deliver his deed to the land. In his answer, the defendant admits his ownership of the land, leaves undenied the allegations of the complaint as to payment of the money, but does deny that he entered into any such agreement with the plaintiffs as that set forth in the complaint, and at the same time he avers that there was no contract or agreement in writing between him and the plaintiffs for a sale of the land or the execution and delivery of a deed to it. Substantially, therefore, the defense is a denial of the contract as set forth in the plaintiffs' complaint and the statute of frauds. The defendant had judgment, and the appeal is on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions. Upon the trial the court found there was no such agreement between the parties as is alleged in the complaint. There is no attack upon the finding. It is therefore conclusive, and upon the facts as found there is no error in the judgment roll.

But in the bill of exceptions it is contended that the court erred in denying a motion made by the plaintiffs for judgment on the pleadings, on the ground that, as the answer left undenied the ownership of the land, the payment and receipt of the purchase money for it, and the refusal to convey by the execution and delivery of a deed, solely on the ground that the agreement between the parties was not in writing, the plaintiffs were entitled to the relief demanded. But, assuming that the pleadings showed a parol agreement between the parties for a sale and conveyance of the lot, such an agreement was invalid under the statute of frauds. Sections 1971, 1973, Code Civil Proc., and section 1741, Civil Code. But it is also true that a court of equity will take such an agreement out of the statute in case of part performance, (section 1972, Code Civil Proc.,) and it is upon that basis that plaintiffs rest their cause of action. To entitle a party in a court of eq-unity to the performance of an oral agreement for the sale of land, the terms of the agreement must distinctly appear, or be made out to the satisfaction of the court. It is well settled that a party who claims a right to a conveyance of land under a parol contract on the ground of part performance must make out by clear proof the agreement as alleged, and the acts of performance alleged and proved must be unequivocal evidence of such agreement. Blum v. Robertson, 24 Cal. 129. Here the pleadings on which the plaintiffs' motion was made deny the very existence of the alleged agreement. It was therefore a matter in issue. And, although there was no denial of the allegations as to the payment of the money, yet no inference could be drawn from the fact of payment that the moneys were paid to the defendant on account of and in the performance of the alleged agreement. Besides, if such an inference could be drawn from the fact, neither the fact, nor the inference, nor both together, would amount to such proof of part performance as would take the parol agreement out of the statute of frauds; for the mere payment of the purchase money of such an agreement is not, according to the general practice in courts of equity, sufficient for that purpose. "By an unbroken current of authorities running through many years it is settled too firmly for question that payment, even to the whole amount of the purchase money, is not to be deemed part performance, so as to justify a court of equity in enforcing the contract." Browne, St. Frauds, § 461; Fry, Spec. Perf. § 403; Story, Eq. Jur. § 761. It is only where the payment is accompanied by a change of possession in the land, or the expenditure of money upon it, on the faith of the oral agreement, and where the failure to perform by the vendor would work a gross fraud upon the vendee, that a court of equity will decree specific performance by compelling the execution of a deed. Story, Eq. Jur. § 761. For money paid under an invalid contract, the party who pays has an adequate remedy at law. There was no error in denying the motion for judgment on the pleadings. Judgment affirmed.

ARBITRATION AND AWARD—NOTICE OF HEARING.

Arbitrators appointed under an agreement between a claimant and the trustees of a city, to pass upon a claim against the city, held meetings, received testimony, and made an award, without giving notice to the mayor of the time and place of hearing, but the trustees were present at one meeting and testified in behalf of the city. Held, that the award was void for want of such notice.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by N. Green Curtis and Thomas

J. Clunie against the city of Sacramento on an award by arbitrators. Judgment for defendant, and order refusing a new trial. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Freeman & Bates, for appellants. W. A. Anderson and A. P. Catlin, for respondent.

MCKEE, J. The plaintiff sued upon an award made in pursuance of an instrument in writing, purporting to have been made on the 29th of July, 1878, "by and between the plaintiffs and the board of trustees of the city of Sacramento, representing and acting for said city." Pursuant to the terms of the instrument the question of the value of some professional services which had been rendered by the plaintiffs for the city of Sacramento was referred to two arbitrators,—one to be selected by the plaintiffs, and the other by the board of trustees,—who were to meet as soon as convenient, and, after hearing such statements as would be made on behalf of either party, were to determine and report in writing to each of the parties; but, in case of a disagreement, power was given them to select a third arbitrator; and it was stipulated that the award of any two of the three arbitrators would be regarded as the award of all, and entered as a judgment against the city, after being allowed by the board of trustees. Two persons were selected pursuant to the terms of the submission; and the court found that soon after the selection they had a meeting, at which they received the unsworn statements of those who were present to testify. The plaintiffs were present at the meeting, but the mayor of the city was not present; and no notice of the meeting was given to or served upon him, either by the arbitrators or by the plaintiffs, and he had no opportunity to be present. Two of the trustees were present as witnesses, one of whom withdrew after making his unsworn statement to the arbitrators. The arbitrators were unable to agree, and they selected a third person, who, upon being notified, accepted the appointment, and the three arbitrators were then sworn and qualified according to law. But they gave no notice to the defendant of a hearing, or of a meeting to be held for hearing the parties and their witnesses, nor did they take any testimony. The original arbitrators handed to the third arbitrator a transcript in long-hand of the phonographic reporter's notes of the statements made to them. Upon that transcript the third arbitrator ex parte took the unsworn opinions of professional men, and those opinions and the transcript of the statements made to the original arbitrators formed the basis upon which the arbitrators made their award. The court held that the award was invalid and void for want of notice to the defendant of the time and place of hearing the cause.

It is contended that the decision is erroneous, because, as the award was a judgment rendered by a tribunal of the parties' selection, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter submitted to it, and of the parties by whom the submission was made, the want of notice of the time and place of meeting for the hearing and determination of the matter submitted does not invalidate the award, and constitutes no defense to an action at law upon it. But the validity of an award does depend not only upon the due and proper appointment of the arbitrators, but upon the regularity of their proceedings, (Crowell v. Davis, 12 Metc., Mass., 296,) and we think if these proceedings are had ex parte, and without notice to the parties of a hearing, their award is invalid and void. That, it is contended, is contrary to the English rule which makes an award conclusive at law. We do not understand that such a rule prevails in the English courts. It is true that in Tittenson v. Peat, 3 Atk. 529, which was decided in 1747, where the defendant pleaded an award, and objection was made that the arbitrators did not give sufficient notice of the time they intended to meet, or of the particular place at which they were to meet, Chancellor HARDWICKE overruled the objection as immaterial, saying that "the arbitrators were not bound to give notice, and that the only ground to impeach an award is collusion or gross misbehavior in the arbitrators, for otherwise, being made the judges of the parties' own choosing, it is final and binding upon all the parties." But that seemed to the courts most unreasonable; and in Paschal v. Terry, W. Kel. 132, (decided in 1760,) the court of king's bench set aside an award which had been made without notice given to one of the parties to the appointment of an umpire, or of a hearing, upon the ground that it was repugnant to the submission; and that it was unreasonable and contrary to natural justice to make an award without giving notice to the parties to attend. "The umpirage," said the court, "was made upon the defendant's evidence alone, parte altera inaudita; the plaintiff was neither heard, nor had any opportunity given him to be heard." The principle of that decision, viz., that every man ought to have an opportunity to be heard in defense of his rights, has been ever since acted upon by the English and American courts, and it runs through all the cases in the books. Whatley v. Morland, 2 Dowl. Pr. 249, 4 Tyrw. 255; Salkeld v. Slater, 12 Adol. & E. 767; Fetherstone v. Cooper, 9 Ves. 67; Russ. Arb. 165; Morse Arb. 116, 118; Railroad Co. v. Thomas, 21 N. J. Eq. 205; In Falconer v. Montgomery, 4 Dall. 232, where an umpire had, without hearing the parties in person, decided the case upon the facts as stated to him by the original referees, the supreme court of Pennsylvania said: "The plainest dictates of natural justice must prescribe to every tribunal the law that no man shall be condemned unheard;" and Justice STORY, in Lutz v. Linthicum, 8 Pet. 178, said: "Without question, due notice should be given to the parties of the time and place of hearing the cause, and, if the award was made without such notice, it ought, upon the plainest principles of justice, to be set aside." See, also, Rigden v. Martin, 6 Har. & J. 403; Passmore v. Pettit, 4 Dall. 271; Walker v. Walker, 28 Ga. 140; McKinney v. Page, 32 Me. 513; Maynard v.

Frederick, 7 Cush. 247; Crowell v. Davis, supra; Conrad v. Insurance Co., 4 Allen, 20; Frissell v. Fickes, 27 Mo. 557; Day v. Hammond, 57 N. Y. 479. It is true, as has been urged, that an award is the judgment of the tribunal selected by the parties to the submission; but greater effect cannot be given to it than is given by law to the judgment of an inferior court. As an inferior tribunal, the authority of the arbitrators was limited by the agreement of submission; and the agreement cannot be interpreted to authorize the plaintiffs to institute an ex parte hearing before the arbitrators. The right to notice of a time and place for a hearing upon the matter submitted was implied in the agreement to submit, unless it was expressly waived by the terms of the submission. Peters v. Newkirk, 6 Cow. 103; Paschal's Case, supra. To take away a man's property or his rights in property, without a hearing, trial, or judgment, or opportunity of making known his rights therein, is violative of that section of the bill of rights which declares that "no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." An award made ex parte, and without the appointment of a time and place for hearing the allegations and evidence of the parties, is therefore invalid and void; and in an action at law upon such an award the want of notice may be pleaded as a defense at law. "It is," says Chancellor WALWORTH, "purely a legal question, upon the ground that it was not within the authority of the arbitrators to make any award without notice." Elmendorf v. Harris, 23 Wend. 628. Judgment and order affirmed.

CONDITIONAL PARDON — REARREST—HABEAS CORPUS.

On representations that a prisoner was partially idiotic, and that he had brothers who would furnish means to send him to friends in Poland, a pardon was granted, on the condition that he forthwith leave the state and never return. On his promise to leave the state on the following evening, the pardon was handed to him, and he was released from custody. His brothers offered him sufficient funds to take him to Poland, but he refused to go, and declared his intention to remain unless he received $1,000, and thereupon he was again taken into custody. Held, that he was not entitled to a discharge from rearrest on habeas corpus; the governor being authorized by Const. Cal. art. 5, § 13, to grant pardons "upon such conditions, and with such restrictions and limitations, as he may think proper."

ROSS, J. The petitioner, who was undergoing imprisonment in the state-prison under judgment of conviction of the crime of murder in the second degree, was, by the governor of the state, granted a pardon upon condition that he forthwith leave the state and never return thereto. The governor, it seems, was induced to grant the pardon upon representations made to him to the effect that the prisoner was partially idiotic; that his parents resided in Poland, and would take care of him if permitted to go to them; and that he had brothers of wealth in this state, who would furnish him with the means necessary to take him there, and would thereafter provide for his support. The pardon was given by the governor to the warden of the prison, to be by him delivered to the prisoner, whenever the same was properly accepted. Upon its receipt the warden tendered the pardon to the prisoner, who refused to accept it unless it should be stipulated that he should be permitted to remain in the state for the period of 80 days after his discharge from the prison. The result of course was that he remained incarcerated. Some weeks afterwards he indicated to the warden—who meanwhile had retained the pardon in his possession—his willingness to accept it, and to faithfully perform the conditions upon which it was granted. Upon this representation, and upon the prisoner's promise to leave the state on the train going east the following evening, the warden handed him the pardon, and released him from custody. His brothers thereupon offered him sufficient funds to take him to his parents in Poland, but he refused to go as he had promised, but declared his intention to remain in California unless his brothers gave him $1,000. Thereupon he was again taken into custody by the warden, and now claims the right to be discharged on habeas corpus. We think it clear that he is not entitled to be so discharged. There is no doubt that the governor was authorized to grant the pardon upon the conditions stated, for he is by the constitution empowered to make such grants "upon such conditions and with such restrictions and limitations as he may think proper, subject to such regulations as may be provided by law relative to the manner of applying for pardons." Const. § 13, art. 5. The pardon in question contained two conditions,—one, that the prisoner should forthwith leave the state; the other, that he should never return to the state. The one was a condition precedent; the other, a condition subsequent. That is to say, the governor, in effect, said to the prisoner: "By virtue of the power vested in me by the constitution, I exempt you from the punishment the law inflicts for the crime you have committed: provided, you forthwith leave the state: and provided, further, you never return to the state." Until he actually leaves the state the pardon does not become operative at all. This must be so from the very nature of the first condition attached to it. When that condition is performed, the pardon becomes operative, but it nevertheless remains subject to be defeated by the breach of the condition subsequent, to-wit, by the prisoner's subsequent return to the state. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 760; Ex parte Wells, 18 How. 311; State v. Smith, 1 Bailey, 283; Lee v. Murphy, 22 Gratt. 789; Flavell's Case, 8 Watts & S. 197. The pardon, therefore, never having taken effect, it results that the prisoner is not entitled to his discharge. It is no answer to say that the pardon was delivered to the prisoner. Apart from what has been already said, delivery of such an instrument is not complete without an acceptance in good faith. The bad faith of the prisoner was demonstrated almost as soon as he got out of prison. Besides, the pardon was given to the prisoner by the warden upon the distinct agreement on his part to leave the state on the train going east the following evening. The subsequent conduct of the prisoner showed that he had no intention of doing any such thing. A pardon obtained by misrepresentation amounting to fraud is void. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 753, 754. Nor is there any force in the suggestion that in such cases the person pardoned may be deprived of the opportunity to comply with the conditions of the pardon. No court has the power to compel any executive officer to afford the person to whom a pardon has been conditionally granted an opportunity to comply with the conditions, for that would be to exercise the pardoning power in part. When the pardon has once taken effect, then the party to whom it is extended acquires a right which the courts can, and will, of course, protect. There is no reason, however, to suppose that in any case any executive officer would refuse to afford the party to whom a conditional pardon should be granted an opportunity to comply with the conditions, and thereby secure its benefits. Every presumption is the other way. Should the fact be otherwise in any case, perhaps some means might be discovered for giving effect to the governor's power. At all events, in the present case, ample opportunity was given the prisoner, which, instead of availing himself of, he abused. Let the prisoner be remanded to the custody of the warden.

BANKS — TRANSFER OF ASSETS — STOCKHOLDERS' LIABILITY — LIMITATION.

1. An agreement by which one bank assigns and transfers to another all its assets in consideration of the latter's assumption of all its liabilities is valid where the assets transferred are sufficient to satisfy all the debts assumed.

2. Where the stockholders of such second bank have received the dividends paid by it on the deposits transferred to it under this agreement, it is too late for them to set up the defense of ultra vires in a suit by one of the depositors to enforce their individual liability after the bank has stopped payment.

¹This case, filed August 30, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

3. To render a stockholder in a bank individually liable for its debts, it is not essential that he shall have paid for the stock for which he subscribed, for a corporation may give credit for its stock, as well as for any other property sold by it.

4. Nor is it essential to that end that certificates of stock shall have been issued to him, for they are merely the proof of property, which may exist without them.

5. A right of action against the stockholders of a bank accrues to a depositor when the bank stops payment, and where there has been no prior default the statute of limitations does not begin to run until then.

6. Articles of incorporation stated that the "corporation was organized for the following named purposes: To do a general savings and commercial banking business; to buy and sell real and personal property; to discount bills, notes, and other commercial and negotiable paper and instruments; to buy and sell exchange; to receive money on deposit; to borrow and loan money; and to do any and all acts incident to or necessary to the transaction of any and all the matters above stated." Held, that this corporation is not a mere savings bank, but has all the attributes of an ordinary commercial bank.

7. The objection that irrelevant evidence was admitted in a case tried by the court is not tenable on appeal unless it is plainly apparent that the court rested its decision on the irrelevant evidence.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county.

Action by Elanora S. Mitchell against William Beckman and others, as stockholders of the Odd-Fellows' Savings & Commercial Bank. There was judgment for plaintiff, and an order refusing a new trial, from which defendants appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Geo. Cadwalader, for appellants. Catlin & Hamburger and Henry Edgerton, for respondent.

THORNTON, J. So much of the opinion of department 2 in this cause, as follows, is adopted as a correct exposition of the law herein: "The complaint in this case alleges that the Odd-Fellows' Savings & Commercial Bank is a corporation, existing under the laws of California, ever since the 10th day of February, 1875, and organized for the purpose of carrying on a commercial banking business; that the defendants are subscribers to the capital stock of the bank in amounts specified in the complaint; that on the 21st day of December, 1878, the corporation above named was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $6,625.72, upon an account for so much money at and before that time had and received by the said corporation from the plaintiff to and for plaintiff's use, and at the special instance and request of said corporation, which sum said corporation thereafter, to-wit, at the place and on the day last aforesaid, undertook and promised to pay plaintiff when it should be thereunto afterwards requested; that plaintiff has recovered a judgment against the corporation for that amount, no part of which has been paid; that the defendants were at the time such indebtedness accrued stockholders in the corporation named; that the corporation suspended all business and closed its doors on the 21st day of September, 1878, since which time it has not resumed business," etc. The action is brought under the statute, and the allegations in the complaint are sufficient. The case has been argued at great length, and with much ability; but it does not seem to us that the points involved are of difficult solution. The main leading facts are that the corporation (the bank) was doing a commercial banking business in the city of Sacramento; that the plaintiff deposited a certain amount of money in it, which has never been repaid; that the plaintiff brought an action and recovered a judgment for the amount against the bank, which judgment remains in full force and effect; whereupon plaintiff seeks to charge the defendants in this action as subscribers to the capital stock of the corporation.

It appears from the evidence in the case that plaintiff's money was originally deposited in the Odd-Fellows' Bank of Savings as early as the year 1873, and that on the 1st day of March, 1875, an agreement was entered into between the two institutions above named, by the terms of which all the assets of the last-named institution were assigned and transferred to the Odd-Fellows' Savings & Commercial Bank, and thereupon that institution assumed all the liabilities of the former bank. It is claimed that this assumption of the liabilities of the old bank by the new one was void for several reasons; but it is sufficient for us to say on this branch of the case that the new bank received all of the assets of the old, which were sufficient, as appears from the evidence of Samuel Poorman, the president of both corporations, to satisfy all the debts of the old bank. He was asked by the court the following question: "Were all the assets transferred to the new bank, and were the assets sufficient to discharge the liability of the Odd-Fellows' Bank of Savings? Answer. Well, I believe they were more than sufficient. I had been president of the Odd Fellows' Bank of Savings for a considerable time before that, and was president of the Odd-Fellows' Savings and Commercial Bank for nearly three years after that, and was familiar with the assets and their values." It may be added, if anything more in this connection is required, that the new corporation opened an account with the plaintiff, crediting her with the amount in her pass-book as a deposit, and paid dividends on the same for more than three years. Of these dividends the defendants received their respective shares, in proportion to the number of shares subscribed for by them, and it is too late now for them to urge the defense of ultra vires.

Another point made in the case is that several of the defendants never paid for the whole amount of the stock subscribed for, and never received certificates therefor. But to make one an owner it is not necessary that he should have paid for his stock. A corporation may give credit for its stock as well as for any other property sold by it. Nor is it necessary that certificates should have been issued. These only constitute proof of property which may exist without them. When the corporation has agreed that a person shall be entitled to a certain number of shares in its capital, to be paid for in a manner agreed upon, and that person has agreed to take and pay for them accordingly, he becomes their owner by a valid contract made upon a valuable consideration. Chaffin v. Cummings, 37 Me. 83. See, also, Spear v. Crawford, 14 Wend. 20; Glass Co. v. Dewey, 16 Mass. 94; In re South Mountain Consolidated Min. Co., 7 Sawy. 30, 5 Fed. Rep. 403; Civil Code, § 322.

The statute of limitations is relied on by appellants as a defense. This point has been determined adversely to the contention of appellants in Green v. Beckman, 59 Cal. 545. The statute did not commence running until the bank stopped payment, which was less than two years before the commencement of the action. We cannot see how it could have begun to run sooner. There was no right of action against the bank by the express terms of the by-laws until a demand and presentation of the depositor's book. The stoppage of payment by the bank gave at once the right of action. It had never refused payment before. It was in no default until the day indicated, when it closed its doors, and by its acts spoke as significantly as words to that effect: "We refuse to pay any one. It is useless to present your bank-book or demand, as we cannot pay." Then the depositor had a right to sue, and not before. It follows, "as the night the day," that the right of action against the stockholders did not commence sooner. How could it? If, on demand, the bank had paid, the stockholders were discharged. Can it be maintained that there was no right of action against the bank, and still one against the stockholders? They are primary debtors, co-ordinately responsible, (see Mining Co. v. Woodbury, 14 Cal. 265,) but one is not responsible before the other. The conclusion here reached is a fair deduction from the principles declared in the case just cited, and it is expressly stated in Davidson v. Rankin, 34 Cal. 505, that the right of action against the corporation and the stockholder accrues at the same time. In what has been said on this point we are not to be regarded as deciding that the cause before us, as to the bar of the statute, is not within the terms of section 348, Code Civil Proc., passed in 1874, and that there is really no limitation of this action. We do not decide it, because we think it better to rest the conclusion reached herein on the grounds above expressed.

It is contended that the deposit here sued for was in a savings bank, which was the agent of the plaintiff to invest her money, and, inasmuch as it was lost through the instrumentality of her agent, she could not maintain this action against the stockholders. Conceding that this would be so were the plaintiff's claim here sued for a deposit in a savings bank, the proof here is conclusive that the Odd-Fellows' Savings & Commercial Bank was a commercial, and not a savings, bank. This is plainly shown by the articles of incorporation. In these articles it is stated: "Said corporation is organized for the following named purposes: To do a general savings and commercial banking business; to buy and sell real and personal property; to discount bills, notes, and other commercial and negotiable paper and instruments; to buy and sell exchange; to receive money on deposit, with or without agreement to pay dividend or interest thereon; to borrow and loan money; to improve and lease real estate; and to do any and all acts incident to or necessary to the transaction of any and all the matters above stated." This is very different from a savings bank. For a definition of a savings bank, see Grant, Banks, 546; Huntington v. Bank, 96 U. S. 388; Coite v. Society, 32 Conn. 173; Osborn v. Byrne, 43 Conn. 155. See, also, Civil Code, §§ 571-579, both inclusive. The Odd-Fellows' Savings & Commercial Bank had all the attributes of an ordinary commercial bank, as the articles indicate.

There was no error in admitting the judgment against the bank for which the judgment or order should be reversed. There was other evidence from the books of the bank to show the indebtedness, and because it was offered for this purpose the objection to its admissibility is urged. The cause was tried by the court, and when so tried we do not understand the objection of irrelevancy is tenable unless it is plainly apparent that the court has rested its decision on the irrelevant testimony. Arthurs v. Hart, 17 How. 6.

As to the number of shares owned by the defendants, we think the finding was sustained by the evidence. We find no error in the rulings of the court below, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW—TRIAL—SICK JUROR—PEREMPTORY CHALLENGES.

1. Where a juror on a murder trial becomes sick, after the jury is sworn and some evidence introduced, and is discharged, and another is called in his place, it is error to overrule defendant's peremptory challenge to the latter, on the ground that his peremptory challenges were exhausted in the selection of the original jury; for Pen. Code Cal. § 1123, provides that in such emergencies "a new juror may be sworn, and the trial begin anew," so that defendant is thereafter entitled to all the peremptory challenges he had in the first instance.

2. Defendants' request, before the beginning of such trial de novo, to have pleas of former acquittal and former jeopardy entered, should be granted.

court. A new juror was called, who was peremptorily challenged by the defendant's attorney. The challenge was denied, on the ground that the defendant, in the selection of the original jury, had exhausted his peremptory challenges. The Code provides that, in case of the discharge of a juror on account of sickness, "a new juror may be sworn, and the trial begin anew, or the jury may be discharged, and a new jury then or afterwards impaneled." Pen. Code, § 1123. What is implied by the clause, "and the trial begin anew?" The title of the chapter which provides for challenging the jury is, "Of proceedings after the commencement of the trial and before judgment." We think, within the meaning of the Code, a trial commences when the case is called for trial, unless the trial be then postponed; that everything that transpires in the case after that, and before judgment, is a part of the trial. That being so, it follows that the defendant was entitled, after the change had been effected, to all the challenges which the law gave him in the first instance. Within that limit he not only had a right to challenge the new juror, but likewise any or all of the original eleven. Bishop says, in such a case, "the prisoner should be offered his challenges over again as to the eleven," and they "should be sworn de novo, and the trial begin again." In this case the "new juror" only was challenged, and, if the defendant had a right to challenge the eleven over again, he certainly had a right to challenge the new one. Instead of having a new juror sworn, the court might have discharged the original jury, and impaneled an entirely new one. If that had been done, the right of the defendant to peremptorily challenge any of them would be no clearer than it is to so challenge the new juror called to supply the place of one discharged. The request of the defendant to have pleas of former acquittal and once in jeopardy entered, was made before the commencement of the trial de novo, and should have been granted, although we are not now prepared to hold that the judgment ought to be reversed on that ground alone. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

INJUNCTION — IRREPARABLE INJURY — FINDINGS — REVIEW.

1. The construction of a tunnel, permanent in its character, through a lot, is an injury irreparable in its nature, against which the owner is entitled to an injunction, without regard to the trespasser's solvency.

2. In a suit for such an injunction, a finding that the injury is not irreparable is inconsistent with a finding that the tunnel is of a permanent character.

¹This case, filed July 31, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

3. The rule under which the appellate court declines to interfere with the granting or refusing of injunctions, as matters within the discretion of the court below, does not apply to the dissolution of a preliminary injunction after final hearing on the merits.

Appeal from superior court, Nevada county.

Action by Philip Richards against John Dower, Jr., for an injunction against the construction of a tunnel through plaintiff's lot by defendant. The purpose of the tunnel, whose dimensions did not appear, but which was 20 feet below the surface, and ran 150 feet through plaintiff's lot, was the development of a quartz ledge, and the removal of rock and other material therefrom. The court, on final hearing, dissolved the preliminary injunction, and rendered judgment for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed.

J. M. Walling, for appellant. Johnson & Mason, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The court found that at the time of the commencement of this action the defendant had excavated and projected a tunnel under the lot of the plaintiff a distance of 15 feet, and was engaged in the further extension thereof, and threatened to continue the same, but that said tunnel has not affected, and will not, if completed, affect, injuriously or otherwise, the surface ground of plaintiff's said lot. There is a further finding "that the driving of the tunnel was not, and will not, if completed, cause the plaintiff irreparable injury, or injure said lot in any way." And another "that the defendant is not insolvent." And, as a conclusion of law from the foregoing facts, the court found that the defendant was entitled to a dissolution of an injunction previously granted, and ordered judgment to be entered to that effect. From that judgment the plaintiff appealed, and the questions which the record presents are: (1) Did the court err in its said conclusion of law? (2) Was the continuation or dissolution of the injunction by the court which granted it so much a matter of discretion as to preclude any interference here with the action of that court in the premises? As late as Mogg v. Mogg, Dick. 670, Lord THURLOW was unable to find a precedent for granting an injunction to restrain a mere trespasser from cutting timber on another person's land. But in Flamang's Case, where a landlord of two closes had let one to a tenant, who took coal out of that close, and also out of the other, which was not demised, the difficulty was whether the injunction should go as to both, and Lord THURLOW ordered it as to both; and on the authority of that case Lord ELDON, in Mitchell v. Dors, 6 Ves. 147, granted "an injunction against the defendant, who, having begun to get coal in his own ground, had worked into that of the plaintiff." In Thomas v. Oakley, 18 Ves. 184, Lord ELDON expressed the opinion that it had then been settled in England that an injunction would be granted to restrain a mere trespasser from cutting timber or taking coal or lead ore from another person's land, and in that case he granted an injunction to restrain the defendant from removing stone from the plaintiff's quarry, on the ground that the defendant was taking the substance of the inheritance,—removing that which was the plaintiff's estate. He said the difference in value between stone and coal or stone and lead ore could not be considered in that case. From which we infer that in his opinion the right to an injunction in such a case did not depend on the value of the substance which was threatened with removal, but upon the fact of its constituting the inheritance or estate of its owner; and, in that light, the kind or quality of the substance would be quite as immaterial as the value of it. And such we understand to be the rule in this state. In More v. Massini, 32 Cal. 594, the court says: "The gravamen is a threatened trespass upon land. The trespass is in the nature of waste, and it will be committed unless the defendant is restrained. Should the threat be fulfilled, the plaintiff would be deprived of a part of the substance of his inheritance, which could not specifically be replaced. In the class to which this case belongs no allegation of insolvency is necessary. The injury is irreparable in itself." Citing Mining Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 322; Hicks v. Michael, 15 Cal. 116; Leach v. Day, 27 Cal. 646; People v. Morrill, 26 Cal. 360. The findings show that the tunnel which the defendant is constructing through the plaintiff's land is of a permanent character. It disturbs the plaintiff's possession, and, if permitted to continue, will ripen into an easement. That, of itself, is sufficient to entitle him to an injunction. Poirier v. Fetter, 20 Kan. 47; Johnson v. City of Rochester, 13 Hun, 285; Williams v. Railroad Co., 16 N. Y. 97. The finding that the injury is not irreparable is inconsistent with the findings which describe the character of the work which it is sought to have enjoined. "The injury is irreparable in itself," and the solvency of the defendant is an immaterial circumstance. The findings leave no room for doubt as to the plaintiff's title to the premises, and that, coupled with the fact that the threatened injury is per se irreparable, entitles the plaintiff to the relief demanded in his complaint; and we think the error committed by the court in dissolving the injunction should be corrected. Cases of palpable error or abuse of discretion are excepted from the rule under which this court declines to interfere with the granting, refusing, continuing, or dissolving of injunctions; and that rule applies more especially, if not exclusively, to preliminary injunctions. We do not think that it applies to a case in which an injunction is continued or dissolved after trial and findings upon all the material issues. In that case, as in any other in which the findings do not support the judgment, it should be reversed. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment on the findings that the injunction issued in the first instance be perpetual, and that the plaintiff recover his costs.

SURVIVAL OF ACTIONS — DEATH OF PARTY PENDING APPEAL—RES JUDICATA.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 385, which provides that an action shall not abate by the death of a party when the cause of action survives, and the case may, upon the death of a party, be continued against his representative or successor in interest, the death of a party pending an appeal does not oust the jurisdiction of the supreme court, and a failure to substitute his representative does not render its judgment void.

2. A judgment in a former action of ejectment is a bar to a present action between the same parties, as to the same questions, although the patent of the land, which is the subject of contention, had not at that time been granted to the person under whom both parties claimed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action of ejectment by Thomas Phelan against Montgomery Tyler and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Thom & Stephens, for appellants. S. Haley, H. K. S. O'Melveny, and Bicknell & White, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The defendants are the legal representatives of William Standifer and John Dunlap, deceased, and the court finds "that said William Standifer and John Dunlap, in 1873, commenced an action of ejectment against Thomas Phelan for the recovery of the possession of the land described in said answer, to-wit, the two small tracts comprising about twenty-one acres, from defendants herein, and that such proceedings were afterwards had in said action and upon the trial thereof that a judgment was entered by the district court in this county, wherein the same was pending, and in favor of the defendant in that action, for costs, in March, 1875; and that afterwards, on the 10th day of June, 1875, said Standifer and John Dunlap took an appeal to the supreme court of the state, but did not perfect said appeal by filing the transcript in said court until July 14, 1875, before which last date, viz., on the 7th day of July, 1875, the said John Dunlap had departed this life; that no suggestion of the death of said John Dunlap was ever made, and no person or legal representative of said deceased was ever substituted in said supreme court for said John Dunlap, deceased; but, without any such suggestion or substitution, the cause was argued and submitted to the supreme court for final determination on the 19th day of October, 1875, and thereupon, then and there, said supreme court rendered its judgment, from the bench, of reversal of the judgment of said district court, and remanded same, with directions to said district court to enter judgment for the plaintiffs in that action on the findings, and on the 30th day of November, 1875, issued its remititur to said district court;" from which the court reached the conclusion, "that the supreme court, at the time the decision and judgment of that court was rendered, * * * had no jurisdiction, and that said judgment was void." If the death of John Dunlap, occurring at the time it did, operated as an ouster of the jurisdiction of the supreme court of the case, the conclusion at which the court arrived is doubtless correct. But the death of a party pending an appeal does not have that effect in any case. "An action or proceeding does not abate by the death or disability of a party * * * if the cause of action survive or continue. In case of the death or any disability of a party, the court, on motion, may allow the action or proceeding to be continued by or against his representative or successor in interest." Code Civil Proc. § 385. There is nothing in the Code which would justify the inference that the death of a party pending an appeal ousts the jurisdiction of the supreme court, and renders its judgment void, unless before the rendition thereof a representative of said deceased party be substituted in his stead. This question was not directly involved in Ewald v. Corbett, 32 Cal. 493, or in McCreery v. Everding, 44 Cal. 284, although there are expressions in both which militate against the view which we entertain on the subject, and which seems to us to be supported by a preponderance of the authorities. The reason why, "in such cases, the judgment is simply erroneous, but not void, * * * is because the court, having obtained jurisdiction over the party in his life-time, is thereby empowered to proceed with the action to final judgment; and, while the court ought to cease to exercise its jurisdiction over a party when he dies, its failure to do so is an error to be corrected on appeal if the fact of the death appears upon the record, or by writ of error coram nobis if the fact must be shown aliunde." Freem. Judgm. § 153. As we view it, the judgment in the former action is no less a bar by reason of its being rendered before a patent for the land had been issued. Both parties then claimed, and now claim, under Pico, and their conflicting claims were in no way affected by the issuance of the patent. The question to be determined in the former action and in the present one is the same,—that is, which party acquired Pico's interest in the land. Such being the case, the former adjudication, in our opinion, constituted a bar to the present action. Byers v. Neal, 43 Cal. 210. Judgment reversed, with directions to the court below to enter a judgment in favor of the defendants upon the findings.

WARRING v. FREEAR.¹

INJUNCTION—VERDICT—FINDINGS BY COURT.

1. In a suit to enjoin defendant from interfering with the accustomed flow of water in a stream, plaintiff claimed by appropriation and use "all the water in the stream to the extent of 60 square inches, measured under a four-inch pressure." Defendant claimed the water as a riparian owner, and the issues were submitted to a jury. Their verdict found plaintiff entitled to 45 inches of water of the stream in question under a 4-inch pressure. Held, this does not cover the issues, which involve the respective rights of both parties.

2. It is the duty of the court, in such a case, to find on the issues not covered by the verdict, unless such findings are waived; failing which, its judgment will be reversed, and a new trial granted.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county. Reversed.

Suit by B. F. Warring against J. B. Freear for an injunction. There were judgment for plaintiff on the verdict of a jury, and an order refusing a new trial, from which defendant appeals.

Blackstock & Shepherd and John F. Godfrey, for appellant. Williams & Williams and C. A. Storke, for respondent.

MCKEE, J. This case arises out of an action to enjoin the defendant from maintaining a dam across a running stream of water in Ventura county, known as the "Arroyo Circo," and from interfering with the accustomed flow of water therein. According to the statement in the complaint of the plaintiff's cause of action, the plaintiff claimed to have acquired the right, by appropriation and use from November, 1869, until March, 1881, to "all the water of the stream to the extent of sixty square inches, measured under a four-inch pressure, for irrigation and domestic purposes." The right thus asserted by the plaintiff was denied by the defendant, who claimed by his answer to have been a riparian owner on the stream from the month of May, 1869, until the commencement of this action; and, as such, was entitled to use, and had used, peaceably and continuously, from May, 1869, the water of the stream for watering his animals and for other domestic purposes; and he admitted that he had, in March, 1881, built a dam across the creek on his land, about 80 rods above the plaintiff's dam, by means of which he diverted about half the water flowing in the stream, for his stock and his natural wants, and for irrigating about one acre of his land, which he had set out in vines and fruit trees. As shaped by the pleadings, the controversy between the parties therefore involved issues of fact as to the respective rights of the parties to the water of the stream. And, as the plaintiff sought to enjoin the defendant from any interference at all with the water flowing in the stream, it became the duty of the court to try and determine the issues raised by the pleadings, and to pass upon the rights claimed by each of the parties, subject, of course, to its power to order any or all of such issues to be tried by a jury. Section 592, Code Civil Proc. But in exercising such power the court should direct proper issues to be framed upon the pleadings and submitted to the jury, (Curtis v. Sutter, 15 Cal. 263,) and the verdict of the jury must respond to all the issues submitted to them. A general verdict is insufficient and should be disregarded, (Brandt v. Wheaton, 52 Cal. 430;) and even a special verdict is only advisory to the court. It may be set aside or disregarded or adopted. In this case the issues were submitted generally to the jury. The verdict returned was as follows: "We, the jury, find that the plaintiff is entitled to forty-five inches, under a four-inch pressure, of the waters of Circo creek, described in the complaint; and we further find that he has been damaged in the sum of one dollar by reason of the unlawful diversion of said waters by the defendant." Upon adopting the verdict, it became the equivalent of a finding by the court; but it did not cover the issues raised by the pleadings. Where the verdict of a jury, in an equity case, does not respond to all the issues, it becomes the duty of the court, if it adopts the verdict as far as it is responsive to the issues, to proceed and find, upon the evidence which has been given and any other which may be offered by the parties, as to the other issues not covered by the verdict, (Bates v. Gage, 49 Cal. 126; Wingate v. Ferris, 50 Cal. 105,) and to make and file its decision in writing, stating the facts found and the conclusions of law drawn therefrom, as required by sections 632, 633, Code Civil Proc. Until such a decision has been made and filed, the case cannot be considered as tried, (Hastings v. Hastings, 31 Cal. 95.) unless the filing of such a decision has been waived. There was no waiver of findings in this case, and, as the court failed to ascertain and determine the rights of each of the parties to the use of the water of the stream in controversy, the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. It is so ordered.

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1883.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS—ESTOPPEL—COSTS

1. The verdict of a jury in an equity case is merely advisory to the court, and, where the findings of the court are contrary thereto, and there is a conflict of evidence, the appellate court will not weigh the evidence to determine whether it preponderates in favor of the findings of the court or those of the jury.

2. The fact that a person has constructed a canal at large expense through another's land, and has maintained and used it, together with a strip of land on each side of it, for irrigation, for more than five years, with the knowledge of the land-owner, and that the latter has never objected to nor opposed it, are not sufficient to estop the land-owner to question the other's title to the canal and land in question.

3. In a suit by many plaintiffs to quiet title against one so constructing and maintaining a canal through their land, a finding that "divers of the plaintiffs" assisted him in its construction is too indefinite to be considered on the question of estoppel.

4. While plaintiffs, in whose favor costs have been decreed, are not estopped by receipt of them to question on appeal so much of the decree as is in favor of defendants, on reversal of the decree they will be required to refund such costs before they are allowed a new trial.

Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county. Affirmed.

Suit by P. J. Stockman and others against the Riverside Land & Irrigating Company to quiet title. There were judgment for defendants, and an order refusing a new trial, from which plaintiffs appealed.

H. M. Willis and B. B. Harris, for appellants. Waters & Gibson, for respondents.

Ross, J. Action to quiet title. It appears from the record that "by arrangement of both parties, made in open court, six special issues were framed to be presented to a jury then and there impaneled to answer the same by their verdict as advisory to the court." Afterwards the jury returned answers to the issues. The cause was then proceeded with, and, after being argued, and submitted to the court for decision, the court made and filed findings of fact and conclusions of law; and it is insisted on behalf of the appellants that, as the findings of the court upon some of the material issues are contrary to the findings of the jury upon the same issues, this court should, notwithstanding a substantial conflict of evidence upon those issues, proceed to weigh the evidence, and decide whether it preponderates in favor of the findings of the court or of the jury. To this we cannot assent. The findings of fact by the court are as conclusive here as they would be if no jury had been impaneled in the case. The question for us is whether there is sufficient evidence to sustain the findings of the court upon the material issues; and a substantial conflict in the evidence upon such issues is sufficient to sustain a finding either way upon them. It has often been held here that the verdict of a jury in an equity case is but advisory to the court, and in this case it appears to have been the understanding between the parties that it was to be regarded in that light only. The findings of the court below upon the issues are, with one exception, next to be noticed, full, and, in our opinion, sustained by the evidence. We would therefore affirm the judgment and order, but for the fact that the defendant, in its answer, set up ownership in itself of a certain water ditch, referred to in the record as the "upper ditch or canal," together with the right of way therefor through that portion of the land described in the complaint, which is found and adjudged to be the property of the plaintiffs. On the issue made as to this question the court below found that the ditch in question was completed in 1871, (more than five years before the commencement of this action,) at heavy cost; and that it "was constructed, maintained, and used, including a strip fifteen feet wide on each side of the center line thereof, * * * for the purposes of irrigation, * * * with the knowledge of the plaintiffs and their grantors, and without any objection or opposition thereto on their part, and with the active assistance of divers of said plaintiffs." With this finding as its basis, the court below adjudged "that the defendants are the owners of and entitled to the possession of and the right to maintain the upper canal of the Riverside Land and Irrigation Company, and to use a strip of land fifteen feet wide on each side of the center of said canal therefor." The finding did not determine the ultimate fact in issue, and is not sufficient to sustain that part of the decree above quoted.

The learned judge who tried the cause and rendered the decree was of the opinion that the facts found in respect to the ditch constituted an estoppel in pais, but in this he was in error. The plaintiffs are many in number, and the finding that the ditch was constructed, maintained, and used "with the active assistance of divers" of them is obviously too indefinite to apply to any particular one or more of the plaintiffs, and it does not purport to include them all. It must therefore be laid out of consideration. The only facts, therefore, left on which the defendants must rely as constituting an estoppel are that the canal cost about $15,000, and that it was constructed, maintained, and used, including a strip of land on each side of it, for the purpose of conducting water for irrigation, with the knowledge of the plaintiffs and their grantors, and without any objection or opposition thereto on their part. We have been cited to no authority, and, know of none, that holds that the bare fact that the ditch was constructed with the knowledge of the plaintiffs and their grantors, and without objection on their part, though at heavy cost, is sufficient to operate an estoppel. "There must be some degree of turpitude in the conduct of a party before a court of equity will estop him from the assertion of his title; the effect of the estoppel being to forfeit his property, and transfer its enjoyment to another. Biddle Boggs v. Mining Co., 14 Cal. 368. For the error committed in the particular last mentioned the judgment and order must be reversed.

The point made for the respondents, to the effect that appellants are estopped from questioning the correctness of the judgment because of the voluntary receipt of the costs awarded them by the judgment, is not well taken. The costs are but an incident of the relief given the plaintiffs, the receipt of which does not come within the rule invoked by respondent. As, however, we find it necessary to reverse the judgment by virtue of which they received the costs, it is but right that the amount of costs so received, to-wit, $2,337.32, with legal interest from the date of the receipt, be returned to respondents, to the end that the status quo be restored. The power of this court thus to order is expressly given by section 957 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is therefore here adjudged that the judgment and order of the court below be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial; such new trial, however, not to be had, without the consent of the defendants, until the plaintiffs shall have refunded to defendants the costs, with interest, as aforesaid. And it is further here adjudged that, upon the going down of the remittitur from this court, the court below enter an order to the effect that the plaintiffs pay defendants the amount of said costs and interest.

MORE v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO *et al.*¹

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 28, 1883.)

PROHIBITION — REMOVAL OF TRUSTEE — JURISDICTION.

A suit by heirs to procure the removal of a trustee holding lands for their benefit is not an action "for the recovery of real estate," such as the constitution of California requires to be brought in the county where the land is situated; and prohibition will not lie to arrest such a suit on the ground that the court is without jurisdiction, because the subject of the trust lies in another county.

In bank.

Petition by A. P. More for a writ of prohibition to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and F. W. Lawlor, a judge of such court. The action to restrain which the writ was sought was brought by the heirs of Nicholas A. Den for the removal of trustees holding lands for their benefit under Den's will. Petitioner was a sub-tenant of the lessee of the trustees. Writ denied.

Flournoy, Mhoon & Flournoy, for petitioner. O. P. Evans, for respondents.

Ross, J. The writ of prohibition only goes to arrest the proceedings of a tribunal, corporation, board, or person when such proceedings are without or in excess of the jurisdiction of such tribunal, corporation, board, or person. Unless, therefore, it can be held that the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco has no jurisdiction of the action entitled Welch v. Huse, it is plain that the writ cannot go; for this writ is not the appropriate one to procure the annulment of proceedings already had. It is contended that the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco has not jurisdiction of the action of Welch v. Huse because of that provision of the present constitution declaring that all actions for the recovery of the possession of real estate shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or some part thereof, affected by such action or actions, is situated. But in no sense is the action entitled Welch v. Huse one "for the recovery of the possession of real estate." It is an action brought by certain cestuis que trustent to procure the removal of the trustees, the appointment of other trustees in their stead, and the appointment of a receiver to take, hold, and protect the property

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — MAKERS — CORPORATION.

1. A certain note was signed: "G. A. Colby, Pres't Pac. Peat Coal Co. D. K. Tripp, Sec. pro tem.;" and it was indorsed by G. A. Colby and several others. Held, that on the face of it it is the note of the coal company.

2. As Colby and Tripp did not charge themselves personally as makers by executing this note, they are not so liable in an action thereon, even if they had not the requisite authority from the corporation for its execution.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco. Affirmed.

Action by the Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank of Savings against G. A. Colby and others on a promissory note. There were judgment for defendants, and an order refusing a new trial, and from the latter plaintiff appeals.

Garber, Thornton & Bishop, for appellant. Wm. H. H. Hart, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This case was heard in department 1, and an opinion filed therein April 30, 1883. Subsequently a hearing by the court in bank was granted; which hearing has been had. We are satisfied with the reasons given and the conclusion reached by the court in department; therefore the order is affirmed.

The following is the opinion of the court in department 1:

Ross, J. The note in suit is in the words and figures following: "$6,750. San Francisco, April 21, 1875. On the twentieth day of April, 1876, without grace, we promise to pay to the order of H. H. Hubbard, six thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum from date until paid, principal and interest payable only in gold coin of the government of the United States, for value received, payable at the Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank, San Francisco. [Signed] G. A. COLBY, Pres't Pac. Peat Coal Co. D. K. TRIPP, Sec. pro tem." Indorsed: "H. H. HUBBARD. G. A. COLBY. E. B. DEAN. E. TRIPP. J. H. L. TUCK." On this note the plaintiff sued G. A. Colby and D. K. Tripp as makers, and the other defendants as indorsers. The first question, therefore, presented, is: Is the note the individual note of Colby and D. K. Tripp, or is it the note of the Pacific Peat Coal Company? Read as a whole, we think it apparent from its face that it is the note of the company, indorsed by the individuals Hubbard, Colby, Dean, E. Tripp, and Tuck. It is urged for the appellant that the words, "Pres't Pacific Peat Coal Co.," and "Sec. pro tem.," are but descriptive of the persons to whose names they are respectively attached; but to this we cannot assent. Promissory notes, like other instruments, must be given that effect which accords with the obvious intent of the parties to them. The individual indorsement of the note by G. A. Colby can be readily understood when the note is viewed as the principal obligation of the Pacific Peat Coal Company, but it would be quite out of the usual order of things for Colby to indorse his own note when he was not the payee thereof. Then, too, to hold the words "Sec. pro tem." but descriptive of the person, would be to give a forced and unnatural meaning to those terms. It is said that the Pacific Peat Coal Company could not be held liable on this note. Of course, that question cannot be determined in this action; but, if the present record correctly presents the facts, it is difficult to see why not, for it there appears that the Pacific Peat Coal Company was at the time of the execution of the note a corporation duly incorporated; that Colby was its president, and D. K. Tripp its secretary pro tem.; that Colby, as such president, and D. K. Tripp, as such secretary pro tem., were by resolution of the corporation duly authorized and directed to execute the note to Hubbard, the consideration for the note being the conveyance of certain tule lands by Hubbard to the corporation, and the indorsers, other than the payee, being obtained because of Hubbard's unwillingness to accept the note of the corporation without personal indorsement. While, as already observed, the question of the liability of the Pacific Peat Coal Company is not now for consideration, the matters just alluded to certainly strengthen the view we take of the note itself. Inasmuch, therefore, as by the note in suit Colby and D. K. Tripp did not charge themselves personally, they are not liable in the present action, which is founded strictly upon the note itself, even if they did not have the requisite authority from the corporation for its execution. Hall v. Crandall, 29 Cal. 567. From these views it results, we think, necessarily, that no cause of action is stated against the indorsers of the note, inasmuch as no notice of the failure of the maker to pay appears to have been given them, conceding that demand was not necessary, or, if necessary, that it was made. Order affirmed.

DEED—CONDITIONS—EJECTMENT—JUDGMENT—COMPETENCY.

1. Where the granting clause of a deed conveys an estate in fee-simple, a subsequent proviso that the grantee shall not convey without the consent of the grantor is void, as a restriction upon alienation, general as to time and persons, and therefore repugnant to the estate created.

2. A judgment in ejectment does not affect a title acquired by defendant after the commencement of the action.

3. The operation of a judgment, pending an appeal therefrom, is suspended, and the judgment is inadmissible in evidence in any controversy between the parties.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco. Reversed.

Action by Eugene Murray against Alfred A. Green and others. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment for defendants and an order refusing a new trial.

E. A. Lawrence and Mat. I. Sullivan, for appellant. B. S. Brooks, for respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J. When this case was here on a former appeal, the court said: "The nature and effect of the instrument executed by and between Mary Ann Roussel and husband and McLeran has not been discussed by counsel, but they treat it as a deed of conveyance, and no objection is suggested as to the validity of any of the clauses of the instrument. One of those clauses prohibits McLeran from selling, conveying, or otherwise disposing of any of the lands without the written consent of Mary Ann Roussel. The deed of McLeran to Murray, made during the pendency of the action of McLeran v. McNamara et al., having been made without the written consent of Mary Ann Roussel, is absolutely void as a conveyance of any interest acquired by McLeran under the first-mentioned deed, if the above clause is valid. The habendum clause recites that the premises are held, the undivided half for McLeran and the other half in trust for said Mary Ann; and another clause provides that, if McLeran shall obtain the seisin or possession of any of the lands, such seisin and possession shall ipso facto operate to invest the said Mary Ann with the legal seisin, possession, and estate of and in the undivided half thereof, at her election. It is unnecessary at this time to define the precise effect of each of those clauses, but it is sufficient to say that, if valid, they vested in said Mary Ann, or her assigns, the legal title to the undivided half of the land in controversy, it being the land which McLeran recovered of Murray in the above-mentioned action. Pending that action, Mary Ann Roussel and her husband and McLeran executed a deed purporting to convey this land to Moon, and he conveyed the same to Porter, the defendant's lessor, who held the same at the commencement of this action. From these facts it results that Porter holds the entire title to the tract of land in controversy, or the undivided half thereof,—that is to say, the entire title if the deed of McLeran to Murray is void because of the first-mentioned clauses of the deed, or the title to the undivided half if he can rely only on the last two mentioned clauses of the deed. The finding, therefore, to the effect that the plaintiff, Murray, is the owner in fee of the premises is contrary to the evidence." 4 Pac. Coast Law J. 215.

The foregoing will be better understood if it be stated that the deed of McLeran to Murray antedates that of McLeran and the Roussels to Moon, who conveyed to Porter, the lessor of the defendant. So that the case turns upon the construction of the deed of the Roussels to McLeran. If that vested in him any title to the premises or to any part thereof, his deed to plaintiff doubtless conveyed such title to the latter. But it was determined on the former appeal that the deed of McLeran did not convey any title to more than an undivided one-half of said premises to the plaintiff, leaving it an open question whether it conveyed any title whatever. By the terms of the deed of the Roussels to McLeran they granted, bargained, and sold to said McLeran, his heirs and assigns, all the lands, tenements, and hereditaments of Mary Roussel situated in San Francisco, to have and to hold the undivided moiety thereof to the proper use and behoof of him, the said McLeran, his heirs and assigns, subject, however, to the provisions thereafter inserted as to the power and control of said McLeran over the said moiety so conveyed to his own use; and to hold the other undivided moiety in trust for the sole and separate use of the said Mary Ann Roussel and her heirs "in manner following, that is to say, in conjunction with the said parties of the first part, or the said Mary Ann Roussel, and not otherwise, to demand, sue for, enter, take, and hold seisin and possession of the same: * * * provided, however, that the said Thomas G. McLeran shall not have any power or authority to sell, convey, or in any wise to dispose of, charge, or incur any part or portion of said property, land, tenements, or hereditaments hereinbefore mentioned and conveyed to him, whether the same be that moiety conveyed to him for his own use or that moiety conveyed to him in trust for the use and benefit of the said Mary Ann; nor shall he have any authority to make or deliver any lease, leases, or releases, nor any acquittance nor adjustments of or concerning said land, tenements, or hereditaments, without obtaining the proper signature and written consent of the said Mary Ann to each and every instrument or writing whereby any of said matters and things may be done; and provided further, that whenever the said McLeran shall hereafter obtain seisin or possession of any of said property hereinbefore mentioned, such seisin and possession of him, the said McLeran, shall, ipso facto, operate to invest the said Mary Ann with the legal seisin and possession of the one undivided half thereof, and to invest her with the legal estate in the one undivided one-half thereof, at her election; and if, for her better security in that behalf, the said Mary Ann shall hereafter make demand of the said McLeran in that behalf, then the said McLeran shall convey to her in fee the one undivided moiety of all or any part of said land, tenements, or hereditaments whereof he may have become actually seised or possessed as aforesaid." This is followed by a covenant of the Roussels that, while said McLeran is faithfully carrying out said trusts, they will not, nor will either of them, without his consent, convey or affect the title held by them, or either of them, to any of said lands, and that any conveyance made by them contrary to this clause shall be null and void; and finally McLeran covenants that he will faithfully perform said trusts at his own proper costs and charges. But for the provision in regard to alienation, the grant of an undivided moiety of the premises to McLeran would be full, absolute, and explicit; and, if the provision in regard to alienation be a condition restraining alienation, and repugnant to the interest created, it is void. Civil Code, § 711.

This is simply declaratory of the common law, (Co. Litt. 223a,) and is not controverted. It is also conceded by counsel for respondent that the clause of the deed is one restraining alienation, but is not, he insists, repugnant to the interest created, and therefore not void. Independently of the condition, the interest created by this deed is the largest possible estate which a man can have in land. And one of the incidents inseparably annexed to an estate in fee-simple is the right of alienation, which "passes by the grant as perfectly as if it were given by the express grant. Without such right, the estate granted would be neither a fee-simple nor any other estate known to the law." De Peyster v. Michael, 6 N. Y. 437. "A condition annexed to an estate given is a divided clause from the grant, and therefore cannot frustrate the grant precedent, neither in anything expressed nor in anything implied which is of its nature incident and is separable from the thing granted." Stukeley v. Butler, Hob. 170. "The reason why such a condition cannot be made good by agreement or consent of parties is that a fee-simple estate and a restraint upon its alienation cannot in their nature co-exist." De Peyster v. Michael, supra. It is difficult to conceive of a condition more clearly repugnant to the interest created by a grant of an estate in fee-simple than the condition that the grantee shall not alien the same without the consent of the grantor. With such a condition, if valid, annexed to the grant, it "would be neither a fee-simple nor any other estate known to the law." The owner of the reversion or possibility of reverter may restrain the alienation by his grantee in fee. This appears in Brooke's Abridgment, title "Condition," 57a. "If a man have lands for a term of years on condition that he shall not grant over his estate, this is good by reason of the reversion remaining in the lessor. The contrary of a feoffment on such condition, or that the feoffee shall not waste, for no right or interest remains in the feoffer." In a grant to a corporation, on the dissolution of which there would be a reverter to the grantor, a condition against alienation would be valid; but, in the absence of a possibility of reverter, the imposition of such restraint is not sanctioned by any case so far as we are advised. But it is claimed that, while a general restraint upon alienation is bad, a partial restraint is valid; but is it not obvious that, in case of a grant in fee-simple, where there is no possibility of reverter, any restraint whatever on the power of alienation would be repugnant to the interest created by the grant? In commenting upon the clause in which Littleton says: "But if the condition be such that the feoffee shall not alien to such a one, naming his name, or to any of his heirs, or of the issue of such a one, etc., or the like, which conditions do not take away all power of alienation from the feoffee, etc., there such condition is good," Chancellor KENT says: "But this falls within the general principle, and it may be very questionable whether such a condition would be good at this day." 4 Kent, Comm. 131. In Doe v. Pearson, 6 East, 173, it was held that a condition only to alien to a particular person or persons is good, but this has been distinctly overruled in Attwater v. Attwater, 18 Beav. 330. In the note to Bradley v. Peixoto, Tud. Lead. Cas. Real Prop. 862, it is said: "A condition not to alien within a limited time, it seems, is good;" and cites Churchill v. Marks, 1 Colly. 445, and Large's Case, 2 Leon. 182. An examination of Churchill v. Marks satisfies us that it does not support that proposition; and it has been demonstrated that Large's was a case of contingent remainder, in which this question was not involved. Mandlebaum v. McDonell, 29 Mich. 78. In the case before us the restriction is not limited as to time or persons. In these respects it is general, and, in our opinion, void.

Respondent's counsel relies very much on Sprague v. Edwards, 48 Cal. 239, in which it was held that when a conveyance is made to a trustee, who has no interest in the trust fund, with power to sell and convey the trust land, subject to the approval of the cestui que trust, the deed of a trustee to a purchaser will not pass the legal title without the approval of the cestui que trust. It is impossible to discover the slightest analogy between that case and this. The doctrine there announced might apply to the conveyance of the undivided moiety in trust from Mrs. Roussel, which, as before shown, is wholly eliminated from this case. The title which the plaintiff acquired from McLeran after the commencement of the action of McLeran v. McNamara et al., in which plaintiff was a defendant, was not in issue in that action, and therefore was not affected by the judgment therein. Having acquired that title after his answer in that action was filed, Murray might do as he has done,—wait until he was ousted, and then bring an action, founded upon a title acquired subsequently to the commencement of that action, to recover possession. "Under the Code a judgment in ejectment is conclusive of but two points,—the right of the possession in the plaintiff at the commencement of the suit, and the occupation of the premises by the defendant at the same date." Freem. Judgm. 301; Yount v. Howell, 14 Cal. 465. While the appeal from the judgment in Porter v. Woodward et al. was pending, the operation of that judgment for all purposes was suspended, and it was not admissible in evidence in any controversy between the parties. Freem. Judgm. 328; Woodbury v.

Bowman, 13 Cal. 634. The conclusion at which we have arrived is that by the deed of McLeran to Murray he acquired the fee of an undivided moiety of the demanded premises, and that the court erred in finding otherwise. Judgment and order reversed.

MORRISON, C. J., and THORNTON, McKEE, and McKINSTRY, JJ., concurred.

Walter D. Stephenson and Graves & Chapman, for petitioner. Bicknell & White, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. By means of certiorari the petitioner seeks to call in question the validity of a judgment and an order made and entered considerably more than one year before the presentation of his petition. In Keys v. Marin Co., 42 Cal. 256, it was held that, unless circumstances of an extraordinary character be shown to have intervened, the remedy through a writ of certiorari should be held to be barred by the lapse of the same length of time that bars an appeal from a final judgment. In the present case no excuse is shown for the delay in the application. Writ denied, and proceedings dismissed

ZUMWALT et al. v. DICKEY. (No. 14,258.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1891.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—TRESPASS BY ANIMALS—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. An action against the owner of sheep for damages for trespass committed by them is not affected by Act Feb. 4, 1874, which gave the owner of the land on which the trespass was committed the right to distrain the animals trespassing, provided proceedings were begun within 60 days; but is governed by the ordinary statute of limitations barring actions for trespass to real property after three years. Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 338.

2. Where defendant, in an action for trespass, is merely a naked trespasser, he cannot object to the admission of patents from the state as prima facie evidence of plaintiff's title.

3. Where the ruling of the court below as to the admission of evidence is erroneous, but the record affirmatively shows that defendant was not injured thereby, defendant is not entitled to a reversal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by D. K. Zumwalt and others against W. J. Dickey for trespass. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals.

N. O. Bradley and W. D. Tupper, for appellant. Oregon Sanders, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, C. Action for damages for trespasses alleged to have been committed on the lands described in the complaint, by defendant, who wrongfully and unlawfully, and without plaintiffs' consent, entered thereon with large bands of sheep, and trod down and depastured all of said lands, and all the grass and herbage that grew thereon, during the years 1888 and 1889, and otherwise injured the same, to the great detriment of plaintiffs, and to their damage in the sum of $910. The complaint further alleges plaintiffs' title and possession and right of possession to the lands therein described. The answer specifically denies the material allegations of the complaint, and avers that in the summer season of 1889 defendant's sheep were for a short time "camped on a portion of said lands known as the 'Horse Corral Meadow,' but the feed and grass had all been eaten off by the sheep of other parties, and defendant's sheep did not do any damage whatever to said land in camping thereon." The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $305, from which judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial this appeal is taken by the defendant. At the trial, plaintiffs severally offered in evidence certain patents from the state of California to themselves; also a deed to them from one Crowley. These patents, and the deed purported to convey to plaintiffs all of the lands described in the complaint, and when offered as stated, were objected to by defendant on the grounds: First, that the action was barred by the statute of limitations because it was not commenced within 60 days after the alleged trespasses were committed, as required by the provisions of the statute approved February 4, 1874, entitled "An act to protect agriculture and to prevent the trespassing of animals upon private property in the counties of Fresno, Tulare, Kern, Ventura, Santa Barbara, San Luis Obispo, and Monterey;" second, because one of the patents for swamp and overflowed land did not show on its face that the lands described therein were ever listed to the state. The objections were overruled by the court, and the rulings excepted to by the defendant, and assigned as error.

With reference to the first ground of objection, it is sufficient to say that, as this action was not founded on that statute, the cause of action stated in the complaint was not barred by the statute of limitations. Section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action for trespass to real property may be commenced within three years after the cause of action has accrued. Triscony v. Brandenstein, 66 Cal. 515, 6 Pac. Rep. 384.

While the alleged erroneous ruling of the court on the second ground of objection, cannot properly be considered by us on this appeal, for the reason that the patents and the deed are not brought up by the record, yet at the same time we have no hesitancy in saying that we do not entertain the slightest doubt of its correctness. The patents were properly admitted as prima facie evidence of title in the plaintiffs, which the defendant was in no position to disprove, because it appears that he was a mere naked trespasser. To disprove the evidence of title furnished by the patents he must bring himself "in some privity with the common source of title." Hebbron v. Graves, 78 Cal. 380, 20 Pac. Rep. 740; Leviston v. Ryan, 75 Cal. 293, 17 Pac. Rep. 239; Doll v. Meador, 16 Cal. 296; Foss v. Hinkell, 78 Cal. 158, 20 Pac. Rep. 393.

It is next insisted that the court erred in permitting one Lillas, a witness for the plaintiffs, to testify, against the defendant's objection, that he saw a couple of thousand sheep "on the Horse Corral Meadow" in August, 1889, and that the man in charge of the sheep, who said his name was Frank Burr, told him that they belonged to the defendant. It appears that only a portion of the Horse Corral Meadow is embraced in the lands described in the complaint; and as plaintiffs failed to show that Burr, who was in charge of the sheep, was connected in any way with the defendant, or that the sheep which the witness saw belonged to the defendant, or that they were on that part of the Horse Corral Meadow owned by the plaintiffs, it follows that the ruling of the court was clearly erroneous; but the record affirmatively shows that the defendant was not injured thereby, for the reason that the damages proved to have resulted from the trespasses admitted are at least equivalent to those awarded by the judgment herein. As the remaining errors complained of are unimportant or noticable, we do not deem it necessary to notice them. We recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

COWAN v. ABBOTT et al. (No. 14,196.)

JOINDER OF ACTIONS — PLEADING — ADMISSIONS.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 427, providing that plaintiff may unite several causes of action in one complaint arising out of contracts, plaintiff may allege (1) that he rendered services reasonably worth a certain sum; and (2) an express contract, whereby defendants agreed to pay him the salary usually paid for such services, reasonably worth a stated amount, and, in addition, a bonus of $1,000 if he accomplished a certain result.

2. Plaintiff alleged in each count that he had received a certain amount, and no more. This defendants did not deny, but they denied having made the contracts alleged, and plaintiff's averments as to what his services were reasonably worth; and alleged that he had been fully paid. Held, that it was not thereby admitted that plaintiff had been paid only the amount alleged.

3. Defendants were engaged in operating a mine as tenants in common, rather than as "mining partners." Their clerk testified that he was told by one of them to make an agreement with plaintiff as to the salary to be received by him, and that it was fixed at $4 per day and board. Plaintiff admits, as shown by his receipts, having been paid $354. Each receipt expressly stated that the amount received was in full to date, or to a day specified, and the last one acknowledged "payment in full to date." Held, that plaintiff could not repudiate the arrangement made with the clerk on the ground that one of defendants had not authorized him to make it, when defendant had ratified the contract.

4. Plaintiff having testified that he did not receive such sum in full payment, whether he did or not was a question for the jury, as his acceptance of it was not conclusive against him.

5. Plaintiff admitted the receipt of more than four dollars per day. Held, that the jury should have been instructed, at the request of defendants, that, if there had been an express agreement fixing his salary at that amount and board, and if he had been fully paid, they should find for defendants.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court. Butte county; P. O. HUNDLEY, Judge. Reversed.

Action by W. A. Cowan against A. Abbott and William Gregory for compensation for services rendered as superintendent of their mine. There was a judgment for plaintiff. From an order denying their motion for a new trial defendants appeal.

H. V. Rearden, for appellants. John Gall, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. Plaintiff sued defendants, as mining partners, to recover for services alleged to have been rendered as superintendent of their mine. The complaint contains two counts. In the first he avers that he performed labor for defendants between certain dates at their request, and that said services are reasonably worth $3,050, of which amount defendants have paid $650 only, leaving $2,400 still unpaid. In the second count he avers an express contract, by which defendants agreed that, if plaintiff would take charge of their mine, pump out the water so that it could be worked, and thereafter manage, work, and mine it, they would pay him the salary usually paid to mining engineers and superintendents, which he avers was reasonably worth $300 per month; and, in case he succeeded in keeping the water out for six months, they would pay him a further sum, as a bonus, of $1,000. The defendants, answering separately, deny specifically each allegation in the complaint, except that they admit that plaintiff performed certain service for them, but not as a mining superintendent; that the service continued from the 1st of March to the 29th of October, 1888. They aver that he was employed to take charge of the machinery and pumps; that he was fully paid long before the commencement of this action.

There was no error in refusing to compel the plaintiff to elect upon which count of his complaint he would rely. The two causes of action arise out of contracts, and can therefore be joined, under section 427 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Theoretically, they are distinct causes of action, and there is no requirement that they shall correspond or be consistent with each other.

As defendants did not rely upon their motion for a nonsuit, the question now is as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the decision. We fail, however, to discover the variance complained of.

Plaintiff testified, in effect, that if he did not get the water out, and keep it out, so the mine could be worked, for six months, he should receive no pay; but if he did so he should be paid a salary, the amount of which was not agreed upon, and $1,000 bonus. His second cause of action states that defendants agreed that, if plaintiff would go to their mine and take charge, and pump out the mine so that it could be worked, and would work and manage the same, etc., he was to be paid a salary and $1,000.

The fact that plaintiff accepted four dollars per day, stating, as he says he did, that it was not in full, though a very strong circumstance against him, was not conclusive. Its effect was for the jury.

Plaintiff, in each count of his complaint, avers that he has been paid for his services the sum of $650, and no more. This amount is not specifically denied in the answer, but the contracts alleged are denied; also the value of the services; and it is averred that plaintiff had been fully paid. We think defendants do not, by this state of the pleadings, admit that no more than $650 had been paid.

On the trial, Thomas James, a witness for the defendants, testified that he was clerk at the mine; that Abbott, one of the defendants, directed him to fix with plaintiff what he was to receive, that he did so, acting for defendants; that plaintiff agreed to take four dollars per day, and was paid at that rate, and receipted in full up to October 30, 1888, when the work ceased. The receipts were placed in evidence, and so far sustain the witness. They each expressly state that the sum received was in full to date, or to a date mentioned. The last, dated October 30th, at which time it is admitted the mine was closed, is for $304.10, "payment in full to date." Plaintiff only claims that he worked 6 months and 25 days. In his evidence he admitted, as his receipts proved, that he had been paid $854. This would be more than four dollars per day for that time.

The facts in contest seem to have been: (1) The value of plaintiff's services; (2) whether defendants made the express contract alleged by plaintiff; (3) whether there was an express agreement, as claimed by defendants, fixing plaintiff's compensation at four dollars per day and board; and (4) whether he had been fully paid. The jury had the right, upon the evidence, to find for the defendants upon the last two issues, and the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that, if they so found, plaintiff was not entitled to additional compensation.

If, as testified by James, plaintiff agreed to receive four dollars per day and board for his services, and did accept it as full payment, he cannot now repudiate the arrangement on the ground that James was not expressly authorized by both of the defendants. By their conduct in this case, both defendants have ratified the act of their agent; and, although the defendants, as partners, were engaged in working a mine, it was evidently not what was technically known as a mining partnership, which in some respects resembles a tenancy in common. For the error mentioned the order should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

EQUITY—CANCELLATION OF COMPROMISE—FRAUDULENT PREFERENCES.

Where plaintiff sought to avoid, in equity, a composition agreement entered into with the other creditors of defendants, on the ground that some of the other creditors received secret advantages at the time unknown to him, and not mentioned in the agreement, the facts that plaintiff, at the time he signed the agreement, did so in consideration of a promise by the agent of defendants to let him have $7,500 at once, and that he gave the agent an order on one of the defendants for that amount, expressing upon its face that it is "payable from the proceeds of the claim" held by plaintiff against defendants, is fatal to the right of plaintiff to equitable relief.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge. Affirmed.

Petition by Frank O'Brien against Greenebaum & Straus. Decree for defendants.

Gordon & Young, (J. F. Sullivan, of counsel,) for appellant. Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, (Edward R. Taylor, of counsel,) for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The right of plaintiff to any part of the relief demanded in the complaint depends entirely upon the validity of the composition agreement referred to therein, and which the plaintiff asks to have adjudged fraudulent and void. If that agreement is to stand, then plaintiff, as a party thereto, is bound by its terms, and his claim against defendants Greenebaum & Straus for their alleged conversion of his money and stocks must be satisfied in the manner thereby provided. The plaintiff alleges that this agreement is fraudulent and void as to him, because certain of the creditors who signed it received fraudulent preferences for the purpose of inducing them to do so, and that such facts were concealed from plaintiff, and were a fraud upon his rights, and his signature was by reason of such concealment fraudulently obtained. The court below found as facts that, for the purpose of securing the assent of certain creditors to said agreement, such creditors were, with the knowledge of Greenebaum & Straus, given secret advantages and benefits superior to those held by a majority of the creditors. But the court also found that on or about the 9th of November, 1886, Moses Greenebaum, a brother of one of the defendants, and who seems to have been the one through whom the other creditors received their preferences, requested plaintiff to sign "the said agreement, and the plaintiff at first refused to sign the same; but two days thereafter, to-wit, on the 11th day of December, 1886, he agreed with said Moses Greenebaum that he would sign the same if, in consideration thereof, he, the said Moses Greenebaum, would immediately upon his so doing let him have the sum of $7,500, and simultaneously therewith the plaintiff gave said Moses an order in writing, drawn by the plaintiff upon the defendant Wolfsohn, for the sum of $7,500, expressed upon the face of the order to be payable 'from the proceeds of the claim I hold against Greenebaum & Straus;' and thereupon the plaintiff signed the aforesaid agreement." "By this means the plaintiff himself obtained a secret advantage and benefit greater than and superior to that held by the majority of the creditors of said Greenebaum & Straus, who signed the agreement." The court thereupon rendered judgment in favor of defendants, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The judgment is right upon the findings. There can be no doubt that the law exacts the utmost good faith between the debtor and his creditors in the matter of entering into a composition agreement for the payment of debts. Such agreements rest upon the express or implied understanding that all the creditors are to share in the assets of the debtor upon the terms and in the exact proportion stated in the agreement itself, and, this being so, it is universally held that if some of the creditors have, unknown to the others, obtained as a consideration for their assent to it more favorable terms than are disclosed by the agreement, the agreement is fraudulent and void as to the creditor who was deceived and induced to accept its terms upon the supposition that there were no concealed preferences, and that he was thereby being dealt with as fairly and justly as others. Story, Eq. Jur. § 378; O'Shea v. Oil Co., 42 Mo. 397; Bank v. Hoerber, 88 Mo. 37; Burrill, Assignm. § 181. But, in order to entitle a creditor to relief from such a fraud, practiced upon him by his debtor and others joining with him in the composition agreement, he must himself come into court with clean hands. The application of this familiar principle of equity is fatal to the right of plaintiff to any relief in this action. The findings are to the effect that, in the very transaction of which he complains, the plaintiff himself, as a consideration for his assent to the agreement which he now seeks to avoid, bargained for and obtained a secret preference over other creditors, and which was fraudulent as to them. Under these circumstances he is not in a position where he can be heard to complain because other creditors obtained secret advantages similar to his own. Judgment and order affirmed.

ALLEN et al. v. SAN JOSE LAND & WATER Co. et al. (No. 14,098.)

EASEMENTS—ALTERATION.

1. Where defendant is the owner of an easement to run water in an open ditch over plaintiffs' land, and undertakes to lay pipes in the ditch of no greater carrying capacity than the ditch, the proposed alteration is such as tends to substitute a new and different servitude.

2. Where plaintiffs in such case seek to enjoin the laying of pipe, it is immaterial that the alteration would be less burdensome to the servient estate, and more convenient to defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. WADE, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by Lyman Allen and others against the San Jose Land & Water Company and Henry Dobbs for injunction. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal.

R. Dunnigan and Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, for appellants. Waller J. Hughes and Chapman & Hendricks, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment upon the pleadings. The only material facts alleged in the complaint, and not denied by the answer, are: (1) The ownership of the land; (2) the defendant has placed pipe upon plaintiffs' land preparatory to laying the same permanently in a ditch across said land. Defendant's answer alleges that "it is the owner of a certain ditch across plaintiffs' land used for the purpose of carrying water to its [defendant's] land for the purpose of irrigation; that the pipes to be laid are of no greater carrying capacity than its said ditch, and when so laid by defendant will render the use of the easementless burdensome to plaintiffs' servient estate, and more convenient to defendant; that no damage has been done to plaintiffs' land, and no damage or trespass threatened or intended." Defendant also sets out the facts showing title to the ditch and water by adverse user. Upon these facts judgment was rendered for plaintiffs for a perpetual injunction restraining the defendant from laying the pipe, and this is an appeal from such judgment.

The principal question in this case is whether an easement to run water over plaintiffs' land in an open ditch is satisfied by carrying the water in a closed pipe, laid on the bottom of such ditch, and then covered to the depth of 13 inches with dirt, provided that such change in the easement would benefit the servient estate and convenience the dominant estate. After a careful examination of many authorities, we are led to conclude that the allegation of the answer "that the alteration in the mode and manner of using the easement will be less burdensome to the servient estate, and more convenient to the defendant," adds no strength to defendant's position, and that such fact is never a material element in a case where it is insisted that the alteration is so substantial as would result in the creation and substitution of a different servitude from that which previously existed. In speaking of this question of easements, in Merritt v. Parker, 1 N. J. Law, 460, the chief justice said: "No one has a right to compel another to have his property improved in a particular manner. It is as illegal to force him to receive a benefit as to submit to an injury. In the light, therefore, in which we view this subject, whether the drawing of the water from the pond by means of a trench, or the causing an additional quantity of water to flow through the lands of the defendant, was productive of benefit or injury, are, in my opinion, questions into which we have no right to examine." In Dickenson v. Canal Co., 15 Beav. 260, it was said: "If the plaintiffs have purchased from the company a right to preserve the waters in the rivers Belbourne and Gade from being diverted in any other manner than * * *, it is no answer to them to say that the diversion proposed will not be injurious to them, or even to prove that it may be beneficial to them. It is for them to judge whether the agreement shall be preserved, so far as they are concerned, in its integrity, or whether they shall permit it to be violated." In Johnston v. Hyde, 32 N. J. Eq. 455, where the owner of the servient estate attempted to substitute a covered way for an open ditch, the court said it could not compel Mr. Hyde to accept the substitution of a covered aqueduct for an open race-way. The same doctrine has been emphatically announced by this court in Gregory v. Nelson, 41 Cal. 278. The action was brought to restrain the defendants from destroying plaintiffs' water-ditch by their mining operations upon a claim across which the ditch ran. Plaintiffs' title to the water-ditch rested upon their right by prescription. The court found in favor of plaintiffs' title, but permitted defendants to proceed with their mining operations, provided they would construct a metal pipe at this point of sufficient capacity to carry the water in lieu of said ditch. In referring to this portion of the judgment the court said "it knew of no principle of law or power in a court of equity to justify or authorize such an invasion of the property rights of one private party to serve the wishes, convenience, or necessities of another private party. It is the duty of courts to protect a party in the enjoyment of his private property, not to license a trespass upon such property or to compel the owner to exchange the same for other property, to answer private purposes or necessities." If the owner of the servient estate is not allowed to materially alter the character of the servitude, although such alteration would not result in damage to the dominant estate, but might be a benefit thereto, we see no reason why the same principle would not apply to the owner of the dominant estate in making material alterations in the character of his easement.

Section 806 of the Civil Code provides: "The extent of a servitude is determined by the terms of the grant or the nature of the enjoyment by which it was acquired;" and it appears to be settled doctrine that both parties have the right to insist that so long as the easement is enjoyed it shall remain substantially the same as it was at the time the right accrued, entirely regardless of the question as to the relative benefit and damage that would ensue to the parties by reason of a change in the mode and manner of its enjoyment. Defendant's title rests upon a right by prescription, an implied grant, a grant which limits and defines defendant's rights as fully and as strictly as though the grant were express; and for the purpose of determining its terms we must look to the nature of the enjoyment by which it was acquired, for, as provided by the section already quoted, the nature of that enjoyment measures the extent of the servitude. It is quite apparent that the nature of defendant's enjoyment in this case was the right of conducting water in an open ditch over and across plaintiffs' land; that right was acquired by actually conducting the water in an open ditch over plaintiffs' land, and the servitude resting upon their realty is exactly of the same character, and no more or less burdensome than though plaintiffs had expressly granted to defendant the right to conduct water in an open ditch across their land. In Ware v. Walker, 70 Cal. 595, 12 Pac. Rep. 475, the court said: "The plaintiff, by the construction of his ditch and the appropriation and user of the water of the stream, acquired, as against the defendant, * * * as complete and perfect a right to maintain his ditch and have the water flow to, in, and through the same as though such right or easement had vested in him by grant."

The only question remaining is whether defendant's easement to conduct water in an open ditch over plaintiffs' land is substantially altered by placing a covered pipe-line in the ground in lieu thereof.

Will the terms of a grant for an open ditch of water be satisfied by laying an under-ground pipe-line? We are clearly satisfied to the contrary, and that such a course, if continued, would result in an extinction of the easement, and the creation of a servitude upon plaintiffs' land different in kind from the one previously existing there. In Heath v. Bucknall L. R. 8 Eq. 5, the rule was declared, quoting from Curriers' Co. v. Corbett, 2 Drew. & S. 355: "Where a house having ancient lights is burned or pulled down and rebuilt, and the question arises whether the character of ancient lights which belonged to the windows of the old house attaches to those of the new house, it appears to me that the principle to be applied to the solution of the question is this: To inquire whether the new windows would impose on the servient tenement either an additional servitude to that to which it was subjected when the old house existed, or a different servitude from that which previously existed. * * * To deprive them of that character the change must be material, either in the nature or in the quantity of the servitude imposed." We believe the threatened alteration by defendants in the mode of using the easement is of such a substantial character as to be without the terms of its implied grant, and therefore tends to the creation of a new and different servitude. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

MCCROSKEY v. LADD et al. (No. 13,297.)¹

DEED BY CORPORATION—VALIDITY—MARKETABLE TITLE—RIGHTS OF VENDEE.

1. A vendor agreed to convey a good and sufficient title or refund any payments made. Defendants refused to accept the deed offered. It appeared that one of the deeds relied on by the vendor in the chain of title was executed by the president and secretary of an incorporated association under their private seals, and recited that they were authorized at an annual meeting of the association to make deeds. Held that, since both the recital in the deed from the association and the absence of a corporate seal failed to show any authority from the board of directors to convey, plaintiff did not offer a good paper title, within the meaning of the contract.

2. A purchaser is not bound to accept a title resting on the statute of limitations, or take the risk of determining from facts which he might learn dehors the record whether or not the statute of limitations can be successfully pleaded against an adverse claim.

3. Defendants are not called upon to specifically point out defects in a title where the contract does not require it, and especially where the flaw is in a deed from a dissolved corporation.

4. The flaw in the deed from the corporation relates directly to the authority of the officers to act, and is not a defect which can be cured by Civil Code Cal. § 1207, which provides that any instrument affecting real property, recorded prior to January 30, 1873, shall be deemed to impart "notice of its contents to subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers, notwithstanding any defect, omission, or informality in the execution of the instrument, or in the certificate of acknowledgment thereof, or in the absence of any such certificate."

5. A vendor may be able through litigation to establish a perfect title, and yet be unable to enforce a contract for the sale of his land.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Benito county; JAMES F. BREEN, Judge. Affirmed.

Action on a promissory note by one McCroskey against one Ladd and another. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals.

John L. Hudner and M. T. Dooling, for appellant. N. C. Briggs, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. On August 25, 1887, the plaintiff agreed in writing to sell and convey certain lots to the defendants on the following terms: "$650 at this date, and the balance ($5,850) within sixty days from this date. And said McCroskey, upon receiving said payments, agrees to make a deed of said property to said persons, and convey title to said premises to them; and, if said persons fail to make said payments as herein named, they shall forfeit all right to said property, and all right to all payments made herein. If said title is not sufficient and good, then said moneys shall be refunded." Thereupon the defendants executed and delivered to the plaintiff a promissory note for $650. Although not required to do so by the terms of the contract, the plaintiff furnished to the defendants an abstract of his title, which the latter submitted to their attorney, who, after examination, reported that it did not show title in the plaintiff. Defendants notified plaintiff of the fact, whereupon the latter furnished another abstract, which was submitted by consent to another attorney, agreed upon by the parties, for his opinion, but the plaintiff did not agree to be bound thereby. After examining the abstract, said attorney, Archer, gave an opinion in writing that the title was not good. This opinion was handed to the plaintiff, but it did not point out, nor did the defendants ever state to the plaintiff, wherein the title was defective. The second abstract referred to was furnished after the expiration of the 60 days named in the contract. Soon after the opinion of Archer was given to the plaintiff, the defendants demanded of the latter the possession of the note referred to. After said demand plaintiff tendered to McClay, one of the defendants herein, a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, in the usual form, describing the property, and demanded payment of the sum of $6,500. The demand was refused, whereupon this action was commenced to recover the amount named in the note.

One of the deeds in the chain of title upon which the plaintiff relies was a deed from the San Justo Homestead Association, a corporation created under the laws of this state, to one Sowle. This deed was executed by the president and secretary of said association, and attested by their individual seals. No corporate seal was attached thereto. The deed recites that to facilitate the sale of certain lots "said association did, at their annual meeting held at Gilroy, California, on the 20th day of January, 1869, pass the following, to-wit: 'Resolved, that the president and secretary of the San Justo Homestead Association, at the time of any sale of said lots, be, and are hereby, authorized and empowered in the name and on behalf of said association to make, execute, and acknowledge a good and sufficient deed of conveyance of grant, bargain, and sale to the purchaser or purchasers of any lots sold, on receipt of the purchase price thereof.' " It is not essential to the validity of a deed executed by a corporation that it should contain a recital of the authority under which it is made, unless such recital is made necessary by statute. 1 Devl. Deeds, § 343. But, where such authority is recited, it will be deemed to be the only authority upon which the officers executing the deed acted. The corporate seal is prima facie evidence that the officers executing the deed had been authorized by the board of directors to act. "It is settled law in this state that a corporation can only act, can only speak, through the medium prescribed by law, and that is its board of trustees." In re La Solidarite Mut. Ben. Ass'n, 68 Cal. 394, 9 Pac. Rep. 453. The recital in the deed to Sowle indicates that the authorization of the president and secretary came from the stockholders at an annual meeting of the association. At least it does not show that the authority came from the board of directors, and the absence of the corporate seal indicates that the board never acted upon the matter. The authority of the officers to execute the deed must affirmatively appear. Kahn v. Supervisors, 79 Cal. 399, 21 Pac. Rep. 849; Koehler v. Iron Co., 2 Black, 715. In cases of this kind, a title, to be good, must be one which is "free from litigation, palpable defects, and grave doubts; should consist of both legal and equitable titles; and should be fairly deducible of record." Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 180, 18 Pac. Rep. 262. The question as to whether or not the vendor has acquired a perfect title by adverse possession is not to be considered. The purchaser is entitled to a good paper title, sufficient in law, "and was not bound to accept title resting upon the statute of limitations, or take the risk of determining from facts which he might learn dehors the record whether or not the statute of limitations could be successfully pleaded against the adverse claim." Benson v. Shotwell, 87 Cal. 56, 25 Pac. Rep. 249.

It is claimed by appellant that the respondents were estopped from claiming any advantage by reason of these defects, because they were not pointed out at the time the objection was made to the title; that, if they had been, the defects might have been cured. The contract does not fix any time or place any duty upon the respondents with regard to an examination into the title or notice to the appellant of any defects which might be discovered therein. The respondents were entitled to rely on the record as they found it. Assuming, however, that it was the duty of the respondents under this contract to point out any imperfections in the title discovered by them, the record shows that the plaintiff was not injured by their failure to give him notice of the defect referred to. The only object in requiring such notice in any case is to give the vendor an opportunity to correct the defect. The court found that the San Justo Homestead Association was dissolved by a decree of the county court in 1877. It would have been impossible, therefore, for the plaintiff to have removed the imperfection in his title before the time named for the completion of the purchase. Conceding, furthermore, that the only question is whether the plaintiff's title was in fact good, and that the authority of the officers of the corporation to execute the deed might have been shown by the minutes of the board of directors, it is sufficient to say that no such showing was made. Proof of the absence of the corporate seal cast upon the plaintiff the burden of showing that the president and secretary were authorized by the board of directors to execute and deliver the deed. Koehler v. Iron Co., supra.

It is claimed by appellant that their irregularity in the execution and acknowledgment of the deed was cured by the provisions of section 1207 of the Civil Code. That section provides that any instrument affecting real property, recorded in the office of the county recorder prior to January 30, 1873, shall be deemed to impart "notice of its contents to subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers, notwithstanding any defect, omission, or informality in the execution of the instrument, or in the certificate of acknowledgment thereof, or in the absence of any such certificate." But the imperfection we have been considering is not a mere defect, omission, or informality in the execution of the instrument, or in the certificate of acknowledgment thereof, but is one which relates directly to the authority of the officers to act.

At the conclusion of their brief, counsel for appellant state that respondents' objections "go to the very foundation of appellant's title," and, if approved by the judgment of this court, will obscure the title to property valued at millions of dollars in and about the town of Hollister. The fear thus expressed, however, is groundless. A vendor may be able through litigation to establish a perfect title, and yet be unable to enforce a contract for the sale of his land. We do not determine in this action whether plaintiff's title is or is not good in fact. The stipulation in the contract that, "if said title is not sufficient and good, then said money paid shall be refunded," must be held to mean that, if there should appear to be such uncertainty about the title arising from the record as to affect its marketable value, the plaintiff would return the money or note which he had received from the defendant. The title must be free from "litigation, palpable defects, and grave doubts." If it is not, "a court of equity will not compel its acceptance, and cast upon him the risk of litigation, and the embarrassment of a questionable title." Townshend v. Goodfellow, 40 Minn. 319, 41 N. W. Rep. 1056. Judgment affirmed.

I concur: GAROUTTE, J.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the judgment. The plaintiff had the right to bring an action for the specific performance of the contract of sale against the other parties thereto, and in order to maintain such action it would have been necessary for him to show that he had tendered to the defendants a deed of conveyance of the lands described in said contract, and that such conveyance was sufficient to vest in them the title thereto. Instead of commencing such an action, he has brought the present one against two of the parties to that contract for a portion of the purchase price of the land, without having tendered to either of them any conveyance. At the time this action was commenced the plaintiff had the right to recover the whole of the purchase price of the land if he had the right to recover any of it, but he could maintain such an action only after a tender of a conveyance. He could not, however, sever his contract, and recover from two of the purchasers a portion of that purchase price, without thereby waiving his right to the remainder, or without giving to them any consideration therefor. He was not entitled to retain the land and at the same time recover its value from the defendants.

MALONE v. BEARDSLEY et al. (No. 13,793.)

APPEAL—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW.

An error in granting a nonsuit is an error in law, and will not be reviewed on appeal unless excepted to.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Del Norte county; JAMES E. MURPHEY, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by John Malone against W. H. Beardsley and others. Plaintiff was nonsuited and appeals.

Lucas & Miller, for appellant. L. F. Cooper and L. F. Cobwin, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit, and the case is brought here on a bill of exceptions. It appears that the case was tried by the court, without a jury, and, when the plaintiff rested, the defendants moved for a nonsuit, and the court granted the motion on the ground that there was "a failure of proof to warrant a judgment of this court in favor of plaintiff." The appellant contends that, under the evidence introduced by him, he was entitled to a judgment against the respondents, and that the court therefore erred in granting their motion. The respondents object that the points made for a reversal of the judgment cannot be considered, for the reason that no exception was taken to the ruling of the court. This objection seems to be well taken. The law must now be regarded as settled in this state that an error in granting a nonsuit is an error in law, and must be excepted to, or it will not be reviewed on appeal, and that it can not be reviewed on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the decision. Schroeder v. Schmidt, 74 Cal. 460, 16 Pac. Rep. 243; Flashner v. Waldron, 86 Cal. 211, 24 Pac. Rep. 1063; Warner v. Darrow, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 737. Here the record does not show that any exception was taken to the order of the court granting the nonsuit, and, in the absence of such showing, it must be presumed that no exception was taken. It follows that the judgment should be affirmed.

KRUMDICK v. WHITE. (No. 13,522.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 1, 1891.)

TERMINATION OF AGENCY—DEATH OF PRINCIPAL.

A contract of agency, merely authorizing the agent to carry on the principal's business while the latter is disabled, vests in the agent no interest in the subject-matter of the agency, and the agency is terminated by the death of the principal, under Civil Code, § 2356.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Lake county; R. J. HUDSON, Judge. Reversed.

Action by Jennette Krumdick against Daniel W. White to recover personal property. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

Yell & Seawell and Bond & Fishback, for appellant. R. W. Crump, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action of claim and delivery, for certain personal property, was brought by the plaintiff as executrix of the last will and testament of her deceased husband, William Krumdick, against the defendant, White, who had purchased the property from one J. F. Edmunds, after Krumdick's death, of which White had notice. Edmunds claimed the same by virtue of a written instrument made by Krumdick in his life-time, while he lay wounded and unable to transact business. The only claim under which Edmunds could have any right to sell the property and transfer the title thereto to White, must be based upon the terms of the written instrument which Krumdick made to Edmunds. If at Krumdick's death the powers of agency given to Edmunds ceased under that instrument, then he could not sell the property, and under the testator's will the executrix would have the right to the possession thereof. The instrument was one which constituted Edmunds the agent of Krumdick, while disabled, to carry on his business as a hauler of freights, and to do all acts in that behalf which Krumdick could. But it did not vest any interest in Edmunds in the subject-matter of the agency confided and intrusted to him, and at Krumdick's death the power of Edmunds to sell ceased as to White, who had notice of Krumdick's death before the former purchased the property. Section 2356, Civil Code.¹ It is plain, therefore, that the jury found contrary to the evidence, under the sixth instruction granted by the court for the plaintiff. In this view of the matter, it becomes unnecessary to discuss any other point made, and we advise that the judgment and order be reversed.

¹ Section 2356 provides that, unless the power of the agent is coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency, it is terminated by the death of the principal.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed.

RICE v. COOK et al. (No. 13,544.)

INJUNCTION BOND—BREACH—DAMAGES.

1. In an action on a bond, executed under Code Civil Proc. § 529, on granting an injunction, to the effect that the plaintiff will pay to the party enjoined such damages as he may sustain by reason of an injunction if the court finally decide that plaintiff was not entitled thereto, it appeared that in an action by C., defendant herein, a farmer was restrained from plowing and seeding his land from January 27th until December 27th following, when the injunction was dissolved by a final judgment for plaintiff. Held, that by such adjudication the condition of the bond was broken, and plaintiff's action thereon accrued at once.

2. Though title to a portion of the land was decreed in C., the condition of the bond was broken, since, if the injunction was wrongfully issued as to any part of plaintiff's land, and was dissolved to that extent, he would be entitled to such damages as he sustained by reason thereof.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge. Affirmed.

Action on a bond by D. M. Rice against John Cook et al. for damage sustained by reason of the wrongful issuance of an injunction. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal.

Parker & Sargent, for appellants. Geil & Morehouse, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. This is an action upon an undertaking for injunction to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the wrongful issuance thereof. It is substantially alleged that on the 27th day of January, 1887, plaintiff was lawfully possessed of the tract of land described in the complaint, and that, while so possessed, he was engaged in plowing and preparing it for seeding; that on said date the defendant Cook commenced an action against the plaintiff herein in the superior court of Monterey county, in which he procured an injunction to be issued and served on plaintiff, enjoining him from plowing or seeding said land, or using the same for any purpose whatever, or from using the grasses then growing or standing thereon; that, upon the issuing of the injunction, the defendants Hughes and Iverson, as sureties, executed their undertaking to plaintiff to pay to him such damages, not exceeding the sum of $1,000, as he might sustain by reason of the injunction if the superior court of Monterey county should finally decide that the plaintiff (Cook) was not entitled thereto; that the condition of the undertaking was broken by the dissolution of the injunction, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $800. The answer specifically denies each and every allegation of the complaint. The case was tried by the court, a trial by jury having been expressly waived, and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $272.50, from which judgment, and the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial, this appeal is taken.

It is claimed by appellants that the condition of the injunction bond was not broken by the judgment dissolving the injunction, for the reason that Cook recovered judgment for a part of the land sued for in the action in which the injunction was issued, from which it necessarily follows that the injunction was not wrongfully issued, and that, therefore, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover damages on the injunction bond. Section 529, Code Civil Proc., provides that "on granting an injunction the court or judge must require * * * a written undertaking on the part of plaintiff, with sufficient sureties, to the effect that the plaintiff will pay to the party enjoined such damages, not exceeding an amount to be specified, as such party may sustain by reason of an injunction if the court finally decide that the plaintiff was not entitled thereto." The undertaking herein, the condition of which is in pursuance of the provisions of the foregoing section of the statute, was broken by the total dissolution of the injunction by a final judgment rendered by the superior court of Monterey county on the 27th day of December, 1887. This was, in effect, an adjudication that the plaintiff in that action was not entitled to the injunction, and that thereupon a right of action upon the injunction bond herein at once accrued in favor of plaintiff, and he was entitled to recover such damages, not exceeding the sum of $1,000, as he may have sustained by reason of the injunction. In Fowler v. Frisbie, 37 Cal. 34, which was an action on an injunction bond, it was said: "It does not appear on what ground the injunction was dissolved, and the defendants insist that this order does not establish the fact that the district court finally decided that the plaintiff in that action was not entitled to the injunction when it issued, and consequently that the plaintiffs have failed to show a breach of the undertaking. But, as we construe the order, it is, prima facie at least, an adjudication that there was no foundation for the injunction, and that it ought not to have issued." The contention that the condition of the injunction bond was not broken because the plaintiff in that action recovered judgment for a part of the property sought to be recovered therein, is untenable, for the reason that, if the injunction was wrongfully issued as to any part of plaintiff's demand, and it is partially dissolved to that extent, he will be entitled to such damages, within the limit of the penalty of the bond, as he may have sustained by reason of the issuing of the injunction. High, Inj. (3d Ed.) § 1040; White v. Clay's Ex'rs, 7 Leigh, 68.

With reference to the rulings of the court occurring at the trial, and which are claimed to be erroneous, it is sufficient to say that they are either harmless or untenable, for the reason that it is evident, from the averments in the complaint and the theory upon which the case was tried, together with the well-settled rule of damages in such cases, that the words, "use and occupation," as employed by the court in its fifth finding, were not intended to limit the rule of damages to the rental value of the property. The condition of the undertaking which was broken by the judgment dissolving the injunction, and upon which plaintiff's right of action accrued, expressly provides for the payment of such damages as may be sustained by reason of the injunction, if it shall be decided that the plaintiff was not entitled thereto. Note 2, p. 488, Sedg. Dam. (5th Ed.) which is well sustained by authority, reads as follows: "In suits on statutory undertakings and bonds given to secure a defendant against damages and costs resulting from * * * an injunction * * * wrongfully issued, * * * the measure of damages is substantially indicated by the terms of the instrument as authorized by the statute, and is the actual expense and loss occasioned by the writ, * * * excluding remote damages." It appears from the findings, and there is evidence to support them, that defendant was at the time of the issuance and service of the injunction lawfully in the possession, and entitled to the possession, of the 160 acres of land in controversy, saving and excepting therefrom 10 acres; that he was deprived of the use and occupation thereof by reason of the injunction from the 27th day of January, 1887, to the 27th day of December, 1887, and that at the time he was enjoined he was engaged in farming said lands; that the condition of the undertaking was broken by the dissolution of the injunction; and that the plaintiff was damaged and injured in the sum of $272.50, solely by reason of the issuance of the injunction. Mr. High, in the third edition of his work on Injunctions, (§ 1673), lays down the following, which we regard as the correct rule of damages in cases of this character: "In determining the amount of damages to be allowed upon the dissolution of an injunction restraining one from exercising acts of ownership over his real property, the courts are not governed by arbitrary rules, but proceed upon equitable principles; the defendant being entitled to such damages as are the necessary and proximate result of such deprivation. And the loss of timber, wood, and sand, which have been taken away from the premises pending the injunction, and while the owner was deprived of the right to protect his land from invasion, may be included in the assessment of damages. So the loss of the use and rental of the premises during the time the defendant was enjoined is a proper element of damages to be recovered in an action upon the bond. So, too, damages for the crops which the defendant was prevented by the injunction from harvesting may properly be allowed, as well as waste committed upon the premises while defendants were deprived of their possession by the injunction. And in such cases the rule of damages is not limited to what the land was worth to plaintiff in the injunction suit, but the damages actually sustained by defendants by being kept out of possession will be allowed; and evidence showing that defendants lost their crops for the entire season by reason of being deprived of the land is admissible." In Edwards v. Edwards, 31 Ill. 474, it was held that, "where an injunction restraining a party from taking possession of a farm was issued in the spring and dissolved in September following, the court in the action on the injunction bond held that the measure of the plaintiff's damages was not merely the value of the use of the land during the continuance of the injunction, but the whole damage occasioned by his being kept out of the possession, including the consequent loss of crop." To the same effect is Richardson v. Allen, 74 Ga. 719. Applying the rule furnished by these authorities to the case before us, our conclusion is that the plaintiff herein is entitled to damages for all loss and injury naturally and fairly traceable to the wrongful issuance of the injunction. We therefore recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

BARNHART v. FULKERTH et al. (No. 14,603.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 2, 1891.)

DISMISSAL OF APPEAL.

Where the proceedings on appeal are regular, the appeal will not be dismissed because the court below had no jurisdiction of the proceedings for a new trial. Watson v. Sutro, 24 Pac. Rep. 172, and 25 Pac. Rep. 64, 86 Cal. 500, followed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge. Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

P. J. Hazen, for appellant. Wm. E. Turner (Chas. J. Heggerty, of counsel,) for respondents.

PATERSON, J. Respondents have moved to dismiss the appeal herein on the following grounds: (1) The notice of motion for a new trial was not served or filed within the time allowed by law; (2) said notice was not signed by the attorneys of record; (3) the statement was not served or filed within the time allowed by law.

There is an apparent conflict of authority upon the subject, but we think the better rule is stated in Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 500, 24 Pac. Rep. 172, and 25 Pac. Rep. 64, where it is held that, if the proceedings on appeal are regular, the appeal should not be dismissed upon grounds showing that the court below had no jurisdiction of the proceedings for a new trial; that such matters are proper for consideration on the hearing of the appeal. See, also, Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 374, 26 Pac. Rep. 206. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

In re VAUGHN'S ESTATE. (No. 14,451.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 8, 1891.)

DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATES.

All the heirs of an estate except W. conveyed to the latter all their interest in certain property. By W. it was conveyed to B., who petitioned for distribution to her. Notice was served on all parties interested, and the fact of B.'s ownership was before the court. No opposition was made to such petition. Held, that the prayer of B.'s petition should have been granted. Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 22 Pac. Rep. 1081, 82 Cal. 68, distinguished.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge. Reversed.

Petition of Martha A. Bradford for distribution to her as purchaser of certain property of the estate of Thomas H. Vaughn, deceased. From an order denying the petition, petitioner appeals.

Emmett Seavell, for appellant. James W. Oakes, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. Appeal by Martha A. Bradford from a decree of final distribution. Before the petition for distribution was filed, all the heirs, except William J. Vaughn, had conveyed to the latter all their interests in certain real property here involved; the said William J. Vaughn had conveyed the whole of said property to D. W. Bradford; and the latter had conveyed the same to the appellant, Martha A. Bradford. The prayer of the petition was that the said property be distributed to said Martha A.; notice was given to all parties interested and duly served; all the facts as to her ownership appeared; and "no one appeared or made any opposition upon the hearing of the said petition for distribution, or opposed the granting of the prayer thereof." The court, however, refused to distribute said property to appellant, but distributed it to the legal heirs of the deceased. We are informed by the brief of counsel that the refusal of the court to distribute the property according to the prayer of the petition and the consent of all parties interested was based upon the decision of the court in Chever v. Ching Hong Poy, 82 Cal. 68, 22 Pac. Rep. 1081. But certainly there was in that case no such question as the one involved in the case at bar. In the Chever Case the appellant, William J. Chever, had, pending the administration of the estate of his deceased father, conveyed to his mother all his interest in the real property of said estate. Upon final distribution, the claim of the mother, as grantee of William J., for some reason was not set up and was not before the court; and the court very properly, upon the facts before it, distributed the interest in question to the heir William J., who was still apparently the owner of it. He afterwards claimed that the decree of distribution conclusively estopped the mother from setting up title under the prior conveyance; but this court held that such was not the law, and that was the only point decided in the case. In stating the question we used this language: "Upon this state of facts the contention of appellant is that, notwithstanding his said deed to his mother of May 10, 1860, by which he conveyed to her all his right and title to the property, the subsequent decree of distribution entirely destroyed the effect of that deed, and conclusively established the title in appellant as of the date of the decree. The contention of respondent is that the title vested in appellant on the death of his father, by operation of law, and passed by the deed to his mother. And we think that the view of the question taken by respondent, and adopted by the court below, is the correct one." If, in the opinion rendered in that case, there was some unnecessary language used, there was none, at least, that should have created any confusion in the case at bar; for if there was an uncalled for query as to the power of the probate court, on distribution, to determine "a contested issue between an heir and alleged grantee, when the former denied the right of the latter," it was expressly said that section 1678 applied to "admitted claims." Moreover, in that case the grantee was not before the court, and he said that "it is clear that, on rendering ordinary decrees of distribution, probate courts deal only with issues and parties legitimately before them." The decree appealed from is reversed, and the court below is directed to render a decree distributing the land described in the petition for distribution to the appellant, Martha A. Bradford.

CRANE V. MCCORMICK et al. (No. 14,059.)

ACTION ON CONTRACT — MISTAKE — REAL-ESTATE AGENT — COMMISSION — EVIDENCE.

1. Where defendants in an action on a contract allege that they entered into the contract under a mistake, and there is no evidence that plaintiff knew that defendants had made such mistake, there is no such mutual mistake as to defeat a recovery under the contract.

2. Where defendants authorized plaintiff to sell certain real estate for them at any time within a year, and agreed for a valuable consideration to pay a commission if the sale should be effected in any way during that time, and the land was sold by defendants within the year, plaintiff, to recover the commission, need not show that he had produced or could produce a purchaser.

3. In such case, testimony as to conversations between defendants as to their intentions in regard to erasing that part of the contract referring to commissions being paid if the land was sold in any way, is incompetent as hearsay, it not being shown that plaintiff was present at the time of the conversations.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge. Reversed.

Action by one Crane against McCormick and Kemp to recover commission on the sale of land. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals.

Stonesifer & Minor and Richard Boyne, for appellant. Hatton & Fulkert and W. E. Turner, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. On September 30, 1866, the defendants authorized De Jarnatt & Crane to sell certain real estate at any time within a year, and agreed to pay them 5 per cent. on $35,000, the limited price, and one-half of any excess of that amount which might be realized from the sale. The written authorization contained the following provision: "And in consideration of your expenses and efforts in attracting settlers to the county it is agreed that, in event of the withdrawal of said property from sale, or in event of sale through any means during the continuance of this power, (one year,) the same commission will thus be paid as though sale had been made by you." On September 2, 1887, the defendants, without any notice to their agents, sold and conveyed the land to R. F. Osborne and Isaac Upham, it is alleged, for the sum of $40,000. Defendants refused to pay De Jarnatt & Crane anything on account of commissions, and the latter assigned their claim to plaintiff, who, as their assignee, demanded judgment for the sum of $4,250. These are the only material facts stated in the complaint, which covers 25 printed pages of the transcript. It is not alleged, except inferentially, that De Jarnatt & Crane ever incurred any expenses, or made any efforts to sell the land or attract settlers to the county; but there was no demurrer to the complaint, and the defendants cured the defect and perfected the issue by an affirmative allegation that De Jarnatt & Crane, to induce the defendants to enter into the contract, promised to publish and distribute a pamphlet advertising the land, but that no such pamphlet was ever published; nor was any effort ever made to advertise or sell the land. The answer covers 72 pages of the transcript, and is a hotchpot of denials, allegations of affirmative matter, probative facts, and superfluous circumstances. From this mass of redundant matters and tiresome reiteration, jumbled together in utter disregard of the provisions of sections 437 and 441 of the Code of Civil Procedure, we have been able to extract sufficient to show that the defendants rely upon the following defenses: That the provision of the contract above quoted was left therein by mutual mistake of the parties, and defendants always supposed until the commencement of this action that it had been eliminated from the printed form before execution; that it was understood and agreed no commissions should be paid unless the sale was effected by or through the agents; that said agents never procured a purchaser, and never did anything to advertise the land or attract settlers to the county, although they induced defendants to enter into the contract by representations that they would do so; that defendants did not sell the ground for cash, but exchanged the same for other lands in part payment and the balance in cash, and that the value of the entire consideration received did not exceed $30,000; that there was no consideration for the execution of the agreement, and, if there was, the same has failed; that plaintiff is not the real party in interest, no assignment having been made to him by De Jarnatt & Crane. There is a demurrer to the answer, covering 16 pages of the record; and a motion to strike out portions of the answer, covering 32 pages. Both were overruled. The jury found that the power of sale was signed by defendants under a mistake, and that De Jarnatt & Crane knew or suspected that it was signed under such mistake. What the mistake was is not found, but there was a general verdict for the defendants.

Under the pleadings, the court should have disposed first of the issue as to whether the clause of the contract quoted was left therein by mutual mistake. If that matter had been determined in favor of the defendants on sufficient evidence, there would have been no necessity for a jury, or for any further inquiry, because plaintiff nowhere claims that the agents found or could have found a purchaser. Plaintiff's right of action is based solely upon the provision of the contract that, if the defendants withdrew the property from sale, or effected a sale in any manner during the year, the same commissions would be paid as if the sale had been made by De Jarnatt & Crane. There is no evidence in the record to support a finding that the provision referred to was left in the contract by mutual mistake. De Jarnatt testified that the first intimation they ever had that any mistake had been made was when the answer was filed in this action. All the evidence shows that such was the fact. It is argued by counsel that because it is shown that McCormick struck out of the power of sale for his individual land a clause precisely like the one quoted above, it clearly appears that he would have modified the contract under consideration in the same way if he had not forgotten to do so. No such deduction can fairly be drawn; on the contrary, it would seem to be a natural conclusion that he intended to leave the clause in the contract which he had stricken from his own. But, however this may be, there is no evidence that De Jarnatt or Crane ever knew, or had reason to know, that defendants had made such a mistake; and, unless they did, it cannot be said that there was a mutual mistake entitling defendants to a reformation of the contract, or sufficient to defeat a recovery in this action. There was no relation of trust or confidence, and the means of knowledge as to the terms and conditions of the contract were equally open to all parties. The mere intent of the defendants, not communicated to De Jarnatt & Crane, cannot control the plain provision of the contract. Hawkins v. Hawkins, 50 Cal. 558; Stewart v. Whitlock, 58 Cal. 2; Association v. Esche, 75 Cal. 517, 17 Pac. Rep. 675.

There is no merit in the contention of respondents that De Jarnatt & Crane cannot recover on the contract without showing that they had produced, or could have produced, a purchaser within the time fixed in the contract, and the cases cited are not in point. Defendants agreed for a valuable consideration to pay the commissions if a sale should be effected in any way during the year. Their agents, acting upon the agreement, at their own expense caused a large number of pamphlets and circulars to be printed and sent to various parts of the world, advertising and offering for sale certain tracts of land, including the land described in the contract. A real-estate agent's right of recovery depends entirely upon his contract with the owner of the land. In this case the sale or exchange of the land by defendants themselves put it beyond the power of De Jarnatt & Crane to thereafter make a sale; and, according to the express terms of the contract, this entitled them, upon proof of performance on their part, to the same commissions they would have earned if they had sold the land for the amount realized by the owners. Civil Code, § 1512; Wolf v. Marsh, 54 Cal. 232; Gilbert v. Sleeper, 71 Cal. 293, 12 Pac. Rep. 172; 26 Amer. Law Reg. (N. S.) 554-567.

It is not necessary to review all of the alleged errors. What we have said will be sufficient to guide the court on another trial. It is sufficient to say that a party's undisclosed intentions are unavailing as against his acts and declarations. The testimony as to conversations between respondents with respect to their intentions to erase the clause referred to from the contract was clearly incompetent and hearsay, neither De Jarnatt nor Crane being present at the time the conversation was held. Woods v. Whitney, 42 Cal. 362. It is not claimed by respondents in their brief that plaintiff is not the real party in interest. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

Ex parte CURTIS. (No. 20,898.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 8, 1891.)

RIGHT TO BAIL—HABEAS CORPUS—NEW EVIDENCE.

1. Accused was held on a charge of murder, and the evidence on the preliminary examination showed that he was arrested by a regular police officer, and, while being conducted to the police station, he resisted the arrest, and in the struggle drew a pistol and shot the officer in the head, killing him instantly, and immediately attempted to escape. Held, that accused was not entitled to bail, under Pen. Code, § 1270, which provides: "A defendant charged with an offense punishable with death cannot be admitted to bail when the proof of his guilt is evident, or the presumption thereof great," etc.

2. Where the petitioner in habeas corpus for the purpose of giving bail seeks, in addition to the report of the evidence taken on the examination, to introduce witnesses under Pen. Code Cal. § 1484, the petition should be addressed to the superior court or judge of the proper county, and set out the discovery of such new evidence among the grounds for the petition.

Application on habeas corpus for bail of M. B. Curtis, alias Strelinger. Denied, and prisoner remanded.

Knight & Heggerty and W. W. Foote, for petitioner. Wm. S. Barnes, Dist. Atty., for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. On the 12th day of October, 1891, the petitioner was by the police court of the city and county of San Francisco held to answer without bail upon a charge of murder, alleged to have been committed in said city and county, on the 11th day of September, 1891. His petition for the writ of habeas corpus is based upon sections 1490, 1491, of the Penal Code, which provides that when a person is imprisoned or detained in custody on any criminal charge for want of bail, such person is entitled to a writ of habeas corpus for the purpose of giving bail, etc., and the sole question for decision is whether on the evidence relating to the offense charged the prisoner ought to be released on bail. A prisoner charged with any offense not punishable with death is entitled, before conviction, to be admitted to bail as a matter of right; but a defendant charged with an offense punishable with death cannot be admitted to bail when the proof of his guilt is evident, or the presumption thereof great. Pen. Code, §§ 1270, 1271; Const. art. 1, § 6. Murder of the first degree only is punishable with death, and the question therefore reduces itself to this: Is there, upon the evidence in the case, evident proof or a strong presumption that the petitioner is guilty of murder in the first degree? In determining this question it is necessary to ascertain the proper construction of the expressions, "proof is evident," "presumption is great." An examination of the decided cases discloses a wide variance of opinion upon this point, some courts and judges holding that the prisoner is entitled to bail unless the evidence against him is such as ought to satisfy a trial jury of his guilt beyond any reasonable doubt; others that bail should be denied when the evidence is sufficient to warrant a grand jury in bringing in an indictment, or, what practically amounts to the same thing, when the evidence is sufficient in law to sustain a capital conviction. Such is the rule that has been adopted in this court. In re Troia, 64 Cal. 152. In that case the evidence was extremely conflicting, and tended very strongly to discredit the only witness who claimed to have been present at the homicide. (The prisoner was, in fact, afterwards acquitted.) But this court, in denying the application for bail, said: "We cannot say, upon the evidence before us, that the superior court ought to set aside the verdict as not justified by the evidence, should the jury find the petitioner guilty of the higher degree of the crime charged. We ought not to anticipate the action of the jury by discharging the prisoner from actual custody, with or without bail, upon evidence which we are not prepared to say is so insufficient as that a verdict requiring a capital sentence, based upon it, should not be permitted to stand." I do not doubt the soundness of this rule, but, even if I did, it is, as a decision of the court, binding upon its individual members. I proceed, therefore, to inquire whether there is any substantial evidence in this case to sustain a verdict of murder in the first degree. And here a question of practice arises as to what evidence may be considered.

The petitioner asks that, in addition to the report of the evidence taken in the police court, he may be allowed to introduce the testimony of a number of witnesses not heretofore examined, by whom he proposes to impeach some of the witnesses for the people, and to prove facts otherwise tending to his exculpation. To this offer the people object, and I think the objection must be sustained. Section 1484 of the Penal Code, upon which the petitioner relies, is merely a legislative declaration of the rule commonly prevailing in the United States that the petitioner in habeas corpus may put in evidence to contradict the return, and may, of course, in a proper case examine witnesses. It does not at all help to a solution of the question as to what is proper evidence in a particular case. There are decisions, however, of some of the state and federal courts which do sustain the contention of this petitioner, but they are opposed by decisions of equal weight in other jurisdictions, and, on the whole, I think it safe to say that ordinarily, in such proceedings as this, only the depositions and other evidence returned by the committing magistrate should be considered. There may be cases in which new facts have been developed, or new evidence discovered, after the conclusion of the preliminary examination, in which it would be proper to hear additional testimony on the application for bail. But in such cases I think the petition should set out the discovery of such new facts of evidence among the grounds of the application, and that the application itself should be addressed to the superior court or judge of the proper county. The regular business of this court demands the entire time of all its members, and they cannot, in justice to its suitors, take upon themselves the hearing of oral examinations of witnesses in proceedings properly appertaining to the local courts.

Confining myself, then, to the report of the evidence taken in the police court, I find that the petitioner offered no testimony whatever, but submitted the case on the evidence adduced by the people, which I am convinced satisfactorily establishes these facts: A few minutes after 12 o'clock on the nights of September 10, 11, 1891, Alexander Grant, a regular police officer of San Francisco, on his proper beat, and wearing his star, but not his uniform, arrested the petitioner at some point on Sixth street, north of Folsom street. Why the arrest was made is left a mystery, the officer being dead, and the prisoner having thus far made no statement regarding it. From the point where the arrest was made, the officer conducted the petitioner along Sixth street to Folsom, down Folsom and across it to a point on its south side between Fourth and Fifth streets, near the southern police station. At this point a struggle ensued between the officer and the prisoner, in which the latter seems to have been resisting the efforts of the former to conduct him to the station. In the course of this struggle the prisoner drew a pistol, and shot the officer in the head, killing him instantly, and immediately attempted to escape by running away, but was pursued and captured by officers from the station, who were attracted to the scene by the noise of the pistol shots. Nothing whatever appears in the testimony tending to show justification or provocation for the killing, and the presumption is that it was malicious, and, therefore, murder. But is there anything upon which a jury would be justified in finding deliberation or premeditation, such as is necessary to constitute murder in the first degree? Upon this point all that it is necessary and all that it is proper for me to say is that, if a jury, upon the facts thus far disclosed, should find the existence of deliberate malice, their verdict could not be set aside upon the ground that there was no evidence to support it. In re Troia, supra. The application for bail is denied, and prisoner remanded.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 9, 1891.)

NEW TRIAL—SURPRISE—PAYMENT OF NOTE—EVIDENCE.

In an action on a note, defendant set up a counter-claim for goods sold to plaintiff. On the trial defendant testified that he had paid the note in full by the sale to plaintiff of a saloon, together with wines, liquors, and cigars, and by money. On a motion by plaintiff for a new trial on the grounds of surprise and newly-discovered evidence, plaintiff alleged that defendant had employed him as manager of the saloon; that defendant's name was painted over the door as proprietor; that, a year after the alleged sale to plaintiff, defendant offered the saloon for sale, and that subsequently, when the saloon was closed, he stated to others, in the presence of plaintiff, and without denial, that the saloon and its contents were his; that defendant was the lessee of the building occupied, and paid the rent, and that licenses hung on the walls in defendant's name; that the first knowledge plaintiff had of defendant's claim was obtained from his testimony on the trial, and that plaintiff did not discover witnesses to the facts alleged until after the trial. Held, that a new trial was properly granted.

FITZGERALD, C. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence and of surprise at the trial. The action was brought by plaintiff on a promissory note executed to him by the defendant for $1,080. The answer contains a general denial of the allegations of the complaint, and sets up, by way of counter-claim, plaintiff's indebtedness to defendant in the sum of $1,557.88 "for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to the plaintiff, and for cash loaned, paid out, and advanced to plaintiff between the 19th day of May, 1886, and the 8th day of October, 1888, upon open, current, running, and mutual account by and between the parties hereto." The trial of the issues thus joined resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant, which the plaintiff moved to set aside and vacate, and to grant a new trial, on the following, among other, statutory grounds: "Accident and surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against; newly-discovered evidence material for the plaintiff which he could not with reasonable diligence have discovered." The defendant, by way of defense, and in support of his counter-claim, gave evidence tending to show the payment in full of the note sued on by the sale to plaintiff of a saloon theretofore owned and conducted by defendant in the town of Galt, and by the further sale and delivery to him, at his instance and request, of wines, liquors, and cigars, and the advancement of money at different times extending over a period of more than 28 months; wherefore, and by reason of which, plaintiff became and is indebted to him in excess of the amount stated on the face of the note in the sum of $377. The newly-discovered evidence set forth in the moving affidavits, identified by the judge as having been used at the hearing of the motion, and not answered by counter-affidavits, is to the effect that, during the whole of the time the plaintiff resided in Galt, he was in the employ of the defendant as the manager of his saloon in that place; that over the door thereof was a sign with the name of the defendant painted thereon as proprietor, and that he was never at any time engaged in any kind of business in that place for himself; that about two months before the saloon was closed and the business discontinued, and something like twelve months subsequent to the alleged sale of the saloon to plaintiff, the defendant offered it for sale as his property; that when the place was closed he was in the possession of it, and at that time he stated to others, in the presence of the plaintiff, who did not dispute it, that the saloon, and the wines, liquors, cigars, and other property therein contained, belonged to him, all of which he, as the owner thereof, afterwards sold and disposed of to persons other than the plaintiff, or removed or caused to be removed from the premises; that during all of this time the defendant was the lessee in possession of the premises used as a saloon as aforesaid, and the rent therefor was paid by him, and the licenses which hung upon the wall were issued to him. Upon this showing in support of the motion, the court, on the grounds stated, ordered that the verdict and the judgment entered thereon be set aside and vacated, and a new trial granted, from which order this appeal is taken by the defendant.

It is insisted by appellant that if plaintiff had used due diligence he could not reasonably have been surprised by the testimony given by the defendant on the trial of the case; and, further, that the new trial was not granted on the ground of surprise. We cannot adopt the views of appellant in relation to this question, as it is evident from the language of the order that the ground of surprise was considered by the court in passing on the motion, and properly so, too, for the reasons given by the respondent that "the answer and so-called cross-complaint do not disclose the nature of defendant's case; that there is no intimation in either of them that he had sold or turned over to plaintiff the saloon at Galt, or that he had sold or furnished him any liquors, beer, and cigars on his account. Plaintiff therefore could not anticipate the character of the defense." The question of a new trial on the ground of surprise is largely one of discretion, and the judge who tried the case is generally in a much better position for the proper exercise of such discretion than an appellate court. It is further claimed by appellant that the alleged newly-discovered evidence was incompetent, impeaching, and cumulative, and that, if it had been heard at the trial, it would not have changed the result. It affirmatively appears that the evidence which is claimed to be newly discovered was perfectly competent, because by it plaintiff proposed to prove that the declarations and acts of the defendant were in direct conflict with the testimony given at the trial. It was therefore material to the issue, because it was original, and goes directly to the merits of the case, and was not offered merely for the purpose of impeachment. It would have been competent even if the defendant had not been a witness in his own behalf. Nor was it cumulative, for the reason that it is not "additional evidence of the same character to the same point." Section 1838, Code Civil Proc. Nor was there any evidence whatever given upon the trial of the case of the declarations and acts of the defendant, as set forth in the affidavits. It therefore follows that such evidence was entirely new, distinct, and material to the issue; and it is perfectly fair to presume that, if it had been produced before the jury at the trial of the case, the verdict would have been different. Stoakes v. Monroe, 36 Cal. 388. We would state in this connection that, where the question as to whether the evidence is cumulative is involved in doubt, it then becomes a matter of discretion, and, unless there has been a manifest abuse of it by the trial court, this court will not interfere.

It is lastly contended that the newly-discovered evidence which is claimed to be material for the plaintiff could have been, with the exercise of reasonable diligence, discovered, and produced at the trial. It appears that the case was tried at Martinez, in Contra Costa county, and that the individuals whose proposed testimony is contained in the affidavits resided at the time of the trial in Galt, Sacramento county, a distance of about 100 miles from Martinez; that the first knowledge that plaintiff had of defendant's case was obtained from the testimony of the defendant while he was testifying as a witness in his own behalf on the trial of the case; that he did not ask for a continuance, because at no time before or during the trial did he have any knowledge of any witnesses by whom he could establish the evidence set forth in the affidavits; and for the further reason that the facts disclosed thereby did not come to his knowledge until after the trial. It is therefore evident that the plaintiff possessed no means by which he could discover the evidence which is alleged to be newly discovered, and that he had no knowledge of the evidence or of the witnesses by whom it could be established until after the trial. As we are clearly of the opinion that the ends of justice will be best answered by a new trial, we recommend that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PALMER & REY v. BARCLAY et al. (No. 13,616.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 9, 1891.)

CHANGE OF VENUE — AFFIDAVIT — AMENDMENT.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 396, provides that if a defendant wishes to remove an action to the county where he resides he must, "at the time he appears and answers or demurs," file an affidavit of merits, and a demand for such removal. Sections 4 and 473 provide that the court, in its discretion, may allow an amendment to any pleading or proceeding. Held, that where such affidavit was filed at the time of appearance and demurrer, but was insufficient, in that it alleged only that the facts constituting the "defense" had been stated to their attorney, the court properly allowed an amendment, and the filing of the amended affidavit related back to the time of filing the original.

2. Where defendants were both asking for the removal of the cause, it was immaterial that the amended affidavit was not made by the defendant who made the original.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. H. REARDEN, Judge. Affirmed.

Action by Palmer & Rey, a corporation, against H. A. Barclay and others for damages caused by the negligence of defendants as attorneys. On a motion to change the place of trial, defendants' affidavit being insufficient, they were allowed to amend, and from the order allowing the amendment plaintiff appeals.

Gordon & Young, for appellant. Houghton, Silent & Campbell, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. This action was commenced in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff by reason of the negligence of defendants, as attorneys at law, while retained and employed by the plaintiff; and the appeal is from an order granting the motion of defendants to change the place of trial to the county of Los Angeles. On the 4th day of June, 1889, the defendants filed a general demurrer to the complaint, and a notice of motion to change the place of trial, with a demand in writing that the trial be had in the county of Los Angeles, upon the ground that all of the defendants then and at the time of the commencement of the action resided in that county. They also at the same time filed an affidavit, made by the defendant Barclay, in which it was stated "that he has fully and fairly stated all the facts in the above-entitled case constituting the defense of the defendant in the above-entitled action to Alex. Campbell, Esq., an attorney at law duly admitted to practice in the supreme court of the state of California, and one of the attorneys for defendants in this action, and is by his said attorney advised that he and his co-defendants have a full and complete defense to said action upon the merits." The motion came on regularly to be heard on the 23d day of August, 1889, and thereupon counsel for plaintiff asked the court to deny the motion upon the ground that no sufficient affidavit of merits had been filed. This the court refused to do, "but granted leave to the said defendants to amend their affidavits of merits, and to file upon said motion to change the place of trial an amended affidavit of merits." A new affidavit was then filed and the motion granted.

In cases like this the Code provides that the action must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the time of its commencement. Section 395, Code Civil Proc. But it also provides that "if the county in which the action is commenced is not the proper county for the trial thereof, the action may, notwithstanding, be tried therein, unless the defendant, at the time he appears and answers or demurs, files an affidavit of merits, and demands in writing that the trial be had in the proper county." Section 396, Code Civil Proc. The appellant contends that the court erred in granting the motion, for the reason that the first affidavit was insufficient, and the second could not be considered, because, as said in Nicholl v. Nicholl, 66 Cal. 37, 4 Pac. Rep. 882, "to be of any avail, such affidavit and demand must be filed when the defendant appears and answers or demurs." The affidavit filed June 4th was to the effect only that the affiant had fully and fairly stated to the attorney all the facts constituting the defense of the defendants, etc. This was clearly insufficient, as was held in Nickerson v. Raisin Co., 61 Cal. 268, and in People v. Larue, 66 Cal. 235, 5 Pac. Rep. 157.

The only question, then, is, had the court a right to consider and act upon the so-called "amended affidavit?" The Code provides that the court may, in its discretion, and upon such terms as may be just, allow an amendment to any pleading or proceeding, (section 473, Code Civil Proc.;) and that the provisions of the Code and all proceedings under it are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice, (section 4, Id.) These provisions seem to us to be broad enough to cover a proceeding like this, and to justify the action of the court below. In Burnham v. Hays, 3 Cal. 115, it was held that under a similar provision of the old practice act the trial court had power, in the exercise of its discretion, to allow a bill of costs, and the affidavit accompanying it, to be amended after the time for filing had expired, and that the filing of the amendments related back to the time of filing the originals, of which they merely formed a part.

It is further objected that the second affidavit was not sworn to by the same defendant as the first, and hence that it should be treated as an original, and not as an amended affidavit. We see no force in this objection. The affiants were jointly sued, and were both asking for a change of the place of trial; and an affidavit of merits could properly be made by one of two or more co-defendants for the benefit of all. Rowland v. Coyne, 55 Cal. 1. The affidavit in question was accepted by the court below as an amended affidavit, and in this we see no error. It follows, we think, that the order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

In re WILLIAMS' ESTATE. (No. 14,214.) 1

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 7, 1891.)

TESTAMENTARY POWERS — SALES OF LAND — CONFIRMATION.

Code Civil Proc. § 1561, providing that in sales of property by an executor under authority given in the will no title shall pass unless the sale is confirmed by the court, does not apply to sales under a will directing that "all the property of which I die the owner * * * vests absolutely in my executor, * * * said executor to hold said property * * * in trust for the uses and purposes in this will mentioned," and giving the executor power to sell any portion of the estate that may seem proper to him.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge. Reversed.

Proceedings by George E. Williams, executor and trustee under the will of Thomas H. Williams, for confirmation of a sale of land. Motion by the executor to dismiss the proceedings was denied, and an order entered making and confirming a sale of the land to another person. From this order the grantee of the executor appeals.

SHARPSTEIN, J. By the terms of the last will of Thomas H. Williams all his property was devised to his executor, George E. Williams, in trust for the payment of debts of the estate, and to distribute the remainder among various devisees. In item 9 of the will the testator declares: "That no confusion may arise in reference to title to any property of my estate, I hereby desire that all the property of which I die the owner * * * vest absolutely in my executor herein appointed; * * * said executor to hold said property, and every part thereof, in trust for the uses and purposes in this will mentioned, and for the use and benefit of my children, as herein provided. Item 10: To my executor herein appointed I give and grant the following powers and authority: (1) To carry on all business in which I was engaged at the time of my death; (2) to borrow money for use of such business, or the benefit of my estate; (3) to bargain, sell, and convey any portion or part of the property of my estate, without any order of court or any other proceeding, and to execute all mortgages or conveyances necessary or deemed proper by him; (4) to sell and convey any part or parcel of property set aside for any one of my children, after distribution," etc. "Item 2: That my executor shall pay all just claims against my estate out of the income thereof, or sales if necessary, or money borrowed." This will was admitted to probate in San Francisco on April 6, 1886, and letters testamentary on the same day were issued to George E. Williams. The administration is still pending. On July 31, 1890, George E. Williams, as trustee and executor under the will, entered into a contract to sell to Gustave Niebaum (the appellant here) certain lands in San Francisco, belonging to the estate, for the sum of $10,000, whereof $1,000 was paid by the purchaser at that date. The agreement acknowledged receipt of $1,000 in part payment, and provided that the purchase should be completed within 15 days thereafter, and contained no reference to any return to or confirmation by any court. On August 25, 1890, without the knowledge or consent of the purchaser, the executor filed a return of sale in the probate court in the usual form, requesting confirmation by the court; and an order was entered setting the petition for hearing by the court on September 5, 1890. On September 5th the hearing was postponed by consent to September 12th. On September 10th, two days before the hearing, Niebaum paid to the executor the remaining $9,000 of purchase money, and received his deed of the land, which recited the terms of the will, and purported to convey the lands pursuant thereto. This deed was recorded on September 11th. On September 12, 1890, when the hearing of the return of sale came on, one J. L. Moody filed in the probate court a written bid, offering to pay the executor $11,000 for the land. The executor moved the court to dismiss the return of sale, and to proceed no further in the matter, upon the grounds that Niebaum required no confirmation, but had paid in full for the land, and had received his deed; that the court had no jurisdiction of the sale to the purchaser, and had no power either to confirm or reject it. Moody was present in court, and opposed the motion to dismiss.

The motion was denied by the court, and an order entered accepting Moody's bid, and making and confirming a sale of the land to him for $11,000, and directing the executor to execute a deed to him accordingly. At the time this order was granted, and after the motion to dismiss was denied, Niebaum appeared, and entered his exception to the order of confirmation upon the same grounds as those of the executor's motion to dismiss.

This appeal is brought from the order confirming sale, and presents the question whether an executor to whom lands have been devised in trust for sale to pay debts of the estate can legally sell and convey them to a purchaser without confirmation by the probate court. In Re Delaney's Estate, 49 Cal. 76, the court said: "The only question remaining is whether the provision of section one hundred and seventy-eight, requiring confirmation of sale, is applicable to the sales made by the executor, when the fee of lands is devised to him in trust." That question was answered by the court in the negative. Section 178 of the statute then in force, to which reference is made by the court in the case above cited, reads as follows: "When such provision has been made, or any property directed by the will to be sold, whether for payment of debts or expenses or for any other purpose, the executor or administrator with the will annexed may proceed to sell without the order of the probate court; but he shall be bound, as an administrator, to give notice of the sale, and to return accounts thereof to the court, and to proceed in making the sale in all respects as if it were made under the order of the court, unless there are special directions given in the will, in which case he shall be governed by such directions. But in all cases no sale shall be valid unless confirmed by the court, under the rules prescribed in cases of sale of real estate by an administrator; and before granting such confirmation the court may require security, as in cases of sales of land by an administrator." The provision of the Code relating to the same subject reads as follows: "When property is directed by the will to be sold, or authority is given in the will to sell property, the executor may sell any property of the estate without order of the court, and at either public or private sale, and with or without notice, as the executor may determine; but the executor must make return of such sales, as in other cases; and, if directions are given in the will as to the mode of selling, or the particular property to be sold, such directions must be observed. In either case no title passes unless the sale be confirmed by the court." Section 1561, Code Civil Proc. It is perfectly obvious, we think, that the former provision of the statute did not apply to sales made under wills like Delaney's; that the latter provision of the Code does not apply to sales made under wills like the one now before us; and, if not, it is quite clear that the court had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the sale, and all its orders and proceedings therein are void. Order appealed from reversed, and cause remanded with directions to the court below to dismiss the return of sale.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 3, 1891.)

LIMITATIONS — RUNNING OF STATUTE — ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

1. Where a seller of stocks fails to deliver them, limitations against his implied promise to refund the purchase money begin to run from the date of his notice to the purchaser of inability to deliver.

2. After such notice, verbal promises to deliver the stocks when he could will not take the case out of the statute of limitations, by reason of Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 360, which provides that no promise is sufficient for such purpose, unless in writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge. Reversed.

Action by L. J. Rose against James Foord, administrator, to recover money had and received. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Lee & Scott, for appellant. Chapman & Hendrick, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to recover $4,000 and interest, against the administrator of the estate of N. R. Vail, deceased, by L. J. Rose. A judgment was obtained, payable in due course of administration, from which, and an order denying a new trial, this appeal is taken. The cause of action, as stated in the complaint, grew out of an agreement on the part of the deceased, in his life-time, to sell and deliver to the plaintiff, within a reasonable time, certain shares of stock, and the certificates thereof, in a mining corporation. Before the mining corporation was incorporated, or any shares of stock or certificates were issued, the plaintiff paid the sum of $4,000 as the purchase price for one-half of the decedent's (N. R. Vail's) share of the stock which he was to have, after the same should be issued. It became impossible for Vail to deliver the shares or certificates therefor, which he had promised to the plaintiff, by reason of the issuance and service of an injunction granted by a court of competent jurisdiction in the state of New York. The plaintiff made a demand in writing some time after he had paid his money, and about the 30th of July, 1883, for the shares of stock and certificates thereof, which he had purchased, and which he had become entitled to receive from Vail. On the 6th of August of that same year, Vail by letter admitted to the plaintiff the former's inability to comply with his contract and deliver the stock or certificates, and make good the proposed sale to the plaintiff. It is evident that, had the plaintiff elected so to do, he might, at the last-mentioned date, have rescinded the contract, a reasonable time having been given for its completion, and the consideration therefor having clearly failed. But, so far from promptly proceeding to stand on such legal right, the plaintiff seems rather to have preferred for several years after that date, and until the death of Vail in 1888, to rely on the contract as made originally, and to insist on its performance, encouraging Vail to suppose that such was the plaintiff's wish; and Vail in turn appearing, from time to time, up to within a few months of his death, verbally promising to get hold of the stock and certificates, and make his sale good. The right of action accrued to the plaintiff on the 6th of August, 1883, when the defendant by letter confessed his inability, and declined thereby to deliver the stock and certificates thereof. Such being the state of affairs, the plaintiff's cause of action, as stated in the complaint, arose from the failure on the part of Vail to comply with his implied promise to pay the purchase price for the stock back to the plaintiff, on the failure of the consideration of the contract of sale and delivery. The statute of limitations of two years on such a verbal promise to pay money had and received would commence to run on the 6th of August, 1883, when the consideration failed.

We perceive no force in the suggestion advanced by the appellant that the complaint states a cause of action based upon any other than a cause of action resting upon the breach of this implied promise just adverted to. When the evidence and findings are examined, even at a glance it is seen that the cause of action declared on was never understood by any of the parties at the trial to be other than what we have here stated. The date when the cause of action became barred was several years before the presentation of the claim to the administrator of Vail, who refused to pay it, and also before the institution of this suit, and before the death of Vail. There are several other points made and argued extensively and exhaustively, but, in the view that must be taken of this matter, we cannot see how they can be of any avail either to discuss or determine. The verbal promises to deliver stock when it could be done, do not appear to be sufficient to take the case out of the statute of limitations of two years. Section 360, Code Civil Proc.¹ For these reasons, after a very thorough and painstaking examination of the record and authorities cited, we are satisfied that the judgment and order refusing a new trial should be reversed, and we so advise.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCE, C.

Action by Mary L. P. Mountjoy against John B. Vance to be appointed guardian of the persons of Robbin and Stewart Vance. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

W. H. Barrows and Barham & Bolton, for appellant. J. R. Leppo, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. On the 14th of October, 1890, Mrs. Mary L. P. Mountjoy filed in the superior court of Sonoma county her petition, praying that she be appointed guardian of the persons of Robbin and Stewart Vance. She stated in the petition that Robbin was a little girl about eight years old, and Stewart a little boy about five years old; that they were the children of John B. Vance and Louise F. Vance, but that the mother was dead; that she was the grandmother of the children, and that they had been living with her at Santa Rosa, Sonoma county, and in her care and custody, for several years; and that the father was not a fit or proper person to have the care and custody of them. The father filed an answer to the petition, and denied that he was not a fit and proper person to have the care and custody of the children; denied that it was necessary that a guardian of the persons of the children should be appointed, inasmuch as he was their legal guardian; and alleged that the children were then, and had been since prior to the filing of the petition, inhabitants and residents of the city and county of San Francisco. After a hearing, the court found, among other things, that the children had been residents of Sonoma county for more than four years last past, living with their grandmother, the petitioner, who had sole care and custody of them during that time; that on the 12th day of October, 1890, the father, without the knowledge or consent, and against the wishes, of the petitioner, carried them away to San Francisco, where he resided; that the father deserted and abandoned the children more than three years previous to the time of his taking them from the custody of their grandmother; that he had not provided for their support for more than four years; and that his reputation was bad; and that the petitioner was a fit and proper person to have the custody of them. An order was accordingly entered that letters of guardianship be issued to the grandmother as prayed for, and from this order the father appeals.

The principal contention of appellant is that the court had no jurisdiction of the case, because, at the time the petition was filed, the children were not inhabitants or residents of Sonoma county; and hence that the order was void, and should be reversed. The evidence on which the order was based was as follows: The petitioner introduced evidence showing that the mother of the children was her daughter, and had been dead about four years; "that several years prior to the death of their mother, the mother and the children lived with petitioner, and were wholly supported by the petitioner; that after the death of their mother the children continued to reside with the petitioner, and to be supported by her; that the father, Vance, has not provided for the support of the children since the death of the mother; that, at various times since the death of the mother, Vance, the father, has expressed and declared to the petitioner that he was willing that she might have the care and custody of the children; that, at various times since the death of the mother, Vance had expressed and declared his intention of never reclaiming or taking the custody of the children from the petitioner; * * * that the reputation of J. B. Vance for sobriety, industry, and morality was and is bad, and has been for more than four years last past, and that he spent his earnings and money for liquors, on women, and general dissipation; that up to about one year ago Vance, the father, resided in Santa Rosa, Sonoma county; that about one year ago he went to San Francisco, and since that time has resided in San Francisco; that after going to San Francisco to reside he married, and for some time previous to the trial has lived with his wife in San Francisco; that on the 12th day of October, 1890, Vance came to Santa Rosa, and went to the home of the petitioner, where the children were, and represented to the petitioner that he desired to take the children down town to get some candy, whereupon petitioner consented, and he took the children and went away with them, as the grandmother understood, to take them down town and get them candy; that Vance then took them to San Francisco without the knowledge and consent of the grandmother; that they were in San Francisco at the time these proceedings were commenced and up to the trial thereof; that petitioner is able to maintain and care for the children." The father then offered testimony showing that his residence had been in San Francisco for the year last past, and was at the time he took the children there, and "that his present wife, Mrs. J. B. Vance, had means with which to support and care for the children, and was desirous of caring for and supporting them." In view of this evidence, we cannot say that the finding that the father had abandoned the children was not justified. He had left them for years to be supported and cared for by their grandmother, and had at various times declared his intention never to reclaim them. And that he recognized the grandmother's right to their custody will be presumed from the fact that he resorted to fraudulent means to get them away from her. If he had considered that he had a right at any time to take them away, presumably he would have asserted his right boldly, and no misrepresentations or deceit would have been used to accomplish his purpose. The general rule is that "the residence of the father during his life * * * is the residence of the unmarried minor child." Pol. Code, § 52, subd. 4. But this rule does not apply when the child is under the age of 14 years and has been abandoned by the father. In such case he forfeits his guardianship of the child, and can no longer claim its custody. St. 1873-74, p. 297. If, then, these children had been abandoned by their father, as the court below found, their residence was in Sonoma county, and it was not changed by their surreptitious removal to San Francisco. The questions involved in the case were all questions of fact, which the court below was called upon and had a right to determine. (In re Danneker, 67 Cal. 643, 8 Pac. Rep. 514,) and we see no good ground for disturbing its conclusions. We advise that the order be affirmed.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

1. A creditor's right to avoid a conveyance which is fraudulent as to him is not affected by his knowledge of the fraud at the time the conveyance was executed.

Department 2. Appeal from district court, twenty-third judicial district.

Action by George K. Fitch against John J. Corbett and others to set aside a deed made by Corbett to his wife as in fraud of his creditors, one of whom, E. M. Heistand, was plaintiff's assignor. The indebtedness to Heistand existed before the conveyance was made, but its amount was not determined until after it, by a settlement between Heistand and Corbett. The court found actual fraud in the conveyance and rendered judgment setting it aside, and refusing a new trial. Defendants appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Henry E. Highton, for appellants. Texas Angel, H. D. Tuttle, and J. C. Bates, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was instituted to set aside a conveyance alleged to have been executed to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, and especially one E. M. Heistand, the plaintiff's assignor, of her rights as creditor. Actual fraud is averred and found as a fact, and the finding is sustained by the evidence. It is argued that, because Mrs. Heistand knew of the fraudulent conveyance, neither she nor her assignor can avoid it. We cannot see that there is any reason in this position, for if she was aware of the conveyance, and knew its fraudulent character, it was still void, and she has done nothing by which her right to proceed to annul it for fraud has been waived or given up. If she knew the character of the conveyance she knew that it was fraudulent, and, by consequence, void. Carter v. Castleberry, 5 Ala. 279. Nor did she waive any right by settling with Corbett for $7,500. How the settlement of the 3d of July, 1878, purged the fraud we cannot conceive. The counsel for appellants is mistaken in viewing this case as a mere voluntary conveyance to the wife without actual fraud, and as only constructively fraudulent against existing creditors. It is, as we have said above, a case of actual fraud alleged, established, and found. We have examined the errors of law assigned, and find none of them maintainable. Judgment and order affirmed.

HABEAS CORPUS—MURDER—BAIL—EVIDENCE.

1. The supreme court is not justified in discharging on habeas corpus, with or without bail, one who is committed to answer a charge of murder, where the testimony of the state's material witnesses before the committing magistrate is not clearly shown to be false.

2. A person committed to answer the charge of murder should not be discharged on habeas corpus, with or without bail, unless the evidence against him before the committing magistrate was so insufficient that a verdict based thereon requiring a capital sentence ought to be set aside.

In bank.

Application by Salvador Troia for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

Holl & Buckley, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner was committed by a magistrate to answer to a charge of murder. His application is that he be permitted to give bail. A witness—one William Rafferty—testified at the examination before the magistrate he saw petitioner kill his wife, under circumstances such as would constitute murder in the first degree. It is claimed that petitioner should be admitted to bail because the testimony before the magistrate, taken as a whole, shows that Rafferty swore falsely in respect to material matters, and that his testimony should be rejected. But while there was testimony with respect to facts and circumstances which, if true, tended strongly to cast discredit upon Rafferty's statements, much of such testimony was in turn attacked and disputed. If, on habeas corpus, we are ever authorized to determine the credibility to be accorded to the testimony of witnesses whose material statements conflict, it is only when the testimony of the material witnesses for the people is clearly shown to be false that we can be justified in discharging the prisoner, with or without bail. It was said by the court of common pleas of Philadelphia county: "It is a safe rule, where malicious homicide is charged, to refuse bail in all cases where a judge would sustain a capital conviction if pronounced by a jury on such evidence of guilt as was exhibited to him on the hearing of the application to admit to bail." Com. v. Keeper of Prison, 2 Ashm. 227. We cannot say, upon the evidence before us, that the superior court ought to set aside the verdict, as not justified by the evidence, should the jury find the petitioner guilty of the higher degree of the crime charged. We ought not to anticipate the action of the jury by discharging the prisoner from actual custody, with or without bail, upon evidence which we are not prepared to say is so insufficient as that a verdict requiring a capital sentence, based upon it, should not be permitted to stand. Petition denied, and petitioner remanded.

ROBBERY—INFORMATION—DUPLICITY—FORMER OFFENSE.

1. An information for robbery, which alleges that defendant had been convicted of petit larceny before the robbery was committed, does not charge two offenses.

2. An allegation in an information for robbery that defendant had been formerly convicted of petit larceny is mere surplusage, and should be disregarded.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county. Reversed.

Information against Peter Boyle for assault with intent to rob. The information was as follows: "Peter Boyle is accused, by the district attorney of Yolo county, by this information, of the crime of felony, committed as follows: The said Peter Boyle, on the 21st day of May, A. D. 1883, at the county of Yolo, in the state of California, did feloniously, unlawfully, and willfully assault one Albert Lemay, with intent then and there to rob the said Albert Lemay; that the defendant, Peter Boyle, before the commission of the offense charged in this information, was in justice's court of Cache Creek township, county of Yolo, state of California, convicted of the crime of petit larceny, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute," etc. The court made an order sustaining a demurrer to the information, and rendered judgment discharging the defendant. The people appeal.

¹ This case, filed September 17, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

McKINSTRY, J. Defendant moved to set aside the information on the ground that he had not been legally held to answer, in that the commitment showed upon its face that defendant had previously been convicted of the offense for which he was held to answer. As the commitment is not in the transcript, we cannot say what is shown upon its face. Defendant demurred to the information that it does not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950-952 of the Penal Code, and that more than one offense is charged therein. The information contains all the averments required by the sections of the Penal Code. It also contains an averment that, before the commission of the offense therein charged, defendant was convicted of petit larceny in a justice's court. If, by reason of the repeal of section 969 of the Penal Code, which took effect April 9, 1880, it is no longer proper to allege a former conviction in an information or indictment, the averment with respect to the previous conviction is surplusage, which should be stricken out or disregarded. The statement that defendant had previously been convicted of a larceny is not a distinct charge of larceny to be tried under the information. Two offenses are not, therefore, charged in the information. If, by reason of the language employed in section 1158 of the Penal Code, an averment of a former conviction is proper, the information is unobjectionable. The demurrer should therefore have been overruled. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded, with direction to the court below to overrule and disallow defendant's demurrer to the information.

SMITH v. DUNN, State Comptroller.²

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1883.)

OFFICIAL REPORTER—SALARY—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

In January, 1880, the supreme court reporter entered upon his office under Const. Cal. art. 6, § 21, by which he was to receive a salary "not exceeding" a certain sum per annum; but the act fixing his salary, and making an appropriation therefor, did not take effect until July 1, 1880, leaving the salary for a period of six months unprovided for. An act was passed on March 13, 1883, making an appropriation to cover this period. Held that, since the salary for this period had not been previously fixed or provided for, the act was not in conflict with the provisions of the constitution prohibiting the legislature from granting "extra" compensation to public officers, or from affecting their salaries by special legislation.

² This case, filed September 21, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

MCKEE, J. By an act of the legislature entitled "An act to pay the salary of the reporter of decisions of the supreme court for the period elapsing from January 7 to July 1 of the year 1880," the sum of $1,208.33 was appropriated out of any moneys in the state treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to pay to the petitioner the salary due him for services as such reporter during the time specified. The act took effect on the 13th of March, 1883. Appropriation of the sum allowed by the law has, in fact, been made, and the money is now in the state treasury for the purpose of the law; but the comptroller of state refuses to draw his warrant for it in favor of the petitioner, because, as it is contended, the law conflicts with section 32, art. 4, of the constitution, which prohibits the legislature from granting any extra compensation or allowance to a public officer, and also subdivision 29, § 25, art. 4, which prohibits special legislation affecting the salary of any officer. But there is nothing in the title or the body of the act which expresses an intention to increase or diminish the salary of the officer, nor to appropriate money to him as extra compensation for official services. The entire scope of the act, as expressed in the title and in the act itself, is to fix and provide for the payment of the salary of the officer for the time specified in the act. Legislation for that purpose is not prohibited by the constitution, unless the salary itself which constituted the subject of legislation had been already fixed, provided for, or paid. If it had been, then the allowance of any additional sum for the same purpose would be in the nature of extra compensation, and the act allowing it would be unconstitutional and void. But the salary of the plaintiff for the time specified in the act had not been fixed, provided for, or paid. The facts are: On the 7th of January, 1880, the petitioner was appointed reporter of the decisions of the supreme court. As such he qualified and entered upon the duties of his office. By the constitution of the state, under which the appointment was made and accepted, he was to receive a salary "not to exceed $2,500 per annum, payable monthly." Article 6, § 21. In dealing with that provision the legislature passed an act fixing the salary at $2,500 per annum, the constitutional limit, and that sum was appropriated for the payment of the annual salary; but the act did not take effect until July 1, 1880. There was therefore an interim during which the salary had not been provided for by law. But the plaintiff was entitled to his salary during that time, because when he entered into office he consented to the terms proposed by the state as to his compensation, i. e., that he would receive a salary not exceeding $2,500 annually, payable monthly; and there arose such a legal relation between him and the state as gave him a public right to have his compensation fixed, within the constitutional limit, by legislative enactment. And when the legislature did, by the act of 1880, fix the annual salary of the office, and provide for its payment, except as to the time of nearly six months, which had intervened between the date of the appointment to the office and the taking effect of the law, there still remained a portion of the salary, due for that time, for which the plaintiff had a valid and subsisting claim against the state, and for the payment of that claim the legislature was authorized, by section 29, art. 4, of the constitution, to make an appropriation. The act of 1883 was passed for that purpose, and we find in it nothing which conflicts with any of the provisions of the constitution. Smith v. Kenfield, 57 Cal. 138, is not opposed to the views expressed or the conclusion reached in this case, in that the facts were not the same or similar. The case is therefore inapplicable. Let the writ issue.

MCKINSTRY, J., (specially concurring.) I concur in the judgment. When the legislature fixed the salary of the reporter he became entitled to demand and receive compensation at that rate from the commencement of his term so soon as the legislature should appropriate moneys for that purpose. By the act of March 13, 1883, moneys were appropriated for the payment of his salary from the commencement of his term to the date when the act fixing his salary took effect.

PEOPLE v. FONG AH SING.¹

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 26, 1883.)

MURDER—ALIBI—INSTRUCTIONS—DYING DECLARATIONS.

1. In a trial for murder it is error to charge that, if the jury find the defendant to have been at another place—as, for instance, in the society's rooms—at the time of this alleged shooting, and if his being there then creates a reasonable doubt of his having been present at the place of the alleged crime at the time of its alleged commission, he should have the benefit of that reasonable doubt and be acquitted, as it compelled the jury to find as a fact that he was at another place at the time of the shooting, and did not extend the question of reasonable doubt to his presence at the club-rooms.

2. On a trial for murder dying declarations are competent evidence as to the act of the killing and the circumstances forming the res gestæ, but are inadmissible as to a former transaction, stated by the deceased as furnishing a possible motive for the crime.

Information for murder against Fong Ah Sing. Verdict of guilty, judgment thereon, and order refusing a new trial. Defendant appeals.

L. Quint, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the People.

Ross, J. The defendant was charged with the crime of murder. His defense was that of alibi, he claiming that at the time the deceased was killed he (defendant) was at certain rooms about three blocks distant from where the murder was committed. Upon that question the evidence was conflicting, and upon that state of facts the defendant, through his counsel, requested the court to charge the jury as follows: "Whilst the prosecution must establish beyond a reasonable doubt the guilt of the defendant, it is not incumbent on the defendant to prove an alibi beyond a reasonable doubt. Though the evidence offered to establish an alibi falls short of the weight of moral certainty as to the existence of the alibi, yet if it leave in the minds of the jury such a doubt or uncertainty that, taken by itself, they could not find for or against the alibi, they are bound to carry such doubt into the case of the prosecution, and to array it there as an element of the reasonable doubt, beyond which the prosecution must establish guilt. The defendant is entitled as much to the benefit of such doubt as to any other doubt raised by the evidence; and if its weight, alone, or added to that of any other, be sufficient to reduce belief in their minds as to the defendant's guilt to a reasonable doubt, they must acquit." This instruction the court below refused to give, but instead gave the jury, as the law upon the subject of alibi, the following: "If the jury find the defendant to have been at another place,—as, for instance, in the society's rooms, which have been spoken of in the evidence at the time of this alleged shooting,—and if his being there then creates a reasonable doubt of his having been present at the place of the alleged crime at the time of its alleged commission, he should have the benefit of that reasonable doubt, and be acquitted." The instruction requested was substantially correct, and should have been given. The charge given was incorrect, and should not have been given. The commission of a criminal offense implies, of course, the presence of the defendant at the necessary time and place. Proof of an alibi is, therefore, as much of a traverse of the crime charged as any other defense; and proof tending to establish it, though not clear, may nevertheless, with the other facts of the case, raise doubt enough to produce an acquittal. A reasonable doubt of the defendant's presence at the time and place necessary for the commission of the crime would seem necessarily to raise a reasonable doubt of his commission of it. But, according to the charge of the court below, the defendant was not to have the benefit of any doubt in regard to the alleged alibi, unless the jury should find as a fact that he was at another place than the place of shooting when the shooting occurred. It is obvious that the finding of that fact would itself have established the alibi, and that would have ended the case of the prosecution. But proof tending to establish an alibi, though insufficient of itself to establish that fact, is not to be excluded from the case. Whatever doubt, if any, such testimony may raise in the minds of the jurors, is for their consideration; and if its weight, alone, or added to that of other evidence in the case, be sufficient to reduce belief in their minds as to the defendant's guilt to a reasonable doubt, they should acquit; for in every criminal case, when all the proof is in, the final question for the jury is, are all the essential averments of the indictment proved beyond a reasonable doubt?

The dying declaration of the deceased was properly admitted in evidence, but the declaration included some matter foreign to an instrument of that nature, and which should have been excluded by the court below from the consideration of the jury. We allude to the following statement of the declarant: "I don't know any reason that Fong Ah Sing had for shooting me, unless it was that a few days before the shooting I was bathing my feet up stairs over a room in which Fong Ah Sing was sitting, and I spilled a little water on the floor, and some of it leaked through the floor and fell upon Fong Ah Sing. Fong Ah Sing was very angry thereat, and told the proprietor of the house that I must apologize, and make him some present, to prevent bad luck coming upon the house. The proprietor did make some little present to Fong Ah Sing, and I supposed the matter was settled." Dying declarations are restricted to the act of killing, and to the circumstances immediately attending it and forming a part of the res gestæ. When they relate to former and distinct transactions they do not come within the principle of necessity on which such declarations are received. Whart. Crim. Ev. § 278; 1 *Greenl. CHIEF JUSTICE. This is an application for a writ to compel the respondent, judge of the superior court, to have the issues of fact in a divorce case pending in said court tried by a jury. The clause of the constitution mainly relied on reads as follows: "The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate." Const. art. 1, § 7. This implies the existence of the right. To "secure" is not to create or acquire, but "to make safe; to relieve from apprehensions of or exposure to danger; to guard; to protect." Webst. Dict. Under the provisions of other constitutions and statutes quite as broad as the clause above cited, it has uniformly been held that the right to trial by jury was not intended to be extended to cases in which the right did not exist at common law. And the counsel for petitioner concedes that this has become too well established as to equity cases to admit of a change of the rule in that respect by the courts. But the counsel insists that an action of divorce is not a case in equity, and cites the clause of the constitution which confers jurisdiction on superior courts to show that actions of divorce are mentioned separately, as if they were different and distinct from cases in equity. Admitting all that he claims in this respect, it by no means follows that the right of trial by jury is given in divorce cases. The right is denied in equity cases, not because they are equity cases, but because no such right ever existed in equity cases; and, by parity of reasoning, it should be denied in divorce cases, because no such right ever existed in divorce cases. In Koppikus v. Commissioners, 16 Cal. 248, the court, FIELD, C. J., delivering the opinion, said: "The provision of the constitution that 'the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all, and remain inviolate forever,' applies only to civil and criminal cases in which an issue of fact is joined. The language was used with reference to the right as it exists at common law. * * * It is in this common-law sense that the language has always been regarded by the courts of this state. It is a right 'secured to all,' and inviolate forever, in cases in which it is exercised in the administration of justice according to the course of the common law, as that law is understood in the several states of the Union. It is a right, therefore, which can only be claimed in actions at law or in criminal actions where an issue of fact is made by the pleadings." It is therefore quite immaterial whether an action of divorce be a case in equity or not, so long as it is a case in which the right of trial by jury did not exist at common law or otherwise. The clause of the constitution relied on does not apply to it.

WRONGFUL ATTACHMENT—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction in an action for wrongful attachment, that the plaintiff was entitled to exemplary damages if it was found that the property was taken wantonly or maliciously, is erroneous when there is no evidence to sustain it.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county. Reversed.

Action by Rieke Hirshberg, administra-

trix of the estate of Samuel Hirshberg, deceased, against Levi Strauss and others for wrongful attachment. There was judgment for plaintiff, from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, defendants appeal.

Napthaly, Friedenrich & Ackerman, for appellants. Jas. C. Martin and Wm. H. & J. R. Glascock, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this case, which was an action against the sheriff and attaching creditors of David S. Hirshberg to recover damages for maliciously levying an attachment on certain goods, the property of plaintiff's intestate, Samuel Hirshberg, the court charged the jury, among other matters, as follows: "In addition to the actual value, you have a right to give exemplary damages, if the proof satisfies you that the goods were wantonly or maliciously taken from the plaintiff; and on this subject I charge you that if you find that the plaintiff, before any action taken by the defendants, purchased the property from David S. Hirshberg and others in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and immediately took possession of the same in his own right, and held such possession down to the time of said taking by defendant, such possession being immediate and continuous, then the presumption is that the plaintiff was the owner of said property, and the taking by defendant against his will was wrongful, and the plaintiff would be entitled to recover damages for the value of the goods at the time when they were taken, and interest from that date to this time; and, if you believe the act of taking was wanton or malicious, you may also add exemplary damages, as before stated." There was no evidence of any character to justify the court in submitting to the jury any question relating to exemplary damages. On this point the charge was entirely abstract, and was calculated to mislead the jury. It may be urged that the jury was not misled, or at all influenced, by this direction, and that the error was without injury. But this is not apparent. On the contrary, the jury might well upon the evidence have found a verdict much smaller in amount, and therefore we cannot say that the verdict was not enhanced in amount by the direction in regard to exemplary damages. For this error the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

MURDER—EVIDENCE—CHALLENGE TO JURY—NEW TRIAL.

1. Where the record of a trial for murder leaves grave doubts as to the truth of the story told by the principal witness for the state, but it cannot be said as matter of law that the jury were not warranted in returning a verdict of guilty, such verdict cannot be set aside.

2. Where defendant in a murder trial testified that shortly before the time at which the crime was alleged to have been committed he and a witness for the state had a quarrel, and on a certain bridge he had knocked said witness down, it was proper to admit in rebuttal evidence that said bridge was muddy at that time, and that the clothes of said witness were free from mud when he reached the place where the alleged crime was committed.

3. Where the court in a murder trial sustained an objection to a question asked a talesman during his examination on his voire dire as to his qualifications as a juror, and said talesman was peremptorily challenged by defendant, and the court subsequently permitted another peremptory challenge in addition to the number allowed by law, such ruling, if error, was harmless.

4. A new trial will not be granted on the ground of newly-discovered evidence when such evidence must have been known to defendant during the first trial, and is also in conflict with the evidence there given.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Charles Freeman was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. N. Post, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant, who was convicted in the superior court of murder in the first degree and sentenced to death, appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Of the numerous assignments of error contained in the record, only four have been insisted upon by counsel in their oral and printed arguments, and to these we shall confine our attention.

A brief outline of the facts of the case will conduce to a clearer understanding of the questions to be decided: The defendant, Freeman, the deceased, Mark Feeny, and two other men, Terrill and Wilks, were employed on a ranch by one De Kay; Feeny as cook, the others as laborers. These men occupied a small house on a ranch four miles distant from the "home ranch" of their employer. A day or two prior to March 6, 1890, Terrill went to the home ranch, leaving only Freeman and Wilks at the other place. The weather at this time was too rainy to admit of plowing, (the work in which Terrill, Freeman, and Wilks had been engaged;) and, having no work to do on the afternoon of March 6th, Freeman and Wilks took their shotguns, and went hunting, leaving Feeny alone on the ranch. The testimony shows that Feeny was a small man, only about five feet high, and weighing less than a hundred pounds; that he was sick, consumptive, weak, and emaciated. There had been some complaint on the part of the hands as to his inefficiency as a cook, but it does not appear that there had been any quarrel or disagreement between him and Freeman during the five or six weeks he had been on the ranch. About 10 o'clock at night, on the 6th of March, Freeman and Wilks returned to the ranch after their hunt. They had stopped on their way at Antelope, and at a wayside saloon had taken several drinks, but, according to the testimony of each, both were sober enough to know and to remember all the details of what ensued. As to what then occurred, this is the story told by Wilks on the witness stand: He says that he entered the house first, put aside his unloaded gun, and heard Feeny call out from his bed, to which he had retired, saying, in substance, "You will find your suppers set out on the table;" that he proceeded to the kitchen, and while he was feeling for the lamp and a match he heard Freeman, who had in the mean time entered the common sleeping-room where Feeny was lying in his bunk, calling him to come in there. He went to the bedroom in response to Freeman's call, who announced that he intended to kill the cook, and that he (Wilks) must help him. Wilks told Freeman that he must be joking, that he did not mean it; but Freeman insisted that he did mean it, and that unless Wilks helped him he would kill him too. Thereupon Wilks says he attempted to leave the room, but was knocked down by a blow from Freeman's gun; that while he was down Freeman cocked both barrels of the gun, and placed it against his breast; that he caught the gun, and pushed it aside, when Freeman again knocked him down across Feeny's bed with a blow of his fist, and, leaning over, bit through his ear. During this struggle Feeny was entreating Freeman not to kill "Archie," (Archie Wilks;) but Freeman continued his violence until, in answer to his demands, Wilks finally said he supposed he would have to help him kill Feeny; whereupon he was released by Freeman, and allowed to get up. Freeman then ordered Feeny to get up, adding that "his time had come." Feeny sat up in bed, and Freeman, still holding his loaded gun in his left hand, so as to threaten Wilks, passed his right arm around the body of Feeny, under his arms, and lifted him from his bed. Then carrying his gun in his hand and Feeny under his right arm, and commanding Wilks to follow, he passed out of the bedroom and from the house, proceeded to a water-barrel containing the water used for domestic purposes, and, bending Feeny across his right leg with his right arm, stuck his head down into the water-barrel and held him there until he was drowned; Wilks in the mean time standing by too terrified to interfere or to expostulate. When Feeny, after being held in the water for three or four minutes, was quite dead, Freeman left him with his feet resting on the ground and his head in the water, and ordered Wilks to get on a horse, go to the home ranch, and inform Mr. De Kay that on their return from Antelope they had found the cook drowned in the water-barrel. Wilks went as directed, but, instead of telling the story put in his mouth by Freeman, told De Kay the truth as to the murder.

Freeman, testifying on his own behalf, told an entirely different story. He says that when he and Wilks were on the road from Antelope, coming back to the ranch, they got into a quarrel over his proposition to ford a creek instead of going round to a bridge. That the quarrel continued as they walked along, and at the bridge culminated in a fight, in which Wilks first struck him with his gun, whereupon he knocked Wilks down on the bridge with his gun, and kicked him several times, until he promised to behave himself. They then proceeded to their house, Wilks entering in advance and going into the bedroom. They called Feeny, but got no answer, and after awhile started to the stable to feed and care for their horses. On their way Wilks went to the water-barrel to get a drink, and from there called out to Freeman, saying, "Here is 'Shorty,'" (the nick-name of the cook.) Freeman went to the water-barrel, and there saw Feeny's dead body in exactly the position and condition in which it remained until removed by the coroner the next day; that is to say, (and as to this all the testimony agrees,) the feet rested on the ground, he had his shoes as well as his pants on, his head was immersed in the water, which stood about eight or ten inches below the top of the barrel, and the lower part of his abdomen rested on the edge of the barrel. When Wilks went to De Kay's to tell his story, Freeman walked over to their nearest neighbor and told his story. When he told how they had found the cook drowned in the water-barrel, he asked for a drink of whisky, saying he felt nervous, and got his neighbor to go home with him to keep him company. He proposed to bring the body into the house and lay it out, but, being informed that it would be wrong to move it before the arrival of the coroner, took a blanket and covered it where it was.

Each of these conflicting stories is to some extent corroborated, and to some extent contradicted, by circumstances. The story of Wilks is opposed to the fact that there is a total absence of any apparent motive on the part of Freeman for wishing to injure Feeny; to the apparent difficulty that even a strong man would have experienced in drowning another, however small and weak, in the manner described,—the murderer having the use of only one arm, the other being occupied with the gun with which he was constantly threatening Wilks, and the victim's arms and hands being entirely free to grasp the edge of the barrel into which his head must have been thrust for a foot or more in order to immerse it; to the improbability that Feeny, who is represented as earnestly beseeching Freeman not to kill Archie, would have allowed himself to be carried to the water-barrel and drowned, not only without a struggle, but even without a word of entreaty. Then there is the extremely significant fact that Feeny undoubtedly had his shoes on when he was drowned, and, consequently, if Wilks' story is true, must have gone to bed with his shoes on. Wilks testifies that Feeny habitually slept in his pants, but neither he nor Terrill say that he ever went to bed with his shoes on. It is claimed, as a corroboration of Wilks' story, that fresh blood was found in the bedroom, where, he says, the fight occurred; but, on the other hand, it seems to be claimed that this blood is accounted for by the supposition that Wilks, though wounded at the bridge, might have continued to bleed after his arrival at home. Freeman's story is opposed to the fact testified to by several witnesses, that the bridge upon which he says he knocked Wilks down was covered with mud, and that no mud was observed on Wilks' clothes when he arrived at the home ranch. As against the conclusiveness of this circumstance there was some testimony that the bridge was not ordinarily very muddy, except near the ends, and that there had been heavy rains, by which it was washed comparatively clean. It is also argued that any mud that may have been on Wilks' clothes would have been washed off by the rain while he was going from the bridge to the house, and from there to the home ranch. In corroboration of Freeman's story, and of the theory of the defense, (viz., that Feeny, going for a bucket of water, and leaning over the barrel to lift it out, had fallen in a fit, and drowned while unconscious,) it was proved that a short time before he went to De Kay's ranch, and, while working at another place, he had fallen in a fit and remained unconscious for some minutes. And it was proved that when his body was lifted from the barrel the water bucket was found under him, in the water. There was, of course, a great deal of testimony as to minor details and collateral circumstances, but the foregoing statement exhibits the salient features of the case for the prosecution and the defense, and is sufficient to illustrate the points to be decided.

1. As to the contention that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, we can only say that, while the case as presented upon the record before us leaves room for grave doubts as to the truth of the story told by Wilks, it cannot be held as matter of law that the jury, who not only heard all the minute details of the evidence, but had the great advantage of observing the demeanor of the witnesses on the stand, was not warranted in concluding that the guilt of the defendant was established beyond a reasonable doubt. If Wilks told the truth, there can be no question that a cruel and deliberate murder was committed, and it was for the jury, in view of all the evidence in the case, to decide the question of his credibility. With their conclusion on this point we cannot interfere.

2. It is contended that the superior court erred in admitting, by way of rebuttal of Freeman's testimony, evidence of the mud on the bridge, and of the absence of mud from Wilks' clothes when he arrived at the home ranch. The claim of counsel is that this was part of the prosecution's case, or, if not, that it was made so by a question asked Wilks by the district attorney on his examination in chief, as to whether he and Freeman had any difficulty on their way home from Antelope on March 6th. We think this evidence was clearly proper evidence in rebuttal, and we do not think that the general question asked Wilks on his direct examination precluded the proof of any specific fact inconsistent with the defendant's testimony as afterwards given. Still less was the state precluded from introducing such proof by the fact that Terrill had testified in chief that Wilks was very bloody when he arrived at the home ranch.

3. It is contended that the superior court erred in sustaining the objection of the district attorney to a question asked of a talesman named Baker, during his examination on voir dire, touching his qualifications to act as a juror. It is unnecessary, however, to decide the question presented by this assignment of error, for the reason that Baker was challenged peremptorily by the defendant, and did not sit on the jury; and the peremptory challenge so used was not lost to the defendant, because the court subsequently allowed him, upon the suggestion of the district attorney, to make another peremptory challenge, in addition to the number allowed by law. The final result, in other words, was the same as if the court had not only allowed the questions asked of the talesman, but had sustained a challenge for cause. Consequently, if there was any error, there was no injury in these rulings.

4. One of the grounds of defendant's motion for a new trial was newly-discovered evidence. The motion upon this ground was supported by a number of affidavits of himself, his mother, his sister, and others, tending to show that his grandfather and other members of his family had been affected with insanity, and that he himself, since the age of 19 years, had been subject to fits, rush of blood to the head, severe pains in the head; that when so troubled he becomes unable to control his actions, or to remember anything he does; that when under the influence of liquor he becomes a dangerous man, crazy, and irresponsible, etc. The learned judge of the superior court, in denying the motion for a new trial, delivered an opinion from which we extract the following statement of his reasons for disallowing the claim based upon newly-discovered evidence: "Admitting the materiality of this evidence, if produced at the defendant's trial, the first question that arises is whether there appears from the affidavits such a showing as would enable this court to say that a case has been made out which should entitle the defendant to a new trial herein. A motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence has always been regarded by the courts with a great deal of suspicion and disfavor. It has been said that 'the temptations are so strong to make a favorable showing after a defeat in an angry and bitter controversy, and the circumstance that the testimony had just been discovered when it is too late to introduce it is so suspicious, that courts require the very strictest showing of diligence.' In one case it was said by Justice SANDERSON that 'applications for new trials upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence must be looked upon with suspicion and disfavor, because the temptation to make a favorable showing after having sustained a defeat is great. A party who relies upon that ground must make a strong case, both in respect to diligence on his part in preparing for the trial, and as to the truth and materiality of the newly-discovered evidence, and that, too, by the best evidence that can be obtained. If he fails in either respect, his motion must be denied.' The law requires at the hands of the defendant that he make careful and diligent preparation for his trial; and it is to be presumed, more especially in a case of the importance of this, involving the life and liberty of the defendant, that in preparing for a trial he should go over very carefully and diligently with his attorney every fact and circumstance which might in any way bear upon his defense. Looking at the character of the showing made by these affidavits, it is inconceivable to my mind that these facts, which are now relied upon as newly-discovered evidence, should not have been known to the defendant, and called to the attention of the attorney in making preparation for the defense. It is true that the defendant states that many of the facts set forth in his affidavit were unknown to him until after his trial, but this statement becomes absolutely unworthy of credence, in view of the fact that in large part the contents of his affidavit are facts which must have been within his personal knowledge. It is not to be believed that the defendant could have suffered, as stated in his affidavit, at various times during his life, from fits and trouble and pains in his head, and the loss of memory as to material things occurring during his life, and not have a personal knowledge of the fact. Neither is it to be credited that a party who has been addicted to the use of strong drink can be entirely unaware as to the effect upon his physical and mental being in the use of intoxicating liquor. The defendant shows, by his own statements, and it appeared in evidence at the trial of this case, that he had been drinking considerably on the day on which deceased met his death. The calling of that fact to the attention of his counsel, to my mind, should necessarily have led to an investigation by the attorney, which would have resulted in eliciting all the facts which are now relied upon by the defendant as newly-discovered evidence. Furthermore, it appears by the affidavits of the mother and the sister of the defendant that all the material facts which are now relied upon by the defendant as newly-discovered evidence were known to them before the occurrence of the facts out of which this case arose. And it appears from the counter-affidavits filed by the district attorney that this sister and the mother of the defendant were in daily communication with the defendant from the time of his arrest up to the time of his trial, and that throughout the entire nine days' trial, which resulted in defendant's conviction, they sat beside him in the court-room, and consulted and advised, not only with the defendant, but with his attorney. The sister states in her affidavit that she saw the defendant on the afternoon of the day in question about 2 o'clock, and that he was then under the influence of liquor, and knowing, as she did, the tendency of his mind and disposition when in liquor, it is almost incredible to believe that she should have neglected to inform his counsel of that fact while preparation was being made for his defense. And I am bound to assume, taking all the circumstances into consideration, that the attorney of the defendant, by an exercise of reasonable care, and inquiry of the defendant and those so intimately connected with him, could have ascertained all the facts in time to employ them in the defendant's behalf at the trial. Nor can the defendant be excused or relieved in any way from the fact that he may have been ignorant of the law or of the rules of evidence which would make these facts material. A party is bound to know the materiality of his evidence, and ignorance of the law does not excuse. Whether or not he was sufficiently acquainted with the law to know of their materiality, it was his duty to have communicated them to his counsel. After a careful consideration of the showing made by these affidavits, when viewed in connection with the facts and circumstances appearing at the trial, I am entirely unable to come to the conclusion either that the evidence set forth was newly discovered, or that it could not by reasonable diligence have been produced at the trial. But there is another reason why the application of the defendant for a new trial upon these grounds would have to be denied. The showing made by the affidavits presented here is wholly and entirely in conflict with the defense made at the trial and the defendant's own evidence. While the defendant may make as many and different defenses to a charge as he may see fit, although they may be inconsistent, nevertheless, if he proceeds to trial upon a certain line of defense without making due inquiry and preparation as to any other defense that he may have to the charge, he cannot be permitted, when the issue has gone against him, to thereafter come in, and, upon a motion for a new trial, suggest for the first time that there is other evidence material to his defense upon a new and different theory. He cannot divide up his defense piecemeal. If he were to be permitted to pursue one line of defense without inquiring as to any other until the issue had gone against him upon that, and then for the first time inquire as to any other, and be granted a new trial upon the ground that it was newly discovered, there would be no end of litigation. A new trial will not be granted upon evidence in conflict with that given at the trial. People v. McCauley, 45 Cal. 146-148; People v. O'Neal, 67 Cal. 378, 7 Pac. Rep. 790." These reasons, we think, are conclusive against the contention of appellant. The record discloses no error, and the judgment and order of the superior court are therefore affirmed.

DIEFENDORFF v. HOPKINS. (No. 13,017.)¹

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 10, 1891.)

CONVERSION—VERDICT—PLEADING—OBJECTIONS WAIVED—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY.

1. Where the verdict in an action for the conversion of goods is for defendant, there need be no finding as to value or damage.

2. An objection to a plea on the ground of insufficiency will not be considered on appeal, when not raised in the court below.

3. Where a married woman, with her own funds, establishes a boarding-house, and with the proceeds thereof mingles a monthly allowance from her husband, and it is not apparent whether the furniture, etc., of the house is purchased with her own money or with that furnished by her husband, but her husband has nothing to do with the business, and by their actions and declarations both show that they considered the business hers alone, and no question is raised as to the rights of the husband's creditors, the furniture of such house must be deemed to be her separate property.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Action by Cornelius J. Diefendorff against Peter Hopkins for the conversion of goods. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thornton & Merzback and Geo. A. Blanchard, for appellant. Freeman, Bates & Rankin, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant, as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, levied a writ of attachment, issued in an action commenced by certain creditors of Mrs. M. A. Rix against her and her husband, upon the furniture of a boarding and lodging house known as the "Colonnade." The plaintiff, claiming to be the owner of the property attached, as vendee of the husband, demanded it of the defendant, and, his demand being refused, commenced this action to recover damages for its conversion. The findings and judgment of the superior court were in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. In support of his appeal from the judgment, the plaintiff makes two assignments of error: First. "The judgment is erroneous on the face of the record, because there is no finding on the material issue of value and damage to the plaintiff." Second. "The justification as pleaded is insufficient upon the face of the answer, in this: that it is not alleged that either an affidavit or undertaking on attachment was filed in support of the writ under which the defendant justifies."

In considering these assignments it is necessary to state the substance of the complaint and answer. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant is sheriff; that on June 20, 1886, plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the furniture in the Colonnade; that on said day the defendant took said furniture and converted it to his own use; that the plaintiff thereafter, and while still the owner and entitled to the possession of said furniture, demanded of the defendant its redelivery and surrender to him; that said demand was refused; that said furniture is of the value of $20,000, and that plaintiff has been damaged in that amount by said wrongful taking and conversion. The answer denies that plaintiff was ever the owner or entitled to the possession of all or any part of the furniture described in the complaint; denies that the defendant ever converted it, or any of it, to his own use; denies that surrender or redelivery has been demanded; denies that the furniture is worth any more than $3,000; and denies that plaintiff has been damaged in any sum whatever. Following these denials, in what is designated in the findings of the superior court as subdivision 2 of the answer are the following allegations: "Defendant, further answering, as a further defense to said action avers: That on the 1st day of June, 1886, one Margaret A. Rix was, and for a long time prior thereto had been and still is, the sole owner of all the property described in plaintiff's complaint. That on said 1st day of June, 1886, an action was duly commenced by one P. D. Barnhard against the said Margaret A. Rix and her husband, Alfred Rix, in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, to recover the sum of $5,451.90, alleged to be due and owing from defendant Margaret A. Rix to P. D. Barnhard, the plaintiff in said action, upon certain promissory notes executed by said Margaret A. Rix to one John Horstman and others, and assigned to said plaintiff; also for merchandise sold and delivered by John Horstman & Co. to said Margaret A. Rix upon open accounts, which said accounts were assigned to plaintiff. That on said 1st day of June, 1886, a summons in due form was issued in said last-named action, and was thereafter, on the — day of June, 1886, served upon the defendant Alfred Rix, the husband of the defendant Margaret A. Rix, and thereafter, on the — day of June, 1886, served upon the defendant Margaret A. Rix, and said defendants have appeared to said action in said court. That on the 1st day of June, 1886, a writ of attachment in due form was issued in said last-named action after the issuance of summons therein, and was placed in the hands of the defendant as sheriff as aforesaid. That on or about date, and in pursuance of the commands of said writ, this defendant, as sheriff, levied said writ of attachment upon the property described in the plaintiff's complaint, and placed a keeper in charge of said property, and still holds the same under and by virtue of said writ of attachment, and in no other manner. That at the date of the levy of said writ of attachment this defendant was the duly elected, qualified, and acting sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, and the property levied on, as this defendant is informed and believes, was and is the property of the defendant Margaret A. Rix, and subject to seizure by virtue of said attachment. That this defendant has never removed any portion of the property described in plaintiff's complaint from the Colonnade House, but has placed a keeper in charge of said property in said house, and allowed the said Margaret A. Rix to use said property, subject to the control of said keeper. That this defendant now holds said property as sheriff, to satisfy any judgment which may be recovered in said action of Barnhard against Rix."

The following are the findings of the superior court: "(1) That the plaintiff was not on the 20th day of June, 1886, nor at any time prior to the commencement of this action, the owner or entitled to the possession of all or any of the household furniture described in this complaint. The defendant on or about said 20th day of June, 1886, took said furniture in the manner hereinafter stated; and the plaintiff thereafter made a demand upon the defendant for the surrender and delivery of said furniture; and the defendant then and at all times refused to surrender and deliver the same to plaintiff. (2) That all the allegations of subdivision two of the defendant's answer are true. That the defendant seized and holds the property described in plaintiff's complaint, under the circumstances and for the purposes stated in said subdivision two. As conclusions of law, I find the defendant entitled to judgment for his costs of suit, and to be dismissed hence without delay. Signed December 29, 1887. JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge."

1. The judgment is not erroneous for want of an express finding on the issue of value and damage. There could be no finding of damage, because the effect of the findings made is that there was no damage, and the value of the goods is of no consequence. Whether it was three thousand or twenty thousand dollars could make no possible difference in the result. Under the facts found, no additional finding as to value could have prevented a judgment for the defendant for costs; and it has been frequently held in this court that the failure to pass upon an issue which has thus become immaterial is not error, or, at least, that it is not a prejudicial error. McCourtney v. Fortune, 57 Cal. 619; Dyer v. Brogan, 70 Cal. 139, 11 Pac. Rep. 589; Malone v. County of Del Norte, 77 Cal. 217, 19 Pac. Rep. 422; Robinson v. Railroad Co., 65 Cal. 263; Brisson v. Brisson, 90 Cal. —, 27 Pac. Rep. 186. Many other decisions to the same effect might be cited. Notwithstanding these decisions, it is contended by appellant, or seems to be, that an omission to find upon all the issues in the case is prejudicial error, because it deprives him of the advantages which it was the purpose of the statute (Code Civil Proc. §§ 632, 633) to secure, viz., a final adjudication upon each separate issue, ever a basis for a final judgment by this court on the appeal. But we do not see how this court could ever in any case render a final judgment for the appellant, however full and specific the findings might be, if a finding on one or more of the issues compelled a judgment for the respondent regardless of the others. As to the claim that the parties have a right to a finding upon every specific issue in a case, in order that they may plead it as res adjudicata, in some possible future controversy where it may become material, although it is not so with regard to the matter being litigated, we do not think it was any part of the purpose of the statute to secure such a dubious advantage.

2. No question was raised in the superior court either by demurrer to the answer or by objection to evidence, as to the sufficiency in form and substance of the defendant's plea of justification under the attachment; and conceding, without deciding, that if such an objection had been made it would have been necessary for the defendant to amend his answer, we are bound to hold, in accordance with our settled rule, that where, as in this case, the trial has been conducted in the superior court upon the assumption of all parties that a plea is sufficient, it cannot be objected to for the first time when the case is here on appeal. The judgment, therefore, must be affirmed.

The principal question in the case, however, arises upon the appeal from the order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial. He contends, in support of this branch of the appeal, that the first finding of the court is contrary to the evidence. In other words, he contends that from all the evidence in the case it clearly appears that the furniture in controversy belonged to Alfred Rix, the husband of Mrs. Margaret A. Rix, in June, 1884, at which date it was transferred to the plaintiff by a bill of sale executed by Mrs. Rix, in the name of her husband as his attorney in fact, and that it has ever since remained the property of the plaintiff. In addition to the findings of the superior court, above quoted, there is contained in the record an opinion of the judge in which the grounds of his decision are set forth more specifically and more at large, and in which he discusses several matters not involved in the findings, as, for instance, the effect of the conduct of Alfred Rix as an estoppel, the effect of an existing lease of the furniture upon plaintiff's right of possession at the date of the seizure, and of the commencement of the action, etc. A great deal of space is devoted in the briefs of counsel to a discussion of these questions, and of points of practice and pleading to which they give rise. We think, however, that they are wholly immaterial. The question, and the only question, to be decided is this: Does the evidence support the findings that the plaintiff was never the owner of the furniture, and that Mrs. Margaret A.

Rix, at the date of the levy of the attachment in the suit of her creditors, was the sole owner? If it does, the order must be affirmed; and if it does not, the order must be reversed, irrespective of the reasons contained in the opinion of the judge.

The evidence shows that Alfred and Margaret A. Rix were married in 1858, and took up their residence in a house belonging to the husband on Pine street, near Powell. At the date of the marriage the wife had no property, but shortly thereafter her husband gave her some lots at the Mission, which she subsequently sold. With the proceeds she purchased a vacant lot adjoining the family residence, upon which her husband erected a large house, containing about 30 rooms, which she used as a boarding and lodging house. Subsequently she rented and disposed of several other boarding or lodging houses in succession before taking the Colonnade. She always, however, kept up the Pine-Street house, leaving it in the personal charge of her niece when she was compelled to be at the other places. How she managed to furnish these various houses, whether by the aid of her husband or upon her own credit, does not distinctly appear; but it is very clearly shown that her husband had nothing to do with the business, either actually or ostensibly. It was always spoken of as her business, and both by his words and his whole course of conduct Mr. Rix distinctly repudiated any concern in it, or any responsibility for its debts. In 1870 he was called to New York on business, and during the ensuing four years was there a large portion of the time. From 1874 to 1883 he was there all the time, with the exception of a few flying visits to California. During all of this time Mrs. Rix was carrying on her business in San Francisco, a business with which her husband would have nothing to do, and which he was constantly advising her to give up. He made her an allowance of $400 a month, apparently for the support of herself and children, but seems never to have directed any particular application of it. She apparently mingled the receipts of her business and her husband's allowance, and expended both in supporting herself and children and in keeping up the business. The circumstances and the acts and declarations of both parties indicate that this was known by and at least tacitly consented to by her husband. The result was that in 1883, her husband still being in New York, she had the Colonnade, a large house of 100 rooms, fully furnished, where she was keeping a boarding and lodging house, and the Pine-Street house, where her niece was in charge. But she had incurred debts, and, being pressed for money, tried to obtain it from the plaintiff. She offered to sell him the furniture of the Colonnade, presumably upon some such terms as were subsequently made in the name of her husband, but the plaintiff would not purchase from her. Acting under advice of counsel, he required a bill of sale from her husband. She accordingly obtained from her husband some sort of an authorization to sell, the terms of which, the writing having been lost, are not very clearly proven. Whatever they were, however, the power of attorney was executed by Mr. Rix, as a matter of form, as he expressed it; or rather, as the evidence indicates, for the mere purpose of satisfying the plaintiff. It is perfectly evident that, in spite of the power of attorney and the form of the transaction, Mrs. Rix all the time claimed the furniture and the right to dispose of it, and that Mr. Rix never did claim it or any part of its proceeds. After obtaining written authority from her husband, Mrs. Rix executed and delivered a bill of sale of the Colonnade furniture in her husband's name to the plaintiff, receiving therefor the sum of $3,000. At the same time the plaintiff gave her a lease of the furniture for two years, which was subsequently renewed for another term of two years, at a rent of $40 per month, stipulating that she might purchase the furniture at any time within the term for $4,000. There was no delivery or change of possession of the furniture. The plaintiff lodged in the Colonnade for a few months, as others did, but it is not seriously claimed that this circumstance was sufficient to work a change of possession. There was not the slightest outward or visible change in the condition of the property, nor did any occur up to the date of the levy of the attachment. Such being the facts disclosed by the evidence, we think they sustain the finding of the court that the furniture of the Colonnade was the separate property of Mrs. Margaret A. Rix.

To begin with, she owned the Pine-Street house and lot, where she carried on a business which was hers exclusively, and in which her husband refused to have any part. The proceeds of such business were, therefore, her separate estate, as being the profits of her separate property. Civil Code, § 162. It is true that they may have been, to some extent, the profits of her labor and personal attention, but so must, in some degree, be the rents, issues, and profits of any separate estate of either spouse, and the wife must have the same right to manage her separate estate, so as to turn it to profit, that the husband has to manage his separate estate. The proceeds of the business, therefore, belonged to her. What these amounted to and how they were expended does not appear, and neither is it shown how the Pine-Street house was furnished. But the whole course of conduct of both husband and wife, for years, and all their declarations, go to show that she managed the boarding-houses, bought and sold and exchanged furniture just as she pleased, and in her own name, with her husband's full knowledge, and without any objection on his part, except his objection to her engaging in a business at all, which he considered unprofitable and injurious to her health.

As to the furniture in question, these circumstances, we think, are more than sufficient to overcome the presumption which ordinarily obtains that any property purchased by either spouse after marriage is community property. Even if it appeared that some of the furniture originally put in the Pine-Street house was bought and paid for by Mr. Rix, the subsequent conduct and declarations of the parties would warrant the inference that it was a gift to his wife. And if, with his knowledge and express or tacit consent, she used some portion of her monthly allowance to pay bills incurred in her business, that also would, as between themselves at least, be regarded and treated as a gift. To what extent creditors of the husband could call in question such transfers to the wife, or how far they could resort to the proceeds of a business, carried on as this was, in disregard of the provisions of the statute relating to sole traders, is a question which does not arise in this case; the only question here being as to how property acquired after marriage may, as between husband and wife, become the separate property of the latter. There is no doubt that it may become so by gift, and we think that, so far as any property originally belonging to this community was mingled with the profits of Mrs. Rix's separate estate, the evidence fully warrants the conclusion that it was so mingled with the husband's knowledge and consent, and with the intention that it should be hers to use, control, and alienate at her pleasure. Indeed, neither the husband nor wife makes any claim to the contrary in any part of their evidence. All this the plaintiff knew, or might easily have ascertained, (and there were abundant facts within his knowledge to put him upon inquiry,) before purchasing the property; but he neglected to avail himself of the knowledge which he had or might have had. The result is that he has no title to the furniture by the transfer from Alfred Rix. As against Mrs. Rix, his title would probably be good by estoppel; but as against her attaching creditors it is wholly invalid for want of delivery and change of possession. The judgment and order of the superior court are affirmed.

ORENA v. CITY OF SANTA BARBARA. (No. 14,118.)

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 7, 1891.)

BOUNDARIES—SURVEYS—STREETS—LOCATION—EVIDENCE—PUBLIC USE—INITIAL POINTS—ORDINANCES—ESTOPPEL—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. A surveyor, hired by a city to make a survey and division into blocks and streets of its lands, the streets to be 60 feet wide, and the blocks 150 yards square, and the corners of the squares to be marked by stakes, made the survey according to contract, and actually located the blocks and streets, marking each block by a stake, many of which remained for several years. His return of survey was merely that the survey was made, as directed in the contract, but contained no field-notes, and made no mention of any initial point or base line. Thereafter the city had made, and adopted as official, maps which purported to show said survey. And certain streets as so surveyed and mapped were declared open. The city then deeded a certain number of square feet, describing them as in a certain corner of one of said blocks, and bounded by two of said streets. Held, that the lot was bounded by the streets as actually located by the surveyor, and that, the stakes showing the location of the block and street lines having been lost, and there being no evidence of the precise point where they had been placed, evidence of the boundaries of the street as actually opened and used was material.

2. The fact that the grantee of the land inclosed his full quantity of land within the block, taking as the street line the boundary as actually opened, and that he acquiesced in this line for many years before putting out his fence into the street as actually used, is evidence of the correctness of the boundary as opened.

3. In ascertaining the actual location of streets and blocks, the initial point and base line of the survey are not necessarily more controlling, or even as much so, as other ascertained points in the survey.

4. An ordinance declaring certain stakes to be the initial points of a survey already made, and attempting to locate lines therein, is void.

5. Such ordinance does not estop the city from claiming a line, inconsistent with the provisions of the ordinance, as the boundary between a street and a block which it had previously conveyed and described as bounded by the street.

6. In an action to quiet title to land claimed by defendant to be part of a street and by plaintiff to be part of his lot, plaintiff cannot make out a prima facie case by evidence of adverse possession, for title to a street cannot be thus acquired as against the public.

Commissioners' decision. Department

1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Action by Gaspar Orena against the city of Santa Barbara to quiet title to a strip of land. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thos. McNulta, for appellant. W. C. Stratton, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an action to quiet title to a strip of land about 16 feet wide, claimed by plaintiff to be a part of block 268 in the city of Santa Barbara, and by the defendant to constitute a portion of Gutierrez street. In 1851 the city of Santa Barbara, being the proprietor of the ungranted lands within its limits, contracted with Haley for a map of the city and for a survey and division into blocks and streets of a certain portion of the lands. Haley agreed to divide the city into squares of 150 yards by streets 60 feet wide, and "to mark each angle of said squares with substantial redwood stakes 18 inches long, not less than two inches in diameter, and to sink said stakes into the ground 16 inches; to make an accurate map of said streets and squares," etc. March 1, 1851, Haley reported "that the city was now surveyed in the manner pointed out in the contract." The report did not contain field-notes, or state the initial point or base line, or that any had been established. In November, 1852, the city employed Wackenreuder to make certain surveys and maps, which were reported April 22, 1853, with two maps, marked "1" and "2." These maps were, by ordinance passed August 8, 1855, declared official maps of the city of Santa Barbara. They were maps showing or purporting to show the Haley survey. April 29, 1853, an ordinance was approved, declaring certain streets, as surveyed by Haley and mapped by Wackenreuder, open. Gutierrez street was one of these streets. Haley made his survey according to contract, and actually located all the streets and blocks, marking each block by a stake driven at each corner. These stakes remained for several years, or at least many of them did, and were known and recognized as Haley's stakes. Lots were sold by the city and conveyed according to the survey, or at least such is our inference from the evidence, although the fact is not made very clear. The plaintiff claims under a deed from the town of Santa Barbara, dated July 9, 1867, which describes his property as "one hundred varas lot situated in the south-west corner of block two hundred and sixty-eight, in the town of Santa Barbara, containing 278 and one-tenth square feet, bounded on State and Gutierrez streets, and at right angles to said streets 278 1-10 feet." It does not appear that there was, at the date of grant, any official map of the town of Santa Barbara, except the Haley, sometimes called the "Brady," map, and the Wackenreuder maps. It is plain, therefore, that plaintiff's lot is bounded by Gutierrez street, as actually located by Haley, and the question in the case is as to this location.

The court apparently failed to find evidence of the existence of any of Haley's stakes upon block 268, or of the precise point where they had actually been placed. Haley was a witness at the trial, and testified substantially that the intersection of Carrillo and State streets was the initial point of his survey; that the streets, as he surveyed them, were exactly 60 feet wide, with the exception of Carrillo and State streets, which were 80 feet each; and that the blocks were 450 feet square, as required by his contract with the city. The plaintiff had been in possession of his lot for 25 years, and had, through tenants, fenced it. Up to about 1876 his fence along Gutierrez street corresponded very nearly with the line of Gutierrez street, as claimed by the defendant. At that time a survey was made from the intersection of Carrillo and State streets, which, allowing 60 feet for the street and 450 feet for blocks, according to the projected plan of the city and Haley's report of his survey, located his line as he now claims it. Thereupon he moved his fence out, as he testified, some 14 feet; as defendant claims, the whole 16 feet in dispute. If the survey of Haley had been exact, the plaintiff would be justified in his conclusion, whether the point measured from were the initial point, or any other ascertained point in the Haley survey, for all would correspond; but so soon as it was determined that Haley's survey was inaccurate, as admittedly it was, the value of such measurements from the initial point, or any other, as evidence, was materially impaired. For instance, a point in Haley's survey was pretty well established at the corner of State and Montecito streets, distant the width of one block and one street easterly from the disputed boundary; and another at the corner of Haley and State streets, the width of one block and two streets westerly. Between these two points, assuming them to have been established, there is an excess of over 16 feet. According to the testimony of a former city surveyor, who ran the line of Gutierrez street by the line of improvements and reputed monuments in the Haley survey, as he determined them, 14 feet of this excess is between Haley and Gutierrez streets. This is in the block immediately opposite plaintiff's premises on Gutierrez street, and is between plaintiff's premises and the assumed initial point. On plaintiff's theory he would get this entire excess. In other words, he gets the benefit of the mistakes in the survey, which, in order to make out his case, he assumes to have been mathematically correct. But the initial point and base line, if they had been marked on the map, and returned in the notes of the survey, instead of existing only in the memory of the surveyor, as they did in this case, would not be necessarily more controlling than other ascertained points in the survey in ascertaining the actual location of streets and blocks. Whether the initial point be of greater or less importance than other ascertained points, would depend on circumstances,—their proximity and relation to the point to be located.

In determining the line of the street, measurements on that street would naturally be of more value than elsewhere; and if they, or the places where they were, cannot be located, it would be important to ascertain the boundaries of the street as actually opened and used; and, if such location has been generally acquiesced in by the public, by lot-owners, and the municipality, in the absence of more certain evidence, it will be conclusive. In this case, the very fact that the plaintiff has inclosed his full quantity of land within the block, as claimed by the defendant, and that, after acquiescing in this line for a number of years, he put out his fence, intruding upon the street then actually used by the public, is a strong circumstance against him. That the fences were built by his tenants makes no difference. He let and relet the premises as inclosed, and still occupies and claims to the fences. He cannot deny his inclosure. If the entire survey could be revised, and made to conform to the plan of the city as projected, and the plaintiff could be awarded his lot under the revised survey, he would gain nothing. There is no reason in his contention except upon the idea that he will retain the full quantity which he now holds, and so much more. But there is no more reason for adjusting the lines of Gutierrez street to the supposed base and initial point than the other streets and blocks, where no monuments of Haley's survey are found. This is obviously impracticable, for it affects the oldest and best improved portion of Santa Barbara, and the evidence shows what should have been expected after the lapse of nearly 40 years,—that it is difficult to locate such monuments.

The learned judge who tried the case adopted the theory of the plaintiff, and he was probably induced to do this by certain ordinances of the city of Santa Barbara, which were admitted against the objections of the defendant, and which rulings are assigned as error in the statement on motion for a new trial and on this appeal. One was ordinance No. 28, passed November 3, 1870. It was here ordained that the iron stakes at the intersection of State and Carrillo streets and at the easterly corner of block 142 "be from now henceforth the initial points of the town survey and of all locations of lots and streets. Satisfactory evidence shows that the aforesaid corners of blocks have been the initial points of the Salisbury Haley surveys; * * * therefore * * * all surveys made thereafter that in any manner deviate from the said initial points, and vary with the courses and distances as set forth in said S. Haley's maps, are hereby declared null and void." etc. This ordinance is void, and should not have been received in evidence. The city council could not change the location of streets and highways in this manner, nor could it affect the rights of lot-holders under grants previously made. Much less could it lay down rules of evidence by which the courts should determine the location of points, nor determine the fact as to the initial point. Even if it had been made in advance, it would have been utterly impracticable, and would not have controlled the actual surveys, although they were shown to be incorrect. No absolutely accurate survey ever was or ever will be made. In order to build cities and towns there must be some finality as to the location of blocks and streets. Under such an ordinance, if valid, there could be none. All lines would be forever subject to be revised and corrected or changed by new surveys not really more accurate, but only for the time deemed so. The ruling admitting ordinance 39 may be disposed of in the same way. The respondent claims that these ordinances, under the circumstances, constitute an estoppel against the city; but, independently of the fact that, so far as locating these lines are concerned, they are absolutely void, we see no element of estoppel in them, and the plaintiff has not expended money or done anything to his injury in reliance upon them. All these ordinances, to which objection was made, were enacted after the grant to plaintiff, and after the street had been opened. In no event could they affect the location of plaintiff's lot. We cannot say that they did not affect the judgment of the court below in its determination of the cause.

In his complaint the plaintiff avers that for more than 16 years before the commencement of the action he had been in the actual, open, notorious, quiet, peaceable, and exclusive possession of the premises in controversy, holding and claiming the same adversely to the whole world, and that the defendant was not seised or possessed of the land, or any part thereof, for 5 years before the commencement of this action. The second finding of the court is in nearly the same language. It is also found that the plaintiff is the owner. This may have been a conclusion from the fact of the adverse possession found. The fourth finding is to the effect that the premises in dispute do not constitute a portion of Gutierrez street. This also may have been a conclusion from the same finding of adverse possession. The fifth finding is to the effect that the plaintiff did not declare that the premises in dispute were a part of Gutierrez street, or consent to its use, and the same has never been dedicated to public use. This is all that is found as to the title of plaintiff, and all that may have been inferred from the supposed adverse possession of plaintiff. But the question of adverse possession is a false quantity in the problem to be solved. The burden was upon the plaintiff to show title in himself. He can do that only by proof that the premises are within his grant. Proof of his supposed adverse possession does not make a prima facie case. This claim assumes the very question in controversy, for if the premises are a part of the public street there could be no adverse possession. Individuals may intrude upon or obstruct a public thoroughfare, but the public cannot be disseised of such lands, and such intruder acquires no rights. We think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 11, 1891.)

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

W. W. Bishop and G. H. Perry, for appellants. Langhorne & Miller, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court in a proceeding in mandamus, commanding the board of new city hall commissioners to allow a certain demand of respondents, payable out of the new city hall fund. The transcript consists merely of the pleadings, the judgment, and a notice of appeal therefrom. The case was tried without a jury, and findings were waived. The complaint (or petition) states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and to authorize the issuance of the writ prayed for, and was attacked only by a general demurrer. All the issues made by the pleadings are presumed to have been found in favor of the petitioners. We are unable, therefore, to see any opening for an attack on the judgment. Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WONG WANG. (No. 20,821.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1891.)

POLICE COURTS—JUDICIAL NOTICE—SUFFICIENCY OF INFORMATION.

1. Act March 18, 1885, establishing police courts in cities having 30,000, and less than 100,000, inhabitants, and giving such courts exclusive jurisdiction of all misdemeanors punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, applies to Los Angeles; the court taking judicial notice of the results of the census of the United States for 1890, which shows that said city contains the population required by said act.

2. In a trial in the superior court of Los Angeles county for a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment, the information charging that the offense was committed in the county, and not showing whether within or without the city, of Los Angeles, is insufficient, under Act March 18, 1885, above, as it fails to show that the offense was committed within the jurisdiction of the superior court.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. SMITH, Judge.

Wong Wang was convicted of running a gambling game, and appeals. Reversed.

Willis & Appel, for appellant. James McLachlan, for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Appellant was tried and convicted in the superior court of Los Angeles county upon an information charging him with having, on the 18th day of October, 1890, at the county of Los Angeles, willfully and unlawfully opened, carried on, and conducted a certain gambling game commonly known as "Chinese Pool;" said gambling game being then and there a percentage game, played for money by means of and with certain devices, to-wit, a billiard table, a board, a billiard ball, and cue. After appellant's motion for a new trial had been overruled, he made a motion in arrest of judgment, one of the grounds of which was that the court had no jurisdiction of the offense charged in the information. The information alleges that the offense was committed in the county of Los Angeles. That county embraces, with other territory, the city of Los Angeles. The offense charged is a misdemeanor punishable by imprisonment, and therefore the police court, if any there was, of the city of Los Angeles, if the offense was committed in said city, had jurisdiction of the offense. Was there a police court in said city on the 18th day of October, 1890, the alleged date of the commission of the offense? The act of March 18, 1885, entitled "An act to provide for police courts in cities having thirty thousand, and under one hundred thousand, inhabitants, and to provide for officers thereof," provides that "the judicial power of every city having thirty thousand, and under one hundred thousand, inhabitants shall be vested in a police court to be held therein by the city justices, or one of them, to be designated by the mayor;" and it is made the duty of said city justices to hold said police court. And exclusive jurisdiction of all misdemeanors punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, is conferred by said act upon said police court.

Does this act apply to the city of Los Angeles? Did it have 30,000, and under 100,000, inhabitants? The act of congress entitled "An act to provide for taking the eleventh and subsequent censuses," approved March 1, 1889, provides "that the enumeration required by this act shall commence on the first Monday of June, 1890, and be taken as of that date." And it is further provided that each enumerator shall compute the enumeration of his district, and prepare the returns required to be made, on or before the first day of July, 1890. We know that the enumeration so made established that the city of Los Angeles had a population of more than 30,000, and less than 100,000, inhabitants on the first Monday of June, 1890. Courts take judicial notice of "public and private official acts of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of this state and of the United States." Section 1875, Code Civil Proc. In Bank v. Cheney, 94 Ill. 430, the court said: "We must take judicial notice that by the census of 1870 Greene county contains a population exceeding twenty thousand inhabitants, and not exceeding seventy thousand, and therefore, according to the classification adopted, belonged to the second class." In People v. Williams, 64 Cal. 87, 27 Pac. Rep. 939, it was contended, among other things, that the court erred in admitting in evidence a certificate of the superintendent of the census to prove the population of the county of Santa Barbara. The court held there was no error in admitting said certificate, and said: "But, if this is not so, the court below and this court can take judicial notice of the results of such census." Citing section 1875, Code Civil Proc.

The exclusive jurisdiction of the police court over certain public offenses committed in a city having 30,000, and under 100,000, inhabitants, depends upon the fact of its having the specified number of inhabitants, and not upon any report or proclamation of the fact. The attorney general states that the "census returns" for California were filed with the secretary of state of California, January 13, 1891. That was 18 days before the court overruled the motion in arrest of judgment; and, if the court took judicial notice of the filing of those returns at the date of their filing, it must be held to have had judicial notice that on the first Monday of June, 1890, the city of Los Angeles had 30,000, and under 100,000, inhabitants; and that the police court of said city, from and after that date, had exclusive jurisdiction of the offense with which appellant was charged. It is not alleged in the information that the offense was committed within the corporate limits of the city of Los Angeles, nor is it alleged that it was committed outside of these limits. To give the superior court jurisdiction, the information should show that the offense was committed within the jurisdiction of that court. The information in this case does not show that fact. The offense may have been committed within the county of Los Angeles, and yet without the jurisdiction of the superior court. It is a familiar and well-settled principle of law that the indictment must allege that the offense was committed within the jurisdiction of the court. 1 Chit. Crim. Law, 131; McBride v. State, 10 Humph. 615. Bishop says: "If the jurisdiction of the court extends over less space than the county, a mere allegation that the offense was committed within the county is insufficient; because, in spite of what is thus disclosed, the tribunal may be without jurisdiction, for the doctrine is general that the place of the offense must be so set out as to show jurisdiction in the court." 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. 375. The allegation of the information that the offense was committed in the county of Los Angeles is consistent with the fact that it was committed in the city of Los Angeles. The rule is that, where the language is ambiguous, a pleading is to be taken most strongly against the pleader. The court erred in overruling appellant's motion in arrest of judgment, and for that reason the judgment is reversed, and the court below directed to dismiss the action, and discharge appellant.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the judgment. I do not think the census is complete, so far as the classification of cities is concerned, until the complete returns are filed in the office of the superintendent at Washington. Ex parte Halsted, 89 Cal. 471, 26 Pac. Rep. 961.

In re BONDS OF MADERA IRRIGATION DIST. (No. 14,157.)¹

CONSTITUTIONAL LAWS—LEGISLATIVE POWERS—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—ESTABLISHMENT—VALIDITY.

1. St. 1887, p. 29, which provides for the organization and government of irrigation districts, is within the legislative power to provide laws for the welfare of the state. Irrigation Dist. v. Williams, 18 Pac. Rep. 379, 76 Cal. 360, and Irrigation Dist. v. De Lappe, 21 Pac. Rep. 825, 79 Cal. 351, affirmed.

2. The board of supervisors petitioned to organize an irrigation district is sole judge of the sufficiency of the bond accompanying such petition.

3. The provisions that the petition shall particularly set forth and describe the boundaries of the district sought to be organized does not require that they shall be described with more particularity than would be necessary in an act of the legislature creating a particular district or a municipal corporation.

4. Act March 16, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 212,) § 5, provides for a hearing in court to examine and determine the legality and validity of the proceedings had for the organization of irrigation districts, and the legality of the bonds to be issued, and the sale thereof. Section 2 provides that the "petition shall state facts showing the proceedings had for the issue and sale of said bonds, and shall state generally that the irrigation district was duly organized," etc. Section 4 provides: "The provisions of Code Civil Proc. respecting the answer to a verified complaint shall be applicable to the answer of said petition," etc. A petition under said statute alleged that the petitioner was duly organized, etc., and the answer thereto denied that any of the steps required for the organization were taken. Held that, as it was the duty of the court to determine the legality of the organization, the record of the board of supervisors that there was evidence, to the satisfaction of the board, on the question whether there were the required number of bona fide freeholders within the boundaries of the proposed district who had signed the petition, was incompetent evidence to show the legality of the proceedings.

5. The proceedings for the organization were not defective, though the order for the issuing the bonds did not conform strictly to the statute, since the statute may be followed by the board of directors when issuance by them becomes necessary.

6. The conclusion of the decree, confirming the legality of the organization, which purports to forever bar all persons interested in the organization of the district, save the contestants herein, from denying any fact relating to the organization, or "providing for and authorizing the issue and sale of the bonds of said district, which might by them have been denied, questioned, or disputed in this proceeding," was not authorized by the statute.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Special proceedings by petition of the board of directors of the Madera irrigation district for the confirmation of their organization, and proceedings for the issue and sale of certain bonds of the district. The proceedings were contested by persons owning land within the district. On the hearing a decree was entered in accordance with the petition, and the contestants appeal. Reversed.

HARRISON, J. The board of directors of the Madera irrigation district, on the 25th of May, 1889, filed in the superior court of the county of Fresno, in pursuance of the act of March 16, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 212,) a petition for the confirmation by that court of their proceedings for the issue and sale of certain bonds of said district, amounting to $850,000. In their petition they alleged that "said Madera irrigation district was duly organized under the laws of the state of California, and especially under the provisions of the act approved March 7, 1887," (St. 1887, p. 29;) and set forth the various steps taken by them in reference to the issue and sale of the bonds, and prayed "that the proceedings aforesaid for the issue and sale of the bonds of said district may be examined, approved, and confirmed by said court, and for all and any legal and equitable relief which may be provided by law, and which the court shall deem meet." Notice was thereupon given by order of the court that the hearing of said petition would be had July 5, 1889; and prior to that day the appellants herein filed answers thereto, showing that they were owners of lands within the district to be affected by said bonds, and specifically denying the allegations in said petition. At the hearing upon the issues presented by the answers of the appellants the court rendered its judgment in favor of the petitioners, and approved and confirmed "the legality and the validity of each and all of the proceedings for the organization of said Madera irrigation district," and further adjudged and decreed that "each and all of the proceedings taken to secure and provide for and authorizing the issue and sale of bonds of said district in the sum of $850,000, and affecting the legality and validity of said bonds, up to and including the resolutions and orders of the board of directors of said district, made March 13, 1889, authorizing the issuance and sale of said bonds, be, and the same are hereby, approved and confirmed." From this judgment an appeal has been taken directly upon the judgment roll, bringing here the proceedings at the trial of the issues by a bill of exceptions.

In presenting their appeal, the appellants have contended that the act of March 7, 1887, under which the proceedings for the organization of the district were had, is unconstitutional, for the reason that it is in its nature beyond the power of the legislature to enact, and also by reason of the provisions therein contained for the organization of the district, and the mode provided for assessments upon the lands in said district, with which to meet the bonds authorized by the act. It is also contended by them that, at the hearing of the proceedings in the court below, the petitioners did not establish by competent evidence that there had been such compliance with the requirements of the act as would constitute a district, or give any authority to provide for the issuance of the bonds in question, and that the evidence upon which the court made its findings was improperly admitted and considered by it. The constitutionality of the act in question was passed upon this court and affirmed in the case of Irrigation Dist. v. Williams, 76 Cal. 360, 18 Pac. Rep. 379, and also in the case of Irrigation Dist. v. De Lappe, 79 Cal. 351, 21 Pac. Rep. 825; but, inasmuch as counsel have made elaborate arguments herein in review of the conclusion reached in those cases, we have again examined the question in the light of these arguments, and in affirming those decisions we present the reasons upon which we again hold the act to be constitutional more at length than was presented in the former opinions.

1. That the legislature is vested with the whole of the legislative power of the state, and that it has authority to deal with any subject within the scope of civil government, except in so far as it is restrained by the provisions of the constitution, and that it is the sole tribunal to determine as well the expediency as the details of all legislation within its power, are principles so familiar as hardly to need mention. The declaration in article 4, § 1, of the constitution, "The legislative power of this state shall be vested in a senate and assembly, which shall be designated the 'Legislature of the State of California,'" comprehends the exercise of all the sovereign authority of the state in matters which are properly the subject of legislation; and it is incumbent upon any one who will challenge an act of the legislature as being invalid to show either that such act is without the province of legislation, or that the particular subject-matter of that act has been by the constitution, either by express provision or by necessary implication, withdrawn by the people from the consideration of the legislature. The presumption which attends every act of the legislature is that it is within its power, and he who would except it from the power must point out the particular provision of the constitution by which the exception is made, or demonstrate that it is palpably excluded from any consideration whatever by that body.

In providing for the welfare of the state and its several parts, the legislature may pass laws affecting the people of the entire state, or, when not restrained by constitutional provisions, affecting only limited portions of the state. It may make special laws relating only to special districts, or it may legislate directly upon local districts, or it may intrust such legislation to subordinate bodies of a public character. It may create municipal organizations or agencies within the several counties, or it may avail itself of the county or other municipal organizations for the purposes of such legislation, or it may create new districts embracing more than one county, or parts of several counties, and may delegate to such organizations a part of its legislative power to be exercised within the boundaries of said organized districts, and may vest them with certain powers of local legislation, in respect to which the parties interested may be supposed more competent to judge of their needs than the central authority. "The members of the two houses are the constitutional agents of the public will in every district or locality of the state, and they may therefore so arrange the powers to be given and executed therein as convenience, the efficiency of administration, and the public good may seem to require, by committing some functions to local jurisdictions already established, or by establishing local jurisdictions for that express purpose." People v. Salomon, 51 Ill. 50. "If from exceptional causes the public good requires that legislation, either permanent or temporary, be directed towards any particular locality, whether consisting of one county or several counties, it is within the discretion of the legislature to apply such legislation as in its judgment the exigency of the case may require, and it is the sole judge of the existence of such causes. The representatives of the whole people, convened in the two branches of the legislature, are, subject to the exceptions which have been mentioned, the organs of the public will in every district or locality of the state. It follows that it falls to the legislature to arrange and distribute the administrative functions, committing such portions as it may deem suitable to local jurisdictions, and retaining other portions to be exercised by officers appointed by the central power, and changing the arrangement from time to time, as convenience, the efficacy of administration, and the public good may seem to require." People v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 544.

In providing for the public welfare, or in enacting laws which in the judgment of the legislature may be expedient or necessary, that body must determine whether or not the measure proposed is for some public purpose. We do not mean by this that the declaration of the legislature that an act proposed by it will be for the public good will of necessity preclude an investigation therein, or that such declaration will be conclusive when the act itself is palpably otherwise. Consolidated C. Co. v. Central Pac. R. Co., 51 Cal. 269. Acts may be passed by that body which will, by their very terms, or the nature of their provisions, show that their purpose is private, rather than public. Such are the acts that were involved in the cases of Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall. 664; Allen v. Inhabitants, 60 Me. 124; Lowell v. City of Boston, 111 Mass. 454; State v. Osawkee, 14 Kan. 419; People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624. But if the subject-matter of the legislation be of such a nature that there is any doubt of its character, or if by any possibility the legislation may be for the welfare of the public, the will of the legislature must prevail over the doubts of the court. Railroad Co. v. City of Stockton, 41 Cal. 147. It may be more difficult to define in advance the line of separation between a purpose which is private and one which is public than to determine whether in the individual case the act is for a public or a private purpose, and, as was said by Mr. Justice MILLER in Davidson v. New Orleans, 96 U. S. 104, it is wiser to proceed "by the gradual process of judicial inclusion and exclusion, as the cases presented for decision shall require." Whenever it is apparent from the scope of the act that its object is for the benefit of the public, and that the means by which the benefit is to be attained are of a public character, the act will be upheld, even though incidental advantages may accrue to individuals beyond those enjoyed by the general public. We have recently held that an appropriation by the legislature of $300,000 for the World's Fair Columbian Exposition at Chicago (Daggett v. Colgan, Cal. 28 Pac. Rep. 51) is to be sustained as a legitimate appropriation of the public moneys of the state, upon the ground that it is one of the objects of government to promote the public welfare of the state, and to provide for the material prosperity of its people, and that it is for the legislature to determine the manner and the extent to which it will exercise this function of government, and that its determination upon that point is limited by its own discretion, and beyond the interference of courts. The same rules of construction must be applied to the exercise of legislative authority in authorizing an expenditure for a local improvement. Such authorization is a legislative declaration that the expenditure is for a public purpose, and for the welfare of the public, and its action is not to be disregarded by the courts upon an assumption by them that such legislation is unwise, or that it may be injurious to some of the individuals who are affected by it. In determining whether any particular measure is for the public advantage it is not necessary to show that the entire body of the state is directly affected thereby, but it is sufficient that that portion of the state within the district provided for by the act shall be benefited thereby. The state is made up of its parts, and those parts have such a reciprocal influence upon each other that any advantage which accrues to one of them is felt more or less by all of the others. A legislature that should refrain from all legislation that did not equally affect all parts of the state would signally fail in providing for the welfare of the public. In a state as diversified in character as is California, it is impossible that the same legislation should be applicable to each of its parts. Different provisions are as essential for those portions whose physical characteristics are different as are needed in the provisions which are made for the government of town and country. Those portions of the state which are subject to overflow, and those which require drainage, as well as those which for the purpose of development require irrigation, fall equally within the purview of the legislature, and its authority to legislate for the benefit of the entire state, or for the individual district. The power of the legislature to adapt its laws to the peculiar wants of each of these districts rests upon the same principle, viz., that it is acting for the public good in its capacity as the representative of the entire state. Under this principle levee districts have been organized directly by the legislature itself, and their organization has been authorized by the legislature through the board of supervisors of the county in which the district is situated. St. 1867-68, p. 316. Such legislation was upheld in Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 406. Under the same principle, reclamation districts have been organized and their creation upheld as a legitimate exercise of legislative power. In passing upon this question in Hagar v. Board, 47 Cal. 233, the supreme court said: "The power of the legislature to compel local improvements which in its judgment will promote the health of the people and advance the public good is unquestionable. In the exercise of this power it may abate nuisances, construct and repair highways, open canals for irrigating arid districts, and perform many other similar acts for the public good, and all at the expense of those who are to be chiefly and more immediately benefited by the improvement;" and, in answer to the suggestion that such was merely a local improvement, the court said: "But we need not rest our decision upon the narrow ground that this is strictly a local improvement. On the contrary, the reclamation of the vast bodies of swamp and overflowed land in this state may justly be regarded as a public improvement of great magnitude and of the utmost importance to the community. If left wholly to individual enterprise, it probably would never be accomplished, and in inaugurating so great a work the legislature has pursued substantially the same system adopted in other states for the reclamation of similar lands, to-wit, by dividing the territory to be reclaimed into districts, and assessing the cost of the improvement on the lands to be benefited;" and refer in support of the opinion to the acts of different states in which similar improvements had been authorized.

The reasons given in that case are fully as potent in support of the authority exercised in the matter of an irrigation district; and, notwithstanding it is urged by counsel for appellants that the authority for reclaiming overflowed lands is to be upheld only as a sanitary measure, it will be seen that that is not the only ground upon which the court based its decision. Nor do we think that it rests upon that ground alone. In our opinion, a more liberal construction should be given to the authority under which such a district is established. Certainly these grounds are not the basis of the authority for the creation of a levee district; that rests, not upon any sanitary ground, but upon the ground of protection to the parties who would be affected by the overflow. Williams v. Cammack, 27 Miss. 222; Wallace v. Shelton, 14 La. Ann. 498. Upon this subject Mr. Cooley says: "But where any considerable tract of land owned by different persons is in a condition precluding cultivation by reason of excessive moisture which drains would relieve, it may well be said that the public have such an interest in the improvement and the consequent advancement of the general interest of the locality as will justify the levy of assessments upon the owners for drainage purposes. Such a case would seem to stand upon the same solid ground with assessments for levee purposes, which have for their object to protect lands from falling into a like condition of uselessness." Cooley, Tax'n, p. 617.

We have not been cited to the statute of any other state which provides for irrigating arid lands, or to any authority in which the power of the legislature over the subject is discussed, but we have no hesitation in saying that the principles upon which the decisions to which we have referred were made are applicable to sustain the legislative authority in making provision for such irrigation. Whether the reclamation of the land be from excessive moisture to a condition suitable for cultivation, or from excessive aridity to the same condition, the right of the legislature to authorize such reclamation must be upheld upon the same principle, viz., the welfare of the public, and particularly of that portion of the public within the district affected by the means adopted for such reclamation. Whatever tends to an increased prosperity of one portion of the state, or to promote its material development, is for the advantage of the entire state; and the right of the legislature to make provision for developing the productive capacity of the state, or for increasing facilities for the cultivation of its soil according to the requirements of the different portions thereof, is upheld by its power to act for the benefit of the people in affording them the right of "acquiring, possessing, and protecting the property" which is guaranteed to them by the constitution. The local improvement contemplated by such legislation is for the benefit and general welfare of all persons interested in the lands within the district, and is a local public improvement. This principle is not contravened by the fact that it may even operate injuriously upon some of the individuals or proprietors of land within the district, or by the fact that there may be some who for personal motives may wish to resist the improvement. Such result is only a sacrifice which the individual makes to the general good in compensation for the advantages enjoyed by virtue of the social compact. All laws of this character are upheld upon the same principle as is the creation of a district for the purpose of any other local improvement, such as the opening of a highway, or of a street, or of a public park. The legislature, to which has been confided the matter, has determined that it will be for the public good that such street or park be opened, and it has imposed the burden of such opening upon the property within a limited district. In each of such instances the land taxed for the improvement may not be the only land that will be benefited. Although land adjacent to the district may be incidentally benefited, that is no reason for taxing such land, nor is it any objection to the proceeding that some of the property within the district will not receive any benefit, or that the improvement will more specifically benefit those who have procured its creation. "It has never been deemed essential that the entire community, or any considerable portion of it, should directly enjoy or participate in an improvement or enterprise, in order to constitute a public use, within the meaning of these words as used in the constitution. Such an interpretation would greatly narrow and cripple the authority of the legislature, so as to deprive it of the power of exerting a material and beneficial influence on the welfare and prosperity of the state. In a broad and comprehensive view, such as has been heretofore taken of the construction of this clause of the declaration of rights, everything which tends to enlarge the resources, increase the industrial energies, and promote the productive power of any considerable number of the inhabitants of a section of the state, or which leads to the growth of towns and the creation of new sources for the employment of private capital and labor, indirectly contributes to the general welfare and to the prosperity of the whole community." Talbot v. Hudson, 16 Gray, 425.

The means by which the legislature may exercise this power are left to its own discretion, except as it may be limited by the constitution. If, in the exercise of its care for the public welfare, it finds that a specific district of the state needs legislation that is inapplicable to other parts of the state, it may, in the absence of constitutional restrictions, legislate directly for that district, or, if it be the case that similar legislation be required for other portions of the state, it may provide for adapting such legislation to those portions at the will of the people in such districts, as was done in the reclamation and levee laws already referred to. It may, too, by general laws authorize the inhabitants of any district, under such restrictions, and with such preliminary steps as it may deem proper, to organize themselves into a public corporation for the purpose of exercising those governmental duties, upon the same principle as it authorizes the incorporation of any municipal corporation under general laws. The constitution of California has been framed with the principle of investing separate subdivisions of the state with local government, and especially authorizes the legislature to confer the power of local legislation upon such subdivisions within the state as may be organized under its authority. The legislature is itself forbidden to interfere in any manner, except by general laws, with the power of local legislation intrusted to such organizations, nor can it delegate to any but public corporations the power to perform any municipal functions whatever, or vest in any but the corporate authority of a municipal corporation the power to assess and collect taxes for any municipal purpose. But, although the legislature is prevented from passing any special or local law which shall be applicable to only a particular portion or district of the state, its power of legislation for the public good in that portion of the state has not been destroyed. It still retains the full power of legislation conferred upon it in the constitution, but is required to exercise such power in the mode prescribed in that instrument. It may pass general laws which from their nature will be capable of enforcement in only particular portions of the state; or it may by other general laws authorize the organization of municipal corporations, which, from the nature of the functions intrusted to them, can find occasion for organization only in certain portions of the state, and it may by such general laws provide for the organization of such and as many species of municipal corporations as in its judgment are demanded by the welfare of the state, and the "protection, security, and benefit of the people," for which government is instituted, and which has been by the people confided to it. Const. art. 1, § 2. The provision in article 11, § 6, of the constitution, "Corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws," does not imply that the legislature must by any general law provide a plan in which shall be prescribed the mode under which all municipal corporations must be organized, and the powers that they can exercise. The provision in article 12, § 1, that private corporations "may be formed under general laws, but shall not be created by special act," although more explicit, and, under the declaration of the constitution itself, (article 1, § 22,) "mandatory" rather than permissive, requiring that they must be formed under general laws, has never been construed as requiring that all private corporations must be formed under the same general law, or limited to the exercise of the same powers. On the contrary, the form of organization, as well as the powers to be exercised, have been by legislation adapted to the character of the corporation to be organized. All corporations of the same class are required to be organized in the same manner, but the nature of the organization does not permit, nor does the constitution require, that corporations of different classes shall be organized in the same manner, or provided with the same powers. Hence the provisions that have been made by the legislature for the organization and powers of railroad, insurance, religious, mining, and other business corporations have been adapted to their respective character and needs. With greater propriety has it been left to the legislature to provide the mode of organization and the powers to be exercised by different species of municipal corporations. Such corporations are but the agents or representatives of the state in the particular locality in which they exist. They are organized for the purpose of carrying out the purposes of the legislature in its desire to provide for the general welfare of the state, and in the accomplishment of which legislative convenience or constitutional requirements have made them essential. Although in this state the legislature is required to provide such agencies under general laws, it is authorized, under its general power of legislation, to invest such corporations, when created, with the same powers which without such restriction it could itself have exercised; and in providing for such organizations it need confer upon them only such powers as in its judgment are proper to be exercised by them in the discharge of the particular functions of government which may be conferred upon them. Being the representatives of the legislature in the various localities of the state, the requirements for organization, as well as the powers to be exercised, vary with the character of the purpose for which they may be created. Hence the general laws which the legislature may enact for the organization of public corporations may be as numerous as the objects for which such corporations may be created. For each of these objects the law is the same, but there would be a manifest impropriety in requiring that the organization of a levee district or an irrigation district should be conducted in the same manner as the organization of a corporation for the management of a public park, or the control of the school department. Whether the districts to which such general laws are applicable, or in which the people thereof may avail themselves of the privilege conferred, be many or few, is immaterial. Even if there be but a single district to which the law is applicable at the time of its enactment, the legislature would be justified under its legislative power to pass general laws, in making such provision for that district. Whenever a special district of the state requires special legislation therefor, it is competent for the legislature by general law to authorize the organization of such district into a public corporation, with such powers of government as it may choose to confer upon it. It is not necessary that such public corporation should be vested with all governmental powers, but the legislature may clothe it with such as in its judgment are proper to be exercised within and for the benefit of such district. Being created for the purpose of discharging only one public purpose, it is not requisite that it have power not necessary therefor, or which would be appropriate to a corporation organized for some other purpose. Neither is it requisite that such corporation should have legislative or judicial powers conferred upon it. It may be organized for the mere purpose of exercising executive and administrative functions, with the added power of making such prudential rules and regulations as may be necessary for the exercise of the particular functions intrusted to its charge. The powers committed to a public corporation organized for the administration of a public park, or for the government of a levee district, or for the control of the police department, need be only such as are peculiarly appropriate to such organizations.

It is contended that the act is unconstitutional for the reason that it is a delegation of the legislative power to create a corporation. If by this is meant that only the legislature can create such corporation, the answer is that the constitution prohibits such action. If it is meant that because the corporation is not "created" until the voters of the district have accepted the terms of the act, the answer is that such proceeding is in direct accord with the principles of the constitution. Having the power to create municipal corporations, but being prohibited from creating them by special laws, the only mode in which such corporations could be created under a general law would be by some act on the part of the district or community seeking incorporation, indicative of its determination to accept its terms. As the constitution has not limited or prescribed the character of such general law, its character and details are within the discretionary power of the legislature. We know of no more appropriate mode of such indication than the affirmative vote of those who are to be affected by the acceptance of the terms of the act. The municipal corporations which may be thus created are not limited to cities and towns. The constitution makes provision in various places for municipal corporations other than cities and towns. Article 11, §§ 9, 10, 12, 16. In each of these sections provision is made with reference to the government or officers of "county, city, town, or other public or municipal corporation;" thus clearly indicating that there may be municipal corporations other than those of a town or city, and, consequently, that the provisions with reference to the incorporation of cities and towns found in section 6 of the same article are not controlling in the organization of other municipal corporations, and that, while the constitution carefully provides for the "incorporation, organization and classification" of cities and towns, it makes no similar provision for other municipal corporations, but very properly leaves such action to the discretion of the legislature. Inasmuch as there is no restriction upon the power of the legislature to authorize the formation of such corporations for any public purpose whatever, and as when organized they are but mere agencies of the state in local government, without any powers except such as the legislature may confer upon them, and are at all times subject to a revocation of such power, it was evidently the purpose of the framers of the constitution to leave in the hands of the legislature full discretion in reference to their organization.

In the present case the legislature has chosen to authorize the creation of a public corporation, in the manner and with the forms specified in the act under discussion. For this purpose it has provided that a petition of 50 freeholders, or a majority of the freeholders owning lands within a proposed district susceptible of one mode of irrigation, shall be presented to the board of supervisors of the county within which such lands are situate; and that the board of supervisors shall, upon the hearing of such petition, after notice thereof, determine whether or not it will take steps to organize an irrigation district; and that upon such determination an election shall be ordered, at which, if two-thirds of the electors within the district shall vote in favor of such organization, the district shall thereupon be organized, and its management confided to a board of directors chosen by the electors of that district. It is objected to this that it is placing in the hands of those not interested the power of imposing a burden upon the owners of the land, who may be a small minority of the electors within that district, or who may even be non-residents of the district. This, however, is a matter which was addressed purely to the discretion of the legislature. Whether such a petition should be made by the owners of a fixed proportion of the land, as was required in the reclamation law, or whether there should be any qualification to the petitioners, or whether there should be any limit to the expenses which they were authorized to incur for the purposes of the improvement, are questions which were solely for the consideration of the legislature. It is not for this department of the government to question the policy or the prudence of a co-ordinate branch. If those who are affected by its proceedings feel that it has not given them sufficient protection, or placed sufficient safeguards around the institution of the corporation, they must seek redress from that body. We can only act upon the law as it has been enacted. It must be observed, however, that this petition has no binding operation, but is merely the initiatory step which gives to the board of supervisors a jurisdiction to act upon the expediency or policy of authorizing the creation of the district. That body is the representative of the county, and has been chosen by its electors for the express purpose of legislation upon local subjects, and may naturally be supposed to have the interests of the entire county, as well as of each of its parts, in charge, and to be acquainted with its needs and requirements. The legislature has not, however, intrusted that body with the final determination of the question, but has authorized it to submit the question to a vote of the electors of the district, and it is only when these electors have determined by a vote of two-thirds of their number in favor thereof that the district can be created as a political body. The objection that this vote may be carried by a majority of those who have no interest in the lands affected thereby is but an incident, and not of the essence of the matter. It is no more than exists in every popular vote which involves the creation of a municipal debt or the adoption of a municipal organization. The fact that the owners of the lands are non-residents within the district, and not allowed a voice in the proceedings, is of the same character. Property qualification for voting, either in amount or character, is expressly forbidden by article 1, § 24, of the constitution, which declares: "No property qualification shall ever be required for any person to vote or hold office;" and, however much non-residents may be affected by the acts and vote of the community, only those who are inhabitants of the district can, by the constitution, be permitted to vote at any election. Article 2, § 1.

That an irrigation district, organized under the act in question, becomes a public corporation, is evident from an examination of the mode of its organization, the purpose for which it is organized, and the powers conferred upon it. It can be organized only at the instance of the board of supervisors of the county,—the legislative body of one of the constitutional subdivisions of the state; its organization can be affected only upon the vote of the qualified electors within its boundaries; its officers are chosen under the sanction and with the formalities required at all public elections in the state,—the officers of such election being required to act under the sanction of an oath, and being authorized to administer oaths when required for the purpose of conducting the election; and the officers when elected being required to execute official bonds to the state of California, approved by a judge of the superior court. The district officers thus become public officers of the state. When organized, the district can acquire, either by purchase or condemnation, all property necessary for the construction of its works, and may construct thereon canals, and other irrigation improvements; and all the property so acquired is to be held by the district in trust, and is dedicated for the use and purposes set forth in the act, and is declared to be a public use, subject to the regulation and control of the state. For the purpose of meeting the cost of acquiring this property, the district is authorized, upon the vote of a majority of its electors, to issue its bonds; and these bonds, and the interest thereon, are to be paid by revenues derived under the power of taxation, and for which all the real property in the district is to be assessed. Under this power of taxation, one of the highest attributes of sovereignty, the title of the delinquent owner to the real estate assessed, may be divested by sale, and power is conferred upon the board of directors to establish equitable by-laws, rules, and regulations for the distribution and use of water among the owners of said lands, and generally to perform all such acts as shall be necessary to fully carry out the purpose of the act. Here are found the essential elements of a public corporation, none of which pertain to a private corporation. The property held by the corporation is in trust for the public, and subject to the control of the state. Its officers are public officers chosen by the electors of the district, and invested with public duties. Its object is for the good of the public, and to promote the prosperity and welfare of the public. "Where a corporation is composed exclusively of officers of the government, having no personal interest in it, or with its concerns, and only acting as organs of the state in effecting a great public improvement, it is a public corporation." Ang. & A. Corp. § 32. "A municipal corporation properly created mainly for the interest, advantage, and convenience of the locality of its people. The primary idea is an agency to regulate and administer the interior concerns of the locality in matters peculiar to the place incorporated, and not common to the state or people at large." 15 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 954. "Public corporations are such as are created for the discharge of public duties in the administration of civil government." Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. 332.

The constitutionality of the act in question is further assailed upon the ground that it makes no provision for a hearing from the owners of the land prior to the organization of the district. But the steps provided for the organization of the district are only for the creation of a public corporation, to be invested with certain political duties which it is to exercise in behalf of the state. Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 406. It has never been held that the inhabitants of a district are entitled to notice and hearing upon a proposition to submit such question to a popular vote. In the absence of constitutional restriction, it would be competent for the legislature to create such public corporation, even against the will of the inhabitants. It has as much power to create the district in accordance with the will of a majority of such inhabitants. It must be observed that such proceeding does not affect the property of any one within the district, and that he is not by virtue thereof deprived of any property. Such result does not arise until after delinquency on his part in the payment of an assessment that may be levied upon his property, and before that time he has opportunity to be heard as to the correctness of the valuation which is placed upon his property, and made the basis of his assessment. He does not, it is true, have any opportunity to be heard, otherwise than by his vote, in determining the amount of bonds to be issued, or the rate of assessment with which they are to be paid; but in this particular he is in the same condition as is the inhabitant of any municipal organization which incurs a bonded indebtedness or levies a tax for its payment. His property is not taken from him without due process of law, if he is allowed a hearing at any time before the lien of the assessment thereon becomes final. People v. Smith, 21 N. Y. 595; Gilmore v. Hentig, 33 Kan. 170, 5 Pac. Rep. 781; Hagar v. Reclamation Dist., 111 U. S. 701, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 663; Davies v. City of Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 46, 24 Pac. Rep. 771.

It is also objected that the mode provided for the payment of the bonds is unconstitutional, in that it provides for an assessment upon the real property within the district according to its value, and not according to the benefit which each particular parcel of land may derive from the improvement. The power of the legislature in matters of taxation is unlimited, except as restricted by constitutional provisions. This is one of the attributes of sovereignty which the people have placed in its hands; and they have intrusted its exercise to its discretion, either in the manner or to the extent to which it is to be applied. All taxation has its source in the necessities of organized society, and is limited by such necessity, and can be exercised only by some demand for the public use or welfare. And, whether the tax be by direct imposition for revenue or by assessment for a local improvement, it is based upon the theory that it is in return for the benefit received by the person who pays the tax, or by the property which is assessed. For the purpose of apportioning this benefit, the legislature may determine in advance what property will be benefited, by designating the district within which it is to be collected, as well as the property upon which it is to be imposed, or it may appoint a commission or delegate to a subordinate agency the power to ascertain the extent of this benefit. It may itself declare that the entire state is benefited, and authorize the burden to be borne by a public tax, or it may declare that all or a portion of the property within a limited region is benefited, either according to its value or in proportion to its actual benefit, to be specifically ascertained by actual determination of officers appointed therefor. Upon the power of the legislature over the subject of taxation, as well as the modes in which and the objects upon which it may be exercised, we know of nothing that has been written in any opinion since that of Judge RUGGLES in People v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 419, which is not either an amplification of the views therein expressed, or an adaptation of them to the particular subject under discussion. In the exhaustive opinion of Mr. Justice SAWYER in Emery v. Gas Co., 28 Cal. 345, the principles declared in that opinion were applied to the case then before the court, wherein this power of taxation was shown to be the foundation for upholding the right of assessment in a manner different from the ad valorem principle. The controversy upon this subject has almost invariably been against the "front-foot" rule, and in favor of the ad valorem principle; and in nearly every state, unless it be New Jersey, the principle has been maintained that it is within the power of the legislature to adopt whichever rule it may select. In Burnett v. Sacramento, 12 Cal. 76, the charter of Sacramento provided that the expense of a local improvement should be assessed upon the adjacent property according to its value, and upon this point the supreme court, speaking through Judge FIELD, said: "The law in question avoids the injustice of general taxation for local purposes, and lays the burden upon the recipients of the benefit. It apportions the tax according to the assessed cash value of the adjacent property, which is as near an approximation to an equitable rule as can well be established. No rule could be adopted which would work absolute equality. An approximation to it is all that can be attained. The power of apportionment, like the power of taxation, is exclusively in the legislature. The constitution contains no inhibition to the tax, and prescribes no rule of apportionment. Security against the abuse of the power rests in the wisdom and justice of the members of the legislature, and they are responsible to their constituents." Assessments for local improvements according to the value of the property assessed have been upheld in Downer v. Boston, 7 Cush. 277; Snow v. Fitchburg, 136 Mass. 183; Gilmore v. Hentig, 33 Kan. 174, 5 Pac. Rep. 781; Stowbridge v. Portland, 8 Or. 82; Creighton v. Scott, 14 Ohio St. 438; Lockwood v. St. Louis, 24 Mo. 20.

It is, however, for the legislature to determine how the apportionment shall be made, and, while it is held that an apportionment of the expenses for a local improvement is to be made according to the benefits received by the property assessed, yet the power to make such apportionment rests upon the general power of taxation, and the apportionment itself does not depend upon the fact of local benefit in any other sense than that all taxes are supposed to be based upon the benefit received by the tax-payer. As was said by Mr. Justice TEMPLE, in Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 428, 14 Pac. Rep. 71: "The main practical difference between assessment for a local improvement and general taxation seems to be that in general taxation it is difficult and generally impossible for the court to say that the purpose of the tax is not a public purpose, or that no benefit will result to the tax-payer, while in local assessments it is more often easy to see that the improvement will not be a special benefit. Still, the benefit is not the source of the power. That is inherent in the government, and is only limited by express or implied limitations found in the constitution, or by its own nature and purposes, and within these limits the legislature is the sole judge of when and to what extent the power shall be used;" and again: "The power being in the legislature, the limitations upon it must be found in the constitution, either in express provisions or by implication, and there exists the same presumption that the law is within legislative power that applies to any other statute; that is, the law will not be declared unconstitutional unless it plainly appears to be so." Page 430, 72 Cal., and page 81, 14 Pac. Rep. Mr. Cooley says, in his treatise on Taxation, (page 622:) "The power to determine when a special assessment shall be made, and on what basis it shall be apportioned, is wisely confided to the legislature, and could not, without the introduction of some new principle in representative government, be placed elsewhere." And, in Hagar v. Board, supra, the court said: "It is equally clear that those clauses which provide that taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state, and which prescribe the mode of assessment, and the persons by whom it shall be made, and that all property shall be taxed, have no application to assessments levied for local improvements." In accordance with this principle, various modes of apportionment for the expenses of local improvements have been upheld. We have already seen that they have been upheld when made in accordance with the value of the property, as well as when made in proportion to the frontage of the lots. The legislature has also itself designated the district which will be benefited by the improvement, as was done in the Dupont-Street Improvement, (St. 1875-76, p. 433,) and as has been provided in the general act for street improvements, where the entire frontage of the block is the district upon which the assessment is to be made. Diggins v. Brown, 76 Cal. 318, 18 Pac. Rep. 373. Assessments have also been upheld when made by commissioners appointed to make specific assessments upon the several parcels of land, (Bridge Co. v. Kirkham, 64 Cal. 519, 2 Pac. Rep. 409,) or when made according to the area of the land affected by the improvement, (Keese v. City of Denver, 10 Colo. 123, 15 Pac. Rep. 825.) The legislature has itself levied a specific tax upon each acre of land within a district created by itself, (Levee Co. v. Hardin, 27 Mo. 495; Williams v. Cammack, 27 Miss. 209, Alcorn v. Hamer, 38 Miss. 652;) and has authorized such tax to be levied by the district, (Wallace v. Shelton, 14 La. Ann. 498;) and has authorized a fixed uniform rate for each sewer upon the estimated cost of all the sewers within the district, (Leominster v. Conant, 139 Mass. 384, 2 N. E. Rep. 690.)

It is not necessary to show that property within the district may be actually benefited by the local improvement, and, even if it positively appear that no benefit is received, such property is not thereby exempted from bearing its portion of the assessment, nor is the act unconstitutional because it provides that such property shall be assessed. Property that is exempt from taxation has always been held subject to the burdens of assessment for local improvements, and property within a district that is not susceptible of receiving any immediate benefit from the improvement is nevertheless so indirectly benefited thereby that it must bear a portion of the burden. If within the limits of a levee district a parcel of land should be so situated as not to require the protection of the levee, that would be no reason for excluding it from its share of the expense, or, if within the limits of a drainage district there should chance to be found a cliff, that would be no reason for exempting it from assessment. The objection that the legislature has no authority to confer upon the supervisors of a county the right to create a corporation whose district shall embrace a portion of the territory of another county does not arise in the present case. It is not contended that any portion of the Madera Irrigation district lies outside of the county of Fresno.

2. One of the objections to the sufficiency of the proceedings taken by the supervisors in authorizing a vote by the electors for the purpose of determining whether the district should be organized is that the bond which accompanied the petition was so defective as to deprive the board of jurisdiction to authorize such election.

If it be conceded that the presentation to the board of a bond with the petition is a jurisdictional prerequisite to their consideration of the petition, we do not think that such element of jurisdiction was wanting in the present case. The bond which was presented, although informal, was not invalid, and was of binding obligation upon those who had signed it. In such a case the determination of its sufficiency by the board of supervisors was as conclusive as their determination respecting the pecuniary responsibility of its signers, or the amount for which the bond should be given.

3. Other objections to the constitutionality of the act, and the sufficiency of the proceedings in the organization of the district, have been presented by the appellants, but we think that they are covered by the views presented in the foregoing opinion. We do not think that the boundaries of the district, or of the election precincts, are so imperfectly described as to prevent the supervisors from acquiring jurisdiction for authorizing the organization of the district. The provision in the statute that the petition shall particularly set forth and describe the boundaries does not mean that they shall be set forth and described with more particularity than would be necessary in an act of the legislature creating a political district or a municipal corporation. If the course of a boundary is given, it is not necessary that such course shall have been actually surveyed upon the ground before the boundary can be said to be particularly described; and a reference to an official map, or to a land-mark designated upon such map, is as definite as would be a reference to the land-mark itself. We cannot, from their description, say that the boundaries given in the petition are so indefinite that the district cannot be definitely located, or that they fail to embrace a distinct and definite territory. As illustrations of similar descriptions in acts of the legislature, we refer to the act incorporating the city of Sacramento, (St. 1850, p. 70,) and the act incorporating the city and county of San Francisco, (St. 1856, p. 146;) also the act setting forth the boundaries of the county of San Benito, (St. 1873-74, p. 95.) The case of Crosby v. Dowd, 61 Cal. 557, referred to by appellants, was expressly overruled in DeSepulveda v. Baugh, 74 Cal. 468, 16 Pac. Rep.

223. The boundaries of a municipal corporation are not construed with any more strictness than is required in the case of a private grant. This subject was fully considered in Irrigation Dist. v. De Lappe, supra.

4. By the act of March 16, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 212,) under which these proceedings were instituted, it is provided in section 5 that, "upon the hearing of such special proceedings, the court shall have power and jurisdiction to examine and determine the legality and validity of, and approve and confirm each and all of, the proceedings for the organization of said district, under the provisions of said act, from and including the petition for the organization of the district, and all other proceedings which may affect the legality or validity of said bonds, and the order for the sale and the sale thereof." It is also provided in section 2 that "the petition shall state the facts showing the proceedings had for the issue and sale of said bonds, and shall state generally that the irrigation district was duly organized, and that the first board of directors was duly elected, but the petition need not state the facts showing such organization, or the election of said first board of directors." Section 4 of the act provides: "The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure respecting the answer to a verified complaint shall be applicable to an answer to said petition. * * *

The rules of pleading and practice provided by the Code of Civil Procedure, which are not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are applicable to the special proceeding herein provided for." The petition in the present case states "that said Madera irrigation district was duly organized under the laws of the state of California, and especially under the provisions" of the act of March 7, 1887. The answers deny this allegation, and deny specifically that any of the steps required by the statute for the organization of the district were taken in reference thereto. In order that the court might determine the legality and validity of the proceedings, it was required by the act in question to "examine" them. The act provides that it "shall have power and jurisdiction to examine and determine the legality and validity of, and approve and confirm, each and all of the proceedings for the organization of said district;" and, unless it shall "examine" the proceedings, it would not have the power to "determine" their legality and validity. One step in the proceedings, and that which was the foundation of all others, and without which the whole superstructure of the corporation and its acts, culminating in the bonds sought to be validated, would have fallen, was that a petition should have been presented to the board of supervisors, signed by 50 or a majority of freeholders owning lands within the boundaries of the proposed district. It was necessary, therefore, for the petitioners herein to make proof to the court that such a petition had been presented to the board of supervisors. Instead, however, of making such proof, they introduced in evidence the record of the proceedings of the board of supervisors, which contained recitals that a petition had been presented to said board, and that, before hearing said petition, evidence to the satisfaction of the board was adduced by petitioners upon the question whether or not there were 50 petitioners whose genuine signatures appeared affixed to said petition, who were bona fide freeholders of lands within the proposed boundaries of said proposed irrigation district; whereupon the board, having announced that they are satisfied that there were 50 such freeholders, whose signatures appeared affixed to said petition, proceeded to hear said petition. The defendants objected to the introduction of this evidence upon the ground that no foundation had been laid therefor, and that it was irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent to establish any issue before the court. The objections were overruled, and an exception taken by the defendants. The petitioners then offered in evidence a document purporting to be a petition, with the signatures of upwards of 50 names attached thereto. To the introduction of this document the defendants objected, upon the ground that its execution had not been shown, and that there was no evidence that the parties whose names appeared attached thereto were freeholders owning lands within the district. The court overruled the objection, to which the defendants excepted. In these rulings the court erred. There was no proof that the petition had been signed by either of the persons whose names were attached thereto, or that either of said persons was a freeholder, owning lands within the boundaries designated in the petition. Whether a petition had been presented to the board of supervisors of such a character as to give to that board jurisdiction to act in accordance with the provisions of the law in question was an issue before the court, to be determined by competent evidence. A declaration by the board of supervisors that such a petition had been presented, even though such declaration was spread upon their records, was not competent evidence in this proceeding, as it was only hearsay. No board or tribunal can obtain jurisdiction by its own recital that it has jurisdiction. It may be held that, when the question of such jurisdiction arises in some collateral proceeding, the act of the board in recognition of the sufficiency of the petition would be presumptive of such sufficiency, yet, when the very issue to be determined by the court is whether the petition was sufficient to give jurisdiction, such issue must be established by evidence as competent as that which is required to establish an issue in any other proceeding. In the absence of any statutory declaration respecting the character of the proof by which any fact may be established in a court of justice, it must be established in accordance with the common-law rules of evidence. It is sometimes provided by statute that in proceedings of this nature the act of the board of supervisors shall be prima facie evidence of the regularity of all proceedings prior to the making of the order, as was the case in Damp v. Town of Dane, 29

Wis. 426; and also in Re Kiernan, 62 N. Y. 459. The effect of such provision is to throw the burden of proof upon those who would challenge the sufficiency of the petition. In all cases it is essential that there be proof of a sufficient petition, inasmuch as without it the board could acquire no jurisdiction to act, and its proceedings would be absolutely void. In the absence of such statutory provision, however, the burden of proving any affirmative allegation is upon him who makes it, (Code Civil Proc. § 1869,) and it must be established under the ordinary rules of evidence. The statute in the present case is silent with reference to the effect as evidence of the action of the board of supervisors upon the petition. We are not aware of any statute which gives to their action any effect as evidence, or which makes their records evidence of any fact other than the corporate act therein recorded. Their records can be competent evidence of only such matters as they are by statute authorized to make matters of record. The statute herein does not authorize the board of supervisors to enter upon their records the facts which give them jurisdiction to hear the petition, or any evidence of such facts; and the entry in their record of such facts, or of such evidence, does not give thereto any official sanction or right of recognition more than any other memorandum that may have been made by their clerk. In People v. Hagar, 49 Cal. 232, when the question arose in a collateral proceeding, and it was contended that the certificate by the commissioners of a compliance by them with the requirements of the statute was evidence thereof, the court held otherwise, saying: "Whatever may have been the rule, if the statute had required the commissioners to state in their certificate to the assessment roll that they had jointly viewed and assessed the land, it is clear that the certificate can have no such conclusive effect, unless it was incumbent on the commissioners to certify that they acted jointly in viewing and assessing the land. But, as the statute does not require them to state that fact in the certificate, their having voluntarily done so was a superfluous act, and, instead of being conclusive of the fact that they acted jointly, was not even prima facie evidence of it."

It was held in Dean v. Davis, 51 Cal. 406, that in a collateral proceeding the regularity of the proceedings under which the district had been organized could not be questioned, under the rule that, being a de facto corporation, only the state could take advantage of any irregularity in its organization. In Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 422, 14 Pac. Rep. 71, the court, however, questioned the power of the county court in that case to pass upon the questions upon which its jurisdiction depended, so as to conclude an inquiry, even upon a collateral attack; and in Kahn v. Supervisors, 79 Cal. 400, 21 Pac. Rep. 849, the court said: "Nor should this jurisdiction be held to attach, whatever court may have ruled that the petition was signed by a majority, when in fact it was signed only by a minority, of the owners designated by the statute." The cases cited on behalf of the respondent in support of the action of the court below are all cases in which the question was presented in a collateral proceeding. In Humboldt Co. v. Dinsmore, 75 Cal. 604, 17 Pac. Rep. 710, it was admitted that the persons who signed the petition were freeholders. After jurisdiction had once been obtained, other proceedings subsequent thereto are movements within the jurisdiction, and can be questioned only by direct attack; but the fact of jurisdiction must be affirmatively shown whenever that is the issue to be determined. It is unnecessary, however, in the present case, to determine what would be the rule if the question should arise in a proceeding where the jurisdiction would be collaterally attacked. The question does not arise collaterally here. The corporation has itself come into court and challenged an examination into the regularity of its organization, and asks the court to examine "each and all of the proceedings for the organization of said district." Upon such a proceeding it becomes as necessary for it to establish such regularity, and to give evidence of each step therein, as fully as if its acts were under investigation upon a writ of review, or as if the state were by quo warranto questioning its right to exercise the franchise of a corporation. In such a case it is incumbent upon it to make proof of every step required by statute for assuming corporate powers. High, Extr. Rem. 712, 716; Larke v. Crawford, 28 Mich. 88. Upon certiorari, though the inferior tribunal is required to certify only matters of record, yet, if the jurisdictional facts do not appear of record, it must certify "not only what is technically denominated the record, but such facts, or the evidence of them, as may be necessary to determine whatever question, as to the jurisdiction of the tribunal, may be involved." Blair v. Hamilton, 32 Cal. 52; Whitney v. Board, 14 Cal. 479; Lowe v. Alexander, 15 Cal. 300. The object of the act in question, as was said in Board v. Tregoe, 88 Cal. 334, 26 Pac. Rep. 237, is for the purpose of affording to investors in the bonds the security of a judicial determination of their validity, and, in order that this may have the effect intended by the legislature, it is not sufficient for the court to perform the mere perfunctory office of recording the determination of the board of supervisors that its proceedings in the organization of the district were regular. The court is not a lit de justice for the mere purpose of entering of record the rescripts of the board of supervisors, and giving to them the dignity of its own judgment. When the defendants controverted the allegations of the petition that the irrigation district was duly organized, it became necessary for the petitioners to establish at the trial the facts showing that it had been duly organized.

Section 456, Code Civil Proc., provides: "In pleading a judgment or other determination of a court, officer, or board it is not necessary to state the facts conferring jurisdiction, but such judgment or determination may be stated to have been duly given or made. If such allegation be controverted, the party pleading must establish on the trial the facts conferring jurisdiction." The provision in the act in question that the rules of pleading and practice provided by the Code of Civil Procedure should be applicable to this proceeding made it incumbent upon the petitioner to establish the due organization of the district by evidence competent therefor. We are not aware of any decision in this state in which it has been held that the decision of an inferior board upon the question of its own jurisdiction was conclusive on a collateral attack, or even prima facie evidence of the fact in a direct proceeding. In Litchfield v. Vernon, 41 N. Y. 123, the legislature had authorized a local improvement to be made "upon application of a majority of the owners of land in the district proposed to be assessed, and the sufficiency of an assessment therefor was afterwards contested in the courts. Upon the hearing in the court of appeals, that court used the following language: "This brings us to the only remaining question in the case, and that is whether there was any competent evidence authorizing a finding that a majority of the owners of land within the territory made subject to assessment made application to the common council, requesting them to make application to the supreme court for the appointment of three commissioners, as provided by the first section of the act of 1859. The act itself is wholly silent as to how this essential fact shall be proved. The right of the common council to apply for the appointment of the commissioners lies at the foundation of the whole proceeding. Unless this right existed, all the proceedings in appointing the commissioners, and subsequent thereto, are void. This right depends upon the question whether a majority of the land-owners petitioned the common council to proceed under the act. In the absence of such petition the common council had no authority in the premises, and nothing could be done under the act. The act does not provide for the determination of this fact by the common council, nor by the special term upon the presentation of the petition for the appointment of the commissioners. The act being silent as to what should be deemed proof of the fact that a majority of the land-owners petitioned the common council, the plaintiff was bound to prove such fact by competent, common-law evidence. This could be done by proof showing who were the owners of the land at the time of the passage of the act, and that a majority of such persons petitioned the common council, as required by the first section of the act. Neither the application of the council to the court, nor the affidavit of the mayor accompanying such application, was evidence of this fact against the defendant. Sharp v. Speir, 4 Hill. 76. There was no competent evidence of this fact given upon the trial, and the exception to the finding of this fact by the judge was well taken." In Thorn v. Commissioners, 130 Ill. 594, 22 N. E. Rep. 520, the same question was presented. The statutes of Illinois provided that the board of park commissioners might take jurisdiction over certain streets, upon first obtaining the consent, in writing, of the owners of a majority of the frontage of the lots and lands abutting thereon; and also provided for a confirmation of any assessment made therefor by the circuit court, upon the application of the commissioners, after notice therefor to the lot-owners. At the hearing of the application for confirmation of the assessment roll, returned by the commissioners in the above case, the commissioners offered a paper, purporting to be the petition and consent of the abutting lot-owners, and showed that such paper came from the files kept by the board of commissioners, and was the written consent acted upon by the board in adding the streets for the purpose contemplated. The court below, upon the objection to the competency of this evidence, held that this document made a prima facie case for the commissioners, and cast the burden upon the objectors to show that it was not the written consent of the property owners, as it purported to be. Upon appeal, however, the supreme court reversed the action of the court below, saying: "We cannot concur in the holding of the trial court. As we have seen, the burden was on the park commissioners to show affirmatively the jurisdictional fact of consent by the owners of the required amount of frontage. The evidence in respect thereto was, we think, wholly insufficient. Waiving the matter of proving ownership by the persons purporting to sign the paper admitted in evidence, it is not shown that a sufficient number of such persons signed the consent to constitute consent by the owners of a majority of the abutting property. The only person introduced who testified generally to the execution of the writing testifies that he procured the signatures of most of the signers, but not all, and he does not testify, except in a few instances, either as to those he did or did not procure. The writing here offered is not signed by the objectors, and we are aware of no rule by which it was admissible in evidence against them, without proof of its execution, nor is the consent at all aided by the fact that the park commissioners acted upon the paper introduced in evidence. While the park commissioners must, in the first instance, pass upon the fact of consent by the owners of abutting property, and determine for themselves whether those owning a majority of the frontage of the property had consented to their appropriation of the street for the purposes contemplated by the act, such determination can have no effect, when their jurisdiction is challenged, in endeavoring to carry out the powers conferred by the statute. The power conferred upon the park board affects and impairs the right of the citizen, and may incur his property without his consent, and may arbitrarily impose onerous burdens for which there is no relief or redress. The legislature has interposed the safeguard of requiring the consent of the owners of more than one-half of the property to be affected, upon the presumption, no doubt, that what will be of benefit to the greater portion will not unduly prejudice the lesser part; and, when the commissioners sought confirmation of their assessment upon appellant's property, under the power conferred by the statute, it was incumbent upon them to show compliance with the law by which alone they obtained jurisdiction to impose the burden. This they have not done." See, also, Pittsburg v. Walter, 69 Pa. St. 365.

5. The order for the issuance of the bonds is that $850,000 be issued, and that the said bonds shall be payable in installments, as follows: "At the expiration of eleven years, not less than five per cent. of said bonds; at the expiration of twelve years, not less than six per cent. of said bonds," etc. Section 15 of the statute provides: "Said bonds shall be payable in gold coin of the United States, in installments, as follows, to-wit: At the expiration of eleven years, not less than five per cent. of said bonds; at the expiration of twelve years, not less than six per cent.," etc. In Irrigation Dist. v. De Lappe, 79 Cal. 351, 21 Pac. Rep. 825, the form of the bond in connection with this provision of the statute was discussed. It was there held that the bonds to be issued should be in such form that each bond would be payable in installments of such percentage in each year as is designated in the statute, and that an order making that percentage of the entire issue of the bonds payable in the designated years would not be a compliance with the statute. In the present case, if 5 per cent. of the $850,000 should be payable at the expiration of 11 years, and the board of directors should not sell or dispose of more than that percentage of the entire issue of bonds, it would make the entire amount of outstanding bonds payable at the expiration of 11 years; whereas, the board of directors, under section 22 of the act in question, are authorized, at the expiration of 10 years after the issuing of said bonds, to levy an assessment for only 5 per cent. of the principal of the whole amount of bonds then outstanding. This provision in the order does not, however, affect the substance of the order for the issuance of the bonds, but merely the form in which the bonds are to be issued, and does not itself invalidate the proceedings had by the district for the issuance of the bonds. The district voted for the issuance of bonds to the amount of $850,000, to be issued in accordance with the provisions of the statute. The manner in which those bonds were to be issued is prescribed by the statute, and can be followed by the board whenever their issuance becomes necessary. The court, however, instead of approving and confirming this order, should have limited its order of confirmation to that portion thereof which designated the amount of the bonds to be issued, leaving to the board itself the duty of preparing the bonds in the form required by the statute.

6. In its decree the court, after determining the legality and validity of the proceedings, added thereto the following: "And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that all persons, and each and every person interested in the organization of said irrigation district, save and except the appellants herein, be forever debarred and precluded from disputing, denying, or disclaiming any fact or facts relating to the organization of the said district, or providing for and authorizing the issue and sale of the bonds of said district, which might by them have been denied, questioned, or disputed in this proceeding." This portion of its judgment was unauthorized. The statute does not confer upon the court any power or jurisdiction to do more than "examine and determine the legality and validity of, and approve and confirm," the proceedings had under said act. What the effect of its determination and judgment may be is to be determined by the court in which it shall at any time hereafter be offered in evidence. The statute makes no provision for including therein an injunction against those who may not have seen fit to question its action in this proceeding, and against whom there has been no service, except by the publication of the notice directed by the court. If by virtue of such inaction on their part they should be hereafter precluded or estopped from questioning the sufficiency of the action of the court in this proceeding, that question must be determined by the court in which any attempt may be made to avoid the effect of the judgment herein. For the error committed by the court in admitting evidence as hereinbefore stated the judgment is reversed.

BEATTY, C. J. Until the filing of the supplemental briefs in this case I had supposed that the constitutionality of the statute commonly known as the "Wright Act" had been definitely settled by the decision of this court in the case of Irrigation Dist. v. Williams, 76 Cal. 360, 18 Pac. Rep. 379, in which I was one of the counsel employed to defend the validity of the act. I therefore sat at the hearing of this case with the expectation of participating in its decision, but on becoming aware of the fact that the constitutionality of the law was again seriously drawn in question upon all the grounds formerly taken, and upon several others, I concluded that, although I might not be disqualified in a strict sense in this particular case, I could not with perfect propriety take part in deciding it, and for that reason express no opinion.

In re BONDS OF MADERA IRRIGATION DIST. (No. 14,234.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1891.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

R. E. Houghton, Octave G. Du Py, Mesick, Maxwell & Phelan, Page & Eells, Pillsbury & Blanding, E. W. Magraw, and E. W. McKinstry, or appellants. Hinds & Merriam, Craig & Meredith, and C. C. Wright, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order denying a new trial. The facts in the record are identical with those in the appeal from the judgment in the same case, 23 Pac. Rep. 272, (No. 14,157;) and for the reasons given in the opinion in that case the order of the court below is reversed, and a new trial granted.

BAIRD v. PEALL. (No. 13,773.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1891.)

MECHANICS' LIENS—CONTRACT PAYABLE IN LAND—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1184, declaring void all contracts for labor and materials expended on buildings, except that of the contractor, unless the whole contract price is payable in money, a painter who contracts to paint an hotel is an original contractor, and the contract is not void because part of the price is to be paid in land.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. § 648, providing that when an exception is made to the findings of the court below on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence "the objection must be stated with so much of the evidence or other matter as is necessary to explain it, and no more," no statement of the evidence or deduction therefrom by way of argument is proper.

Commissioners' decision. Department

1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; JOHN REYNOLDS, Judge.

Action by J. H. Baird against W. J. Peall to enforce a mechanic's lien. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Kennedy, for appellant. W. B. Hardy, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to foreclose a mechanic's lien for the sum of $150, alleged to be the balance due on a contract for painting. The following is a copy of the written contract as admitted by the pleadings: "San José, Dec. 19, 1888. Contract and agreement made this day between W. J. Peall and J. H. Baird, whereby J. H. Baird, a painter and contractor, agrees to paint a certain frame hotel, known as the 'Continental Hotel,' of forty (40) rooms, located in the town of Bethlehem, Santa Clara county, Cal.; the same to be two-coat work of lead and oil or rubber preparation, to suit the owner, W. J. Peall. The shingles above cornice to be painted in different color from main part of building, for the consideration of three hundred and ninety ($390.00) dollars, but in case of party-colors an additional twenty ($20.00) dollars will be allowed to said J. H. Baird. This contract does not include the tin roof. Said J. H. Baird does hereby agree to accept as a part payment a certain contract of certain lots of land situated in the city of San José or the town of Bethlehem, to the amount of one hundred and fifty dollars; the balance of the contract price to be paid in the following manner, to-wit: One hundred dollars upon the completion of priming said hotel outside, fifty dollars more when outside is second-coated; and the balance when the building is completed, inside and out. The work to be completed as speedily as possible. We and each of us agree to this contract and agreement. W. J. PEALL. J. H. BAIRD. Interior of said building to have two coats of paint and oil, cresting over cornice not included. PEALL." The judgment was in favor of plaintiff, enforcing the alleged lien for the balance claimed. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant contends that the contract is void, because the whole price is not payable in money; and in support of this point cites the following provisions in section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "As to all liens except that of the contractor, the whole price shall be payable in money, and shall not be diminished by any prior or subsequent indebtedness, offset, or counter-claims in favor of the owner and against the contractor. * * * All such contract and alterations thereof as do not conform substantially to the provisions of this section shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereof by either party thereto." I think the plaintiff was an original contractor, within the meaning of sections 1184, 1187, and 1194 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and therefore within the exception expressed in the above quotation from section 1184. La Grille v. Mallard, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 294. His contract was to paint the hotel, and, of course, to furnish the necessary materials for that purpose. The cases of Sparks v. Mining Co., 55 Cal. 389, and Schwartz v. Knight, 74 Cal. 432, 16 Pac. Rep. 235, cited by appellant, are not in point, as in those cases liens were claimed simply for materials furnished. Had the plaintiff contracted to do the work in consideration that defendant should convey to him certain land or personal property, without fixing the money price or value of the work, perhaps he would not have been entitled to a lien; but the money price of the whole work is fixed by the contract, though a specified portion of that price ($150) is to be paid in land. Upon a breach of the agreement to pay $150 in land, the damages would be liquidated and certain, and precisely the same as they would be in case of the breach of an agreement to pay so much money. The exception in favor of the contractor, in the provision of the Code above quoted, indicates, if it does not imply, that he may contract and have a lien for the value of his work payable otherwise than in money; and this is in perfect accord with section 1183, which provides that he shall have a lien for the value of the labor done and materials furnished. In other states, under statutes not substantially different from our Code in this respect, mechanics' liens for the contract price of labor and materials, payable in property, have been enforced, and I have found no case to the contrary. Phil. Mech. Liens, § 129, and authorities there cited.

Other points are made by appellant, but in view of the pleadings and findings by the court none of them requires special consideration. The contract and the performance thereof on the part of the plaintiff are admitted by the pleadings. The findings of fact in favor of the plaintiff on all the issues support the judgment, and no particular in which any one of them is not justified by the evidence is specified in the bill of exceptions upon which the motion for new trial was made.

The following are the only attempted specifications of insufficiency of the evidence: "(1) The evidence shows that the contract in writing is void, and the plaintiff waived his right to a lien, because the sum was not payable wholly in money, and finding 3 is contrary to the evidence. (2) That the evidence shows that the 15th of May, 1889, at the time of commencement of this suit, plaintiff had no claim against defendant, but that D. Rinaldo was the owner thereof, and therefore finding 3 is against the evidence. (3) That by assigning said claim to Rinaldo plaintiff lost any claim of lien he might have had, and waived it, and therefore finding 4 is against the evidence." There is no finding numbered 4, and that part of the findings numbered 3 contains at least three distinct propositions of fact, as follows: "(3) That the total contract price of said labor and materials was the sum of $410, of which amount $260 has been paid, leaving a balance of $150 still due and owing. No part of said balance of $150 still owing plaintiff by defendant is to be paid otherwise than in money, and the allegations in the answer of defendant that plaintiff is to receive as part payment for said work and materials a conveyance of any lot, tract, or parcel of land is untrue." There is no specification in the bill of exceptions that any one of these propositions is not justified by the evidence, as required by section 648 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Each distinct proposition excepted to on the ground that it is not justified by the evidence should be separately specified; and no statement of the evidence, nor deduction therefrom by way of argument, is proper in connection with the specification. What "the evidence shows" should not be argued or considered until the hearing of the motion. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. AH LEN et al. (No. 20,815.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1891.)

CRIMINAL LAW—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL.

Where counsel for the people, by remarks during a trial for murder, and by statements to the jury not founded on the evidence, imputes to defendants a character for violence, even though the court instruct the jury to disregard any statement of fact not warranted by the evidence, a verdict of guilty will be reversed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. MCKINLEY, Judge.

Ah Len, Ah Jung, and others were convicted of murder, and appeal. Reversed.

C. C. Stephens and J. A. Donnell, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The appellants were charged by information with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed on one Fong Ah Lung in the county of Los Angeles, and were convicted of murder in the second degree. This appeal is from the judgment and an order denying their motion for a new trial. During the progress of the trial Mr. Ling, one of the attorneys conducting the case in behalf of the people, stated to the court, in the presence of the jury: "I would like to have the court direct the defendants to forbid them making threats against Charley Ah Him, as he sits here assisting the prosecution of this case. Now, this is the second time that it has been done, and I would like to have the court put a stop to it. * * * Two or three of the defendants have said here just this instant: 'Now, you look out what you are doing; you look, or we will fix you.'" The court immediately directed the jury to "pay no attention whatever to remarks made by counsel," and the trial proceeded. Upon the close of the evidence the same attorney made the opening address to the jury, and during the course of his argument "he remarked to the jury that the violence of these defendants in killing Fong Ah Lung was exemplified here in this court-room; that during the trial of the case they couldn't keep their mouths shut, but threatened him or his assistant, Charley Ah Him, by making threats in the court-room." To this appellants objected, on the ground that it was not warranted or justified by any evidence in the case, and the following proceedings were had: "The Court: The court will instruct the counsel for the prosecution to abstain from making any remarks upon any matter not shown by the evidence, and will instruct the jury to pay no attention whatever to any statement of fact which is not warranted by the evidence; that the only matter before them for their consideration is the evidence; and they are not to take into consideration any statement of counsel with reference to any matter of fact which is not shown by the evidence. Proceed with the argument. Mr. Ling. It is just what I expected. Mr. Stephens. Just a moment. Mr. Ling. I expected when the facts came out the galled jade would wince."

The learned judge of the court below did everything in his power to dislodge from the minds of the jurors any impression which the statements referred to may have made, but we do not think the error committed against appellants was thereby removed from the case. There was no withdrawal of the facts so stated, but, on the contrary, after the court had directed the jury to disregard them, the counsel who made the statement, in effect, again reiterated its truth by the assertion, "I expected when the facts came out the galled jade would wince." A person accused of crime is entitled, under the constitution, to a trial by jury, conducted according to the established principles of law, not the least important of which is that the verdict shall be founded only upon relevant and competent facts produced before the jury under the rules prescribed for the admission of evidence; and it was held by the supreme court of New Hampshire, in the leading and well-considered case of Tucker v. Henniker, 41 N. H. 317, that this right is violated "if counsel are permitted to state facts and comment upon them in argument against the adverse party which are not before the jury by proofs regularly submitted." It is true that the attorney for the prosecution in this case was not permitted by the court to comment at any length upon the facts which he himself imported into the case; but, while this was to the credit of the court, it does not change the fact that a matter not in evidence, and of a nature clearly prejudicial to the appellants, was laid before the jury for the purpose of affecting their verdict, and it is no answer to this to say that the jury may have disregarded it. As was said in the case just cited: "When counsel are permitted to state facts in argument, and to comment upon them, the usage of courts regulating trials is departed from, the laws of evidence are violated, and the full benefit of trial by jury is denied. It may be said, in answer to these views, that the statements of counsel are not evidence; that the court is bound to instruct the jury; and that they are sworn to render their verdict only according to evidence. All this is true; yet the necessary effect is to bring the statements of counsel to bear upon the verdict with more or less force, according to circumstances; and, if they in the slightest degree influence the finding, the law is violated, and the purity and impartiality of the trial tarnished and weakened. If not evidence, then manifestly the jury have nothing to do with them, and the advocate has no right to make them. It is unreasonable to believe the jury will entirely disregard them. They may struggle to disregard them; they may think they have done so, and still be led involuntarily to shape their verdict under their influence." It follows that the only safe and just rule to apply in such cases is to make it impossible for a party to derive any advantage from such misconduct of counsel by promptly granting a new trial to the adverse party, unless it is clear that the verdict was not affected thereby. It may be added that, if the fact stated by counsel had been introduced in evidence against the objection of appellants, it would have been sufficient to reverse the judgment, as the fact is itself an irrelevant one. It had no legitimate tendency to prove any issue in the case, but it was one which, as urged by counsel for the prosecution, was well calculated to illustrate "the violence" of appellants, and this was doubtless the object of bringing it to the attention of the jury; but the character of a defendant on trial for murder is not subject to this kind of attack. Judgment and order reversed.

In re GALLAND'S ESTATE. (No. 14,379.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 14, 1891.)

CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE—RIGHTS OF PLEDGEE—FUNERAL EXPENSES.

1. Where a policy of insurance was assigned to satisfy a debt, and the assignee was authorized to collect the money from the company, which he did on the death of the insured, and retained the amount of the debt, and paid over the balance to the insured's executor, it was error for the court to refuse to allow the claim in the executor's account on the ground that it was not presented against the estate, as a pledgee is not obliged to present his claim to the executor of the pledgor unless he seeks recourse against other property of the estate.

2. Such debt would be allowed under Code Civil Proc. § 1632, providing that it is the duty of the court to allow sums paid by the executor in good faith in discharge of debts justly due.

3. Where a will directed that the testator's funeral expenses should not exceed $100, and the will was not received by the executor until after the funeral, it was error for the court not to allow reasonable and proper charges in excess of $100.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge. Modified.

I. B. L. Brandt, for appellant. J. H. Henderson, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by the executor from an order settling his first annual account.

1. The decedent, during his life-time, being indebted to one Badt in the sum of $290 for money loaned, duly executed, acknowledged, and delivered to said Badt a bill of sale and assignment of a certain life insurance policy for $3,000, issued to decedent by the Germania Life Insurance Co. By this assignment Badt was authorized to recover and collect the money from the company; and, in compliance with the requirements of said company, Badt immediately presented to and left with said company the said assignment. Afterwards, upon the death of the decedent, Badt collected the full amount of the said policy from said insurance company, and paid it over to the executor with the exception of said sum of $290, which he retained. (He also retained the amount of an attorney's fee, which is not now under consideration.) The court below refused to allow it, upon the ground that Badt had not presented the same as a claim against the estate. In thus ruling the court below erred. A pledgee is not obliged to present his claim to the executor of the pledgor unless he seeks recourse against other property of the estate. Kibbe's Estate, 57 Cal. 407. Moreover, as it amply appears beyond all question that Badt's debt was "justly due," it ought to have been allowed the executor under section 1632, Code Civil Proc.

2. The executor paid out various sums for funeral expenses, amounting in all to $202.75. The items of this amount were duly presented by the several persons claiming them, and were approved and allowed by the executor and probate judge. There is no finding, and no ground for contending, that the items of this account were not reasonable and proper charges, or that the executor did not pay them in good faith; but the court refused to allow $102.75 of the amount, and allowed the executor only $100 thereof, upon the ground that the will of the decedent provided that the funeral expenses should not exceed $100. It is found "that said last will and testament was not received by the said executor until some time after the funeral of said deceased;" and it is also found "that during the life-time of said deceased he gave to said executor the sum of $100, to be used by him to defray the funeral expenses of said deceased." Under these circumstances, we think that the executor should have been credited with the full amount of these payments. The claims thus paid, having been duly approved and allowed, were prima facie valid debts against the estate, and although they could be afterwards contested by the heirs, the burden was upon the latter to show their invalidity. The expenses were necessarily incurred immediately after the death of the decedent, and, as it appears, before the executor knew the provision of the will on the subject. It does not appear that when the decedent gave the executor the $100 he then limited the funeral expenses to that amount. Moreover, it is the duty of an executor to give a decedent decent burial, and he cannot be absolutely limited in the performance of such duty by the provisions of a will. Bell v. Briggs, 63 N. H. 592, 4 Atl. Rep. 702. If the items of the funeral expenses here involved had been rejected on the ground that they were extravagant or exorbitant, a different question would be presented. But they were rejected solely on the ground of a violation of the will. We see no other errors. It is ordered that the order appealed from be modified so as to allow the executor the additional amount of $290 retained by said Badt, and also the additional sum of $102.75 for payment of funeral expenses; and that in all other respects the said order stand affirmed. The superior court is directed to modify said order as herein stated.

NOYES v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. (No. 13,840.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 12, 1891.)

RAILROADS — INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK — QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action against a railroad company for the wrongful death of an employee of one of its contractors, it appeared that deceased, with the knowledge and consent of the company, was walking to his work on the right of way, in a narrow place between a bluff and the sea, traversed by two parallel tracks, with knowledge that two locomotives, one on each track, would shortly follow him in the same direction; that he received warning by the bell of one, and then perceived that they were approaching at such relative rates of speed as would probably bring them together at the moment of passing him; that he attempted to cross the track towards the bluff, and was struck and killed while so doing. Held, that a nonsuit was improperly directed, as the questions of defendant's negligence and deceased's contributory negligence were for the jury. HARRISON and McFARLAND, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; JOSEPH P. JONES, Judge.

Action by one Noyes, administrator, against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. From the judgment of the court below directing a nonsuit plaintiff appeals. Reversed. For former hearing, see 24 Pac. Rep. 927.

Henry C. McPike and D. M. Delmas, for appellant. L. D. McKisick and Fred B.

Lake, (H. S. Brown, of counsel,) for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action brought by the administrator of one De Mattos to recover damages for causing his death. The plaintiff was nonsuited by the superior court, and his appeal from the judgment presents two questions: First, did the evidence introduced by the plaintiff in the superior court make out a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant? and, if so, second, did such evidence show that De Mattos was himself guilty of contributory negligence? The following brief statement of the facts which the evidence on the part of the plaintiff proved, or strongly tended to prove, is extracted from the brief of his counsel, and is in every particular sustained by the record: "On the 26th day of July, 1886, the deceased, Manuel F. De Mattos, was run over and killed by an engine on defendant's road near Port Costa. At and for many years before that time the defendant owned and operated a railroad running from Port Costa along the margin of the Straits of Carquinez, in a southerly direction. At some distance southerly from Port Costa, on the line of the road, were located certain extensive grain warehouses, called the "Nevada Docks." There was a double track running from Port Costa to these docks,—one the main, and the other the switch, track. Going from Port Costa to the docks, the main track is on the right, and the switch on the left, hand. The width of the roadway is not more than sufficient to accommodate the two tracks, being only twenty-four feet. On the right, and but four feet from the end of the ties of the main track, rises an abrupt steep bluff, at the foot of which was dug a drainage ditch, while on the left the ties projected to the water's edge. Mr. Edgar De Pue had been for more than two years engaged by the defendant as a contractor, to load and unload their cars at these docks, employing at times in this business as many as one hundred men. To facilitate the operation of loading and unloading the cars, the defendant had been in the habit of sending daily two locomotive engines from Port Costa to the docks. On their way to the docks these engines were accustomed to carry some of the hands engaged in loading and unloading, but by far the larger part of the force daily found its way from Port Costa to the docks, and back again, after their day's labor, by walking along the space between the tracks. There was no road, and no means, except by the railroad track, to reach the docks from Port Costa. The deceased, De Mattos, was one of the men thus employed by Mr. De Pue. In the early morning of the 26th day of July, 1886, a crew of men, under the supervision of Mr. De Pue, started from Port Costa for their work at the docks. Two locomotive engines were, as usual, to accompany them from Port Costa. Some of the men, and Mr. De Pue himself, clambered upon the engines for a ride, but the larger number—some nineteen or twenty, including their foreman, Mr. Angle—started on foot upon the track in advance of the engine. They had gone but a short distance when the engine on the switch track started behind them, following them at a very moderate rate of speed. The engine on the main track with Mr. De Pue aboard was the last to leave Port Costa, and, whether to make up for lost time, or for some other less pardonable cause, proceeded on its course at full speed. De Mattos was among the men who had started afoot, ahead of the engines, and who were traveling towards the docks along the accustomed path between the tracks. While they were thus traveling on a narrow part of the road, where the switch track came up to the water's edge, and the main track was but a few feet from the abrupt bluff on the other, they were warned, by the sound of its bell, of the approach of the engine on the switch track. Turning, they beheld it approaching at a distance of about forty yards; but at the same time they saw the engine on the main track, almost upon them, approaching without warning and at full speed. As the main engine was coming at full speed, a glance sufficed to show that it would, in a moment, be abreast of the switch-engine, and thus the whole space of the road-way between the bluff and the water would be covered by them. The danger of their position flashed at once upon the mind of every man. On one side was the water; on the other side the high bluff. To use the expressive language of the foreman, 'The men did not have much time to think, and, in a moment of desperation, they took the best course they thought possible' to escape impending death. One of the men 'jumped on top of the rocks in the water,' and was fortunate enough to escape without more than some injuries to his legs. Another tried the dangerous experiment of remaining standing between the tracks, and allowing the engines, which were running abreast, to pass him. He was struck by one of the engines as it passed, but not so as to cause him any great injury. Others sought to escape by running to the space at the foot of the high bluff. Of these was De Mattos, and, as he was running for his life across the main track, the engine struck him, ran over him, and killed him." Such being the case, it should have been left to the jury to decide from the evidence whether, as matter of fact, there was negligence on the part of the defendant, or contributory negligence on the part of De Mattos. It cannot be held as a legal conclusion, upon such a statement of facts, that De Mattos was, or that the defendant was not, guilty of negligence. The judgment and order are reversed, and cause remanded.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

We dissent: HARRISON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the judgment. In the former decision it was said: "The same facts which show that the deceased was negligent show also that the employes of respondent were not guilty of negligence." Upon further consideration of all the evidence, I am not prepared to say as matter of law that the engineer in charge of the engine on the main track, with his knowledge of all the circumstances, was not negligent in running at a rate of speed which would bring the locomotives together at the narrow part of the road where the men were traveling. The question is not, "How would I act were I juror?" but whether there is any evidence at all from which inferences may be drawn in support of or against the charge of negligence. Speaking of nonsuit, the court, in Wilson v. Railroad Co., said: "But where negligence, as the essential element in the case, is disputed, and the evidence of it is conflicting, or consists of circumstances from which the inferences may be drawn for or against it, it is the province of the jury to determine, under instructions by the court, whether the evidence establishes it as the proximate cause of the injury complained of." 62 Cal. 172. Whether the engineer was guilty of negligence, and whether the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, under the rule stated and under the evidence, cannot be determined as matter of law, but should be submitted to the jury, with proper instructions from the court.

2. A purchaser of the land is entitled to the benefit of the record of the release, though he relied on a statement that the land was unincumbered, and did not examine the record, and the release was made by mistake.

3. Where a conclusion of law necessarily follows a state of facts found, a finding of the court is not faulty, though the conclusion of law is not stated in terms.

4. Where the question before the court was whether a certain instrument operated as a discharge of a mortgage, and the court found that it did, it was immaterial that the court failed to find the exact amount yet unpaid on such mortgage.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; R. F. MYRES, Judge. Suit in equity to foreclose a mortgage, by A. Miller against John B. Hicken and others, defendants, and R. Wittenbrock, intervenor. Defendants and intervenor had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Fulweiler and F. P. Tuttle, for appellant. Wallace & Prewett and Wallace & Wallace, for respondents. Taylor & Holl, for intervenor.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to foreclose a mortgage executed to him by defendant Hicken, July 1, 1881, to secure a note for \$12,000 and interest, upon the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 2, township 11 N., range 5 E., Mt. Diablo base and meridian. Johnson and wife were made defendants as claiming some interest in the land; and they answered, averring that on January 11, 1888, plaintiff had released and discharged said mortgage; that afterwards they purchased the land from Hicken; and that they are owners and in possession of the land unincumbered by the alleged mortgage of plaintiff. Wittenbrock intervened, also averring the release and discharge of said mortgage, and alleging, further, that when Johnson purchased from Hicken he gave to the latter, to secure part of the purchase money, a mortgage on the land for the sum of \$6,200, and that afterwards intervenor loaned money to Hicken, and took said mortgage from Johnson as security. He prayed that his mortgage be decreed to be superior to that of plaintiff, and that it be foreclosed. Hicken made default. Plaintiff alleged, in an amended complaint, that the release was made by mistake, and asked to have it reformed. The court found in favor of the intervenor, and Johnson and wife, finding, however, that the release was made through mistake, and decreed that the mortgage held by intervenor be foreclosed; that the surplus, if any, after sale, be paid to Johnson; and that plaintiff take nothing by his action. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. There are a number of points made by appellant; but the first and main question in the case is whether or not a certain written instrument, duly executed and acknowledged by plaintiff on January 11, 1884, and duly filed and recorded the next day, was a full and operative release and discharge of said mortgage from Hicken, which is the basis of this action. The said mortgage embraced not only the said S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ and W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of said section 2, in township 11, but also several other parcels of land; and the said instrument is as follows: "Know all men by these presents, that I, Alexander Miller, of El Dorado county, state of California, do hereby certify and declare that a certain mortgage bearing date the first day of July, 1881, made and executed by John B. Hicken, of Placer county, state of California, the party of the first part therein, to Alexander Miller, the party of the second part therein, conveying the north half ($\frac{1}{2}$) of the south-west $\frac{1}{4}$, and fractional north-west $\frac{1}{4}$, of section 1, and the south-east $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 2, and fractional east $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 3, and the fractional north $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 2, all in township 10 north, range 5 east, Mt. Diablo base and meridian, and situate in Placer county, California, as security for the payment to said Alexander Miller of a certain sum of money specified in said mortgage, and recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county of Placer, in Book M of Mortgages, on page 635, on the second day of July, 1881, together with the debt thereby secured, is fully paid, satisfied, and discharged. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal the eleventh day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-four. [Seal.] ALEXANDER MILLER."

RELEASE OF MORTGAGE—CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE—ASSIGNMENT.

1. A discharge of a mortgage which gives the date of the mortgage, the parties thereto, the book, page, and office where and the time it was recorded, is operative, though the mortgaged premises are not correctly described therein.

It is contended that the land in contest was not discharged from the lien of the mortgage, because it was not mentioned in said instrument. But the language used in the instrument clearly operated as a full satisfaction of the entire mortgage referred to, and there can be no doubt as to the mortgage intended to be discharged. The description in the instrument leaves no question as to the identity of the particular mortgage described. It gives the date of the mortgage, the parties to it, the time and office where and when it was recorded, and the book and page on which it was so recorded. We think, therefore, that the instrument in question was a discharge of the mortgage thus identified, and a release of its lien upon all the land embraced in it. We see nothing in the point that Johnson, at the time of his purchase, did not himself examine the record, but chose to rely on the representation of another person that the land was not incumbered. A party dealing with land is bound by the record, and is entitled to any rights which may accrue to him under it; and his position with reference to it is the same whether or not he examines it himself. Neither do we see any point in the objection made to the method of the assignment and transfer to the intervenor of the mortgage from Johnson to Hicken, and to the finding of the court on that subject. The intervenor (Wittenbrock) made the loan through his agent, L. S. Taylor. He first (through Taylor) loaned Hicken $1,500, in April, 1886, and at that time Hicken deposited the mortgage with Taylor as security. It had then attached to it what described in the mortgage. On January 31, 1887, Wittenbrock (through Taylor) advanced to Hicken a further sum of money, which, added to the $1,500, made $3,000; on which day Hicken, by a separate instrument duly executed and acknowledged, (and recorded February 2, 1887,) sold, assigned, and transferred to Wittenbrock the said mortgage, together with the promissory note described therein, authorizing him to collect and enforce it by action, etc. Afterwards, some time in the spring of 1887, Taylor discovered that the note attached to the mortgage which he had kept in his possession was only a copy, and that the original note was in the possession of one Oppenheim, to whom it had been hypothecated by Hicken to secure the sum of about $1,200 loaned by the former to the latter; whereupon Taylor entered into negotiations with Oppenheim, and procured from him the said original note. Therefore, from at least the date of the written assignment, (January 31, 1887,) which was before the filing of the amended complaint, and probably from the first deposit of the mortgage and supposed note with Taylor in April, 1886, the title to the note and mortgage vested in Wittenbrock, subject only to the lien of Oppenheim, and complete as against all other persons. We do not think, therefore, that any question arises under the doctrine of lis pendens. Johnson having actually paid to Hicken a large part of the purchase money, and given his promissory note and mortgage for the balance, was clearly a purchaser "for a valuable consideration;" and the court finds that neither Johnson nor Wittenbrock had notice of the mistake in the said discharge of said mortgage, and believed that no incumbrance existed upon the land except the said mortgage given by Johnson. The evidence was sufficient to support the findings, and we see no want of a finding of a necessary or material fact. It is objected that the court did not find in terms that the defendants and intervenor had not "constructive" notice of plaintiff's mortgage; but that followed from the facts found, and it is immaterial that the court did not make an express "conclusion of law" to that effect. It is also contended that the court should have found the exact amount unpaid upon plaintiff's mortgage, instead of saying that it was "about $10,000;" but, as between appellants and respondents, that was an immaterial matter. And it is contended that the finding that plaintiff "did not intend to release" the mortgage is not specific enough as a finding that the release was made by mistake; but the judgment went upon the theory that there was such mistake, and the result would have been the same, no matter how clearly the mistake had been stated in the finding. The findings covered all the material issues. The exceptions to rulings of the court regarding the admissibility of certain testimony need not be discussed, because it mattered not whether the proposed testimony was admitted or rejected. It was of no consequence in the case whether or not Hicken told Johnson that the title was clear, or whether or not Johnson was at any time in Auburn, and might have examined the records. It was immaterial that plaintiff afterwards made another partial release of the mortgage; and, moreover, Johnson had purchased before that occurred. Whether or not the court below should have given plaintiff a personal judgment against Hicken for the amount of the note is a question that does not arise on this appeal. We see no other points which need special notice. It is no doubt a hardship for plaintiff to lose part of his money, but we see no legal relief. Judgment and order affirmed.

GRAND JURIES — SELECTION — ELISORS — WRIT OF PROHIBITION.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 226, providing that whenever a sufficient number of jurors fail to appear the court may order a sufficient number to be drawn and summoned, or it may direct the sheriff or an elisor chosen by the court to summon as many men of the county to serve as jurors as may be required, the court should not appoint an elisor to select and summons talesmen for the completion of a grand jury without a showing that the sheriff is disqualified.

Petition of Elwood Bruner for writ of prohibition to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco and Hon. WILLIAM T. WALLACE, judge thereof, to restrain further proceedings on indictments against petitioner.

J. C. Campbell, for petitioner. A. L. Rhodes, Dist. Atty., and Wm. S. Barnes, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the superior court of San Francisco, department No. 6, and the judge thereof, from proceeding further against petitioner upon two certain paper writings purporting to be indictments. The main ground of the petition is that the body of men who presented said writings had no legal existence as a grand jury; and that, therefore, the respondents have no jurisdiction or authority to arraign or try petitioner upon the same. Upon the record presented two principal questions arise: (1) Was said body a legal grand jury? and (2) if it was not, then is prohibition a proper remedy?

The material facts in the case are undisputed, and are as follows: The respondent, the presiding judge, made an order that 25 names be drawn in the usual way from the "grand-jury box" (which contained the names of 144 persons selected by the 12 judges of the superior court) for the purpose of procuring a grand jury. After service by the sheriff on all of said persons who could be found, 18 of them appeared. Eight of them were excused by the court for good cause, and the others were accepted. No further drawing from the grand-jury box (in which there remained more than 100 names) was made; but thereupon the court made the following order: "And it now appearing to the court that of the entire number of persons drawn to serve as grand jurors there are only the number of ten proper and competent to so serve and not excused, it is now here ordered that a sufficient number, to-wit, the number of nine good and lawful men, be forthwith summoned by an elisor appointed by the court here for that purpose to be and appear before the court hereon Thursday, August 20, 1891, at 12 o'clock meridian, to complete the said grand jury, and that Henry H. Scott be and is hereby appointed such elisor; and all further proceedings in impaneling a grand jury are continued until the 20th day of August, 1891, at 12 o'clock meridian." Another order was also made, formally appointing said Scott elisor, who, after being sworn as such, returned nine other persons as grand jurors. The whole of said nine persons were accepted, and thus the requisite number of 19 grand jurors were procured and sworn. No reason was given why the jury was not completed by an additional drawing from the grand-jury box; nor was there any cause why, when the other method of getting jurors was adopted, the sheriff was not ordered to summon them instead of an elisor. No charge of partiality, interest, or disqualification of any kind was made against the sheriff by affidavit, or in any other manner; and the record shows that the sheriff was discarded and the elisor appointed simply because the court chose to do so. And the contention of respondents' counsel is that the power of a judge to appoint a private person to select a jury is unlimited and unqualified by any provisions of law, or any considerations whatever,—his will being supreme in the premises. No question, therefore, arises here as to the jurisdiction of a court to pass upon the issue of disqualification of a sheriff in such a case, because here there is no such issue.

The provisions of statutory law upon the questions here involved may be somewhat briefly stated. The formation of grand and trial juries is provided for in the Code of Civil Procedure, commencing with section 204; and the general provisions on the subject are these: In January of each year the superior court of the county must make an order designating the estimated number of grand jurors, and also the number of trial jurors, that will be required for the business of the ensuing year, and thereupon the board of supervisors must select from the qualified citizens of the county—taking them as nearly as may be from the different wards and townships in proportion to population—the number designated by the court. A certified list of these names is given to the county clerk, who must write the names of the grand jurors on separate pieces of paper of uniform appearance, and, having folded them so as to conceal the names, must deposit them in a box called the “grand-jury box;” and whenever during the year a court orders a grand jury, it is provided that the jurors shall be drawn by the clerk, in the presence of the court. He must shake the box so as to mix the slips containing the names before drawing, and must observe other statutory directions providing against the unfair drawing of particular names for particular purposes. Sections 219, 241. In cities and counties of more than 100,000 inhabitants, which includes San Francisco, the jurors are selected in January by the judges of the superior court, instead of by the supervisors. Section 204. In all other respects the law is the same. Such is the general method provided by statute for the formation of juries, and it is as wise a method as could well be devised to procure fair and impartial jurors, and to prevent public officers from bringing together certain persons on a jury in order to secure a certain result,—to annoy the innocent or protect the guilty.

There is, however, another provision of the Code—intended, evidently, for cases of neglect of duty or inadvertence, and to prevent, in some instances, great delay or expense—on which the right of the court to procure a jury as it was procured in the case at bar is based. The thought of the legislature in enacting the provision would seem to have been directed more particularly to trial than to grand jurors; but, if its language be wide enough to grant the power here contended for, then the power exists. But, if the language does not grant such power, then it does not exist, for it is granted nowhere else. The said provision is contained in section 226, and is as follows: “Whenever jurors are not drawn or summoned to attend any court of record or session thereof, or a sufficient number of jurors fail to appear, such court may order a sufficient number to be forthwith drawn and summoned to attend the court, or it may, by an order entered on its minutes, direct the sheriff or an elisor chosen by the court forthwith to summon so many good and lawful men of the county, or city and county, to serve as jurors, as may be required; and in either case such jurors must be summoned in the manner provided in the preceding section.” It is apparent that the claim of power under the said section 226 to do the thing complained of in the case at bar should be closely scrutinized, and denied unless the power be found to be clearly given; for, if it exist, it is a most arbitrary and dangerous power,—one that can easily be used to unjustly destroy character, liberty, or life. And in determining whether or not there be such legal power we must discard all consideration of the worthiness or unworthiness of the purpose sought to be attained in any particular case. There must be attributed to the learned judge of the court below good motives and purposes; but, if he have the power claimed, then such power must be conceded to every other person who may at any time occupy a similar judicial position. Under such power a court could easily procure the indictment, and perhaps the conviction, of any person whom it deemed to be an offender, by simply appointing a person favorable to its designs to select jurors with a similar bias. In times of great public excitement—political or otherwise—a citizen who has incurred censure in certain quarters would have scarcely a remnant left of that protection which is afforded by a fair trial before an impartial jury; and to say that such unlimited power can be safely lodged with all the men who may happen to be judges would be to ignore human history and the principles of human nature. It must be remembered that unauthorized power may be used for bad as well as for good purposes. A spectator might, for the moment, look in safety and with complaisance upon the barbaric tumult of a mob if he happened to be in sympathy with its present design; but let the fury of another mob be directed against him, or those whom he knows or believes to be innocent, and he will appreciate at once the value of legal protection. So, also, he may look lightly upon the spectacle of a jury packed for the purpose of prosecuting one whom he believes to be guilty; but, if such a course were pursued towards him or his friend, he would have clear views of personal security, and the sacredness of a jury trial. Under the best system that human wisdom can devise, an innocent man will, at long intervals, be punished, and a guilty one go free; but that a government of law is better than a government of unlimited personal power is a principle that has been fought out in English and American history, and established as a monument of liberty.

The asserted power of the court in the case at bar comes, if it comes at all, from these words in the section last quoted, “or an elisor.” It has no other source. The whole force and stress of the question involved rest on the word “elisor.” The language is not that the court shall direct the sheriff “or some other person,” or “any qualified citizen,” or “any other person over the age of eighteen,” (as in case of service of summons in civil cases,) to summon the jury. There is no ordinary, general language used which would have denoted a legislative intent to give the court unlimited discretion under any and all circumstances, without any showing, to choose whomever it pleases to pick out a jury. Common language is discarded, and the exclusively legal word “elisor”—a word used nowhere else than in law language—is employed. What is the meaning of that word? And what was the legislative intent in using it? A rule of construction that has always obtained is aptly expressed in section 16 of the Code of Civil Procedure as follows: “Words and phrases are construed according to the context and the approved use of language; but technical words and phrases, and such others as have acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning in law or are defined in the succeeding section, are to be construed according to such peculiar and appropriate meaning or definition." Now, the word "elisor" has a "peculiar and appropriate meaning in law," as much as any word that can be suggested. It is not used at all in common language. No one in private or business circles would think of calling an agent or trustee an "elisor." It can be found rarely, if ever, in general literature. It is doubtful if the majority of men of good intelligence have any notion as to its meaning. Practically it is unknown and used alone in law literature, and in the law its meaning is clear and unquestioned. It has always meant, and means now, a person appointed to perform certain duties pertaining to certain officers, when the latter are disqualified. He was originally confined to the duty of returning a jury in the event of such disqualification; but in some states his duties are extended to the service of other process, but only in the event of the disqualification of some other officer. The provision for such appointment, as stated in Blackstone, is as follows: "If the sheriff be not an indifferent person,—as, if he be a party to the suit, or be related, either by blood or affinity, to either of the parties,—he is not then trusted to return the jury, but the venire shall be directed to the coroners, who, in this, as in many other instances, are the substitutes of the sheriff to execute process, when he is deemed an improper person. If any exception lies to the coroners, the venire shall be directed to two clerks of the court, or two persons of the county, named by the court and sworn. And these two, who are called 'elisors' or 'electors,' shall indifferently name the jury," etc. 3 Bl. Comm. 355. In Bouvier's Law Dictionary "elisors" are defined as "persons appointed by the court to return a jury when the sheriff and coroner have been challenged as incompetent." Such is the definition given in all the dictionaries, and such the sense in which the word is used in all the law-books to which our attention has been called; and we do not understand that counsel for respondent claims differently. Therefore, considering the universal meaning given in the law generally to the word "elisor," and without considering any other legislative provision upon the subject in this state, it would seem clear that, when section 226 gives power to direct the sheriff or an elisor to summon a jury, it uses the word as designating a person to be appointed in the event that the sheriff has been "challenged as incompetent." Such construction is not only compelled by the only known meaning of the word, but brings the section into harmony with all the other sections relating to the selection of juries, the object of which is clearly to have jurors, as far as possible, fair and impartial. The sheriff is an officer elected by the people, and usually long before he is called upon to select a jury. If he should be secretly partial in any future case, it would be an accidental evil. He could not, at least, be appointed for such express purpose. And the fact that "coroner" was omitted (inadvertently or otherwise) from section 226 does not change the meaning of "elisor," who is essentially one who is a substitute for some disqualified officer.

But our statutory law gives the same meaning to "elisor" that is given to it in the general authorities. It is provided that, "with relation to each other, the provisions of our four Codes must be construed [except as in the next two sections provided] as though all such Codes had been passed at the same moment of time, and were parts of the same statute." Pol. Code, § 4480. (The next two sections refer to cases of conflict, and have no application here.) When, therefore, "elisor" is used in one Code, it must be deemed to have been used with reference to its definition given in another Code. The Political Code, from sections 4175 to 4193, deals with the duties of sheriff, and with process and notices and their service. It refers to both civil and criminal procedure. Section 4176 provides generally that the sheriff must "serve all process and notices in the manner prescribed by law." Section 4175 provides that "'process,' as used in this article, includes all writs, warrants, summons, and orders of courts of justice or judicial officers. 'Notice' includes all papers and orders (except process) required to be served in any proceeding before any court, board, or officer, or when required by law to be served independently of such proceeding." It is impossible to imagine any sort of a thing ordered by any court, or judge thereof, which has to be executed by an officer, that is not embraced in the above definitions; and the general statutory provision is that it must be executed by the sheriff. Section 4191 provides, however, that, if the sheriff be "a party to an action or proceeding," the process and order therein must be executed by the coroner. And then, in section 4192, the office and functions of an elisor are provided for and described as follows: "Process and orders in an action or proceeding may be executed by a person residing in the county, designated by the court, the judge thereof, or a county judge, and denominated an 'elisor,' in the following cases: (1) When the sheriff and coroner are both parties; (2) when either of these officers is a party, and the process is against the other; and (3) when either of these officers is a party, and there is a vacancy in the office of the other, or when it appears by affidavit to the satisfaction of the court in which the proceeding is pending, or to the judge thereof, that both of these officers are disqualified, or by reason of any bias, prejudice, or other cause would not act promptly or impartially." The only attempt to break the force of this provision is by way of suggesting that the word "proceeding," as used therein, must be limited to that peculiar kind of civil remedy which is called in section 23 and in section 1063 et seq. (Code Civil Proc.) a "special proceeding." But there is no room for such construction. The provision in question does not say "special" proceeding, and the preceding sections and the whole article in which it occurs refer to both civil and criminal matters, and use the word "proceeding" in its general and well-known sense, which includes all steps taken and all things done, wherein judicial procedure is instituted or judicial action invoked. Even in a strictly civil action, when reciting what had occurred in the case, we say, such "proceedings were had," etc. This is the common meaning of the word "proceeding," when applied to things done in court or before judicial officers. Indeed, counsel for respondents in his brief refers very naturally to the formation of a grand jury as a "proceeding." And so we have a statutory definition and description of "elisor" in full accord with the meaning that has always been given it in the general law.

It is contended that, no matter how a body of men may have been gathered together, its acts cannot be attacked if it be recognized by the court as a "grand jury," upon the principle sometimes applied to the act of de facto public officers. One of respondents' counsel goes so far as to assert that the legal existence of a jury can be inquired into only by the proceeding of quo warranto; and, while other counsel do not assume that very novel position, yet their views logically drift them there. But quo warranto does not lie against a mere temporary employment like that of a jury; it lies only against the holder of a public office having a "fixed and permanent tenure." 7 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 4040, and notes. It would, indeed, be startling if a man could be put to the partial ignominy and hazard of a trial at the will of any set of men whom a court might choose to style a "grand jury." But the correct doctrine on that subject was clearly stated by this court in Levy v. Wilson, 69 Cal. 105, 10 Pac. Rep. 272, where the court, through McKee, J., say: "One of the grounds stated in the petition is that the indictment was found by a body of men styled a 'grand jury,' that was not in law and fact 'a valid and constitutional grand jury.' If that be so, the accusatory paper returned to the court below as an indictment is worthless and void, (People v. Thurston, 5 Cal. 69,) and the court has no jurisdiction to try the petitioner upon it; for no person can be held to answer for crime unless on information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or an indictment by a grand jury." In People v. Thurston, Id., the same rule was stated, where MURRAY, C. J., delivering the opinion of the court, said: "I regard the indictment thus found by an illegally constituted body as worthless, and all proceedings based upon it void." See, also, People v. Coffman, 24 Cal. 234. And such is the tenor of the general authorities. In State v. McNamara, 3 Nev. 75, the court say: "An indictment found by a jury not legally constituted cannot be valid." In Brown v. State, 9 Neb. 163, 2 N. W. Rep. 378, the court say: "The grand jury must be selected in the manner prescribed by law. There is no security to the citizen but in a rigid adherence to the legislative will, as expressed in the statutes for our general guidance."

In Stokes v. State, 24 Miss. 623, it was held that (we quote from the syllabus, which correctly states the decision) "a grand jury consists of the requisite number of competent individuals selected, summoned, impaneled legally, and sworn according to the forms of law; and, if the law be not followed, the grand jury is incompetent to perform legal acts. * * * The strict observance of the statute in regard to the formation of a jury cannot be dispensed with." In Rainey v. State, 19 Tex. App. 481, the court say that "a valid indictment is an indispensable prerequisite to a legal prosecution for felony." In Finley v. State, 61 Ala. 201, the court, after referring to an unauthorized order made by the lower court on procuring a grand jury, say: "The exercise of such a power by the court would be a violation of the spirit of all our legislation, and would convert the grand jury from a distinct, independent body, drawn and summoned by officers specially charged with that duty, into a mere dependency of the court, chosen by its absolute will. The practical results of such a power are too apparent to require discussion or statement. There is no reason for imputing to the court in this instance more than mere error; but the power exercised in the hands of a capricious or an unscrupulous judge would destroy the purity and independence of the grand jury, and pervert it from all the purposes of its institution." There are numberless other authorities to the same point, but it is useless to indulge in further citations. And these authorities are determinative of the other form in which one of the respondents' counsel states his position, to-wit, that the court, having obtained jurisdiction of the matter of forming a grand jury by first making a valid order that certain jurors be drawn from the box, retained, or thus acquired, power to make the subsequent invalid order that other jurors be selected by Scott. But that was the exact state of facts in many of the cases above cited. In Finley v. State, for instance, the court had first made a legal order that certain grand jurors be properly drawn, and had afterwards made an illegal order for the procurement of other jurors. The fact is that the jurisdiction of the respondent to legally impanel a grand jury did not come from any order which it made in the premises. That jurisdiction came from the law, and was vested in the court before any order was made by it. But that power was limited. There was room for the play and exercise of discretion within the inclosure, but the court could not get beyond that without overleaping or breaking down the barriers. The appointment of Scott was an act entirely independent of and distinct from the order for the drawing of jurors from the box; and, if there was any power to make it, such power must be found in the law, and not in any previous action of the court. As said in High, Extr. Rem. § 774, (2d Ed.) a court "will not be permitted to make a jurisdiction for itself, by coupling matters beyond its control with those upon which it may rightfully adjudicate."

Our conclusion is that the court below had no authority in law to appoint said Scott to select grand jurors, because there was no case to which the power of appointing an elisor applied.

2. Is prohibition the proper remedy? Prohibition lies in all cases where there have been proceedings "without or in excess" of jurisdiction, and there "is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law." Code Civil Proc. §§ 1102, 1103. If the views hereinbefore expressed are correct, it is clear that the appointment of the (so-called) elisor was "without jurisdiction." Jurisdiction is usually defined as "the power to hear and determine;" but of course it is difficult to express, in abstract terms, a statement of the distinction between error in exercising jurisdiction and jurisdiction itself, that can be readily applied to all cases as they may arise. The law endeavors to fix definitely everything that can in its nature be so fixed, so as to leave as little as possible to the judgment or caprice of those who administer it. But, as many future events cannot, in the nature of things, be foreseen and provided for, it follows necessarily that much must be left to the discretion of courts and other tribunals. And the main test of jurisdiction in any particular matter is whether or not discretion is given the court as to such matter. In the matter before us, for instance, if the law intended to give the power to appoint an elisor in the event of disqualification of the sheriff, it is apparent that the law could not determine beforehand the disqualification of any particular person who might happen to be sheriff at any future time. It could not say that any such sheriff would be actuated by "bias or prejudice." Consequently the determination of the issue, when properly made, of such disqualification, is necessarily left to the discretion of the court, and it has jurisdiction to hear and determine that issue. But when there is no such disqualification, then there is no discretion given to determine whether an elisor should or should not be appointed. Consequently, when there is such an issue made, and the court finds against the disqualification; or when, as in the case at bar, it is admitted that there was no such disqualification, then no jurisdiction exists to make the "appointment." And the jury, not being a legal body, and the so-called indictment being void, then, as before quoted from Levy v. Wilson, "the court has no jurisdiction to try the petitioner upon it." The conclusion follows that the proposed action of the court would be without and in excess of its jurisdiction.

The only other question is: Would petitioner have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law? If there be such remedy, it must be by appeal. But it would be a difficult proposition to maintain that a defendant in a criminal case, forced through all the stages of a trial for felony without any indictment against him, or, which is the same thing in effect, upon a void indictment, would have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, because, after conviction and judgment, and perhaps after suffering the ignominy of imprisonment in the state-prison, he could have the illegal proceeding reversed on appeal. But it is not necessary to discuss that question, because it has been held several times by this court that the point here made by petitioner cannot be reached on appeal. It was so held by our predecessors in People v. Southwell, 46 Cal. 141. In that case the lower court had made an order reciting that there were objections to the sheriff, and that the court intended to submit certain charges against him to the grand jury, and for that reason appointing the coroner to summon the grand jurors. The defendant attacked, in the court below, the legality of the grand jury upon the ground of such appointment of the coroner, by moving to set aside the indictment. On appeal this court first held that the appointment of the coroner was illegal, that the question could be reviewed on appeal, and that the judgment should be reversed; saying, among other things, that "a due regard to the rights of all persons accused or to be accused by the grand jury requires that that body should be summoned by the officer intrusted by law with the performance of that duty." But a rehearing was granted, and, after further consideration, the court—WALLACE, C. J., dissenting, and adhering to the former opinion—held that "in its legal effect the motion was a challenge to the panel," and that, as the objection to the summoning of a jury by the coroner was not a statutory ground of challenge to the panel, the defendant had no remedy on appeal. In People v. Welch, 49 Cal. 174, the court below had allowed the district attorney to examine the sheriff as to his qualifications to summon a jury, and, upon his testifying that he was biased against the defendant, had appointed the coroner to summon the jury. The defendant objected to the venire for that reason; but this court, on appeal, while holding that the action of the court below was wrong, held also that the question could not be reached, saying that People v. Southwell "is authority for the proposition that the mistake of the judge in this case was not ground for challenge to the panel of trial jurors, or of objection to the venire." (It will be noticed that in both of the above cases there was an attempt in some form to attack the qualification of the sheriff.) The same rule was announced in People v. Colby, 54 Cal. 37, and People v. Hunter, Id. 65; and in each of said cases People v. Southwell is mentioned and expressly approved. And unless all of these cases—and some later ones—are to be overruled, there is no way in which the question raised in the case at bar can be reached, except by the writ of prohibition. And such, we think, was the decision of this court in Levy v. Wilson, 69 Cal. 105, 10 Pac. Rep. 272. In that case the petition was for a writ of prohibition. The petitioner set forth that he had been indicted by a body of men styled a "grand jury," but "that the body that found said indictment is not a grand jury, or a valid, legal, or constitutional body of grand jurors;" that the respondent Wilson, judge of the court in which said indictment was pending, was about to proceed to try petitioner upon said indictment, and that he would so proceed unless prohibited by the order of this court. Whereupon he prayed that a "writ of prohibition" be issued "restraining said Hon. T. K. Wilson, as a judge of said superior court, from taking any further action or proceeding in said matter." (See petition in said case.) Now, the first question presented to the court, and which it must have decided affirmatively before looking further into the case, was this: Assuming that the body of men by whom petitioner was indicted was not a legal and valid grand jury, is prohibition the proper remedy, and has the court jurisdiction, under that proceeding, to grant the relief prayed for? If the decision had been adverse to the proposition that prohibition would lie in such a case, there would have been no occasion for the court proceeding further and examining into the grounds upon which petitioner, in that particular instance, rested his charges of the invalidity of the jury. The case would have stopped at the threshold. And the question was fully presented and elaborately argued by opposing counsel. Louderback, for petitioner, argued strenuously that prohibition was the proper remedy, and cited numerous authorities to sustain his position; while the first point made by counsel for respondent, J. N. E. Wilson, was that prohibition would not lie; authority also being cited to the point. And so, if the court had agreed with the position of respondent, it would have dismissed the proceeding upon that ground. But no such course was pursued. It entertained the writ of prohibition, and discussed the cases where it will and will not lie, and clearly held that it would lie when there was an indictment by a body not a valid and constitutional grand jury. Such is the necessary result of the action of the court, and such is the conclusion that must follow the language which it used. In that case the petitioner, among other things, had alleged numerous irregularities as grounds of the illegality of the grand jury, and the court, in speaking of those, used this language: "Most of the grounds stated for the purpose are irregularities and errors accruing before and after the finding and return of the indictment. But, as these are matters which are reversible and remandable on appeal in the action, they are not grounds for a writ of prohibition. Prohibition lies to arrest the proceedings of a judicial tribunal when they are without or in excess of its jurisdiction, and the writ is issuable only in cases where there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law." But, having disposed of these minor matters, the court proceeds: "One of the grounds stated in the petition is that the indictment was found by a body of men styled a 'grand jury,' that was not in law and in fact a valid and constitutional grand jury. If that be so, the accusatory paper returned by them to the court below as an indictment is worthless and void, (People v. Thurston, 5 Cal. 69,) and the court has no jurisdiction to try the petitioner upon it."

And so the express language of the court is a clear statement that if in that case the indictment had been found by a body of men who were not a legal grand jury, the peremptory writ of prohibition would have been granted. From every standpoint, therefore, the case must be taken as a full authority to the point that prohibition lies in the case at bar. But when the court proceeded and looked into the merits of that case, it found against the petitioner. The fact relied on was that the court below, after having ordered some of the grand jurors drawn from the jury-box, had then ordered the sheriff to select the rest from the body of the county. The point insisted on by petitioner was that under the constitution grand jurors must be "drawn," and that "drawn" meant taken from the jury-box by lot, and that the statutory provision allowing the court to direct the sheriff to select jurors was unconstitutional. On that point the decision of the court was against the petitioner. While it says that "we are of opinion that the court below in exercising its discretion ought to have ordered the panel to be filled by requiring the clerk, in open court, and in the presence of the judge, to draw the requisite number of names from the grand-jury box, instead of requiring the sheriff to summon jurors from the body of the city and county," yet it holds that "the course adopted by the court was one authorized by the Code." But if the court had held with the petitioner in his contention about the sheriff's power, it is clear that the writ would have issued. As to the case of Ex parte Haymond, it is sufficient to say that the distinction between a mere witness and a party indicted for a felony is too clear to need discussion. We are of opinion, therefore, that there is no jurisdiction in the respondent to proceed with the trial of petitioner; that the latter has no "plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law;" and that prohibition is the proper remedy.

Petitioner makes the point that at the time of the order complained of there was a rule of the superior court of San Francisco, made by the 12 judges thereof, and never repealed or abrogated, as follows: "Rule 4. It shall be the duty of the presiding judge to preside over the drawing and impanelment of all grand juries required by law or by the public interests to be drawn. Grand jurors must in all cases be drawn from the list of grand jurors selected by the judges of this court, unless the grand-jury box containing the names of jurors so selected shall be exhausted without securing a grand jury." Also, that the constitution requires a grand jury to be drawn; and that "drawn" means taken by lot from a jury-box. Also, that one of the alleged indictments against petitioner shows upon its face that, if the crime charged was committed at all, it was committed in the county of Sacramento, and without the jurisdiction of respondents. Also, that the trial jurors before whom he would be tried have likewise been procured by another similar order appointing another elisor. Also, that petitioner was compelled to appear before said grand jury, and testify as to the very charges upon which he was indicted. But, as our views heretofore expressed are determinative of the case, and as some of said questions are reviewable upon appeal, we deem it unnecessary to here discuss them. Let the writ issue restraining the respondents, as prayed for in the petition.

We concur: HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.

GAROUTTE, J., (concurring.) This proceeding is an application for a writ of prohibition, requiring the judge of department No. 6 of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco to refrain from proceeding further in the trial of one Elwood Bruner, upon the ground that such course would be in excess of the jurisdiction of the court; the alleged indictment upon which the trial is predicated having no validity whatever, because found and presented by a body of men not a grand jury. The questions presented upon this hearing are quite important, and in some respects may be considered very novel, when precedent is sought in the authorities of this state. But neither the novelty nor the importance of the matter under investigation demands that its final determination should be reached otherwise than by a most careful consideration of principle and authority. In this case it is so apparent that the court acted without its authority in the appointment of an elisor that the matter demands no extended consideration. Section 4192 of the Political Code reads: "Process and orders in an action or proceeding may be executed by a person residing in the county, designated by the court or judge thereof, or a county judge, and denominated an 'elisor,' in the following cases: * * * (3) When it appears by affidavit to the satisfaction of the court in which the proceeding is pending, or to the judge thereof, that both of those officers [sheriff and coroner] are disqualified, or by reason of any bias, prejudice, or other cause would not act properly or impartially." The impanelment of a grand jury is a proceeding within the provisions of the foregoing section, and it is conceded that the sheriff labored under no disqualification; consequently the contingency for the appointment of an elisor in this case never arose. Section 226 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads: "Whenever jurors are not drawn or summoned to attend any court of record or session thereof, or a sufficient number of jurors fail to appear, such court may order a sufficient number to be forthwith drawn and summoned to attend the court, or it may, by an order entered in its minutes, direct the sheriff, or an elisor chosen by the court, forthwith to summon so many good and lawful men of the county, to serve as jurors, as may be required, and in either case such jurors must be summoned in the manner provided in the preceding section." Section 242 of the same Code provides: "When, of the persons summoned as grand jurors and not excused, nineteen are present, they shall constitute the grand jury. * * * If less than nineteen of such persons are present, the panel may be filled as provided in section 226 of this Code." Conceding that the provisions of the Political Code quoted have no application to the matter of the impanelment of a grand jury, and that section 226 of the Code of Civil Procedure is alone controlling, still I have no hesitation in saying that under that section the court has no power to appoint an elisor, unless the sheriff is disqualified. From any point of view taken, it is the necessary conclusion that the proper construction of section 226 is that the court may appoint an elisor only when the contingency has arisen, whereby the officer elected by the people to perform such service, and which service is a duty enjoined upon him by statute, has become disqualified to act in the matter. The word "elisor" is a technical legal word, with a technical legal meaning; a meaning definitely and uniformly settled by all the authorities; and, under elementary rules of construction, such meaning must attach to it in this section of the Code. An elisor is "an elector chosen by a court to return a panel of jurors, where the sheriff and the coroner are disqualified." And. Law Dict. It is not necessary to amplify upon the necessity in the interest of good government for a strict construction of the law pertaining to the selection of jurors. It is the spirit of the entire law pertaining to the subject that the names of jurors, both grand and petit, should always be drawn from the box, rather than that the great responsibility should be cast upon any officer of going out upon the highways and byways, and of his own choice and will selecting jurors. Our present law, in many essential features, is the outgrowth of an act of the legislature found in the statutes of 1857, p. 168, which provided, among other things, that all grand jurors and all trial jurors, in criminal cases, without exception, should be drawn from the box. This act of 1857 was the direct result of the gross failure of justice, under a corrupt use of the power previously vested by law in the officers of the court to select jurors from the body of the county, and which abuse of power resulted in the organization of the vigilance committee of 1856, a matter which is inseparably connected with the history of this city and state.

The principles which are applicable and controlling upon matters of mandamus are equally applicable and controlling upon proceedings in prohibition; and in Rex v. Barker, 3 Burrows, 1268, Lord MANSFIELD, in speaking of the object and scope of the writ of mandate, said: "It was introduced to prevent disorder from a failure of justice and defect of police. Therefore it ought to be used upon all occasions where the law has established no specific remedy, and where in justice and good government there ought to be one. Within the last century it has been liberally interposed for the benefit of the subject and admeasurement of justice. The value of the matter, or the degree of its importance to the public police, is not scrupulously weighed. If there be a right, and no other specific remedy, this should not be denied." The case of Quimbo Appo v. People, 20 N. Y. 542, received an exhaustive consideration from the court of that state, and, after referring to many authorities upon the question as to when the writ of prohibition should issue, it said: "These cases prove that the writ lies to prevent the exercise of any unauthorized power in a cause or proceeding of which the subordinate tribunal has jurisdiction, no less than when the entire cause is without the jurisdiction." And again: "This shows that the writ was never governed by any narrow technical rules, but was resorted to as a convenient mode of exercising a wholesome control over inferior tribunals. The scope of this remedy ought not, I think, to be abridged, as it is far better to prevent the exercise of unauthorized power than to be driven to the necessity of correcting the error after it is committed." It would seem from the principles laid down in the foregoing authorities, that in this case prohibition is pre-eminently the proper remedy; for, if prohibition is not the remedy, then the defendant is barred from all remedy, for, as we will hereafter indicate, this court has repeatedly and uniformly held that the defendant has no appeal in such a case. It is confidently submitted that our judicial institutions are not so constituted but that the power to relieve an innocent man from an unjust and illegal prosecution and conviction must be found somewhere and in some manner in our judicial tribunals. Such is not only a principle of natural justice recognized by the intelligence and conscience of all civilized nations, but, as a matter of abstract right under our constitution, a defendant is entitled to a remedy.

It is unnecessary to quote further authorities from other states or countries. The question as to whether or not the writ of prohibition is the proper remedy has been squarely met and decided in the affirmative by this court in the case of Levy v. Wilson, 69 Cal. 105, 10 Pac. Rep. 272, and, unless that case shall be overruled at this time, it stands all-controlling upon the case at bar. Like this, as shown by the verified petition filed, that was an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the Hon. T. K. WILSON, as judge of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, from proceeding with the trial of one Henry Levy, charged by indictment with the crime of burglary, and, among the various grounds relied upon by petitioner for the issuance of the writ, he alleged "that said body or alleged grand jury was not a grand jury or a legal or constitutional grand jury." This court, after first remarking that "most of the grounds stated for the purpose were irregularities and errors in law occurring before and after the finding and return of the indictment," said: "One of the grounds stated in the petition is that the indictment was found by a body of men styled a 'grand jury,' that was not in law and fact a valid and constitutional grand jury." If that be so, the accusatory paper returned by them to the court below as an indictment is worthless and void, (People v. Thurston, 5 Cal. 69,) and the court has no jurisdiction to try the petitioner upon it; for no person can be held to answer for crime unless on information, after examination and commitment by a magistrate, or an indictment of a grand jury. And the court then proceeds to quote the definition of the words "grand jury," as declared by the law of this state in section 192 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The foregoing authority decides clearly and emphatically that an accusatory paper returned as an indictment by a body of men not a valid and constitutional grand jury is worthless and void, and a court has no jurisdiction to try a defendant upon such a paper. From the mere statement of the proposition it would seem no lawyer would dispute it. Certainly no court would challenge it. These quotations are not obiter dicta of the court; they are the heart and life of the decision. At the threshold of the case respondent insisted that petitioner had no remedy by prohibition, (exactly what is being done here.) This objection raised a question of law, and it was absolutely necessary for the court to meet it and dispose of it before entering upon an examination of the facts. The question was argued with learning and ability by counsel for petitioner and respondent, and it was in answer to that argument that these principles of law were declared by the court. If it can be said that there is language to be found in the case of People v. Southwell, 46 Cal. 150, opposed in any way to these views, such language would seem to be dicta, or, if it ever had weight as authority, it must be held to have been overruled by Levy v. Wilson, supra.

The court had jurisdiction to impanel a grand jury, to the same extent and in the same manner that it had jurisdiction of the crime of murder. It had no jurisdiction to impanel a grand jury in a manner without the law, and as its caprice might dictate. Neither had it jurisdiction to take a man vi et armis, charged with murder, and proceed to hear and determine his guilt or innocence. Conceding the court had jurisdiction of the offense of murder, and by reason of a valid indictment had jurisdiction of the defendant, it would have no jurisdiction to proceed to try the defendant without a jury; or, upon a verdict of guilty by a jury, it would have no jurisdiction to render a judgment that the defendant be crucified. In the case of Windsor v. McVeigh, 93 U. S. 282, in the opinion of the court, this matter of jurisdiction was clearly and succinctly discussed by that eminent jurist, Mr. Justice FIELD, wherein he said: "Though a court may possess jurisdiction of a subject-matter and of the parties, it is still limited in its modes of procedure, and in the extent and character of its judgments. It must act judicially in all things, and cannot then transcend the power conferred by the law. If, for instance, the action be upon a money demand, the court, notwithstanding its jurisdiction over the subject and parties, has no power to pass judgment of imprisonment in the penitentiary upon the defendant. If the action be for possession of real property, the court is powerless to admit in the case the probate of a will. * * * The judgments mentioned, given in the cases supposed, would not be merely erroneous; they would be absolutely void, because the court in rendering them would transcend the limits of its authority in those cases. * * * And the reason is that the courts are not authorized to exert their power in that way. The doctrine stated by counsel is only correct when the court proceeds, after acquiring jurisdiction of the cause, according to the established modes governing the class to which the case belongs, and does not transcend in the extent or character of its judgment the law which is applicable to it."

Were the acts of the court in the formation of this grand jury in excess of its jurisdiction? Under the constitution the court has jurisdiction to form a grand jury, but by reason thereof it would not follow that it had jurisdiction to form such grand jury in any way it saw fit. Section 192 of the Code of Civil Procedure says: "A grand jury is a body of men, nineteen in number, returned in pursuance of law." A grand jury is not a body of 20 men, returned in pursuance of law, neither is it a body of 19 men, returned to the court in pursuance of no law. The court has jurisdiction to impanel a grand jury, but it has jurisdiction to impanel it only in accordance with the provisions of law; and when it impanels it without the law it is acting in excess of its jurisdiction, and such a body is not a grand jury, for it does not fill the test demanded by the section of the Code just quoted. If, by reason of its general jurisdiction granted by the constitution to impanel a grand jury, it has the power to form one of 19 men not in pursuance of law, it would have the same power to form one consisting of 40 men, or, possibly, 40 women. It is no more requisite, viewed by the statute, that the grand jury should consist of 19 men, than it is that it should be returned according to law. Indeed, from a standpoint of honest, conscientious results, the number of the grand jury is insignificant, as compared to the manner of its selection. When the law declares that a grand jury shall consist of 19 men, and the court impanels a grand jury consisting of 10 men or 12 men, it acts without its jurisdiction, and such a body is without authority, and has no vitality whatever. There is no case to the contrary in this country, and very many directly to that effect. Such a body is not a grand jury, and in congregating it the court was not acting within its powers, for its authority was limited to the formation of a grand jury. In State v. Symonds, 36 Me. 132, the court, referring to three citizens who were placed upon the grand jury, said: "These persons were summoned and charged as grand jurors, and added to the panel, and acted in finding this bill; but, as their selection for the purpose was not in conformity to the laws of this state, they constitute no part of a legal grand jury, * * * and the indictment should be revoked and forever held at naught."

In Doyle v. State, 17 Ohio, 224, the law there requiring a grand jury to consist of 15 persons, the court said: "A less number is not a grand jury. Fourteen are not a grand jury. * * * Hence, in this case, the indictment was not found by a grand jury. * * * Hence, that which purports to be an indictment was no indictment, and the party charged could not be put upon trial to answer. It should have been quashed, or set aside as a nullity." In Finley v. State, 61 Ala. 206, the court said: "Without the agency of the sheriff, but in exclusion of it, the court orders a sufficient number of names to complete the grand jury from the bystanders in the court-room, to be placed upon strips and drawn. The statute imposes upon the sheriff the duty and responsibility of summoning the persons from whom a sufficient number to complete the grand jury are to be drawn, and the court could not exclude him from the performance of the duty, or transfer it to another, or assume to perform it. * * * The exercise of such a power by the court would be in violation of the spirit of all our legislation, and would convert the grand jury from a distinct, independent body, drawn and summoned by officers specially charged with that duty, into a mere dependency of the court, chosen by its absolute will. The record affirmatively discloses that this accusation is not an indictment; that it proceeds from and is the act of a body of men organized as a grand jury in violation of law. It follows that the judgment must be reversed." In McQuillen v. State, 8 Smedes & M. 597, the court said: "A grand jury does not, by our law, consist of thirteen or more men, congregated by the mere order of the court or by accident in a jury-box, but it consists of the requisite number of competent individuals, selected, summoned, and sworn according to the forms of law; and, if the law be not followed, it is an incompetent grand jury." In Lott v. State, 18 Tex. App. 630, in speaking of the acts of a grand jury composed of 13 men when the law required 12, the court said: "Such a body of men is unknown to the law, and its acts, being wholly without authority of law, are absolutely null, and a pretended indictment preferred by such a body can have no legal standing or effect whatever. It cannot confer any jurisdiction of the case upon the court. Our conclusion is that the matter presented by the motion in arrest of judgment is fundamental, and reaches the very foundation of this prosecution." In People v. Thurston, 5 Cal. 69, which case was approved in Levy v. Wilson, supra, this court said, speaking through Chief Justice MURRAY: "I regard the indictment thus found by an illegally constituted body as worthless, and all proceedings based upon it void." The principle declared by the foregoing cases, to-wit, that a body of men sworn as a grand jury, if not composed of the number required by law, or if not impaneled in pursuance of law, is not a grand jury, and that an accusatory paper presented to the court by such body is not an indictment, and that consequently the court has no jurisdiction to try a defendant upon such paper, has been upheld and affirmed directly in many other cases. See Rainey v. State, 19 Tex. App. 479; State v. Williams, 5 Port. (Ala.) 130; Stokes v. State, 24 Miss. 621; Burley v. State, 1 Neb. 385; State v. Lawrence, 12 Or. 297, 7 Pac. Rep. 116.

Respondent insists that, the court having jurisdiction to form a grand jury, and its first order to draw the names of 25 persons from the box being strictly within the requirements of the law, the court thereby obtained jurisdiction, and all matters and orders done and made by the court towards the formation of a grand jury, subsequent to that time, were not jurisdictional, but simply erroneous. This position has no sound support. The first order made by the court in the process of impanelment of the grand jury was no more jurisdictional than the second order made by the court. The court, by exercising its jurisdiction in making a valid order, could not thereby create in itself jurisdiction to make a void order. In this case the grand jury was formed under two separate and independent orders of the court, and under two separate and distinct provisions of the statute. If one was jurisdictional, the other was equally so. The court had the power to make the first order, and exercised it by ordering that the names of 25 persons be drawn from the box. The result of this order was the securing of 10 grand jurors. It had no power to make the second order, and necessarily such order had no legal results. The nine men selected by the elisor were intruders, and necessarily no grand jury was impaneled. The action of the court in appointing an elisor cannot be mere error, any more than a judgment of imprisonment for life upon a conviction for petit larceny would be mere error. In both cases the fatality is caused by an absence of power to make the order. If it is simply an error of the court to appoint an elisor and order him to summon nine men as grand jurors, without any authority in law, it would only be an error of the court to have selected the men itself from the by-standers, or from its personal friends; it would have been simply an error of the court to have impaneled a grand jury consisting of 10 men. If an order appointing an elisor to summon nine men as grand jurors, made in direct contravention of law, is mere error, then an order for the elisor to summon 19 men to compose a grand jury would be mere error, and a grand jury could be impaneled so wholly and entirely irregular as to outrage and shock the law at all points; and still it would be mere error. This is the necessary result of such doctrine, and it would be a grave impropriety to hold it to be the law.

We have now determined that the court acted in excess of its jurisdiction in the impanelment of this grand jury. Has the defendant a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy other than by prohibition? In the cases of People v. Southwell, 46 Cal.

141; People v. Welch, 49 Cal. 174; People v. Colby, 54 Cal. 37; People v. Hunter, Id. 65; People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 323, 19 Pac. Rep. 161,—and others not necessary to note, it was held that a defendant had no appeal to this court from such action of the trial court in impaneling a grand jury as is disclosed by the record in this case. As early in the history of the legal jurisprudence of this state as the case of People v. Hunter, supra, this court said: "Such must be considered the settled doctrine in this state. Conceding that these cases do not establish the true rule, and that the defendant can appeal to this court to right such wrongs, yet such remedy is not plain and speedy; neither is it adequate. It cannot be said to be plain and speedy when at every milestone marking his path to this court there may be found an obstruction completely blocking his way in the form of a supreme court decision, placed there by the very court towards which he is traveling for relief. His remedy by appeal is not adequate. To say that an innocent man can be charged and convicted of a crime involving the greatest moral turpitude, and lie in a felon's cell until he can be set at liberty when his appeal has dragged its slow length along to this court, and that such remedy is adequate for his wrongs, is a travesty upon the use and meaning of words. In the case of Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 399, 24 Pac. Rep. 121, this court decided that the remedy by appeal was not adequate where the appellant might suffer irreparable damage by a destruction of his property pending the appeal. It would follow that it is a very conservative view to say that in this case the remedy by appeal is not adequate; for loss of liberty, and irreparable damage to character and good name, would result to this defendant pending his appeal. The remedy is not adequate to him, for, pending his appeal, wounds would be inflicted no surgeon's art could heal. For the foregoing reasons I think the writ should issue as prayed for.

BEATTY, C. J., (dissenting.) I concur in so much of the opinion of the court as holds that the appointment of an elisor to select and summon talesmen for the completion of the grand jury was, in the absence of any finding of disqualification of the sheriff, a violation of the statutory provisions regulating the formation of grand juries. But I do not think it can be held that the superior court is exceeding its jurisdiction in proceeding with the trial of the petitioner upon the indictments which have been presented against him, and, if not, its action cannot be arrested by prohibition. Precisely the same vice which infects the proceedings in this case was disclosed in the Southwell Case, and several later cases in which it has been followed, (People v. Southwell, 46 Cal. 141; People v. Colby, 54 Cal. 37; People v. Hunter, Id. 65;) in all of which it was expressly held that for such a violation of the statutory provisions on this subject there was no remedy by appeal. This would of course be, as the court intimates, only an additional reason for holding that prohibition is the proper remedy, if, as contended, the superior court has no jurisdiction to try an indictment found and presented by a body so irregularly organized. But I think that, while the only point expressly decided in the Southwell Case was that there was no remedy by appeal, the decision necessarily implies that in such cases the superior court has jurisdiction to proceed to trial and judgment; for surely it ought not to be supposed, in the absence of anything necessarily involving such conclusion, that this court meant to decide that the legislature, by any sort of amendment to the Penal Code, could oust it of its constitutional appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases; that it could, by merely omitting to provide for grounds of challenge to the panel of a grand jury, or of motion to quash or set aside an indictment, enable the superior court to try and convict a citizen upon an accusation presented by a body of men lacking in the essential constitutional qualifications of a grand jury, without having its action reviewed on appeal to this court, where, by the constitution itself, the power of review in such cases is lodged. Such a decision, I say, is not to be imputed to the court when it has not been expressly made, unless it is necessarily to be implied from the conclusion reached, or the reasoning upon which such conclusion is founded; and I see nothing in the opinion of the court in the Southwell Case from which it can be implied that the action of the superior court in pretending to try an indictment presented by a body of men claiming to be a grand jury, but which is not a valid, constitutional grand jury, could not be reviewed on appeal. On the contrary, I find the distinction stated with quite sufficient clearness between a de facto grand jury, whose indictments, so far from being void and subject to collateral attack, are legally sufficient to justify the court in proceeding to try them, and a body claiming to be a grand jury, but having no semblance or color of authority. With respect to such a body, it is distinctly intimated that it would be the duty of the superior court to strike from its files any pretended indictment that it might present, and (as I think must be understood) that, if the superior court neglected its duty in that respect, its action would be reversed on appeal. But whether or not this is what the court meant to say, it certainly said nothing to the contrary effect. What was said in the subsequent case of Levy v. Wilson, 69 Cal. 108, 10 Pac. Rep. 272, is also perfectly consistent with this view. An accusatory paper returned as an indictment by a body of men not constituting "a valid, constitutional grand jury" is worthless and void, and no court has jurisdiction to bring the person accused to trial upon it.

But what is a valid, constitutional grand jury? It is, I think, a body of men possessing the constitutional requisites of a grand jury, as distinguished from merely statutory requisites. As to the former, the legislature cannot dispense with them, nor can it, by altering or refusing to enact rules of procedure, deprive this court of the constitutional power to enforce their observance through the medium of an appeal or writ of error, or by prohibition, when that may be necessary. But as to mere statutory regulations in regard to the selection and summoning of talesmen to complete the panel of a grand jury, which exist only by the grace and favor of the legislature, it is entirely competent for the same power which has prescribed them to determine what, if any, advantage may be taken of their violation. This principle I find very clearly and forcibly stated by Judge ANDREWS, delivering the opinion of the court of appeals of New York in the case of People v. Petrea, 92 N. Y. 144: "If the defect in the constitution of the tribunal deprived it of the character of a grand jury in a constitutional sense, there can be no doubt that the court would have been bound to have taken notice of it, although no statute authorized it, or even if the statute assumed to preclude the raising of the objection. But when the defect is not of that character, and the defendant may be held to answer the indictment without invading any constitutional right, then the question is one of procedure merely, and the right of the defendant to avail himself of the objection is subject to the regulation and control of the legislature." This, it seems to me, is unquestionably a sound view, and it is conclusive of this case. Here the grand jury was not selected as the law prescribes, but it is not lacking in any constitutional requisite. It is composed of 19 members,—the number prescribed by the statute for the time being,—a number within the common-law limits of not less than 12 nor more than 23. It has been impaneled, sworn, and charged with the duties of a grand jury by and is acting under the direction of a court vested with the power to impanel it, and it was drawn and summoned in the sense of the constitution, (article 1 of section 8.) As to this point, I do not think that the constitution means anything more than that a panel must be drawn in the first instance. It does not require, in case, after a regular drawing and summoning of the panel, there are not a sufficient number to form a grand jury, that talesmen for its completion should be drawn. In other words, I hold, as it has invariably been held heretofore, that this provision of the constitution was not intended to change the law existing at the date of its adoption. These indictments are, therefore, not void, and the legality of the grand jury cannot be attacked otherwise than by motion or challenge of a person indicted upon some ground allowed by the statute.

As to the objection that the indictment for bribery in this case shows on its face that no part of the offense was committed in San Francisco, no answer is made, and I do not see how any answer can be made to it. But, although it seems pretty clear that the superior court of San Francisco has no jurisdiction of the offense charged, I do not think this court should interfere by prohibition until the particular defect referred to has been called to the attention of the superior court by demurrer, and even then appeal would be the usual and sufficient remedy.

The other objections to the indictment do not, in my opinion, involve any question of jurisdiction. Upon these grounds, while fully concurring with the court in its construction of the statute relating to the appointment of an elisor to select and summon talesmen, I am constrained to dissent from the conclusion that the error of the superior court can be corrected by prohibition.

DE HAVEN, J. I dissent. The indictments pending against petitioner in department No. 6 of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco were returned by a body of men impaneled by that court as a grand jury, and charged by it with the duties pertaining to such a body. In my opinion, the learned judge of that court committed an error in making the order which directed the summoning of some of its members by an elisor, in the absence of a showing that the sheriff was disqualified to perform that duty. Section 226 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "Whenever jurors are not drawn or summoned to attend any court of record or session thereof, or a sufficient number of jurors fail to appear, such court may order a sufficient number to be forthwith drawn and summoned to attend the court, or it may, by an order entered in its minutes, direct the sheriff or an elisor chosen by the court forthwith to summon so many good and lawful men of the county, or city and county, to serve as jurors as may be required; and in either case such jurors must be summoned in the manner provided in the preceding section." This section does not, when properly construed, give to the judge an absolute discretion to select any person to summon jurors to complete the panel, without reference to the sheriff or his disqualifications. If such were the intention of the law, it would have been more clearly expressed by omitting the word "sheriff" altogether, and simply providing that the jurors should be selected by some person named for that purpose in the order, and then the court would have been left with complete discretion to select the sheriff or any other person to execute its order; but such is not its language, and, giving due effect to the meaning of the word "elisor" in the connection in which it is here used, the true meaning of this section is that the court shall direct the sheriff to summon such jurors, or, in case of his disqualification, some person to act in his place. But this error of the court did not convert the persons impaneled by it as a grand jury into a body of usurpers, without any semblance of authority, and whose accusations are mere nullities, which the court is without jurisdiction to entertain. The court had undoubted authority to impanel a grand jury. Its order made for the drawing was regular, and when, in due course of the proceeding, certain of those drawn were excused from serving, and there did not remain a sufficient number of competent jurors to form the panel, the court was called upon in the exercise of its jurisdiction to obtain additional jurors, and how this should be done was a matter for the court to determine by its order, and involved the exercise of discretion as to whether they should be drawn or summoned; and, in the event that the latter mode was adopted, required the exercise of judgment,—a decision whether under the law the execution of its order should be directed to the sheriff or some other person. That the judge of that court was thus called upon to determine what the law required in the premises is evident, and that this was the exercise of a judicial function in a matter over which he had perfect jurisdiction is to my mind so clear that the mere statement of the proposition ends all argument upon the point. The right to act in the matter at all, and to decide for the time being what was the law applicable to the proceeding before the court, constituted jurisdiction in every sense of that term, and no mere error in the decision of the question thus regularly before it could deprive the court of jurisdiction over that proceeding, or make its orders therein subject to a collateral attack, as absolutely null and void.

The court having this jurisdiction over the general proceeding, it follows necessarily that the jury impaneled by it is a de facto body, having the right to exercise the functions of a grand jury, and whose indictments can only be questioned in the court to which they were returned, with the right of appeal from any judgment therein. Every possible objection which, under the law or constitution, can be taken to the formation of such grand jury, must be presented by the accused in that court, and not by an independent and collateral action in another court. That the objection here urged against this particular grand jury is a mere irregularity, and does not at all affect the jurisdiction of the superior court over the indictments returned against petitioner, was, in my opinion, clearly and distinctly held in the case of People v. Southwell, 46 Cal. 141. In that case, as in this, the jurors had been selected and summoned by an unauthorized person, and this court, on appeal, said this was only an irregularity, and one for which the statute did not even provide a remedy. In thus deciding and affirming a judgment of conviction the court necessarily held that such an irregularity was not fatal to the jurisdiction of the court to try the defendant upon an indictment returned by a grand jury, many of whose members had been irregularly and improperly summoned. It was there said: "It is claimed on behalf of the defendant that, if the grand jury was not selected and summoned as required by law, it was an illegal body, which usurped the functions of a grand jury, and its acts are wholly void." In the course of its opinion, and in reply to this position of the appellant in that case, the court, in pointing out the difference between a grand jury which had such technical defects in its organization and a body wholly without authority and whose indictments would not properly be considered by the court, further said: "It may be that, if a paper be presented to the court in the form of an indictment, but which was found by a body of men having no semblance of authority to act as a grand jury, it would be the duty of the court to strike it from the files as a mere nullity, and as wholly worthless for any purpose. It would have no proper place among the files of the court, and ought, therefore, to be removed from them. * * * But it is not every slight irregularity which may occur in the formation of a grand jury, which would justify the court in striking the indictment from the files as a nullity; otherwise there would be no need of a challenge to the panel, as all objections to the grand jury could be taken on a motion to strike the indictment from the files. The true distinction lies between the acts of a body having no semblance of authority to act at all, and of a body which, though not strictly regular in its organization, is nevertheless acting under a color of authority. In the former case the acts of the wholly illegal body are nullities, having no proper place among the files of the court; but in the latter case section one hundred and eighty-two of the statute prescribes the only method by which mere irregularities in the formation of the grand jury can be inquired into. The case at bar comes within the latter category. On the facts disclosed by the record it cannot be affirmed that the grand jury had no semblance of authority, and were acting without color of lawful right. It was regularly drawn from a grand-jury list, duly certified, and, some of them having been excused, the deficiency was supplied by a venire properly issued by the order of the court. We think the court erred in directing the venire to be summoned by the coroner instead of the sheriff. But this was only one of the irregularities for which the statute has failed to provide a remedy. A grand jury, summoned in pursuance of a venire duly issued, cannot be said to be a wholly illegal body, having no semblance of authority, merely because the court erroneously directed the venire to be served by the coroner instead of the sheriff. It was error of which the defendant perhaps might justly complain, but the statute has provided no remedy for it." This decision has never been overruled, but, on the contrary, has been repeatedly referred to as authority in later cases in this court, and seems to be conclusive of every question presented by this record. Indeed, my attention has not been called to the decision of any court, either in this state or elsewhere, in which it has been held that an irregularity in the formation of a grand jury of the character here complained of can be corrected in a collateral action. In Wharton's Criminal Law and Practice, § 350, it is said: "If the body by whom the indictment was founded was neither de jure nor de facto entitled to act as such, then the proceedings are a nullity, and the defendant, at any period when he is advised of such nullity, is entitled to attack them by motion to quash or by plea in abatement, or, when the objection is of record, by motion in arrest of judgment. He is, in most jurisdictions, sheltered by constitutional provisions from prosecution, except upon indictment found by a grand jury; and when the body finding the indictment is not a grand jury, either de jure or de facto, then its prosecution must fall when the question is duly raised. But a de facto grand jury cannot be deemed a nullity under this provision of the constitution." This seems to me to be the true rule, and in the case of Ex parte Haymond, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 859, we held upon the same state of facts disclosed in this record that this same grand jury was a de facto jury. This being so, in my opinion the superior court has jurisdiction to proceed upon the indictments, and any judgment which it might make would not be void, and therefore the writ should be denied. In the foregoing I have assumed that the offenses charged against petitioner are alleged to have been committed in whole or in part within the city and county of San Francisco. If, however, the indictments are defective in this respect, and it is not shown that the attention of the superior court has been called thereto, petitioner is not entitled, as a matter of right at this time, to the writ demanded.

SHARPSTEIN, J. I dissent. It seems to me that the only serious question in this case is whether the court, in the absence of an affidavit showing that the sheriff and coroner were "disqualified, or by reason of any bias, prejudice, or other cause would not act promptly or impartially," has the power to direct "an elisor chosen by the court forthwith to summon so many good and lawful men of the county, or city and county, to serve as jurors, as may be required," which was fully and carefully considered in People v. Southwell, 46 Cal. 141, and determined against the contention of the petitioner. Under the law then in force the coroner was authorized to execute process only when the sheriff was a party to an action or special proceeding. It nowhere appears, nor is it suggested in People v. Southwell, supra, that the sheriff was disqualified to serve the venire. Therefore the power of the court to direct it to the coroner in that case rested upon no better foundation than the power of the court in this case to direct it to an elisor. The court in People v. Southwell, supra, very pertinently remarked that "a grand jury summoned in pursuance of a venire duly issued cannot be said to be a wholly illegal body, having no semblance of authority, merely because the court erroneously directed the venire to be served by the coroner instead of the sheriff." In that case the court said: "We think the court erred in directing the venire to be summoned by the coroner instead of the sheriff." That shows that it was not a case in which the court was authorized by law to direct the venire, to the coroner. Had it been, the court could not have said that it was error to so direct it. I think the opinion of the court in People v. Southwell, supra, is amply supported by reason and authority, and that it would be much safer to follow than to overrule it. I therefore think the application for a writ of prohibition in this case should be denied.

TAYLOR v. FORD. (No. 12,982.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 18, 1891.)

RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL.

Where defendant, in an action under Code Civil Proc. § 1050, to have determined a claim asserted by defendant against plaintiff on a note, files a pleading which in form and substance is a complaint on the note asking judgment for the amount claimed thereon, and plaintiff, answering, sets up want of consideration and other defenses, it is error for the court to refuse a demand by plaintiff for a jury trial.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by H. W. Taylor against C. D. Ford to have a claim determined. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Charles F. Haulon, for appellant. Page & Eells, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought under section 1050 of the Code of Civil Procedure to have determined an adverse claim which defendant asserted against plaintiff upon a certain promissory note for $8,509.85. Defendant filed a pleading styled "an answer and cross-complaint," which was in form and substance a complaint upon said promissory note, with a prayer for judgment against plaintiff for the amount due thereon. Plaintiff answered, setting up want of consideration and other defenses. At the proper time plaintiff demanded a jury. The court denied this demand, and proceeded to try the case without a jury, and subsequently rendered judgment against plaintiff for the amount which the court found to be due upon the note. Plaintiff appeals. In refusing the demand for a jury the court erred. The issues raised by the cross-complaint, and the answer thereto were triable in the ordinary course of law, and by a jury unless waived. It was a common-law action upon a promissory note, with a defense of want of consideration; and the case comes clearly within the principles stated in Donahue v. Meister, 88 Cal. 121, 25 Pac. Rep. 1096. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

SMULLEN v. PHILLIPS. (No. 14,408.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 18, 1891.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—RUNNING OF STATUTE—AMENDMENT OF COMPLAINT.

Where a complaint is amended to obviate a variance, and the cause of action is the same as that set out in the original complaint, the amended complaint relates to the commencement of the action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; JOHN C. GRAY, Judge.

Action for slander by Smullen against Phillips. Judgment for defendant. Order for new trial. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John Gale and Mr. McBarney, for appellant. H. V. Rearden and M. G. Murphy, for respondents.

FITZGERALD, C. This is an appeal from an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The action is slander, and the words charged in the original complaint, as having been spoken by the defendant of and concerning the plaintiff, are, "He is a thief." These words impute to the plaintiff a crime punishable by law, and are therefore actionable per se. At the trial the witnesses for plaintiff testified that the words used by the defendant, at the time and place alleged, were as follows: "That thieving son of a ———, he stole $2,500 from me, and I can prove it." This testimony was on motion stricken out on the ground of variance, and the plaintiff, after excepting to the ruling of the court, moved for and obtained leave to amend his complaint by inserting the words of the witness in lieu of those originally declared on. The defendant in his answer specifically denies the material allegations of the amended complaint, and, among other matters of defense, avers that the alleged cause of action set out therein is barred by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The trial was then proceeded with by the plaintiff recalling his witness and propounding to him the following question: "State the language used by the defendant Philips at his store on November 6, 1888, in the presence of yourself and others, of and concerning the plaintiff Smullen." Counsel for the defendant here objected "to the introduction of any evidence in support of the cause of action set out in the amended complaint herein, upon the ground that the cause of action set out in said amended complaint is barred by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure." The objection was sustained, and plaintiff, after excepting to the ruling of the court, rested his case. The court, upon motion, then instructed the jury to find a verdict for the defendant, which they accordingly did, and judgment was entered thereon in favor of the defendant. Plaintiff, in his notice of intention to move the court to vacate and set aside the verdict and judgment herein, and to grant a new trial, stated that it would be "made upon a statement of the case to be hereafter served, and upon the following grounds, viz.: 'Errors in law occurring at the trial, and duly excepted to by said plaintiff.'" The following are the specifications of errors contained in the statement on motion for a new trial: "(a) The court erred in striking out the testimony of the witness J. J. Rich, relative to the words used by the defendant given in support of the original complaint. (b) The court erred in sustaining defendant's objection to the testimony of the witness J. J. Rich, offered in support of the cause of action set out in the amended complaint." The order shows that the new trial was granted on the ground last assigned, the first having been waived by the filing of the amended complaint. The scandalous words laid in the original complaint are not qualified or altered in their sense or meaning by those proved to have been used by the defendant. The former are clearly embraced in the latter, and both substantially charge that the plaintiff is a thief. As the cause of action is the same, it is evident that the object and effect of the amended complaint was simply to obviate a variance by conforming the allegations thereof to the proof. The action was commenced within the meaning of the statute, when the original complaint was filed, and it follows that the amended complaint relates to the commencement of the action; and, as the original complaint shows on its face that the cause of action therein stated was not barred by the statute of limitations at the time it was brought, it follows that the new trial was properly granted by the court below on the ground stated in the order. The order appealed from should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

BUELL v. BUELL. (No. 13,698.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 17, 1891.)

EXECUTION—ISSUANCE—MOTION TO RECALL—SUBSTITUTION OF ATTORNEYS.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 681, allowing five years from the entry of a judgment to issue execution thereon, the running of a statute is not suspended pending an injunction staying execution.

2. A motion to recall an execution is an original proceeding, and may be made by attorneys, other than those who appeared in the original action, without substitution.

3. A notice of motion to recall the execution, specifying the grounds of the motion to be "for the reason that the said execution was wrongfully and unlawfully and improperly issued," is sufficient to raise the question of the authority of the court to issue the execution.

4. Where the court has improperly made an order directing execution to issue, it may, on motion, recall the execution, though the order is appealable. Dorland v. Hanson, 22 Pac. Rep. 552, 81 Cal. 202, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Motion to recall a writ of execution issued by H. P. Buell against R. T. Buell. Writ ordered recalled. Plaintiff appeals. Order affirmed.

Wm. H. Webb, for appellant. Geil & Morehouse, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal from an order made by the superior court of Monterey county on the 11th of November, 1889, recalling a writ of execution issued by its order, on a money judgment rendered by the district court in and for that county on the 28th of February, 1877. Notice of the motion was served on appellant's attorney in proper time, and it stated that respondent would move the court, at a time named, to recall the writ, "for the reason that the said execution was wrongfully and unlawfully and improperly issued;" and it further stated that the motion would be made on the record and papers on file, etc. When the motion came on to be heard, appellant objected to the hearing upon the grounds (1) that no legal notice of the motion had ever been filed or served upon him or his attorney; and (2) that the notice failed to specify in what respect the execution was either wrongfully or unlawfully or improperly issued. The objections were overruled, and an exception reserved. It was then shown that execution on the judgment was stayed by various orders of the court, made at the request of respondent, until January, 1878; that on the 17th of January, 1878, respondent commenced an action against appellant in the district court in and for Santa Clara county, to obtain an injunction restraining appellant from taking out an execution on, or enforcing the collection of, his said judgment; that an injunction was issued as prayed for and served on appellant, and that it remained in full force and effect until the 10th of September, ber, 1885, when it was dissolved by the judgment and decree of the superior court of the county; that on the 30th of September, 1885, the appellant applied to the superior court of Monterey county for an order directing its clerk to issue an execution on his judgment, and that the order asked for was made, and in pursuance thereof an execution was issued and placed in the hands of the proper officer for levy and service, but subsequently returned wholly unsatisfied; that again on the 16th of September, 1889, the appellant made application to the same court for an order directing the clerk thereof to issue an execution on his judgment, and "the said superior court, after a full hearing and consideration of the facts and matters appertaining thereto, duly gave, made, and caused to be filed and entered in said cause its order in writing, directing and commanding the clerk of said court to issue a writ of execution," etc.; and that, in pursuance of this order, an execution was issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff of Santa Barbara county, with instructions from appellant's attorney to levy the same upon the property of respondent. This last writ was recalled by the order of the court, and the appeal is from the order recalling it.

1. The appellant contends that the notice of the motion to recall was not legal, or such as he was entitled to, because it was signed by attorneys other than those who appeared for respondent in the original action, and no substitution was shown. We see nothing in this point. The motion was a new and original proceeding, as much so as would have been an action to review the order of the court directing the issue of the writ, and the respondent had full power to employ such attorneys as he might choose to conduct it. McDonald v. McConkey, 54 Cal. 143.

2. Appellant further contends that the motion was insufficient because it failed to specify the grounds of the notice with particularity. The respondent, on the other hand, claims that the order for the issuance of the writ was made by the court without authority, and in excess of its jurisdiction; that the writ was therefore void; that it could and should be recalled, even on an oral motion, upon its illegal issuance being shown. Assuming respondent's theory to be correct, we think the notice was sufficient. The question then is, did the court have jurisdiction and authority to make the order for the issuance of the writ? Section 681 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The party in whose favor judgment is given may, at any time within five years after the entry thereof, have a writ of execution issued for its enforcement." And it has been held that, when the judgment is for the recovery of money, execution can only be issued thereon within five years after its entry. It is claimed by appellant that the time during which execution was stayed should be excluded from the computation of the five years. But this claim cannot be sustained, the contrary rule having been expressly declared by this court. Solomon v. Maguire, 29 Cal. 237; Cortez v. Superior Court, 86 Cal. 278, 24

Pac. Rep. 1011. In the last-named case the court said: "The judgment, being 'for the recovery of money,' * * * could not be enforced by execution after the lapse of five years from the entry thereof. * * * The order staying proceedings did not operate to suspend the running of the statute. Solomon v. Maguire, 29 Cal. 237; Dorland v. Hanson, 81 Cal. 202, 22 Pac. Rep. 552. The order under review was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court. The court had no power to enforce the same after the lapse of five years." It is true that in that case the order was only a stay order, but we see no difference, in legal effect, between such an order and a writ of injunction commanding the same thing. In view of the authorities, we think it must be held in this case that the court below had no authority or power to make the order for the issuance of the writ, and that the writ was therefore void, and subject to be recalled by any proper proceeding instituted for that purpose.

3. The last point made for a reversal is that the order granting the writ was an appealable order, and could only be attacked by appeal therefrom or writ of review. But this is no longer an open question. The same point was made in Dorland v. Hanson, 81 Cal. 202, 22 Pac. Rep. 552, and expressly overruled. The order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

FOGEL v. SCHMALZ et al. (No. 13,617.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 18, 1891.)

TORTIOUS ACTS OF AGENT—LIABILITY OF PRINCIPAL—APPEAL.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 939, subd. 1, which provides that "an exception to the decision or verdict, on the ground that it is not supported by the evidence, cannot be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, unless the appeal is taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment," does not limit the time within which an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit may be taken. Warner v. Darrow, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 737, followed.

2. In an action for conversion against a husband and wife for property purchased, he being manager and agent for his wife in conducting a pawnshop, the wife cannot be held, in the absence of testimony to show that the husband was acting within the scope of his agency in purchasing the property, or that she subsequently ratified his acts.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. H. REARDEN, Judge.

Action by Robert R. Fogel against William Schmalz and Miriam Schmalz for conversion. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed as against William Schmalz and reversed as against Miriam Schmalz.

Henry H. Davis, for appellants. H. H. Lowenthal, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The complaint in this action consists of two counts, one of conspiracy, wherein it is charged that the two defendants Schmalz, in company with one Livingstone and one Cohen, co-defendants, conspired with one Parado to cheat and defraud Greensweig & Co. out of large quantities of jewelry, and that such conspiracy was successful, etc.; and the second count alleges a conversion of the said property by these defendants, and praying damages. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and this appeal is prosecuted by the defendants Schmalz from the judgment and order denying a new trial, the action having been dismissed as to the other defendants by the trial court. In this record we find what purports to be a statement on appeal, made after a motion for a new trial upon the minutes of the court, and in that statement it appears that a motion for a nonsuit was made and denied, and an exception to the ruling of the court entered. This ruling is relied upon as error, and, under the authority of Warner v. Darrow, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 737, it cannot be questioned but that an error of the trial court committed in granting or denying a motion for a nonsuit is an error of law, and as such can be reviewed upon appeal from the judgment, even though such appeal is not taken within 60 days from the rendition thereof.¹ There is no evidence whatever tending to show any conspiracy between these defendants, as set forth in the complaint, and upon that count plaintiff's case signally failed. As to the count of the complaint charging a conversion, we think the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted as to the defendant Miriam Schmalz, as there is no evidence in the record in any manner indicating that she was a party to the conversion of this property. All the testimony in the case in any way relating to the defendants Schmalz is the evidence of one Parado that he sold the property to the defendant William Schmalz at the store, corner of Dupont and Sutter streets; and the evidence of the defendant Miriam Schmalz that she was the wife of her co-defendant Schmalz, and the owner of the pawnbroking business at said place. She further testified: "William Schmalz is the manager of my business. My name appears on the sign over the door. I do not know anything about this case. I know none of the parties. Never saw Parado and never authorized my husband, who is my agent in the business, to purchase any goods from Parado. I do not know that he purchased any goods from Parado." It appears from the foregoing statement of facts that the defendant Miriam Schmalz was an utter stranger to the transaction, and there is nothing to indicate that she accepted the fruits of the sale or in any manner ratified the acts of her co-defendant. Such being the case, and no evidence having been introduced to show that he was acting within the scope or authority of his agency as manager of the business in buying these articles, we see nothing to support an allegation of conversion as far as Miriam Schmalz is concerned, and her motion for a nonsuit should have been granted. Let the judgment and order be reversed as to the defendant Miriam Schmalz, and the cause remanded; and as to the defendant William Schmalz let the judgment and order be affirmed.

COUNTY CLERK—COMPENSATION—ESTOPPEL.

The fees due plaintiff, both as county clerk and auditor, were paid into the county treasury, the payment of the former being made under a law afterwards held invalid; and during the whole time he received from the treasury a sum greater than that he was entitled to as clerk, but less than that due him as both clerk and auditor. Held, that his receipt of this amount does not estop him to claim and recover the difference between it and the amount paid into the treasury on both accounts.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county.

Action by E. B. Whiting against Plumas county. There was final judgment sustaining defendant's demurrer to the complaint, from which plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed.

D. W. Jenks and J. D. Goodwin, for appellant. R. H. F. Variel, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The plaintiff was clerk and ex officio auditor of Plumas county, and, as such, entitled to certain fees as clerk and to certain fees and percentages as auditor, which fees and percentages the tax collector, during a certain specific period, paid over to the county. The plaintiff during the same period paid the fees received by him as county clerk into the county treasury. During the same period he drew from the treasury $125 per month, which was more than the fees received and paid in by him as clerk, but less than the aggregate of the fees and percentages to which he was entitled as clerk and auditor. His fees and percentages as auditor, as above stated, were paid into the county treasury by the tax collector. During the period above referred to it was supposed that the act of March 26, 1873, entitled "An act in relation to certain officers of Plumas county, and to fix the compensation thereof," was a valid act. In Whiting v. Haggard, 60 Cal. 513, this court determined that it was not. The payment by the clerk of the fees received by him as clerk into the county treasury, and drawing therefrom $125 per month, was wholly unauthorized by the law then in force. But no particular harm could result therefrom, because the amount which he drew during the time the act above referred to was supposed to be valid was less than the fees paid in by him and the fees and percentages to which he was entitled, paid in by the tax collector. Crediting the county with the amount drawn out during the aforesaid period, and debiting it with the sums paid in, to which the plaintiff was entitled, there is a balance in his favor of $1,193.69, for the recovery of which this action is brought. The claim is not an inequitable one, and the allowance of it will simply place the parties where they would be if the law had been strictly complied with. One of the grounds upon which the claim is resisted is that the payment by the plaintiff of his fees into the treasury was voluntary. But he only paid in the fees he had received as clerk, and he has drawn an amount considerably in excess of the sum so paid. In other words, the county has voluntarily paid him more than he paid the county, and he very properly credits the county with the excess in his account against the county for fees and percentages to which he was entitled as auditor, and which were turned over to the county by the tax collector. That is, he in effect says to the county: "I am entitled for fees and percentages as auditor from the first Monday of March, 1880, to the 31st day of March, 1882, to the sum of $2,228.53, of which I have received $1,034.84, leaving a balance due me of $1,193.69." Unless the receipt of a part of what was due him constitutes a waiver of his right to recover the balance, we cannot conceive upon what ground such right can be defeated; and nothing is better settled than that the receipt or acceptance of a part of a debt is not a satisfaction of the whole, nor a waiver of the right to recover the balance. The case as presented by the record before us is not one to which the doctrine of estoppel will apply. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the complaint, with leave to the defendant to answer within 10 days after receiving notice thereof.

PEOPLE ex rel. ORR v. WHITING.²

STATUTES—TAKING EFFECT.—COUNTY OFFICERS.

Act March 26, 1878, relating to certain officers of Plumas county, contained provisions as to the election of a recorder, which were to take effect immediately, but the taking effect of the rest of the act was postponed until March, 1880. In the mean time the present constitution was adopted, which provides in article 22, § 1, that all laws in force at its adoption, and not inconsistent with it, shall remain in full force and effect until altered or repealed by the legislature. Held, that this provision continues in force so much of the act of 1878 as relates to the recorder, while the rest of the act is rendered forever incapable of taking effect.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county.

to oust defendant from the office of recorder of Plumas county, which he claims by election under Act Cal. March 26, 1878, and to put the relator in possession thereof, as county clerk and ex officio recorder, under Pol. Code Cal. § 4105. There was judgment on demurrer in favor of the relator, from which defendant appeals. Judgment reversed.

J. D. Goodwin, D. W. Jenks, and F. B. Whiting, for appellant. E. C. Marshall, Atty. Gen., and R. H. F. Variel, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. By its terms, so much of the act of the legislature entitled "An act in relation to certain officers in Plumas county, and to fix the compensation thereof," approved March 26, 1878, as provides for the election of a county recorder, took effect immediately and prior to the adoption of the present constitution. Other parts of the act were, by its terms, not to take effect until the first Monday of March, 1880, and consequently were not in force at the adoption of said constitution, which provides "that all laws in force at the adoption of this constitution, not inconsistent therewith, shall remain in full force and effect until altered or repealed by the legislature." Article 22, § 1. The portions of the act which could not take effect until after the adoption of the constitution were obviously not in force at the adoption of it. But other portions of the same act were in force at that date. Such portions of this act as were not in force at the adoption of the constitution never have and never will take effect. Peachey v. Supervisors, 59 Cal. 548; Speegle v. Joy, 60 Cal. 278; Whiting v. Haggard, 60 Cal. 513. The portions which were in force at the adoption of the constitution are as distinct and separable from those which were not as it is possible for different parts of the same act to be. That such was the understanding and intention of the legislature is evidenced by the enactment that one part should take effect immediately, and the other two years thereafter. This proves that in the opinion of the legislature one part might stand and be executed independently of the other. If it could be for two years, we are unable to discover why it could not be for all time. "If, when the unconstitutional portion is stricken out, that which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed in accordance with the apparent legislative intent, wholly independent of that which was rejected, it must be sustained." Principles of Const. Law, 152. We are therefore of the opinion that on the facts disclosed by the record the appellant is entitled to the office from which it is sought by this action to oust him. This renders it unnecessary to consider the other point discussed by counsel. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the complaint, with leave to the plaintiff to amend within 10 days after receiving notice thereof.

THORNTON, J., and MYRICK, J., concurred.

1. Where a person contracts to pay his agent a certain commission "when the balance of purchase money is paid" on the principal's ranch by the buyer procured by the agent, the right of action for such commission accrues at the instant the balance of the purchase money is paid.

2. Where a person merely brings the buyer and seller together to make their own contract, which they do, the fact that he received a commission from the buyer is no defense to his action for the commission which the seller, after completing the contract, promised to pay him when the purchase money was all paid.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Amador county.

Action by W. O. Green against James Robertson for services rendered by plaintiff about the sale of defendant's ranch. The defenses were that the action was prematurely brought, and that, while plaintiff was acting as defendant's agent for the sale of the ranch, he also acted as the purchaser's agent, and received compensation from him. There were judgment for plaintiff, and an order refusing a new trial, from which defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Charles E. Gray, for appellant. A. C. Brown, for respondent.

MYRICK, J. This action was brought to recover judgment for $400 and interest on the following instrument: "Jackson, Cal., March 17th, 1882. I hereby agree and promise to pay unto William O. Green the sum of four hundred dollars for and in consideration of services to me rendered by him in finding a purchaser and selling my ranch to John Tucker, when the said Tucker or his assigns pays to me the balance of the purchase price, to-wit, the sum of twenty-six hundred dollars; and when such payment is made by said Tucker then I agree to pay the said $400 to said William O. Green. JAMES ROBERTSON." In addition to the averments of execution of the instrument, plaintiff averred that the balance of the purchase price—$2,600—had been paid by Tucker to the defendant. The defendant admitted the employment and services, the execution of the instrument, and that the balance of the purchase price had been paid. The plaintiff was entitled to judgment on the pleadings. Neither of the defenses was sufficient to prevent recovery. First. As soon as the money was paid by Tucker the defendant owed the $400 to plaintiff, and plaintiff could maintain his action without waiting for the day to expire. The instrument does not say "on the day Tucker pays me I will pay the plaintiff;" but it says, in effect, "when he pays me I will pay." Second. The matters set up in the answer as to the employment of plaintiff by Tucker do not constitute a defense. The plaintiff made no bargain for the sale of the property. He was not authorized to make a bargain. He undertook to bring the buyer and seller together, and he did so. They made their own bargain; and, after plaintiff had rendered his service and brought them together, and after they had made their bargain, the defendant executed the instrument in suit. There is no pretense that the defendant is not satisfied with the price he received; no pretense that Tucker is not satisfied with the price he paid. Judgment and order affirmed.

EMINENT DOMAIN—NECESSITY—WATER COMPANIES.

1. No such "necessity," as contemplated by Code Civil Proc. § 1241, exists for the condemnation of land by a water company to secure an additional source of supply, where it is shown by its own evidence that it already owns sources which would, if utilized, increase its supply to a practically unlimited extent.

2. It is no ground for a right to take the land in question that its resources could be utilized at much less expense than could those of the lands which the company already owns.

In bank. Appeal from district court, San Mateo county.

This is a condemnation proceeding, brought by the Spring Valley Water-Works against the San Mateo Water-Works and others. There was judgment for defendants, and an order refusing a new trial, from which plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Fox & Kellogg, F. G. Newlands, and McAllister & Bergin, for appellant. Garber, Thornton & Bishop, for respondents.

McKEE, J. This case arises out of a proceeding commenced under part 3, tit. 7, Code Civil Proc., relative to the subject of eminent domain. As shaped by the pleadings, the proceeding indirectly involves a controversy between two water corporations, each incorporated under the laws of the state, and claiming to be in charge of a public use, for which it asserts the right to appropriate private property. In the exercise of that right the plaintiff seeks, by the proceeding in hand, to condemn 23 acres of land in San Mateo county, which, it alleges, form part of the canadas, valleys, and canons which, uniting near a place in the said county known as "Crystal Springs," constitute, with their creeks, streams, rivulets, lagoons, springs, and catchments, the only adequate source from which the plaintiff can derive its necessary supply of water for its corporate purpose within any distance from which water can be conducted to San Francisco, and without an expenditure of many millions of dollars more than would be required to appropriate and utilize the land in controversy, or without an expenditure greatly disproportionate to the benefit to be derived therefrom. Admittedly, the title to the land sought to be condemned is in the defendant, which claims to have already appropriated the land to the use of the public for its corporate purpose of appropriating and storing water for distribution and sale to the inhabitants of San Mateo county. This the plaintiff denies, but also affirms that, if such appropriation has been made by the defendant, the public use to which it proposes to appropriate the land—i. e., for the corporate purpose of appropriating and storing water for distribution and sale to the inhabitants of the city and county of San Francisco—is a greater public use than that represented by the defendant. Whether the public use represented by the plaintiff is greater than that represented by the defendant is a question subordinate to the main question involved in the proceeding itself as to the necessity for appropriating the land for the public use; and, as that is a judicial question, and lies at the foundation of the right asserted by the plaintiff, it became the imperative and controlling issue in the case. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. v. Metropolitan Gas-Light Co., 63 N. Y. 326; Kohl v. U. S., 91 U. S. 367. Upon that issue the court found as follows: "Tenth. That the use of the said land is not a necessity to the Spring Valley Water-Works, but would be a great convenience, and enhance the value of its property, and secure a fuller water supply to the inhabitants of San Francisco. Eleventh. That the present water supply of the said Spring Valley Water-Works is fully equal to the wants of the people of San Francisco, and will so remain for many years,—at least four years,—and that a larger catchment could be secured by said Spring Valley Water-Works with small expense. Twelfth. That said Spring Valley Water-Works has other sources of supply, which water can be utilized by it as a good money-making investment, long before the inhabitants of San Francisco will need the same." From these facts the court found as a conclusion of law that the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment of condemnation. But it is contended that the decision is against the law and the evidence, and that is the principal question involved in the case, for the specifications of error are that the decision is not sustained by the findings, and that the findings are not sustained by the evidence. In this court it is incumbent upon the appellant on such a contention to show that in the evidence upon which the findings are based there was no substantial conflict, and that the facts and the inferences deducible from them as found by the court were contrary to the evidence. We think the evidence upon which the plaintiff rested its case justified the finding. The evidence consisted of the testimony of the chief engineer and superintendent of the plaintiff, and it related to the sources of supply of water possessed by the plaintiff during the time over which the testimony of the witnesses extended, the increase of the population of San Francisco, the requirements of the city for water, and the constant increase from year to year of those requirements. As to those points the evidence seems to have been uncontradicted; and it tended to prove that the plaintiff had obtained its supply of water for the use of San Francisco for 14 years from certain creeks known as "Pilarcitos," "San Andreas," "Lobos," "Islais," and "San Mateo." The Pilarcitos was the first source of supply, and the second was the Islais. Finding that running streams of water without storage reservoirs would be insufficient and unreliable as a source of supply, the plaintiff, in 1863, built what is known as the "Upper Pilarcitos Dam," and in 1866-67 what is known as the "Lower Pilarcitos Dam;" and in 1867 it commenced to build on the San Andreas a reservoir which was completed in 1869; and afterwards, in 1874, an addition was made to it. From these sources the plaintiff had for 14 years furnished water to the city of San Francisco and its inhabitants. But in 1874 the engineer of the plaintiff began to discover that the catchment and storage capacity of the sources of supply of which the plaintiff was then in possession must be increased. It could not safely rely on the Pilarcitos and San Andreas combined, with all their water-rights and waste water caught, to produce more than 9,000,000 gallons daily. Meanwhile the population of San Francisco was constantly increasing, and the requirements for water kept pace with the increase of population. The daily consumption of water and the increase of population were shown by the following table:

Year.	Population.	Daily Consumption of Water.
1864.....	115,000	2,500,000 gallons
1867.....	150,000	4,500,000 gallons
1870.....	180,000	5,500,000 gallons
1874.....	240,000	8,700,000 gallons
1875.....	250,000	10,500,000 gallons
1876.....	290,000	12,500,000 gallons
1879 (time of trial).....	310,000	12,000,000 gallons

The sources of supply were also subject to be affected by the variability of the rain-fall in California. That variability from 1850 to 1876-77 was shown to have been as follows:

Season.	No. of Inches.
1850-51.....	7.40
1861-62.....	49.27
1862-63.....	13.62
1863-64.....	10.03
1870-71.....	14.10
1871-72.....	34.71

Under those circumstances, the capacity of the plaintiff to supply San Francisco and its inhabitants with water began to be publicly questioned. The newspaper press took up the question, and its discussion agitated the public mind, and caused dissatisfaction with the plaintiff, so that, as the engineer expressed it, "the people that had been ordinarily using a reasonable amount of water in their households, and even with a fair allowance for waste, all of a sudden commenced to waste water so fearfully that at that rate we would not be able to keep up the supply much longer. In fact the daily demand from 1874 until 1875 increased to two million gallons daily, while in former years—in ten years—the increase had been only six million gallons during the ten years, or an average of six hundred thousand gallons yearly." The plaintiff therefore found itself confronted with the question "whether it would adopt stringent measures to repress the waste, or incur additional expenditure in order to provide an additional supply for the people to waste." Conference and consultation upon that question resulted in the determination upon the part of the engineer, the president, and the board of directors "to strike a medium road, by partly checking the waste, and increasing the sources of supply." Waste was to be stopped by meters, and the supply increased by the acquisition of the Crystal Springs property, and the construction of reservoirs thereon. The meter experiment caused public irritation, and, proving unsatisfactory, it was soon abandoned. But the Crystal Springs scheme was projected and surveyed. That scheme involved the appropriation of a valley, containing about 160 acres of land, lying back of the towns of Milbrae, San Mateo, and Belmont; bounded on the west by the coast range of mountains, and on the north and south by hills and mountains. According to the evidence, the valley was originally a natural lake, full of water, which forced an outlet through the hills of San Mateo at the place where the San Mateo creek makes its way through the hills to San Francisco bay. By constructing a dam at the junction of the three arms of the creek, where the passage-way was made, the entire valley could be turned into an artificial lake. But instead of one lake the plaintiff designed to make three artificial lakes in the valley for the storage of water,—one where the San Andreas reservoir is now constructed, another at the location of the present Crystal Springs reservoir, and the third at the junction of the three arms of the San Mateo creek, where it forces its way through the hills. By this project the plaintiff considered it could increase its supply of water about 18,000,000 gallons daily, and be enabled to introduce the water into San Francisco, so as reach the various levels of the city with proper pressure, and upon the gravitation plan. In the scheme Pilarcitos was designed for the highest levels, San Andreas for the levels below, and Crystal Springs for the lowest levels; the final dam to be constructed on the latter levels to be at the three arms of the San Mateo creek, and that was intended to meet the demand of the lowest levels of San Francisco.

In carrying out the project the plaintiff, during the summer and fall of 1874, and afterwards, purchased and acquired the title to 153 acres of the land bordering on the natural lake or lagoon, which is now embraced in the present Crystal Springs reservoir, and also land in the valley below and to the north of it. Of the 28 acres of the land sought to be condemned for this scheme 7 acres are covered by the waters of the lagoon, and the whole is part of a larger tract of land, which belonged to one who, in 1874, acted as the agent of the plaintiff in making for it purchases of the lands bordering on the lagoon; but the owner was not informed that the plaintiff wanted to buy his land, nor were any steps taken to acquire the same until after it had been transferred to the San Mateo Water Company. Inferentially, therefore, the plaintiff did not consider it necessary to acquire the land in connection with the Crystal Springs scheme until after it had been transferred to another water company. Before that transfer the plaintiff had experienced no great difficulty in meeting all demands, however extravagant, for water; and at the commencement of the present proceedings it had secured other streams, watersheds, water-rights, and land with which to meet any reasonable demands which might be made upon it in the future. Those were, in addition to Pilarcitos and San Andreas, the water, water-rights, and properties which it had purchased and acquired in Lake Merced, San Francisco, Calaveras, San Gregorio, Pescadero, Clear Lake, and Lake Tahoe. Of its various sources of supply the plaintiff had utilized only Pilarcitos, San Andreas, and Lobos. Pilarcitos furnished 3,000,000 gallons daily, San Andreas 5,500,000 gallons, and Lobos 2,000,000; and there were over 2,000,000 gallons pumped out of artesian wells. San Francisco could have got along comfortably with 9,500,000 gallons of water daily; and, if regulated by meters, 5,000,000 gallons would have been sufficient to supply the demand. One-third of the water furnished was wasted, yet the supply could have been readily increased, because Merced, at that time, had been purchased; and, according to the evidence of the engineer of the plaintiff, "it would probably furnish, on an average, from five million to six million gallons a day," although by some engineers it was placed at seven or eight millions; and there was testimony given by some persons who were not experts that it would furnish ten million gallons daily. Then there was also Calaveras, consisting of about 4,200 acres of land in Alameda and Santa Clara counties, with the water and water-rights connected therewith, for which, it was in evidence, the plaintiff had paid $1,000,000, the water from which, by means of an aqueduct, could be emptied into the San Andreas reservoir sufficient to furnish a supply, "deducting for evaporation and everything," of from 60,000,000 to 75,000,000 gallons daily. Next to the Crystal Springs project, Calaveras was the best, but the most distant and expensive. Crystal Springs was more convenient and cheaper; at the same time Calaveras alone would furnish a supply of water four times greater than Crystal Springs.

Upon the case as it was presented by the plaintiff we cannot say that the findings of fact were not sustained by the evidence. But, assuming that they were justified by the evidence, it is contended that the finding that the land in controversy would be a great convenience, and would enhance the value of the corporation and secure a fuller water supply to the inhabitants of San Francisco, satisfies the degree of necessity required by the Code, (section 1241, Code Civil Proc.) and is, in itself, a finding that the property is necessary to the use represented. Such things alone, however, do not constitute the elements of legal necessity. Private property, contiguously situated to the works of a corporation, may be very convenient for its corporate purpose, and the acquisition of the same might add to the wealth of the corporation by enhancing the value of the property which it has in hand, and yet not be reasonably necessary to the corporation in the discharge of its duty to the public. "For public uses the government has the right to exercise its power of eminent domain and take private property, giving just compensation; but for public convenience it has not. A public convenience is not such a necessity as authorizes the exercise of the right of eminent domain. The taking of private property for public uses is in derogation of private right, and in hostility to the ordinary control of the citizen over his estate, and statutes authorizing its condemnation are not to be extended by inference or implication." Prather v. Railroad Co., 52 Ind. 36. So in Illinois, where a railroad company undertook to condemn a portion of the ground used and occupied by the state, under a law which authorized it "to enter upon, take possession of, and use all and singular any lands, streams, and materials of every kind, * * * necessary for the construction, completion," etc., "of its road," the supreme court of Illinois used this language: "The word 'necessary' has great flexibility of meaning. It is used to express mere convenience, or that which is indispensable to the accomplishment of a purpose. If we were compelled to say that the general assembly intended to embrace this property in the grant, we should hold that, as a condition to its appropriation to the uses of the company, it would have to appear that this property was indispensably necessary,—not merely convenient or profitable to the road,—but to its completion and operation; that without it the objects and purposes of the creation of the company would be defeated, and the company cease to exist. There can be but little doubt that this strip of ground would be of great convenience to the company, and we entertain as little doubt that all of the grounds and buildings thereon would also be of greater convenience, to say nothing of the saving of expenditure in the purchase of land for the use of the company. But we cannot believe that it is anything more than a matter of convenience and profit that the company should apply this ground to the purposes sought." Therefore the right to condemn was denied. And in a proceeding to condemn land for a public highway, where there was proof that a public road already existed between the proposed termini which answered all the purposes of the public, although it had been allowed to go without repairs, in violation of the duty of those who had it in charge, it was held by the supreme court of Louisiana that there was not necessity to take private property for the same purpose. Lecoul v. Police Jury, 20 La. Ann. 308. So where on an application by a railroad company to "expropriate" lands, (as it is called in Louisiana,) it appeared that the company had already a sufficient quantity for its purpose, the supreme court held that the application should be denied. "The right of expropriation," says the court, "should only be enforced by inches, and upon conclusive proof of the necessity upon which it rests." Jefferson v. Hazeur, 7 La. Ann. 182. Necessity is therefore not made out by proof of great convenience, nor of enhancement of values, nor of accumulation of properties of the same kind for the same use.

Unquestionably, where the object of public use is a supply of fresh water, the public have the right to an unstinted supply, and the corporation to whom has been granted the franchise to furnish the supply has the capacity to appropriate private property for that purpose. But its capacity is limited to the real necessity which exists for the appropriation. If such a necessity exists, the individual use of property must give way to the necessity of it for the public use. But whatever may have been the opinion and judgment of the plaintiff as to the necessity in its affairs, which moved it, in 1875, to seek to appropriate this land for the use which it represents, the necessity for appropriation was disproved by its own showing that its utilized sources of supply were, and continued afterwards to be, adequate for the public requirements, and that it was entirely practicable for it at any time to utilize its unutilized sources so as to increase the supply to a comparatively unlimited extent; and also by the fact that it was entirely practicable for the plaintiff to construct on its own land, just above the land of defendant, the improvement for which it seeks to condemn the defendant's land. Utilization of the means on hand would, of course, incur expenditures of money; but so would the acquisition and utilization of suitable private property for the same public purpose; and it might be that the expenditures required for the former would be much greater than those required for the latter. The proofs, however, do not make out a case of financial impossibility, nor of any unreasonableness of expenditure required on the part of the plaintiff for making available its abundant resources. Indeed, it might well be inferred from the evidence of the plaintiff that the cost of utilizing its present resources would not measurably exceed the cost of acquiring and utilizing what it now seeks to condemn. But even if it ran beyond, and it were practicable to supply the use by the additional cost, whatever it might be, there would be no need for the plaintiff to invade private property for the same use. Necessary the property might be, under such circumstances, as a matter of economy; but necessary it would not be for the public use. A corporation in charge of such a use cannot condemn whatever it may find convenient and profitable to acquire, on the ground merely that it may save expense. On that question the following language by an English judge, the master of the rolls, in Fenwick v. East London Ry. Co., L. R. 20 Eq. 544, is applicable to condemnation proceedings in our own courts: "I think the case is concluded by the authorities,—I should have thought it would have been by good sense without authority,—that you cannot damage your neighbor's property merely for the purpose of saving yourself a little money, where it is unnecessary for the construction of the railway." This being conclusive of the case, it is unnecessary to consider the other questions arising out of the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

RICHARDS v. GRIFFITH et al. (No. 14,096.)

SUBROGATION.

B. mortgaged his land, and the instrument was filed in 1885. In August, 1886, defendant acquired a lien on the land by virtue of a judgment against B. In October, 1886, B. gave a mortgage to plaintiff, with the understanding that plaintiff would pay the prior mortgage, which was done, and the mortgage satisfied of record. Thereafter defendants purchased under execution sale on their judgment, and, no redemption being made, they took a sheriff's deed. At the time they purchased they had no notice of a lien prior to their judgment lien. Held, in an action to foreclose, that, as against defendants, plaintiff was not subrogated to the rights of the mortgagee in the prior mortgage. Persons v. Schaeffer, 3 Pac. Rep. 94, 65 Cal. 79, followed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; G. G. CLOUGH, Judge.

Suit by Richards against Griffith, Stose, and Bunnel to foreclose a real-estate mortgage. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. V. Reardan, for appellant. Gray & Sexton, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. The court below sustained the demurrer to the complaint, and, plaintiff having declined to amend, judgment was entered in favor of the defendants. It is alleged in the complaint that on November 11, 1884, defendant Bunnel made and delivered to Charles St. Sure a promissory note for the sum of $700, payable November 11, 1886, and to secure payment thereof executed and delivered to him a mortgage on certain lands, which are described; that on August 25, 1886, the defendants Griffith & Stose recovered and caused to be docketed a judgment against said Bunnel for the sum of $303.26; that on October 21, 1886, Bunnel made and delivered to plaintiff his promissory note for the sum of $1,200, payable two years after date, and to secure payment thereof he executed and delivered to plaintiff a mortgage on the same property owned by him, and described in the St. Sure mortgage; that plaintiff made the loan of $1,200 to Bunnel upon the express agreement with the latter that the St. Sure mortgage should be satisfied and discharged by said Bunnel out of the sum loaned to him by plaintiff; that thereupon the plaintiff paid St. Sure the amount due on the note which he held against Bunnel, ($904.16,) and St. Sure released Bunnel from the indebtedness and canceled the mortgage; that on November 3, 1886, an execution upon the judgment referred to was procured by Griffith & Stose, and that they at execution sale, after due proceedings, became the purchasers of the land described in the mortgage; that the property was sold at said sale December 11, 1886, for the sum of $315.60, and on June 23, 1887, no redemption from the sale having been made, the sheriff executed and delivered a deed to Griffith & Stose; that the St. Sure mortgage was recorded August 3, 1885, and the mortgage to plaintiff on the day it was executed. Upon these facts plaintiff prayed for a foreclosure of his mortgage, a sale of the property, and payment to him of the amount of $904.16, with interest thereon from the date of the discharge of the St. Sure mortgage. His contention is that by virtue of his agreement with Bunnel, and the payment and discharge of the St. Sure mortgage, he was subrogated to all the rights of St. Sure, and that the lien which was superior to the lien of the judgment, though changed in form, still subsists. It will be observed that there is no averment of fraud, accident, or mistake, or of any real or colorable necessity on the part of plaintiff to pay the St. Sure mortgage in order to protect his own interests. Plaintiff was a mere volunteer party to the transaction. It is not claimed that Griffith & Stose had any notice of the agreement between plaintiff and Bunnel, or of the fact that plaintiff paid off the St. Sure mortgage with money procured from Bunnel. At the time they purchased the land the St. Sure mortgage was satisfied and canceled of record. Before they were informed of the facts upon which appellant relies for subrogation they changed their position. They purchased the property in good faith, for a valuable consideration, without notice of appellant's claim that there was a lien superior to their judgment lien. We cannot say whether they would have paid $316.60 or any other sum for the property, if they had known of plaintiff's claim, but it is sufficient to say they did change their position before they had any notice of the facts. We think the learned judge of the court below, in reviewing the authorities, correctly held that this case falls within the principle discussed and applied in Persons v. Schaeffer, 65 Cal. 79, 3 Pac. Rep. 94. It was there held that a lien will be kept alive under some circumstances in favor of one who has paid the lienholder, although the latter has satisfied and discharged it of record; but that where the equity is a latent one the lien will not be kept alive to the prejudice of a subsequent bona fide purchaser. See, also, Guy v. Du Uprey, 16 Cal. 196; Bunn v. Lindsay, 95 Mo. 250, 7 S. W. Rep. 473, a case very much like this; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. p. 102, § 658. The judgment is affirmed.

BEASLEY v. SAN JOSÉ FRUIT-PACKING CO.
(No. 14,237.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 17, 1891.)

EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT.

In an action by a servant against his master for injury caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant, a declaration by defendant's foreman, made after the alleged injury, to the effect that the culpable servant "was a careless man before that, and they knew it, and that the company ought not to have kept him as long as it did," is not admissible to prove defendant's negligence.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; JOHN REXNOLDS, Judge.

Action by Beasley against the San José Fruit-Packing Company for personal injury. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. New trial.

S. F. Leib, for appellant. Richards & Welch, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff, an employe of the defendant, brought this action to recover for personal injuries caused by the carelessness of a fellow-employe in running a freight elevator. Judgment was rendered in his favor for $500, and from this judgment and an order denying a new trial the defendant has appealed. The plaintiff can maintain no action against the defendant for damages sustained solely through the negligence of a fellow-employee; but, to avoid the effect of this rule, the plaintiff has charged in his complaint that the defendant was negligent in selecting and retaining in its service the fellow-servant through whom the accident occurred. The presumption is that the master has done his duty, and has selected competent servants, and there is no presumption that the fellow-servant is incompetent or careless; hence it is incumbent upon the servant who seeks to recover from the master for the carelessness of a fellow-employee to show by affirmative proof, not only that the fellow-employee was in fact careless, but that the master had knowledge of such carelessness, or was negligent either in the selection or retention of such servant. There must be some personal fault of the master before he can be made liable, and the burden of showing such fault is on the plaintiff. Wood, Mast. & Serv. § 419. The facts shown at the trial in support of this allegation are that Henning, who had charge of the elevator at the time of the accident, had been previously employed by the defendant as a night watchman; that while in that service it was his duty at night to fill the gasoline tank, and that on one occasion about 10 days prior to this accident, when he went to the gasoline-house for that purpose with a lighted lantern, as was his custom, upon opening the door an explosion took place by reason of some of the gasoline having leaked out of the tank. It was not shown by any competent evidence that Henning was, in fact, careless at any time prior to the accident with the elevator, or that he was either known or reputed to be a careless man; and the fact that upon a single occasion an accident had occurred while he was in the service of the defendant, in a different employment, would not show any incapacity for another employment in the same service. There is no necessary inference that an accident is the result of carelessness; and it was testified by Wright, the foreman of the defendant, that, in his opinion, that accident was not the result of any negligent act of Henning. Upon this point the court instructed the jury that they should disregard any specific act of negligence on his part in his employment as night watchman, and that "the responsibility of the defendant for the exercise of reasonable care in his employment dates from his transfer to the receiving department, and must be considered in the light of the defendant's knowledge of facts affecting his character and reputation for care at that time." This took from the jury the right to consider his action connected with the gasoline explosion, and we must assume that the jury followed the instructions of the court. Emerson v. Santa Clara Co., 40 Cal. 543. For the purpose of showing that Henning was careless, and that his carelessness was known to the defendant at the time he was put in charge of the elevator, it was testified on behalf of the plaintiff that, on the evening of the day on which the accident occurred, Wright, who as foreman of the defendant had employed Henning, visited the plaintiff at his house, and in a conversation with him said that "Mr. Henning had been a careless man before that, and they knew it; he set their place on fire a few days before; that accidents had happened before with him, and that the company ought not to have kept him as long as it did." The testimony of what Wright had said to the plaintiff on the evening after the accident was not competent to prove the fact that Henning was careless, and did not in any respect bind the defendant. The admissions of an agent, not connected with the transaction to which they refer, cannot bind his principal, even though made in explanation of an act previously done by him while in the exercise of his agency. Much less can his opinion bind his principal with reference to a transaction with which he was not connected. Whart. Ev. §§ 1173, 1180. "The opinion of an agent, based upon past occurrences, is never to be received as an admission of his principal, and this is doubly true when the agent was not a party to those occurrences." Insurance Co. v. Mahone, 21 Wall. 157. "The declarations of an agent or servant do not in general bind the principal. To be admissible, they must be in the nature of original, and not of hearsay, evidence. They must constitute the fact to be proved, and must not be the mere admission of some other fact. They must be made, not only during the continuance of the agency, but in regard to a transaction depending at the very time." Luby v. Railroad Co., 17 N. Y. 133. See, also, Rockwell v. Taylor, 41 Conn. 59; First Nat. Bank v. Ocean Bank, 60 N. Y. 297; Packet Co. v. Clough, 20 Wall. 540; Gutchess v. Gutchess, 66 Barb. 483. The declarations of officers of a corporation rest upon the same principles as apply to their agents. Railroad Co. v. Decker, 82 Pa. St. 119. Inasmuch as the evidence of Wright was not competent to bind the defendant, there was no evidence before the jury from which they were authorized to find that the defendant "neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employee," (Civil Code § 1970;) and the court should have given to them the following instruction, requested by the defendant: "Even if it be true that the accident happened by reason of the negligence of the fellow-servant of plaintiff, yet there is no proof sufficient to be submitted to you that the defendant neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of such fellow-servant." For its error in refusing to give this instruction the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial granted.

In re HILDEBRANDT'S ESTATE, (two cases.
Nos. 14,040 and 14,041.)

EXECUTORS—CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE.

1. An executor cannot pass upon his own claim against the decedent's estate, under Code Civil Proc. § 1510, providing that, if the executor or administrator is a creditor of the decedent, his claim, duly authenticated by affidavit, must be presented for allowance or rejection to a judge of the superior court.

2. The fact that an executor holds officially more money than the amount due him individually from the estate does not prevent him from making an affidavit for his claim, alleging, as required by Code Civil Proc. § 1494, "that there are no offsets to the same, to the knowledge of affiant."

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeals from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. V. COFFEY, Judge.

Two appeals by William C. Hildebrandt, executor of Louis G. C. Hildebrandt, deceased: (1) From an order settling the executor's first account; (2) from an order of partial distribution. Both affirmed.

Rosenbaum & Sheeline, for appellant. James M. Haven and William Loewy, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. There are two appeals in this case, one from an order settling the executor's first account, and the other from an order of partial distribution. Both orders were based upon the same facts, and involved the same questions of law; the two appeals may therefore be considered together. On January 10, 1889, William C. Hildebrandt was appointed executor of the last will of Louis G. C. Hildebrandt, deceased, and letters testamentary were issued to him. On the 23d of the same month notice requiring the creditors of the decedent to present their claims to the executor within a time named was published, as provided by law and ordered by the court. On August 15, 1889, the executor filed in court a verified inventory and appraisal of all the estate of the decedent which had come to his possession and knowledge. In this inventory he charged himself with money due the estate in the sum of $11,429.43, "less offset of $10,000 claimed by said executor," thus making the balance due, $1,429.43, and the whole value of the estate, $5,962.43. On August 29th, upon motion of one of the legatees, the court ordered the inventory amended by adding thereto the $10,000 deducted, and it was so amended by the executor, thus making the whole appraised value, $15,962.43. In June, 1890, the executor filed in court his first annual account, which was in substance as follows:

"William C. Hildebrandt, executor, in account with the estate of Louis G. C. Hildebrandt, deceased.

"To cash received as follows, to-wit:

Due from William C. Hildebrandt,....	$11,429 43
Less offset claimed by William C. Hildebrandt.....	10,000 00
	$ 1,429 43
Trunk containing, etc., appraised at..	20 00
	$ 1,449 43
Contra. Various sums paid out as expenses of administration	80 42
Balance.....	$ 1,369 01"

Several of the legatees and heirs of the decedent filed objections to the allowance of the alleged offset, upon the ground that no claim for the same had ever been presented, and the time for presentation of claims against the estate had long since expired. When the matter of the settlement of the account came on to be heard, the executor was called as a witness, and testified "that the account, as filed, was correct;" but he "admitted that no claim whatever, as prescribed by statute, had been presented to the judge by him." Thereupon the court refused to hear further evidence, and entered an order sustaining the objections, and disallowing the alleged offset of $10,000. To this order an exception was reserved by the executor. In proper time, Marie Peters, one of the legatees named in the will of decedent, filed her petition praying for a partial distribution of the estate, and setting forth facts, which, if true, entitled her to such distribution. After a hearing upon the petition, the court found that its allegations were true, "and that the sum of fifteen thousand nine hundred and sixty-two and forty-three one hundredths ($15,962.43) dollars has been received by the executor; that the time has expired for the presentation of claims against said deceased, and that no claims against the said deceased have been presented to said executor, nor to the judge having charge of this estate; that said petitioner is entitled, as a legatee under the will of said deceased, to the four-fifteenths of the residue of the estate of said deceased, after the payment of the expenses of administration." And an order was thereupon made that the executor pay to the petitioner, "from the proceeds of said estate in his hands, the sum of twenty-five hundred ($2,500) dollars, taking the receipt of said Marie Peters therefor, on account of her distributive share of said estate." To this order an exception was also reserved. In support of the appeals it is contended that the first order was erroneous, because the court should have heard testimony as to whether the alleged offset was a just demand against the estate, and, if found to be so, should have allowed it, notwithstanding no claim therefor had been presented; and that the second order was erroneous, because if the offset had been allowed, as it should have been, then the petitioner would not have been entitled, under the will, to so large a sum as was distributed to her. The Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows: "Sec. 1493. All claims arising upon contracts, whether the same be due, not due, or contingent, must be presented within the time limited in the notice, and any claim not so presented is barred forever," etc. "Sec. 1494. Every claim which is due, when presented to the executor or administrator, must be supported by the affidavit of the claimant, or some one in his behalf, that the amount is justly due, that no payments have been made thereon which are not credited, and that there are no offsets to the same, to the knowledge of the affiant," etc. "Sec. 1510. If the executor or administrator is a creditor of the decedent, his claim, duly authenticated by affidavit, must be presented for allowance or rejection to a judge of the superior court, and its allowance by the judge is sufficient evidence of its correctness, and must be paid as other claims in due course of administration," etc. It is urged that these sections do not apply to and cannot affect this case, for the reason that, as the executor had in his hands more money belonging to the estate than the amount of his claim, he could not have made the affidavit "that there are no offsets to the same, to the knowledge of affiant," and hence that he was entitled to have his claim allowed without presentation. This position cannot, in our opinion, be maintained. The statute is imperative, and applies to all claims arising upon contracts. If the effect of it is to cause a loss or work a wrong in some particular case, that is a matter for the consideration of the legislature, and not the courts. We are unable to see, however, how the loss sustained by appellant can have resulted from his inability to comply with the requirements of the law. It would seem rather to have resulted from his own carelessness and neglect. The money which he had received as executor he held in his official capacity, while the debt was due to him, if at all, in his individual capacity. The money of the estate was not an offset, in any sense, to his private claim, and the fact that he held that money in no way prevented his making the affidavit required. We advise that the orders appealed from be affirmed.

CHAFOIN V. RICH et al. (No. 13,859.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 24, 1891.)

APPEAL—REMITTITUR—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT—ACTION ON NOTE—INTEREST.

1. In an action against R. and D., makers of a note, a judgment was rendered for plaintiff against R., and in favor of D. On appeal, the judgment in favor of D. was reversed, and a remittitur was issued to the court below to enter judgment against him also, and an entry was made by the lower court, which recited that the cause came duly before the court, and the remittitur was presented, "and it now appearing, upon and from due and legal proofs," that there is due on the note set out in the complaint, "for principal, the sum * * * and that plaintiff is now entitled to judgment therefor, with costs: Wherefore * * * it is ordered," etc. Held, that the entry did not show a retrial, but that judgment was entered according to the remittitur.

2. As against D., who was a joint maker, although in reality a surety, the note did not cease to draw the stipulated interest when the judgment was rendered against R.

3. The note was dated June 16, 1883, payable three months after date, with the interest payable semi-annually. The judgment against D. was entered January 12, 1889. Held, that it was not error to include in the judgment interest on the note, at the stipulated rate, from the time for the last semi-annual payment in December, 1888, up to the date of the judgment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by Martin Chafoin against A. G. Rich and Michel Dubs on a promissory note. A judgment had been rendered against Rich, and in favor of Dubs; but on appeal the judgment for Dubs was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment against Dubs. This is an appeal from the judgment as entered by the lower court. Affirmed.

W. R. Daingerfield and Edw. F. Fitzpatrick, for appellants. Geo. W. Fox, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action upon a promissory note, which reads as follows: "$4,000. Mayfield, June 16, 1883. Three months after date we promise to pay to the order of Martin Chafoin four thousand dollars, at two per cent. per month from date, value received. Interest to be paid semi-annually. A. G. RICH. MICHEL DUBS." The defendants answered to the complaint separately. Defendant Dubs, by his answer, denied that he executed the note for a good and valuable consideration, or for any consideration whatever, or that he was indebted to the plaintiff for or on account of the note in the sum due thereon, or in any sum; and he averred that he signed the note only as a surety for defendant Rich, and at the time was known by the plaintiff to be a surety, and was received and accepted by him as such; that plaintiff failed and neglected to present the note to Rich for payment at or about the time it became due, and failed and neglected to notify him (Dubs) of its non-payment until about the month of February, 1884. Wherefore he prayed that plaintiff take nothing as against him. After trial the court found the facts to be as alleged by Dubs, and accordingly rendered judgment against Rich for the principal of the note, and the interest thereon computed up to that time, making $5,778.67, and in favor of Dubs for his costs. From this judgment in favor of Dubs the plaintiff appealed to this court, where the judgment was reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment against the respondent on the findings. Chafoin v. Rich, 77 Cal. 476, 19 Pac. Rep. 882. The remittitur in the case was filed in the court below January 12, 1889, and on the same day judgment was entered by that court in favor of the plaintiff and against Dubs for the sum of $9,349.16, besides costs; that being the amount found due on the note for principal and interest, computed at the rate named therein, up to the time of such entry. From the judgment so entered this appeal is prosecuted by Dubs. The judgment recites that the cause came duly before the court on the 12th day of January, 1889, and that the attorney for plaintiff presented to the court the remittitur from the supreme court, whereby it appeared, etc. "And it now appearing to the court, upon and from due and legal proofs, that there is now due and owing upon the promissory note set out in plaintiff's complaint, from said defendant Michel Dubs to the plaintiff, for principal the sum of four thousand dollars, and for interest the sum of five thousand three hundred and forty-nine 16-100 dollars, aggregating nine thousand three hundred and forty-nine 16-100 dollars, and that plaintiff is now entitled to judgment therefor, with costs: Wherefore, by reason of the law and the premises, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed," etc. Appellant contends that this shows a new trial of the case, and not the entry of a judgment on the findings, as directed by the remittitur, and hence that the judgment was not erroneous or voidable merely, but absolutely void; citing Mulford v. Estudillo, 32 Cal. 139, and Hayne, New Trial & App. § 299. It is true that, where the supreme court directs a particular judgment to be entered, the court below must not retry the cause, but must enter the judgment directed, and the entry of a different judgment is void. But we fail to see how the rule applies to this case. As we read the recitals of the judgment, the court did not retry the cause, or attempt to do so, but simply found the amount then due on the note, and entered judgment therefor as it understood the remittitur to direct.

It is also contended that, appellant being a surety, no greater sum could be demanded or recovered from him than was due from his principal, and that the remittitur should have been construed as directing the entry of judgment for such sum only as was shown by the findings to be then due from Rich, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the time the first judgment was entered. But, as between plaintiff and appellant, the latter was a maker of the note, and was obligated to pay it in full. As against him the note continued to be a binding obligation, and to draw interest at the stipulated rate until it was merged in the last judgment. He might have paid the note before suit was brought, or might have paid the judgment against Rich after the judgment in his own favor was reversed, and thus not only have relieved himself from further liability, but have placed himself in a position where, being a surety for Rich, he could have recovered back from him the money paid. He chose not to do this, however, but preferred to fight the matter out to the last in the courts, and whatever increased loss he may now sustain must be attributed to his own obstinacy and bad judgment.

It is further contended that each judgment was given for a sum in excess of what was then due; that as the note was payable three months after its date, (June 16, 1883,) and the interest was to be paid semi-annually, the installments of interest only became due on the 16th days of December and June following; that when the first judgment was rendered on April 23, 1885, the interest from December 16, 1884, was not due, and should not have been included, as it was; and when the second judgment was rendered on January 12, 1889, the interest from December 16, 1888, was not due, and should not have been included. We see nothing in this point. When the note was made, it was evidently contemplated that the holder would permit it to remain unpaid for a considerable time, provided the interest should be paid at the end of each half year. But there is nothing in this to indicate that, if the note should be paid or sued upon intermediate the half year, the full interest up to that date would not be due and payable. We think the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Ex parte GORDAN. (No. 20,868.)

CONTEMPT — APPEARANCE BY ATTORNEY — ORDER OF ARREST — JURISDICTION.

On a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, it appeared that a divorced father failed to pay each month the amount ordered by a superior court for the support of his infant child, and was ordered to appear in person before the court to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt; that on the day appointed he appeared by his attorney, who offered to file the sworn answer of his client, together with certain affidavits in response to the order; that the court refused to receive them, and entered an order that the father was guilty of contempt for not appearing personally, and thereupon issued a writ of attachment causing his arrest. Held, that the father had a right to appear by attorney, and that the order for his arrest was without jurisdictional basis.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. BUCKLES, Judge.

Petition by Solomon Gordan for a writ of habeas corpus in behalf of Robert Gordan. Writ granted.

Peter J. D. Sullivan and James G. Maguire, for appellant. Henry I. Kowalsky, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The petition herein is by Solomon Gordan, praying that Robert Gordan may be restored to his liberty. The facts are as follows: Robert Gordan was plaintiff in an action for divorce against his wife, Elka Gordan. Judgment was rendered in said case in favor of plaintiff therein, on December 8, 1887, granting the divorce, but providing that the infant child of the parties, Leah Gordan, until further order, "be placed in the charge and custody of the grandmother, Sarah Patek, to be by her sustained at the expense of the plaintiff, Robert Gordan." In January, 1890, the said Sarah Patek filed a petition in which she stated that Gordan had been paying her $25 per month for the support of said child down to November, 1889; that for November and December, 1889, he had not paid anything; and that $25 per month was not sufficient. She prayed that the court order him to pay $50 for the two back months, and for the future $40 per month. Gordan answered and set up various reasons why such order should not be made. After a hearing the court, on January 25, 1890, ordered him to pay said $50, and also thereafter to pay said Sarah $30 per month. There seems to have been no further trouble until some time in 1891; but on June 27, 1891, the said Sarah Patek filed another petition, in which she stated that in February, 1891, said Gordan had ceased paying said $30 per month. Whereupon the court made an order, on June 27, 1891, "that said Robert Gordan be and appear in person," before the court on July 3, 1891, to show cause "why he should not be punished for contempt in failing and refusing to obey" the order requiring him to pay said $30 per month, and "why he should not pay the costs reasonably incurred in this matter." This order was served on Gordan on June 29, 1891, in San Francisco, where he resided; the court making the order being the superior court in and for the county of Solano. On said July 3, 1891, said Gordan appeared in court by his attorney, Herbert Chynski, who, on behalf of Gordan, offered to file the sworn answer of the latter, and certain affidavits in response to the order to show cause. But the court refused to receive the affidavits, or to hear the proceeding on its merits, because Gordan was not personally present, and because his counsel admitted that when last seen he "appeared to be in good health" and "physically able to attend court." Whereupon the court ordered the sheriff to call the said Gordan at the court-house door, and, no response having been made to the call, the court entered an order reciting the said facts, and adjudging that said Gordan was guilty of contempt in not appearing personally in court, and ordering a writ of attachment to issue to the sheriff commanding him to arrest said Gordan, and hold him in custody until the opening of the court, and then bring him before the court. Pursuant to said order such writ was issued and Gordan was arrested; and by virtue of said writ the sheriff claims to hold the said Robert Gordan. We do not deem it necessary to examine the points made by petitioner, that the original order to pay money to Sarah Patek was invalid because she was not a party to the divorce suit, and that the alleged contempt having been committed, if at all, without the immediate presence of the court, there should have been an affidavit stating the facts constituting the contempt, as provided in section 1211 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The alleged contempt for which Gordan is held in custody is not the refusal to obey an order requiring him to pay money, but his failure to appear in person in response to the notice to show cause. In civil proceedings, and even in many criminal proceedings not involving a felony, a party may appear in person or by counsel. Of course, in proper cases, he may be taken under attachment or warrant of arrest; and, within certain territorial limits, a person may be compelled to attend court as a witness by the process of subpoena. But in the case at bar Gordan was merely summoned to appear in court on a certain day, and show cause why a certain thing should not be done. He appeared on said day by counsel, and offered to show cause. This he had a right to do, and the court should have proceeded to hear and determine the issue before it. That part of the order which commanded him to appear in person the court had no power to make; and the subsequent order for his arrest for not appearing personally had no jurisdictional basis. It is ordered that the said Robert Gordan be discharged from custody.

GORDAN v. BUCKLES, Judge. (No. 14,588.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 28, 1891.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. BUCKLES, Judge.

J. D. Sullivan and James G. Maguire, for petitioner. Henry I. Kowalsky, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is a petition for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent from proceeding to hear and determine a charge of an alleged contempt committed by petitioner by not appearing in person in the court of respondent on July 3, 1891, in response to an order to show cause. The facts are stated in the opinion of this court this day rendered in Ex Parte Gordan, 28 Pac. Rep. 489. The petition contains some matters referring to the respondent personally, the insertion of which was a violation of professional propriety by counsel for petitioner. All of the petition is stricken out except so much thereof as consists of a bare statement of the facts necessary to show the character of said order of July 3, and the proposed action of the respondent thereunder. Let a final writ issue prohibiting respondent from proceeding to punish petitioner for a contempt in not appearing in person before the court of respondent on July 3, 1891.

FELTON et al. v. LE BRETON et al. (No. 13,438.)

TRUSTS — FORECLOSURE — ATTORNEY AND CLIENT.

1. On the execution of a trust-deed to secure a loan from the grantee to the grantor, one F., who had been the attorney for both parties, and who acted for the grantee in making the loan, induced the grantee to include in the deed a sum due from the grantor to F. for legal services, and agreed that no part of such sum should be paid until the loan was repaid in full. F. did not inform the grantee that his rights might be affected by including such sum in the deed. Afterwards the grantee, desiring to terminate the trust, was advised by F. that he could not purchase at a sale under the power contained in the deed, but that he might do so on foreclosure by action, and take the land discharged of the trust. The action to foreclose was conducted by F., who was not made a party, as attorney for the grantee, (plaintiff therein,) until F. died. The grantee, being authorized by the decree, purchased at the foreclosure sale for less than the amount of his loan. Held, that he took the land discharged of any trust on account of the sum secured by the deed to F.

2. In an action by an attorney arising out of business transactions with his client which resulted in a benefit to the attorney and a detriment to the client, the burden is on the attorney to show that he fully advised the client of the legal effect and consequences of the transactions.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Equitable action by Felton and others against Le Breton and others to compel enforcement of a trust. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Pillsbury & Blanding, for appellants. Garher, Boalt & Bishop, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. October 1, 1870, Juana I. Estudillo and others, owners of the Guadalupe rancho, in Santa Barbara county, and the San Leandro rancho, in Alameda county, and certain other real and personal property in Alameda county, executed to Theodore Le Roy a deed of conveyance of said property, in trust, to sell and dispose of the same, and out of the proceeds to pay certain indebtedness on their part to himself specified in the instrument, with interest, and such sums as should be afterwards advanced by him to them; and also all taxes, liens, costs, and legal expenses which might be paid or incurred by him in managing the property, and protecting the title thereto. The property had been in litigation for several years, and was at this time heavily incumbered, but measures had been agreed upon by which it was to be removed from litigation, provided a loan could be effected sufficient to pay off the various claims. In this emergency, Mr. John B. Felton, who had been attorney for the Estudillos in their litigation in reference to the property, applied to Le Roy to loan them money with which to free the property from its incumbrances, and to take the property himself as security for such loan. Felton was also, and had been for many years, the sole legal adviser of Le Roy, and acted as his legal adviser in the making of this loan. The Estudillos were indebted to Felton and certain other attorneys in the sum of $49,000, which Felton was also desirous of having secured by the deed of trust, and, as an inducement to Le Roy, proposed to him that these claims of the attorneys, including his own, should be subordinate to the claim of Le Roy for the indebtedness to him, as well as for his advances, and should be paid only after Le Roy had been fully reimbursed. Le Roy thereupon consented to the arrangement; and the instrument above named was executed to him, and he accepted the trust, and entered into possession of the property. The instrument recited that the grantors were indebted to Le Roy in the sum of $446,849, which sum was made up by adding the $49,000 due the attorneys to the amount of the money advanced by and owing to Le Roy. About a year after the execution of the instrument, Felton, at the request of Le Roy, executed to him a declaration in writing in conformity with his verbal agreement that the $49,000 item should not be paid until after Le Roy had been entirely reimbursed for the principal and interest of his own claim, together with the advances and expenses made and incurred by him in the management of the property. Le Roy continued in the management of the property under this conveyance for several years, making sales of portions from time to time, advancing additional amounts to the Estudillos, and incurring expenses in its management, but, finding that the indebtedness was increasing from year to year, instead of being extinguished, as had been anticipated when the instrument was executed, became desirous to have the trust extinguished, and for this purpose consulted Felton as his attorney, and was advised by him that he could not purchase at any sale made by himself under the power contained in the instrument without having the property so purchased by him subject to the same trust, but that, if he should institute an action in equity in the nature of a foreclosure, and for the sale of the property under a decree of the court, he could then purchase the property at such sale, and hold it discharged of the trust. Under this advice a suit was commenced in September, 1884, in the name of Le Roy, in the late third district court for Alameda county, against the grantors in the instrument, but without making Felton and the other attorneys defendants therein. Felton prepared the complaint in this action, had it signed by two attorneys who were employed in his office as attorneys for Le Roy, signed it himself as counsel for the plaintiff, and conducted the suit until his death, in May, 1877. After his death Le Roy employed B. S. Brooks, Esq., as his attorney, who thereafter conducted the litigation. Upon the trial of the action a full accounting on the part of Le Roy under the deed of trust was taken, and judgment rendered in January, 1879, that there was due to Le Roy the sum of $768,077, and directing a sale of the property by commissioners appointed by the court. In this sum was included the item of $49,000, and interest thereon from October 1, 1870, subject, however, to the priority in payment of the indebtedness due to Le Roy. Orders of sale were thereafter issued upon the judgment to the commissioners appointed therein, and after proper notice they made sales of the property mentioned and described in said judgment, and at such sales Le Roy became the purchaser of the property described in the complaint herein; and on the 26th of March, 1880, and on the 26th day of May, 1880, he received from the commissioners, respectively, conveyances of the property so purchased by him, and thereafter during his life-time, and his administrator after his death, held possession and received the income of said property under the claim that he was the sole owner thereof. The proceeds of the sales by the commissioners were not sufficient to satisfy the judgment in favor of Le Roy, but left a deficiency of $167,514.42 on the 29th day of May, 1880. The amount included in the judgment on account of the sum of $49,000, aforesaid, with interest thereon, was less than the amount of this deficiency, being only $109,821.25. The present action was brought by the representatives of Felton for the purpose of having it declared that the property, after its purchase by Le Roy at the commissioners' sales, under the order of the court, as aforesaid, was still held by him subject to the trust under which it was originally conveyed to him, in the proportion which Felton's claim for attorney's fees bore to the amount of indebtedness in favor of Le Roy at the time when the instrument of October 1, 1870, was executed, and that an accounting be taken between the plaintiffs and defendants concerning the trust; that the trust be executed by selling the land, and the proceeds be apportioned between the plaintiffs and the defendants in the proportions in which they might be entitled to receive the same. Upon the trial of the cause the court made its findings of fact substantially in accordance with the aforesaid statement, and found as conclusions of law that at the execution of the instrument of October 1, 1870, there was a resulting trust in favor of Felton and against Le Roy in the proportion which his part of the $49,000 bears to the sum of $397,849 which still exists in favor of the representatives of Felton against the representatives of Le Roy in and upon the lands described in the complaint, subject to a priority in favor of Le Roy as to his proportion of the same, secured by said trust-deed; that the decree rendered in 1879, in the suit of Le Roy v. Estudillo, in the third district court, did not extinguish the trust, either by its own force or by way of estoppel; and rendered judgment accordingly in favor of the plaintiffs, directing an accounting and a sale of the property, and an apportionment of the proceeds in accordance with said finding. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendants, which was denied; and an appeal has been taken from the judgment, and from the order denying a new trial.

1. One of the material findings of fact made by the court is unsupported by the evidence in the case, and is contradictory to other findings. In finding 40, the court finds that, when Le Roy consulted Felton for the purpose of bringing the action of Leroy v. Estudillo, he was advised by him that by the sales under a judgment rendered in such action the "trust would be wholly extinguished and terminated as to the defendants in said action, and he would become, as against such defendants, the owner in fee-simple absolute of all the property acquired by and through such sales," while in finding 41 the court finds that Felton advised him that such procedure "would fully terminate said trust." We find no evidence in the record showing that Felton at any time advised Le Roy that by a sale under such judgment the trust would be extinguished and terminated "as to the defendants in said action," or that there would be any qualification upon the termination of the trust. The only evidence in the record upon this subject is that of Steinbach, that Felton advised Le Roy that the trust would be terminated by a suit in foreclosure, and that Le Roy could bid in the property, and own it absolutely, and that, if he should purchase the property at the sale, he would have an absolute right and title to it, and be liable to nobody, and that the claim of Felton and the other attorneys would be terminated. The fact embraced in this finding is so material to the judgment that a failure to make the finding in accordance with the evidence necessitates a new trial. If, however, we should assume that only that finding which is supported by the evidence is to be considered by us, under the principle that when a finding of fact is susceptible of two constructions, one of which is supported by the evidence and the other not, only that which is supported by the evidence will be considered, we must then hold that the findings do not support the judgment.

2. By his purchase at the sales under the judgment in the case of Le Roy v. Estudillo, Le Roy became vested with all the title that the grantors in the instrument of October 1, 1870, had at the date of that instrument in the property so purchased, freed and discharged of the lien and trusts created by the instrument. All of the parties to that instrument were before the court, and under the issues presented by the pleadings in the action the acts of Le Roy in the management of the trust were investigated, and an account was taken of his receipts and disbursements, and also of the amount remaining unpaid of the original indebtedness, for the securing of which the instrument was executed, and his said acts and account were approved and confirmed by the court; and in its judgment directing a sale of the property for the purpose of satisfying the amounts thus determined to be due to Le Roy, the court directed that such sales should be made at public auction, upon notice thereof, by commissioners appointed by it, and that at such sale "the plaintiff, [Le Roy,] and any and all others, whether parties to this suit or not, may be and become purchasers upon compliance with the terms of sale," and that, upon the execution of a deed to the purchaser, he should become vested with the title in fee to said real estate so purchased by him. An absolute conveyance of property by a debtor to his creditor, in trust, that he may sell the same, and out of the proceeds discharge the debt, is in effect only a mortgage with a power of sale, and the grantee may treat it as such, and, instead of making a sale under the power, may go into a court of equity for a foreclosure and sale under its decree, and whenever such course is pursued his relation to the property is the same as that of a mortgagee in the foreclosure of an ordinary mortgage. The purpose with which Le Roy brought that action was to extinguish the trust upon which he held the property, by having the property sold under the direction of the court, and thereby to realize a sum sufficient in amount to satisfy the indebtedness for which it had been conveyed to him. It was for the interest of all parties to the instrument that any sale that might be made under such direction of the court should be for as high a price as could be obtained. If at such sale Le Roy could not bid as a purchaser, he might be compelled to witness a sacrifice of the property which had been given as security for his debt, with the possible consequence of a loss of a portion of his indebtedness; and at the same time the debtors would fail to have their debt extinguished by the same sacrifice of their property. Unless the title which Le Roy would receive, if he became the purchaser at such sale, would be of the same character as that which would be received by any other purchaser, he would necessarily refrain from bidding at the sale; and thus the competition of bidders would be diminished, and the very object of the action would be defeated.

The rule which forbids a trustee from bidding at a sale made by himself is based upon principles of equity, and is the creature of courts of equity; but the same court which has established and which enforces the rule can dispense with its enforcement whenever the circumstances of any case do not require the application of those principles. The rule which forbids a mortgagee to purchase the property sold under a power of sale contained in his mortgage rests on the same principles; but in some states provision has been made by statute that under such power the mortgagee may cause the sale to be made by a sheriff or other public officer, and himself become the purchaser, while in other states it is provided that the mortgagee may become the purchaser at his own sale under such power, if it can be made to appear that the sale was made in good faith, and the proceedings were fairly conducted. A court of equity has the same right to determine in advance of the sale, in any particular case, that the circumstances are such as will justify it to authorize the trustee to become a purchaser, as it has after the sale to approve a purchase made by a trustee under statutory authority. When the sale is made under the direction of a court of equity, by officers appointed by the court, it is not a sale by the trustee, and the rule forbidding him to purchase at his own sale has no application. The appointment of commissioners in the case of Le Roy v. Estudillo to make the sale was equivalent to the appointment of a new trustee and the discharge of Le Roy, and gave to him the same right to purchase at the sale that the beneficiary has at a sale made by the trustee under a deed of trust created for his benefit. It must be borne in mind that Le Roy was the beneficiary under the trust, as well as the trustee, and that his rights as beneficiary, as well as his obligations as trustee, were entitled to receive consideration from the court. It is a rule in equity that the beneficiary under a deed of trust may become the purchaser at a sale by the trustee, to the same extent, and with the same results, as may be exercised by a creditor in any other action who purchases the property of his debtor at a judicial sale, (Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587; Easton v. Bank, 127 U. S. 538, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1297;) and the trustee may himself make the bid at the instance of the beneficiary without impairing the validity of the sale, (Richards v. Holmes, 18 How. 143.) In Wright v. Ross, 36 Cal. 414, many principles similar to those in the present case were involved; and it was there held that Ross, to whom Buckalew had assigned the Turner mortgage as security for his own debt, had the right, in a suit for foreclosure instituted by himself upon the Turner mortgage, to purchase the property covered thereby, and hold it discharged of any trust in favor of Buckalew; "that, having elected to purchase at that sale as a legitimate method of procuring payment pro tanto of the debt due to him from Buckalew, he is entitled to the exclusive benefit of the purchase, unless by the terms of the contract a trust is created which denies to Ross the usual right of a creditor to purchase the property of his debtor at a fair judicial sale." If Le Roy had proceeded against the will, or without the knowledge of Felton, in subjecting the property to a sale under the direction of the court, there would be much force in the proposition that the property purchased by him at such sale would not be divested of the trust in favor of Felton, under which he originally received it; but in view of the fact that the suit under which the sale was made was instituted upon the advice of Felton, that thereby the trust would be fully terminated, and that Felton was himself the attorney for Le Roy, and prepared the complaint, instituted and conducted the suit up to the time of his death, and that he included as defendants in the action such parties as he deemed essential for carrying out the purpose for which Le Roy had employed him, we do not think that it can lie in the mouth of the representatives of Felton to claim that the result of those proceedings is contrary to what he had advised. If Felton had included himself and his associates as defendants in the action, they would have been bound by the judgment, and the property purchased by Le Roy freed from any trust in their favor as fully as from the trust in favor of the other defendants. His failure to include them in the suit cannot be availed of by his representatives any more than it could have been by himself.

3. It was held by the court below that upon the execution of the instrument of October 1, 1870, Le Roy held the property under a double trust,—that which is expressed in the instrument, and that arising from the parol agreement between himself and Felton in reference to the $49,000, subsequently reduced to writing,—and that, although by his purchase under the judgment he held the land freed from the trust in favor of the Estudillos, it is still bound by the other. Felton had been the legal adviser of Le Roy for many years prior to the execution of that instrument, and was his sole adviser in the transactions which resulted in the execution of the instrument itself. It was at his solicitation that Le Roy consented to make the loan and accept the trust, and the item of $49,000 was included therein for the benefit of Felton and his associates, upon the inducement that that sum should not be payable out of the proceeds of the property until after Le Roy had been fully reimbursed. While an attorney is not prohibited from having business transactions with his client, yet, inasmuch as the relation of attorney and client is one wherein the attorney is apt to have very great influence over the client, especially in transactions which are a part of, or intimately connected with, the very business in reference to which the relation exists, such transactions are always scrutinized by courts with jealous care, and are set aside at the mere instance of the client unless the attorney can show by extrinsic evidence that his client acted with full knowledge of all the facts connected with such transaction, and fully understood their effect; and in any attempt by the attorney to enforce an agreement on the part of the client growing out of such transaction the burden of proof is always upon the attorney to show that the dealing was fair and just, and that the client was fully advised. Kisling v. Shaw, 33 Cal. 440; Brock v. Barnes, 40 Barb. 533; Howell v. Ransom, 11 Paige, 542; Ford v. Harrington, 16 N. Y. 289; Evans v. Ellis, 5 Denio, 643; Dunn v. Dunn, 42 N. J. Eq. 437, 7 Atl. Rep. 842; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 310, 311. In the words of Lord ELDON, he must make it manifest that he gave to his client "all that reasonable advice against himself that he would have given him against a third person." Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 278. The relation of Felton to Le Roy, as his legal adviser, demanded of him the highest fidelity to the interests of his client. He was precluded from assuming any relation towards Le Roy which would prevent him from devoting his entire energies to his interests, and was likewise precluded from asking Le Roy to assume any relation to him by which their interests might become antagonistic. There is nothing in the record to show, or even to intimate, that Felton was at any time influenced by any other motive than to promote the interests of Le Roy. The court finds that "in effecting the said transactions between the said Estudillos and Le Roy, and inducing the said Le Roy to permit the said sum of $49,000 to be included in the said trust-deed, as aforesaid, the said Felton was not aiming to secure a benefit and advantage to himself, to the injury and detriment of the said Le Roy, nor by an abuse of the confidence of the said Le Roy in him as his legal adviser, but it was a detriment to said Le Roy to include said sum of $49,000 in said trust-deed, to the extent that it involved the bringing in of additional parties in any action to foreclose said trust-deed, and in defense of the action referred to in finding 51, herein;" referring to an action similar to the present, brought by one Newhall against Le Roy, in behalf of the other attorneys. Newhall v. Le Breton, 119 U. S. 259, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 225. When it was thus shown that, by the act and inducement of Felton, Le Roy had sustained injury and detriment in allowing the $49,000 to be included in the trust-deed, it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs, in their action to enforce the trust concerning said sum, to show to the court that Felton had fully discharged his duty towards Le Roy, and had advised him of the legal effect and consequences of so including it. The record fails to show that any such advice was given by Felton, or that Le Roy was in any way informed that any possible detriment could occur from assuming such relation of double trust in reference to the property conveyed to him. It was not necessary for the defendants to show that there had been any failure on the part of Felton in the performance of his duties to his client. The burden of proof was upon the plaintiffs to show that they had been performed by him, and a failure to make such proof imposed upon the court the necessity of adjudging the invalidity of the transaction between them. The judgment and order of the court below are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

COFFEY v. QUINT et al. (No. 13,786.)¹

ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—ASSIGNMENT OF CLAIM—CONSTRUCTION—FINDINGS.

1. One C. transferred to plaintiff, his attorney, a claim against M. Plaintiff, subsequent to the death of C., stated that he had no interest in the claim, but that the assignment had been made for the benefit of C.'s estate. Afterwards, however, he asserted that the claim was his, the only evidence therefor being plaintiff's own statement that, prior to C.'s death, he and plaintiff had an accounting, and this claim was then assigned to plaintiff. Held, that the trial court was justified in finding that the assignment was made for the benefit of C.'s estate, and that the claim was never the property of plaintiff.

2. Several months after C.'s death plaintiff assigned the claim, and the trial court found that the assignment was made to secure a personal debt of plaintiff. Held, that such finding was not inconsistent with the finding that plaintiff was not the owner of the claim.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; F. W. LAWLER, Judge.

Action by John J. Coffey against one Quint and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John J. Coffey, in pro. per. W. H. Payson, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The evidence in this case fully sustains the finding of the court that the assignment to the plaintiff by Corcoran of the claim against McCloskey was for the benefit of Corcoran's estate, and was never the property of the plaintiff. Corcoran at the time of the assignment was upon his death-bed, and died five days thereafter. The plaintiff was at that time and had been for some years his attorney and legal adviser. The only evidence in support of his ownership of the claim was given by himself, that "prior to his death he and I had an accounting of business transactions; he gave me this assignment offered in evidence." In viewing the relations existing between plaintiff and Corcoran at the time of the assignment, and in the absence of any affirmative proof that Corcoran received any consideration therefor, the statements shown to have been made by the plaintiff subsequent to the death of Corcoran, that "the assignment was for the benefit of the estate of Mr. Corcoran," and "I have no claim against it; I don't own it, and I have no interest in it;" and which he did not deny,—justified the court in making the findings above named. About three years prior to the death of Corcoran certain of his personal property was attached in a suit by the Bank of California, and, for the purpose of releasing the property, McCloskey gave an undertaking to pay the judgment; and Corcoran, for the purpose of indemnifying him, transferred to him a claim which was the subject-matter of the claim assigned to the plaintiff. Upon this claim McCloskey, after Corcoran's death, collected certain moneys, and out of the same paid the judgment recovered by the bank, and the remainder to the administrator of Corcoran's estate. Several months after Corcoran's death the plaintiff assigned the claim to the defendant Diemer, and the court finds that at the time of such assignment he was indebted to Diemer in the sum of $50, and that the assignment was a security for said indebtedness. It does not appear that this indebtedness was ever paid. The plaintiff does not question the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain this finding, but claims that it is inconsistent with the finding that he was not the "owner" of the instrument. We see nothing inconsistent in the two findings. He could easily make an assignment, as security for his own debt, of property of which he was not the owner, but which he merely held in trust for another. The plaintiff in his complaint alleged that the defendants had collected the amount due on the assignment and converted it to their own use. Not only was there no evidence of this, but McCloskey testified that he had paid all of the money to Mrs. Corcoran, and none to Diemer. As we find no error in the record, the judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. SCHINDLER v. FLINT *et al.*¹

INSURANCE COMPANIES—INCORPORATION—QUO WARRANTO.

1. Under Civil Code, § 290, (as it existed in 1874,) requiring articles of incorporation to state the capital actually subscribed, and section 419, which prohibited the formation of a fire insurance company without a capital of $100,000, articles of incorporation of such a company, which state that its capital stock is $100,000, and that $5,000 of that amount are actually subscribed, are insufficient, and the persons signing them do not form a corporation.

2. In a proceeding to have it adjudged that defendants have usurped a corporate franchise, and to restrain them from exercising it, the alleged corporation is a necessary party.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

This was a proceeding by the people, at the relation of David Schindler, against Thomas Flint and others, to have it adjudged that defendants have usurped and wrongfully hold a corporate franchise, and to restrain them from exercising it. The alleged corporation was known as the "California Farmers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company." Defendants demurred to the complaint on the ground that it was not made a party, but the demurrer was overruled, and it was adjudged after trial that defendants "have wrongfully intruded into and wrongfully hold and exercise * * * the franchises of a corporation," and that they be restrained from transacting any business as such corporation," from which judgment defendants appeal. Judgment reversed.

Pillsbury & Titus and A. W. Thompson, for appellants. A. L. Hart, Atty. Gen., and Fox & Kellogg, for respondent.

MYRICK, J. This is a proceeding by the people to have it determined that the defendants have usurped, intruded into, and wrongfully hold and exercise a corporate franchise, and that they be restrained from exercising the same. The articles of incorporation stated the capital stock to be $100,000, of which the amount actually subscribed was $5,000. The certificate was filed May 22, 1874. As section 419 of the Civil Code then read, no corporation could be formed for insurance, except on live-stock, without a subscribed capital equal to $100,000. Section 290, as it then read, required the articles to state the amount actually subscribed. We think these sections should have been read together, to the extent of stating (1) the amount actually subscribed, and (2) that it equaled $100,000. This being so, the persons signing the articles did not form a corporation. But the alleged corporation is not a party, and has not been heard; therefore its right of existence, or its right to transact business, cannot be adjudged or determined in this proceeding. It may be that individuals, perhaps the relator, have had such transactions with the alleged corporation as not to be in condition to dispute its existence. The people are interested to the extent that no further insurance business shall be transacted by the defendants, (that is, no policies issued;) and to that extent the defendants might, perhaps, be enjoined; but to prevent the corporation from collecting its dues, or maintaining any action, without being heard as to its right so to do, is beyond the scope of the present proceeding. The complaint was demurred to upon the ground, among others, of defect of parties defendant, in that the corporation was not made a party. We think the demurrer well taken. The corporation was a necessary party. It certainly should be heard before any decree should be made affecting its rights; and possibly the very right of defendants, as individuals, to transact business, or do any act, might involve the right of the corporation to have the business done. The rights of the corporation may be, and probably are, involved in the very acts sought to be enjoined. It has the right to take issue on the allegation that the individuals enjoined are its trustees or directors. It is well to say, to prevent any misconception, that if on a new trial, after the alleged corporation has been made a party, it should be adjudged that it never had been legally a corporation, in that case appropriate proceedings should be had by which the affairs of such de facto corporation should be wound up and settled by the trustees, whatever due to it collected, and whatever due by it paid, the balance, if any, to be divided among the stockholders. The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded, with instructions to sustain the demurrer upon the ground above indicated, and for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

WEAVERVILLE & M. WAGON-ROAD CO. v.
BOARD SUP'RS TRINITY COUNTY.¹

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1883.)

MANDAMUS—To SUPERVISORS—FIXING RATES OF TOLL.

1. On a petition for mandamus to compel the board of supervisors of a county to fix the rates of toll on a wagon road therein, claimed by the plaintiff, the ownership of the road cannot be inquired into.

2. Nor, in such proceeding, can the plaintiff's right to the corporate franchise which it claims be questioned.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Trinity county.

Petition for mandamus by the Weaver-ville & Minersville Wagon-Road Company against the board of supervisors of Trinity county. There were judgment refusing the writ, and an order denying a motion for new trial, from which plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

W. J. Tinnin and C. E. Williams, for appellant. Grove L. Johnson, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The plaintiff applied to the superior court of Trinity county for a writ to compel the respondent to fix the rates of tolls to be taken on the Weaver-ville & Minersville Wagon Road, which the plaintiff claims to own. The defendant filed an answer, in which it denied that the plaintiff was the party beneficially interested in the proceedings for obtaining a writ; denied that W. S. Lowden, who made the affidavit upon which the application for the writ was based, had any right or authority to make said affidavit on behalf of the plaintiff, and alleged that the plaintiff had no interest in said road, and that said Lowden instituted said proceedings for the exclusive benefit of himself and one Eligh. It also denied that the plaintiff was a corporation; that it owned said road; that it had a right to collect tolls; that it was the duty of the respondent to fix the rates of tolls; and that the plaintiff ever requested the respondent to fix the rates of tolls; and finally alleges that said road is, and since the date of its construction, in and about the year 1862, has been, an open public highway, over which the public has the right of passage free, and without the payment of tolls therefor. The findings are contradictory. It is found "that plaintiff is not a corporation duly or otherwise organized under the laws of California, and is not the party beneficially interested in this action;" and then it is found "that the Weaver-ville & Minersville Wagon-Road Company was incorporated in 1863, for the purpose of constructing a wagon road between the points specified in the affidavit upon which this action is based; that said company never constructed a wagon road between said points or elsewhere, but that said company repaired and operated a wagon road which had already been built, and collected tolls thereon, until about the year 1867." There is a finding "that the plaintiff is not the owner of the wagon road described in the affidavit upon which this action is based," and another "that from the date of the organization of said company in 1863 to the bringing of this action the said wagon road has been kept in repair by the company; and those claiming through said company, without cost to the county of Trinity or any road-district in said county; and that the right of said company, and those claiming under it, to collect tolls on said road, has never been disputed until a short time prior to the commencement of this action." It is also found "that plaintiff did not, on the 1st day of August, 1881, or at any time, demand of said board of supervisors to fix the rates of toll which plaintiff should be allowed to take, but that demand was made upon said board in behalf of W. S. Lowden and James Eligh, and such demand was made in the name of the plaintiff; that said board of supervisors did on the 3d day of August thereafter refuse, and still refuses, to fix the rate of tolls to be taken on said road either for this plaintiff or for any other person or corporation." The finding last above quoted is contrary to the evidence, which shows that the demand was made by officers of the plaintiff and on its behalf, and there is no evidence tending to prove that it was made otherwise. It appears by the findings that the plaintiff was incorporated in 1863, and that it in some way obtained the possession of the wagon road which it was incorporated to construct and operate, and that it has ever since retained the possession of it. Such possession was prima facie evidence of ownership. Whether based upon paramount title or not, was a question which could not be inquired into except in an action or proceeding in which some person who claimed a better title was a party; and then it could not be tried by a board of supervisors, nor in a proceeding to determine whether a mandate should issue to compel the performance by said board of a duty imposed upon it by law. The question of title can be inquired into and determined in a proper proceeding, but clearly not in this. And it is equally clear that the board of supervisors could not inquire into nor de-

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Suit by Charlotte Windhaus against Adam Bootz and others to set aside certain deeds of gift on the ground of fraud. Defendants had a decree, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. Castelhun, for appellant. H. H. Lowenthal, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action by a judgment creditor to have certain deeds of gift of real property made by respondent Adam Bootz to his wife and daughters set aside as fraudulent and void against creditors. The court made many probative findings, and also found as an ultimate fact that the transfers were not made with intent to defraud creditors, and thereupon rendered judgment for defendants. This is an appeal from that judgment and the order denying a motion for a new trial.

The principal error relied on by appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that "the transfers were not made with intent to defraud creditors." The respondents presented no evidence to the trial court, and that introduced by appellant is neither full nor satisfactory, and is practically as follows: One Severin testified that in 1879 Bootz owed him $3,000 upon a certain promissory note, and at the end of the year 1880 he owed about $1,000 upon the note. He continued: "I needed money, and asked him for it. He told me to transfer the note. I afterwards borrowed one thousand dollars from Mrs. Windhaus, the plaintiff in this action. This lady and I went out to Bootz's park. I asked Mr. Bootz for the money. He told me he had the money, but he wanted to make some improvements, and wanted to keep as much money back as possible. I told him to pay as much as possible. He said he could pay two hundred dollars, and with the balance he wanted to build a shed. I asked her (Mrs. Windhaus) if she was satisfied. She said, 'If there is no help any other way, we have to be satisfied then.'" It seems the indebtedness was then transferred from Severin to Mrs. Windhaus, Bootz paying her $200, and giving her his note for $800, payable in 6 months. This transaction occurred September 12, 1882, and it appears that during the year 1882 he and his family were conducting a saloon, restaurant, and lodging-house upon Pine street, in the city of San Francisco, although the record is silent as to what capital was invested in that business. The plaintiff, Charlotte Windhaus, corroborated the testimony of the previous witness as to the facts occurring at the interview at Bootz's park, and further testified that after the $800 note became due she demanded its payment several times, without avail. She brought suit upon it May 10, 1885, recovered a judgment, and execution was issued August 21, 1886, and returned by the sheriff wholly unsatisfied.

The deeds to the various parcels of realty were deed of gift made by Adam Bootz to his wife and daughters, dated May 27, 1881, November 7, 1881, and April 8, 1882.

From the foregoing statement of the facts we are not disposed to disturb the finding of the court that "the transfers were made without any intent to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors." In the case of Judson v. Lyford, 24 Pac. Rep. 286, this court set aside such a finding of the lower court for lack of support in the evidence, but from a comparison of the evidence it can readily be seen that that case is not this case. Aside from other incriminating circumstances existing there, two all-controlling facts appear, which are not visible here, to-wit: Defendant conveyed away all his property, and at the time was practically insolvent. In the case at bar there is nothing to indicate but that respondent Bootz, at the time of these transfers, retained ample property to meet his obligations; neither is it shown that any other obligations were outstanding against him, nor that this indebtedness was more than a mere bagatelle as compared to his assets. Even conceding that the return of an execution nulla bona five years after these conveyances were made by Bootz would be some evidence that he was insolvent at the date of the transfers, still his acts subsequent to these transfers, in paying interest upon the note, and in paying a considerable portion of the principal, would seem to neutralize whatever effect could be given such fact. But, aside from that, we are unable to perceive any tenable ground upon which the presumption can be based "that a man insolvent now is presumed to have been insolvent five years ago." It can only be upon the principle that once a millionaire, always a millionaire; or once a bankrupt, always a bankrupt. In these pushing, busy times fluctuations in a man's financial condition are probably the general rule; and, aside from that, presumptions never run backwards. In Inhabitants of Hingham v. Inhabitants of South Scituate, 7 Gray, 232, the court said: "The law presumes that a fact, continuous in its nature and character, like domicile, possession, or seisin, when once established by proof, continues; and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, legally infers therefrom its subsequent existence. But we know of no rule of law which permits us to reason in an inverse order, and to draw from proof of the existence of present facts any inference or presumption that the same facts existed many years previously." See, also, Chandler v. Aqueduct, 122 Mass. 307.

Appellant insists that a voluntary conveyance is prima facie or presumptively fraudulent as against existing creditors but such is not the law in this state, however courts of others states and text-writers upon the subject may hold. We have had occasion in the recent case of Bull v. Bray, 89 Cal. 286, 26 Pac. Rep. 873, to give this and kindred questions very careful consideration, and appellant's position is not in consonance with the law as there declared. Indeed, such contention is directly antagonistic to that portion of section 3442 of the Civil Code which says: "Nor can any transfer or charge be adjudged fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration." Tbrekel v. Scott, 89 Cal. 353, 26 Pac. Rep. 879, decides that an allegation of fraudulent intent is indispensable to a complaint in this character of action. And section 3442 of the Civil Code declares that the question of fraudulent intent "is one of fact, and not of law." It therefore appears from these authorities and the section of the Code cited that presumptions of law as to the fraudulent intent of a grantor have no standing under the laws of this state.

Appellant insists that the court failed to find upon all the material issues raised by the pleadings. Conceding such to be the fact, no injury could result to her by such failure. The ultimate fact in this case was whether or not these transfers were made with intent to defraud creditors. All other issues revolved around that fact. Its determination controlled the judgment. It may be conceded that appellant is entitled to a finding in her favor upon every other issue, still such findings would not justify a contrary judgment. Porter v. Woodward, 57 Cal. 535; McCourtney v. Fortune, Id. 617; Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528, 9 Pac. Rep. 738; Dyer v. Brogan, 70 Cal. 136, 11 Pac. Rep. 589. For the foregoing reasons let the judgment and order be affirmed.

WHEELER v. BOLTON. (No. 12,641.)

EXECUTORS—LIABILITIES—FAILURE TO TAKE POSSESSION OF LAND—MEASURE OF DAMAGES—DUTIES.

1. In an action by a legatee against an executor for failure to take and hold possession of 72 acres of land claimed to have been left by her testator, it appeared that the inventory filed by defendant included the land as assets of the estate, and that it was appraised at $6,000; but it was shown that decedent had no right or title to 30 acres of the tract. Held that, if plaintiff was entitled to damages for the loss of the remaining 42 acres, it was error to take as a basis for computing such damages the value of the entire 72 acres, as appraised in the inventory.

2. Since an executor is chargeable with the entire estate of the decedent, the rule applicable to the loss of the personal estate by him should apply to the loss of the real estate also, and he should be charged with the value of the real estate at the time of its loss.

3. The facts that decedent had no title to 30 of the 72 acres claimed; that soon after his death the remaining 42 acres were seized and held by adverse possession; and that defendant had no funds in his hands belonging to the estate with which to prosecute a claim for recovery,—do not justify the recovery of punitive damages from defendant, in the form of compound interest on the value of the land at the time of its loss.

4. Prior to decedent's death, defendant purchased the Santillan grant to a tract of land embracing the 72 acres subsequently claimed by decedent, and afterwards, while executor, conveyed the entire tract, but neither he nor his grantee ever had possession, and the grant was worthless. Held, that such a conveyance by defendant in his individual capacity, since it could not transfer any interest belonging to the estate, was not a violation of official duty.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; M. A. EDMONDS, Judge.

Action by Margaret C. Wheeler against one Bolton, as executor of the estate of William L. Carman, deceased, for failure to take and hold certain real estate claimed by decedent. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from an order denying a new trial. Order reversed.

Daniel Rogers and Philip G. Galpin, for appellant. Cope & Boyd and Oliver P. Evans, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. William L. Carman died in San Francisco, September 7, 1850, leaving a last will and testament, by which he devised and bequeathed all his estate to the plaintiff, and appointed the defendant and one Adams his executors. The will was admitted to probate January 10, 1851, and on the 20th of that month the executors qualified and entered upon the duties of their office. Carman in his lifetime had caused to be surveyed a tract of about 72 acres of land in the form of a parallelogram, in the vicinity of Mission and Twenty-Third streets, in San Francisco, to which he made claim, and on which he made certain improvements. About 30 acres of this tract lay to the west of the San Jose road, and was subsequently ascertained to be included within the limits of the Noe grant, while the remainder, about 42 acres in extent, was a part of the pueblo lands of San Francisco, and outside of the lands covered by the Van Ness ordinance. After the executors had qualified, they caused an inventory of the assets of the estate, with an appraisal thereof, to be prepared and filed in the probate court, and in said inventory was included as a part of the assets of the estate "seventy-two acres of land at the Mission Dolores, to which the deceased had a pre-emption right," which was appraised at $6,000. The court finds that the defendant never had the actual possession of any part of the 72-acre tract of land, and it appears from the evidence that soon after Carman died one Green took possession of that portion lying to the east of the San Jose road, and that the same has since been held adversely by him, and those claiming under him. The court also finds "that at the death of said Carman, and for a long time thereafter, to-wit, until the first day of January, 1852, there was no adverse holding or possession of the said forty-two acres of said Carman tract lying to the east of said San Jose road, which could have prevented the defendant, as executor of said estate as aforesaid, from taking possession as such executor of the said last-mentioned tract of land." Prior to any claim by Carman of this tract of land, viz., April 11, 1850, the defendant had purchased the Santillan grant to a tract of land comprising about three square leagues, in the vicinity of the Mission Dolores, which embraced the lands subsequently claimed by Carman; and on the 13th of July, 1853, he conveyed this tract so purchased to one

George W. Wright by an instrument in which the sum of $200,000 was expressed as the consideration. It does not appear that any possession under this grant was ever had by the defendant, or taken by Wright under the conveyance to him, and the grant itself was subsequently adjudged to be fraudulent. June 30, 1852, the defendant filed an account in the probate court containing a statement of his receipts and disbursements in the administration of the estate, in which, under the heading of "Statement of property embraced in the inventory of the appraisers," was the item "seventy-two acres of land situate at the Mission Dolores, to which the deceased held a pre-emption right," etc., "valued at $6,000;" and under the heading, "Statement of disposition of the same property by the executors," was the item, "No disposition has been made of this property in consequence of a question of title now before the United States land commission." This account was settled and allowed by the court, July 12, 1852, and an order made canceling the bonds of the executors, and directing them to forward to the plaintiff the money in their hands ($61.06) belonging to the estate, which was done August 25, 1852. This was treated by the executors as a close of their administration of the estate, and nothing further was done therein until July 17, 1875, when, upon the petition of the plaintiff, the defendant (his co-executor having left the state) was cited to appear before the probate court, and render a final account in the matter of said estate. Such account was rendered by him, September 23, 1875, and was settled by an order of the court as of December 13, 1875. Thereafter, on the 17th of April, 1876, upon the petition of the plaintiff, the probate court made a decree of distribution in said estate, in which it "adjudged and decreed that the said real estate, as described in the inventory of said estate, and the account therein filed on the 10th day of June, 1852, be, and the same is hereby, distributed, to-wit, seventy-two (72) acres of land situated at the Mission Dolores, to which the deceased held a pre-emption right, be, and the same is hereby, distributed to Margaret C. Wheeler, sole legatee under and by virtue of the will of said William L. Carman, deceased." In its finding upon this point the court below, referring to the decree of distribution, states that in said decree "the plaintiff was adjudged to be entitled to the possession of said real estate, and the defendant required to surrender and deliver the possession of the same to the plaintiff;" but this portion of the finding must be disregarded, as it is contradicted by the terms of the decree itself, which is set out at length in the same finding.

The plaintiff commenced this action, December 23, 1876, to recover from the defendant the sum of $400,000, alleging in her complaint that the said 72 acres of land were then of that value, and were of the value of about $6,000 at the date of Carman's death, and that the defendant, "in violation of his duties as executor, did not safely keep, retain, and protect his possession of this land, but allowed and permitted himself to be dispossessed, and the property and title lost to the plaintiff." The action was tried by the court, and in its findings, in addition to the foregoing facts, the court found "that the said sum of $6,000 was the true value of the said claim of the said Carman to the said seventy-two (72) acres of land at the time of said appraisal and valuation, and at all times thereafter, to and including the 13th day of July, 1853," and found that the plaintiff had sustained damages for which the defendant is responsible in the sum of $109,000; stating in its finding that "the damages are estimated on the basis of six thousand dollars, ($6,000,) as the value of the claim or interest of the estate on the 13th day of July, 1853, and adding thereto legal interest from said day until the present time, computed with annual rests." Judgment was thereupon entered in accordance with the findings, a motion for a new trial made by the defendant was denied, and from the order denying a new trial the defendant has appealed.

The case has been before this court on two former appeals, the first from a judgment rendered on sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, (54 Cal. 302,) and the second from an order granting a new trial after a judgment of nonsuit, (66 Cal. 83, 4 Pac. Rep. 981.) As the present appeal is only from the order denying a new trial, we are limited in our consideration thereof to a review of the action of the court upon the grounds upon which the new trial was asked. Whether the conclusions of law are correctly drawn from the findings of fact, or whether the findings sustain the judgment entered thereon, can be examined only upon an appeal from the judgment. Nor are we required upon this appeal to determine what is the law of the case, as established by the opinions upon the former appeals, or whether the allegations of the complaint were sustained by the evidence offered at the trial, as neither of these questions has any relevancy in determining whether the court committed error in admitting or excluding evidence, or made its findings of fact without sufficient evidence to support them. Brison v. Brison, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 186.

The finding of the court "that the said sum of $6,000 was the true value of the said claim of the said Carman to the said seventy-two acres of land at the time of said appraisal and valuation, and at all times thereafter, to and including the 13th day of July, 1853," rests for its support entirely upon the valuation placed thereon in the inventory filed by the executors, and the statement thereof by the defendant in his account, filed June 30, 1852. The inventory itself was not offered in evidence, as it could not be found, nor was there any copy produced, although it appeared from one of the letters of the defendant to the plaintiff that he had sent her a copy. The court found, however, that the inventory was made and filed by the executors prior to June 30, 1852, and that in it they set forth as a part of the assets of said estate "seventy-two acres of land at the Mission Dolores, to which the deceased had a pre-emption right," and that the value of the land as stated therein was $6,900.

It must be considered that at the time when Carman caused this tract of land to be surveyed, and laid claim thereto, there was very great uncertainty, if not entire ignorance, concerning the character of title to any of the land in that portion of San Francisco. With the ideas brought with them from the older states, individuals sought to appropriate by possession whatever land they deemed necessary for themselves, a common idea being that 160 acres was the limit to any claim they might make. The witness Hoadley testified: "There wasn't any land in San Francisco but what there was a cloud about it, unless there was a few old Spanish grants made before the American occupation;" and again, "In those days a man took up what he could get, and hung onto it, and that is about the way of it. I suppose they got title the same as I did mine,—the 160 acres." Congress did not until March 3, 1851, pass the act for the purpose of settling land titles in California, and the pre-emption laws of the United States were not extended to California until 1853; nor was there any law, either state or federal, by which a person could acquire title to any of the public land. Although it was understood that Mexican grants had been made for lands in San Francisco, yet the boundaries of these grants were not defined, nor had their validity been established. The Santillan claim, which was then of great notoriety, although its validity was disputed, and it was afterwards rejected as fraudulent, covered the whole of this region. The Noe grant, above referred to, was not surveyed until after Carman's death, and it does not appear that it was at any time inclosed, or that there was anything to indicate its boundaries. One of the results of this uncertainty and ignorance of title was that those who sought to appropriate to themselves portions of what they may have supposed to be public land located their claims in part upon lands which afterwards proved to be within a Mexican grant, as was done by Carman in the present instance. The Carman claim for 72 acres appears to have always been treated as an entirety. There is nothing in the record to indicate that any distinction was ever made, either in value or character of title, in the life-time of Carman, or at any time afterwards, during the administration of his estate, between the portion included within what was afterwards determined to be a part of the Noe grant and the portion east of the San Jose road. It was included in the inventory, and valued by the appraisers as a single tract of 72 acres of land, and was valued as an entirety at the sum of $6,000. The finding that the tract on the east of the road was inclosed does not affect this proposition, for the court does not find that Carman inclosed this tract, and there is no evidence that Carman himself ever built or authorized the building of any fence or inclosure whatever. The court finds that he "caused to be surveyed and claimed to own" the 72-acre tract, and the witness Brown testified that at the time of his death the whole 72-acre tract was inclosed. The finding of the court that Carman was not the "owner of, nor seised or possessed of," any part of the 72 acres that was within the Noe grant relates to facts ascertained after Carman's death, and does not qualify the fact that he claimed the whole, or that he at all times supposed that his title to that portion of his claim was the same as his title to the other portion, or that the sum of $6,000, which the court takes as the "basis" for determining the damages chargeable against the defendant, was the value of his claim to the entire tract. At the date of the valuation it does not appear that it was known that any portion of the claim was within this grant, and the fact that it was named in the inventory and appraised as a 72-acre tract is a presumption that it was not so considered. The court, however, after finding that the original claim was for the 72-acre tract, and that in the inventory it was valued as an entirety at the sum of $6,000, finds that, as Carman was the "owner" of only the 42-acre tract, the liability of the defendant for negligence is limited to this 42-acre tract, but takes as the "basis" of this liability the valuation which was placed upon the 72-acre tract. In this the court erred. It is not necessary for us to determine upon this appeal whether, in an action by the heir against the executor after distribution, for a devastavit, the inventory filed in the probate court is competent evidence of the value of the property included therein, since we are satisfied for other reasons that the inventory was improperly considered by the court at the trial of the present cause. Upon the settlement of his accounts in the probate court the executor is chargeable "with the whole of the estate of the decedent which may come into his possession, at the value of the appraisement contained in the inventory," unless he shall exonerate himself, as provided by the statute, Code Civil Proc. § 1613. This inventory is, however, only prima facie evidence of the value of the estate, (Woerner, Adm'n, § 320;) and, as the inventory would be inadmissible as evidence of any matter not required to be expressed therein, so any valuation of property included therein would not be even prima facie evidence of the value of other property not therein specifically described or valued. In the present case, therefore, as the inventory offered related to a tract of land different in extent from that for which the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the value from the defendant, the question of the competency of a proper inventory does not arise.

The court finds that the defendant never had actual possession of any part of the 72-acre tract, and its finding that until the 1st day of January, 1852, there was no adverse possession of the 42-acre tract "which could have prevented the defendant, as executor of said estate, as aforesaid, from taking possession as such executor of the said last-mentioned tract of land," is equivalent to a finding that on and after the 1st day of January, 1852, there was such adverse possession, and that the defendant was thereby prevented from taking possession of the land. It is a general rule that the executor is prima facie liable only for such assets of the estate as come into his possession. Williams, Ex'rs, *p. 1667. If the heir seeks to charge him for negligence in not taking possession of property belonging to the estate, the burden rests upon the heir to establish such negligence. The liability of the executor for his negligence is measured by the detriment sustained by the estate therefrom. If Carman's acts in his life-time gave him no right to the portion west of the San Jose road, and his estate had no right thereto by reason of the fact that the land belonged to the Noe grant, it was not incumbent upon the defendant to attempt to get possession of it, and the value of that portion of the 72-acre tract could form no element in determining the damage sustained by his failure to obtain possession of the tract on the east side of the road. If the defendant was liable to the plaintiff in damages to any extent upon the facts shown at the trial,—and upon this point we express no opinion,—his liability was to be measured by the value of that portion of the land which was lost to the estate through his negligence, and it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to present competent proof of such value. If the estate lost only 42 acres of land, the defendant was not liable for the value of 72 acres, nor could such value be made the "basis" for estimating the damages chargeable to the defendant.

There was no evidence before the court of the value of Carman's claim to the 42 acres lying to the east of the San Jose road. The valuation of the 72-acre tract in the inventory was not susceptible of segregation for the purpose of fixing different values to different portions of the tract; much less could that valuation be applied by the court exclusively to the 42-acre tract. Taken by itself, the inventory could not form a basis for determining the value of the portion of the tract east of the road, and, in the absence of any other evidence on the subject, the court had no basis for its decision, and its finding in that respect is unsustained by the evidence. The testimony offered at the trial with reference to the value of the land at a later date, as well as the finding by the court of the value of the 42-acre tract in 1866, is immaterial, and need not be considered, as such value did not enter into the basis adopted by the court in determining the damage sustained by the plaintiff, nor would the value at that date be the measure of the defendant's liability for a loss which was sustained by the estate in 1853.

The court also erred in adding compound interest to the sum found to be the value of the property lost to the estate through the negligence of the defendant. The general rule applicable to an executor, as well as to any other trustee, is that, except in cases in which he has been guilty of some positive misconduct or willful violation of duty, he is not to be charged with compound interest. In cases of mere negligence, no more than simple interest is ever added to the loss or damage resulting therefrom. In cases where he has mingled moneys belonging to his trust with his own funds, and used them for his own advantage, courts have charged him with compound interest, upon the theory that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, he will be presumed to have received such profits from their use. Insurance Co. v. Lynch, 11 Paige, 520. This rule is of modern growth, and is applied more frequently in this country than in England. It has been adopted, "not for punishing the delinquent trustee, but for the purpose of attaining the actual or presumed gains, and to make certain that nothing of profit or advantage remains to the trustee, except, perhaps, his commission or compensation." Cruce v. Cruce, 81 Mo. 684. See, also, Story, Eq. Jur. § 1277; Perry, Trusts, § 471; Attorney General v. Alford, 4 De Gex. M. & G. 851; Jones v. Ward, 10 Yerg. 170; Barney v. Saunders, 16 How. 542; Hook v. Payne, 14 Wall. 257; Schlielfelin v. Stewart, 1 Johns. Ch. 620; McKnight v. Walsh, 23 N. J. Eq. 146. But, even in such case, if the executor can show that he has acted in good faith, and has not made any greater profit by the use of the funds, he will be charged only simple interest. Perkins' Estate v. Hollister, 59 Vt. 348, 7 Atl. Rep. 605. The rule charging him with interest is, however, limited to cases in which it is either shown or presumed that the executor has himself profited by his acts, or has been guilty of such willful misfeasance as to justify the court in requiring from him compensation therefor.

Whether, in any instance, the executor is chargeable with even simple interest, must be determined by the trial court from all the circumstances of that case. It cannot be said, as matter of law, that interest is to be added to the value of the property that has been lost by his neglect. The circumstances connected with its loss may so completely exonerate him from any charge of neglect that he would not be held liable for even its value, and his neglect may have been so technical that the court would not feel justified in requiring from him more than a restoration of the value of the property; and it has been held that the heir himself may have been so negligent in prosecuting his claim that the court would consider that the executor should not be charged with interest. Brinkley v. Willis, 22 Ark. 1. The Civil Code fixes the measure of damages for the willful conversion of personal property to be its value at the time of conversion, with interest from that date. Section 3336. If a purchaser of land is evicted by paramount title, his recovery of damages is limited to the purchase price, with interest, and he cannot recover for any enhanced value which the land may have in the mean time received. The negligence of the defendant herein was of no higher grade than a simple tort resulting from non-feasance, and for the breach of such an obligation the measure of damages is the amount which will compensate for all the detriment proximately caused thereby. Civil Code, § 3333. We have not been cited to any authority in which the liability of the executor for the loss of real estate has been determined. In many states the executor does not have the charge of the real property of his testator. In California, however, he is entitled to the possession of both real and personal estate. Both are placed by our statutes upon the same footing. Upon a settlement of his accounts in the probate court, the executor is chargeable "with the whole of the estate of the decedent which may come into his possession at the value of the appraisal contained in the inventory," except as he may be exonerated in the instances provided by the Code. Code Civil Proc. § 1613. The statute makes no distinction between real and personal estate, and we think the rule applicable, in case of the loss by him of personal estate, should have equal application to a loss of real estate. His liability cannot be any greater because relief is sought in another forum than it would be if determined by the court which has been especially constituted for settling his accounts. As his liability for the loss of personal property would be fixed at the date of the loss, so it must be for the loss of real estate. We do not think that the facts in the present case justify the application of any rule of punitive damages to the defendant herein. Inasmuch as, very soon after the death of Carman, Green took adverse possession of the 42-acre tract of land, and the defendant never had the actual possession of any part of the 72 acres, and it does not appear that the executor at any time had in his hands funds belonging to the estate with which he could prosecute a claim for its recovery, there is an entire absence of proof or presumption of advantage to himself, or of wanton neglect of official duty. It does not appear that the defendant was ever in possession of any portion of the land covered by the grant, nor was it shown that Wright, to whom he conveyed the same, or any one under him, ever took possession thereof; and it was shown that the tract in question was taken possession of very soon after Carman's death, and has since been held by other parties claiming under hostile claims. The conveyance by the defendant of his own land, or any grant by him in his individual capacity, could not transfer any interest which belonged to the estate of Carman. Under these circumstances we think the court was not justified in attributing an official neglect or violation of duty on his part to the connection of the defendant with or his acts relating to the Santillan grant. The court, however, fixes the date of his conveyance to Wright, viz., July 13, 1853, as the time when the land was lost to the estate, and also takes its value on that date, as found by it, to be the basis of the defendant's liability to the estate for the negligence by which such loss was sustained. This value was therefore the measure of the right of recovery for the defendant's negligence. Such liability would not be increased because 20 years elapsed after the loss had occurred. The plaintiff had the right to call the defendant to an account in the probate court at any time after the neglect by which the loss had occurred, and no facts are shown in the record excusing her from bringing her action immediately thereafter. Whatever liability the defendant had incurred was fixed at that date, and could not be increased by any neglect on the part of the plaintiff to call him to an account. The court below assumed this to be the correct theory of fixing the basis of his liability, but, as we have seen above, erred in determining the amount of such liability, and adding thereto interest compounded each year for upwards of 20 years. The order denying a new trial is reversed.

DUNLAP v. STEERE. (No. 13,997.)

VACATING JUDGMENT—SERVICE BY PUBLICATION—FRAUD.

Code Civil Proc. § 412, allowing service of summons by publication under certain circumstances, requires the plaintiff to present to the court a verified complaint or an affidavit showing that a cause of action exists against defendant. Held, that a judgment by default, quieting title to land in plaintiff, will be set aside by a court of equity, though the action is not brought till more than a year later, where defendant had no actual notice, and plaintiff had no title to the land, and knew that his affidavit, upon which service by publication was ordered, was false. MCFARLAND, PATERSON, and GAROUTTE, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; A. W. HUTTON, Judge.

Action by Dunlap against Steere to quiet title and annul a judgment. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wells, Guthrie & Lee, for appellant. Chapman & Hendrick, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The action is one in equity, and is in effect to set aside a former judgment between the parties, wherein the alleged title of the defendant herein to the land described in the complaint was quieted as against all claims of the present plaintiff. The findings of the court below show that this judgment was obtained by default, and upon a service of the summons therein by publication, and that the present plaintiff had no knowledge of the pendency of that action, or of the rendition of said judgment, until more than one year after its date. The court also finds, and the evidence is sufficient to sustain these findings, that in point of fact the plaintiff here was the owner of the property involved in that action, and that not only was the defendant here without title, but that he knew that the allegations of the complaint filed by him for the purpose of obtaining the judgment referred to were wholly false. The question, therefore, presented, is whether a judgment thus obtained is beyond the reach of successful attack in a court of equity. The legal effect of this judgment, if permitted to stand, is to divest plaintiff of all title to his property, in favor of one who has succeeded by a compliance with the mere forms of law in obtaining such judgment, and that, too, without the knowledge of plaintiff, and therefore when it was morally impossible for him to defeat it. We think the plaintiff is entitled to the relief which he asks, not only upon authority, but upon the plainest principles of justice. "In general, it may be stated that in all cases where, by accident or mistake or fraud or otherwise, a party has an unfair advantage in proceedings in a court of law, which must necessarily make that court an instrument of injustice, and it is therefore against conscience that he should use that advantage, a court of equity will interfere, and restrain him from using the advantage which he has thus improperly gained." Story, Eq. Jur. § 885. In order to justify the application of this rule, it must appear not only that the judgment against which relief is sought is unjust and unconscionable in itself, but that the person against whom it was rendered was not guilty of negligence in omitting to make his defense in the original action. The facts as found by the court below bring this case fully and clearly within the operation of the rule of equity just cited. In the first place the defendant practiced a fraud upon the court, as well as upon the present plaintiff, in procuring the order for the publication of the summons in the action referred to. Under section 412 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a plaintiff is entitled, under certain circumstances, to procure such an order; but, in order to be so entitled, he is required by that section to first present to the court or judge, either in the form of a verified complaint or an affidavit, a statement of facts showing that a cause of action exists in his favor against the defendant. Such an affidavit was presented by the defendant here in the action, which resulted in the judgment now sought to be set aside; but it necessarily results from the findings of the court that not only was the defendant's affidavit false in this respect, but that he knew that it was false. An affidavit of this character is always ex parte. The absent defendant is not present to impeach it, and if it is sufficient in form the court cannot disregard it, but is compelled to accept its statements as true, and make the order which is demanded. Under such circumstances a plaintiff who seeks to avail himself of the statutory mode for a constructive service of summons must exercise good faith in his representations to the court or judge. He must at least believe that the affidavit which he presents is true. The presentation of a willfully false affidavit for the purpose of obtaining an order for service of the summons by publication is itself an act of fraud; and when the judgment which rests upon it is itself unconscionable, and was obtained without the knowledge of the defendant therein, it should be set aside.

It is claimed, however, that the fraud here complained of is concluded by the judgment itself; that whether the defendant had a good title to the land in controversy was the very matter involved in the former action, and the judgment therein is conclusive upon the plaintiff; and in support of that the case of U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 61, and other similar cases, are cited. But the rule there announced is only applicable where the former judgment was the result of a trial between the parties, or where the one against whom the judgment was rendered had actual notice of the pendency of the action, and neglected to submit his proofs. The case just mentioned was one in which a retrial of an action which had been once fully tried was asked, and can have no kind of bearing here, where the plaintiff never had his day in court, or any opportunity to make his defense to the false and fraudulent claim upon which the judgment against him was based. Not having any knowledge of the pendency of that action, it was an absolute impossibility for him to protect his rights therein, and his failure to defend was not a negligent omission on his part. It is this difference in the facts which brings the plaintiff here within the protection of the exception to the general rule which was acted upon in U. S. v. Throckmorton, supra, and the existence of which exception was not only admitted in the opinion of the court in that case, but was afterwards applied in the later case of U. S. v. Minor, 114 U. S. 238, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 836. In the case of Adams v. Secor, 6 Kan. 542, it was held by the supreme court of that state that a judgment based upon a false and fraudulent claim should be set aside where the defendant therein had only been served by publication, and did not have actual notice of the pendency of the action. In Tomkins v. Tomkins, 11 N. J. Eq. 512, the court, while refusing relief upon the facts before it, recognized the justice of relieving a defendant from an unjust judgment obtained without his knowledge. It is there said: "The usual ground upon which a court of equity refuses to interfere with a judgment is because the defendant should have protected himself in the court where the judgment was obtained. In a case like the present, of foreign attachment, where the proceeding is in rem, and the judgment is obtained without the knowledge of the defendant, and the proceedings are all necessarily ex parte, it would be hard, indeed, if this court could not interpose to protect a party against the fraud of the plaintiff. The propriety of this court's interfering in such cases is too obvious to require its vindication." In the case of Irvine v. Leyh, 102 Mo. 200, 14 S. W. Rep. 715, and 16 S. W. Rep. 10, the supreme court of Missouri state what we deem the true rule to be applied here. After referring to the case of U. S. v. Throckmorton, supra, and other cases following it, the court say: "The principle thus so strongly stated in the cases cited proceeds upon the ground that the party had an opportunity to appear and interpose the defense in the suit in which the judgment complained of was rendered. The cases before cited are those in which the defendant in the first suit appeared, or had actual notice of the suit, and might have interposed the fraud as a defense. In all such cases the issues made by the pleading, or which might have been made, are justly regarded as settled and merged in the judgment, leaving collateral matters only open to investigation. But in our opinion the rule of the cases cited cannot be applied in all of its strictness to a case where the defendant has been brought in by newspaper notice only, and had no actual notice of the suit, and as a consequence had no real opportunity to defend. The rule must be applied to those cases where the reason upon which it is founded admits of its application. But, to entitle the plaintiffs to the relief which they asked and procured in the case, it is not enough for them to simply show that Leyh had no valid cause of action against them. They must at least show that the claim was founded upon or conceived in fraud, and that the machinery of the law was resorted to for the purpose of enforcing what was known to be a fraudulent demand." The facts found by the court here fully satisfy the rule as held in the case just cited. That rule, it seems to us, gives to one obtaining a judgment against another without a trial, and without his knowledge, sufficient protection. Its application to the facts of this case must result in an affirmation of the order appealed from. Appeal from judgment dismissed; order denying motion for new trial affirmed.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; HARRISON, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur. It appears that Dunlap was, without any fault of his own, deprived of the opportunity of interposing a perfect defense to the action of Steere v. Dunlap, and it is alleged in the complaint herein, and found by the court, not only that the allegations of the complaint in the former action were untrue, but that Steere at the time knew they were false. The evidence is sufficient to sustain this finding, at least so far as the complaint in the former action counted upon a title by prescription; but there is nothing to show that Steere in fact knew that his tax-title was void, though such knowledge is by the law imputed to him. The case, then, presents these features: Steere sues Dunlap upon a claim which he knows to be false. He obtains an order for publication of summons based upon the two grounds that Dunlap has departed from the state, and cannot after due diligence be found within the state. His affidavit is in itself sufficient to justify a finding that these grounds exist; and a judgment entered upon Dunlap's default, after publication of summons, is not void, and cannot be set aside upon motion unless the motion is made within a year. Code Civil Proc. § 473. Can it, then, be annulled by suit in equity after the year? I think it clear, on principle, that in a case where no rights of innocent third parties are involved a judgment so obtained ought to be set aside upon the ground that it was fraudulently obtained; the fraud consisting in taking a default judgment upon a claim made in bad faith against a defendant who, without any fault on his part, is prevented from interposing a perfect defense. The findings of the superior court, therefore, which are supported by the evidence, are themselves sufficient to support the judgment; and the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial should be affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent, and concur in the opinion of Commissioner VANCLIEF, prepared in department, a copy of which is hereto attached; and I desire to say further that, in my opinion, there is no sufficient evidence to support the latter part of the following finding of the court: "And the said John Steere was not then the owner of the said property, nor any part thereof, and had no right, title, or interest of any sort therein, all of which he well knew." In Steere's complaint in the original action, he first averred ownership and possession of the land, and afterwards also averred adverse possession in himself and grantors for five years; and it fully appears that he relied upon paper title founded on a certain tax-deed, as well as upon adverse possession,—if, indeed, he introduced any evidence at all about adverse possession, which does not appear. In the present action, Dunlap avers that the only claim which Steere had was a certain tax-deed, which he sets out in full in his complaint, together with the certificate of purchase which preceded it, in order to show that it did not, in law, convey title; the contention being that the deed, although good on its face, did not accomplish its purpose, because it did not follow the recitals of the certificate, and the recitals of the certificate showed an irregularity in the assessment. Assuming this to be the law, the attack upon Steere's deed is, at least, extremely technical; and it does not support the finding of fraudulent personal intent against him, viz., that "he well knew" that "he had no right, title, or interest of any sort" in the property described in his deed. The only other evidence tending to support the said finding relates to Steere's possession; and, assuming that it shows a want of adverse possession, under the views above expressed, there was no warrant for the general finding that he well knew that he had no right or interest of any sort. There are other reasons why, in my opinion, the former judgment should not be disturbed, but I consider further discussion unnecessary.

The following is the opinion of VANCLIEF, C., in department.

"Action to quiet plaintiff's title to two lots in the town of Santa Monica, in the county of Los Angeles, and for this purpose to annul a former judgment of the same court between the same parties as to the same lots, and to enjoin its execution. Judgment passed for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The judgment was rendered September 24, 1888, and the appeal from it was taken July 18, 1890, and should, therefore, be dismissed; but the appeal from the order was taken within sixty days from the time the order was made.

"The principal question, and the only one that need be considered, is, was the former judgment conclusive of the rights of the parties to the land in question? This question arises on the appeal from the order by defendant's exception to the sufficiency of the evidence. The former action was by the present defendant, Steere, against the plaintiff here, to quiet the alleged title of Steere to the lots in question; and the judgment therein was rendered against the defendant (plaintiff here) by default. The service of summons in that action having been made by publication, it is contended that the affidavit upon which the order of publication was made is defective and untrue in material particulars. The following is a copy of that affidavit: 'John Steere, being duly sworn, says: That he is the plaintiff in the above entitled action. That the complaint in said action was filed with the clerk of said court on the 25th day of June, 1884, and summons thereupon issued. That said action is brought to obtain a decree of said court quieting the plaintiff's title to that certain tract or parcel of land lying and being situate in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and particularly described as lots X and W, in block 193, in the town of Santa Monica, as designated on the map of said town. That in said decree it be declared and adjudged that plaintiff is the owner of said premises, and that the defendants, or either of them, have no estate or interest whatever in or to said land and premises. And affiant further says that said plaintiff is the owner in fee of said premises, and said plaintiff and his grantors have been for more than five years continuously in the open, notorious, and adverse possession of said premises, claiming the same adversely to all the world. That the defendants claim some interest in said premises adverse to plaintiff, but the said claims of defendants are without any right whatever, and that the said defendants, or either of them, have no right, title, or interest in said land or premises, or any part thereof. Reference is had to the verified complaint of plaintiff on file herein, in which the cause of action is fully set forth. That said defendant, R. T. Dunlap, cannot, after due diligence, be found within this state. That the said R. T. Dunlap has departed from this state, and cannot, after due diligence, be found within this state, and this affiant, in support thereof, states the following facts and circumstances: That the summons which was issued in said action was given to the sheriff of Los Angeles county, and said sheriff made diligent search for said defendant, R. T. Dunlap, but could not find him, and said sheriff informed affiant that he did not know where said defendant Dunlap was or where he could be found; that affiant has searched for said defendant, R. T. Dunlap, and has inquired of a great many of the citizens and residents of Los Angeles county—among them, M. B. Boyce, Wm. Flores, and John Milner—as to the whereabouts of said defendant, R. T. Dunlap, and as to his residence; that each of said persons so inquired of informed affiant that they did not know where said defendant, Dunlap, was, where he resided, or where he could be found; that said M. B. Boyce claims to be the agent of said R. T. Dunlap, but even he informed this affiant that he did not know where said Dunlap was, or where he could be found; that affiant does not know where said R. T.

Dunlap resides, where he is, or where he can be found; that affiant has made diligent inquiry to find said defendant, but cannot, after due diligence, find him within this state; that this affiant therefore says that personal service of said summons cannot be made on said defendant, R. T. Dunlap, and prays for an order that service of the same may be made by publication. JOHN STREERE.' The order of publication was in the usual form, requiring the summons to be published two months in a proper newspaper, and it was published as required by the order. More than one year after the rendition of the former judgment the defendant (plaintiff in this action) moved the court in which it was rendered to set it aside, and for leave to answer, upon his affidavit, stating substantially the same facts alleged in his complaint herein. This motion was denied, and no exception was taken to the order denying the same, and no appeal has been taken therefrom. As one of the express objects of this action is to set aside the former judgment, and to enjoin its execution, that judgment is fully set out in the complaint, and the judgment roll in that action was introduced as evidence in chief by the plaintiff. The defendant also pleaded the former judgment as a bar to this action.

"1. It appears that the former action was commenced by H. K. S. O'Melveny, as attorney for plaintiff, and that his name was indorsed on the summons as attorney for plaintiff; that before the order of publication was made an order substituting Messrs. Wells, Van Dyke & Lee as attorneys for plaintiff was made; but that the summons was published as originally issued, with the name of O'Melveny indorsed thereon as attorney for plaintiff. It is contended by respondent that the name of Wells, Van Dyke & Lee should have been indorsed on the summons as published, and that the omission so to indorse them is a fatal defect in the publication. The provision of the Code requiring the name of plaintiff's attorney to be indorsed on the summons relates to the summons as issued by the clerk, and was complied with in this case. As there is no requirement that the names of attorneys afterwards substituted for or added to the original attorney for plaintiff shall be indorsed on the summons, I think the summons was properly published in the form in which it was issued.

"2. No other defect in the form or substance of the affidavit is pointed out by counsel, and none is perceived; but it is alleged that the statements therein that Dunlap had departed from this state, and that, after due diligence, he could not be found within this state, are not true; and the court so found. The only evidence to sustain this finding is the testimony of the plaintiff, Dunlap, to the effect that, although he departed from this state in 1879, he returned to Inyo county, in this state, in the spring of 1881, where he openly and publicly resided and worked as a miner and farmer from that time until 1887; that he never during that time saw the newspaper in which the summons was published, nor had any actual notice of the publication of summons, or of the pendency of the former suit; that he left Mr. Boyce in charge of the lots when he departed from the state, but did not inform Boyce that he intended to leave, or where he was going; and that he never communicated with Boyce or any other person in Los Angeles county during his absence until 1887. This testimony has no tendency to prove that the affidavit was not made in good faith. The affidavit is sufficient to show that, 'after due diligence,' Dunlap could not be found 'within the state.' This, with the other facts therein stated, justified the order of publication. Code Civil Proc. § 412; Forbes v. Hyde, 31 Cal. 348; Ligare v. Railroad Co., 76 Cal. 610, 18 Pac. Rep. 777. The publication of the summons according to the order was service of it upon the defendant, having the same effect as if served by either of the other modes prescribed by the Code, (Code Civil Proc. §§ 413, 416,) except that in case of service by publication alone the defendant, on a proper showing, may be allowed to answer to the merits of the action at any time within one year after the rendition of the judgment. Id. § 473. After the expiration of one year the judgment by default, upon service of summons by publication, is just as conclusive as if it had been rendered upon personal service, and will not be opened or set aside by a court of equity except on the ground of fraud, accident, mistake, or surprise by which, without any fault or negligence on his part, the defendant was prevented from making a meritorious defense. U. S. v. Throckmorton, 98 U. S. 68; Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 67 Cal. 298, 7 Pac. Rep. 908; Amador C. & M. Co. v. Mitchell, 59 Cal. 179; Mastick v. Thorp, 29 Cal. 448; Boston v. Haynes, 33 Cal. 32; Phelps v. Peabody, 7 Cal. 52. Upon a sufficient affidavit the court found and determined that the defendant in the former action could not, 'after due diligence, be found within the state,' and so recited in the order of publication. This judicial determination of the fact is conclusive as against the mere testimony of the plaintiff that he was in Inyo county, in this state, at the time the former action was commenced, and when the order of publication was made, and that in his opinion personal service might have been made upon him there by the exercise of due diligence. There is no pretense that the plaintiff in the former action knew or had any reason to believe that the defendant was in Inyo county. Nor is there any evidence tending to prove that the acts of diligence stated in the affidavit were not performed, or to show fraud or bad faith on the part of the plaintiff in that action in procuring the order of publication. Nor is there any averment or evidence of any mistake, accident, or surprise, in the legal sense of those terms, by which the plaintiff herein, without fault or negligence on his part, was prevented from making his defense in the former action. That service of summons by publication is proper in an action to quiet title to land in this state was expressly decided in the late case of Perkins v. Wakeham, 86 Cal. 580, 25 Pac. Rep. 51.

"It follows that, for aught that appears by the record in this case, the former judgment is conclusive evidence that the appellant is the owner of the lots in question, and that the findings of the trial court to the contrary are not justified by the evidence. I think the appeal from the judgment should be dismissed, that the order denying a new trial should be reversed, and a new trial granted."

PATERSON, J. I dissent on the ground that the evidence does not justify the decision. I recognize the correctness of the rule stated in the cases cited by Mr. Justice DE HAVEN; but, to make it applicable, it should clearly appear from the evidence that the party charged with fraud deliberately commenced and prosecuted his action with the intent to defraud his adversary, and knowing that his claim was baseless in law and in fact. In this case the evidence, in my opinion, fails to show that the defendant, in prosecuting his action against Dunlap, acted in bad faith. His complaint was filed on June 25, 1884. Summons was issued on the same day, but the affidavit for publication was not made until February 7, 1885. This does not show great activity on the part of Steere in attempting to consummate the fraud with which he is charged. No wrong can be predicated upon the fact that the summons was published in the Weekly Censor. The judge decided the question as to the paper in which the summons should be published. The default of the defendant in that action was entered on May 18, 1885. This action was not commenced until November 30, 1887. Mr. Dunlap testified that he left Boyce in charge of the property at Santa Monica, as his agent, in January, 1878. There was a house on the property at the time, and the land was fenced. Plaintiff testified, also, that he received rent for the property only one year, and the reason why he made no inquiries about it was because he had lost the address of Boyce. This is a singular excuse, and shows great negligence. The town of Santa Monica is so small that probably every man in the town knows every other inhabitant thereof; and it would have been easy to discover the whereabouts of his agent, if he had made any inquiry. Boyce testified that the plaintiff left the property in his charge to sell, and meantime to collect the rents; that the last time he saw Dunlap was in January, 1878; that Steere took actual possession of the property, and made improvements on the house, in the fall of 1885. He testified further that Steere called upon him several times, and inquired very earnestly where Dunlap could be found; that he came to see about getting service on him; that Steere was inclined to push matters, and that he (Boyce) was a little indifferent about the matter; that Steere claimed to have a tax-deed for the property, and asked him (Boyce) how soon he could hear from Dunlap, and that he told him he thought he would hear from him in three, four, or five weeks, probably. Milner, under whom Steere claims, paid the taxes on the property for the years 1879-80, 1880-81, 1882-83, 1883-84; and, when the defendant purchased from him, he repaid the amount of taxes which Milner had thus paid. Milner's certificate of sale from the tax collector was dated March 4, 1879. The evidence is entirely consistent with the theory of the good faith of Steere in the prosecution of his suit. The circumstances show that he believed himself to be the owner of the land. He paid a valuable consideration for the tax-title, and he and his grantor paid the taxes assessed upon the land every year, except two, after 1878. If he had desired to perpetrate a fraud upon Dunlap, it is not at all probable that he would have importuned Boyce so often to discover the very fact which would have effectually prevented him from making the affidavit, and procuring the order for publication. It is said that it must be presumed he knew his tax-deed was invalid. I do not think any such presumption should be indulged; but, if it can, it certainly is not sufficient to convict him of a willful and deliberate attempt to defraud, when it is admitted or appears that he paid a valuable consideration for the tax-title, and endeavored in good faith to give the defendant in the action personal notice of the claim set up. The worst construction that can be fairly put upon the conduct of Steere is that he had a doubt as to the validity of his title, and sought the aid of the court to settle the matter in his favor. This he had the right to do. He knew that plaintiff was claiming through his agent the right of possession, and to collect the rents. There is no evidence that any one ever advised Steere that his tax-deed was invalid. Probably not one man in a thousand, outside of the profession, would have known that the deed was void. The question of ownership, and the question whether one has held adverse possession, are questions so mixed with law that a statement in relation thereto by a layman should not be regarded with great strictness.

McFARLAND, J. The brief of counsel for appellant is substantially a mere recapitulation of the general assignments of error as they appear in the bill of exceptions. It contains frequent general statements, such as that "the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision," that "the court erred" in making certain findings of fact, that the "court erred in finding certain conclusions of law," that the "court erred in making the decree," etc. But no reasons are given why the court erred, no views are presented as to the questions sought to be raised, and no authorities cited. Under these circumstances, we can hardly be expected to do the work of counsel, and elaborately hunt up and consider what counsel has not argued. Upon a cursory view of the record, we have noticed no material error for which the judgment should be reversed. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PETERSON V. KINKEAD. (No. 13,423.)

ESTOPPEL TO DENY LESSOR'S TITLE—PUBLIC LANDS.

Plaintiff had possession of a tract of public land for six years, and annually cropped the land, and made valuable improvements thereon, including a house 12 by 14 feet in size. Defendant acquired possession of plaintiff's house by a verbal lease from plaintiff, to whom he paid rent for a while, and then refused, and claimed the land for himself on the strength of his possession and "intention" to enter the same as a homestead. Held, in an action by plaintiff to recover possession of the premises, that defendant was estopped to deny plaintiff's title.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Benito county; J. F. BREEN, Judge.

Action by Peterson against Kinkead. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John L. Hudner, for appellant. N. C. Briggs, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action in the nature of ejectment to recover from defendant the possession of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 29, township 14 S., range 6 E., M., D. M., in the county of San Benito. The action was commenced December 13, 1888. The answer of the defendant, after denying all the allegations of the complaint, proceeds as follows: "And for another and further answer defendant avers that the land described in the complaint is public land of the United States, open to settlement under the homestead and pre-emption laws. That defendant is a citizen of the United States, over the age of twenty-one years, and a married man, having a wife and child. That defendant is now residing upon said land with a view and intent of entering the same as a homestead under said homestead laws, and of acquiring title thereto under said homestead laws. That said land is subject to a claim of the Southern Pacific Railroad, but for a valuable consideration said company will abandon and relinquish its said claim to said land, and the same will thereby become open to immediate entry under said homestead laws; and defendant, with his said family, is now residing upon said land in good faith, and with the intention of procuring said relinquishment of said railroad company, and of immediately thereafter entering the same as a homestead as aforesaid. And that any claim of said plaintiff to said land is in fraud of the right of said defendant to enter said homestead, and of the government of the United States, and of the right of the latter to said land, and its right to dispose of the same under said homestead laws." Judgment passed for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals from it, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The court found that the demanded premises "are a part of the government domain, and open to settlement under the homestead and pre-emption laws of the United States, subject, however, to the inchoate title of the Southern Pacific R. R. Company." That plaintiff "entered into possession of said land, under purchase of the 'right of possession' from one Hitchcock, about six years ago; said Hitchcock being at the time in the peaceable and exclusive possession thereof." That from the time of such purchase and entry until 1888 the plaintiff continuously cultivated about 10 acres of the land, taking therefrom annual crops of hay and grain. That, together with a larger tract of 80 acres, the land in dispute was inclosed by a wire and brush fence, "which, in connection with natural barriers, made an inclosure sufficient to turnstock. This inclosure was placed by plaintiff and his grantor, and has continuously, down to December 8, 1888, been maintained by plaintiff." It is further found that there was on the premises a small house, 12 by 14 feet in size, which was generally occupied by an employe of the plaintiff, and was occupied by one of them immediately prior to the entry of defendant and his family as herein-after stated. On August 15, 1888, the plaintiff verbally leased this cabin to the defendant from month to month, at a rent of three dollars per month, which the defendant agreed to pay, the plaintiff agreeing to make an addition to the cabin at a future time not specified, but which he never made. The defendant entered into possession of the cabin under this lease, and continued to occupy it until December 8, 1888, when he refused to pay any rent, and denied that plaintiff had any right to the demanded premises, and claimed them for himself as a settler thereon under the homestead laws of the United States; and the court finds that at the time of the trial he was residing upon the land "with a view and intent of entering the same as a homestead, and acquiring title thereto under said homestead laws," but that he has not taken any step for that purpose required by law, except as above stated. It does not appear what was the nature of the alleged "inchoate title" of the railroad company to the land, nor under what act of congress the railroad claimed, nor that any railroad was ever located under such act of congress. Nor does it appear that either party ever acquired any right whatever from the railroad company. Counsel for appellant states in his brief that the right of the railroad company to the land was declared forfeited by act of congress before the trial of this action, but he does not cite the act.

Conceding to the appellant that the land was public land, open to entry under the homestead and pre-emption laws of the United States, that he had the requisite qualifications to make a homestead entry, and that he intended to do so, yet for that purpose he had no right to enter or settle upon improved land in the actual possession of the plaintiff. Goodwin v. McCabe, 75 Cal. 585, 17 Pac. Rep. 705; McBrown v. Morris, 59 Cal. 65; Davis v. Scott, 56 Cal. 165. Even if he was not estopped from denying plaintiff's title by the lease under which he was permitted to enter and occupy, he is entitled to no advantage by having gained plaintiff's permission to enter and occupy as tenant, while he secretly intended thereby to obtain a possession adverse to plaintiff, for the purpose of enabling him to claim the land as a settler under the homestead laws, if such was his intention. If such an entry upon the land was not surreptitious, it was, nevertheless, obtained by his fraudulent deception, from which the law will allow him no advantage to the prejudice of the plaintiff. The defendant failed to connect himself with the government title, under the homestead laws or otherwise, even by his answer, which avers only that he "is residing upon said land in good faith, and with the intention of procuring said relinquishment of said railroad company, and of immediately thereafter entering the same as a homestead." There is no pretense that he had ever filed any affidavit with the register or receiver of the land-office, or that he had in any manner indicated to the government his intention to claim or enter the land under any law. Nor, indeed, does it appear from the findings or answer when he conceived the intention to claim the land under the homestead laws, it being alleged and found only that he had such intention at the time of filing his answer. It is to be presumed, therefore, that he entered into possession as tenant under the lease in good faith, as he professed to do, and that he conceived the intention to claim adversely to his landlord afterwards. This being the case, and having failed to connect himself with the government title, he is estopped by the lease from denying the plaintiff's title. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

NEWMAN v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (No. 13,561.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 15, 1891.)

PUBLIC LANDS—MEXICAN GRANTS—RIGHTS OF CITY IN PUEBLO LANDS—CONVEYANCES TO BONA FIDE OCCUPANTS.

1. In an action to recover land the complaint alleged that the city of San Francisco passed an order by which it granted all its title to certain lands referred to in the order to the persons in the bona fide actual possession thereof on March 8, 1866, and that this order was repealed by a subsequent order, which prescribed different terms on which the legal title to said lands was to be acquired by those who were in the bona fide possession thereof at such date; that this latter order was passed by the board of supervisors of the city without jurisdiction; that the conditions therein prescribed were oppressive; and that the act of the legislature ratifying it was unconstitutional and void. It was nowhere alleged that plaintiff ever complied with the terms prescribed by the second order, or that he was prevented from so doing by defendants. Held, that such complaint did not state a cause of action, as Act Cong. March 8, 1866, (14 St. at Large, p. 4,) entitled "An act to quiet the title to certain lands in the city of San Francisco," which relinquished to the city all the right and title of the United States to the pueblo lands in suit, directed that the land not theretofore granted to the city should be conveyed by the city to parties in bona fide actual possession thereof, in such quantities and on such terms as the legislature of the state of California might prescribe, the complaint failing to allege that the first order was ratified by the legislature.

2. The averments in such complaint that defendants acquired their deeds from the city of San Francisco by fraud and false evidence are immaterial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. A. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Action by B. B. Newman against the city and county of San Francisco and others to quiet title, and for other purposes. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. B. Newman, in pro. per. Geo. Flournoy, Jr., Newlands, Allen & Herrin, Haggin & Dibble, Olney, Chickering & Thomas, and Theodore H. Hittell, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The superior court sustained demurrers interposed by the several defendants to plaintiff's amended complaint, and thereupon entered judgment in favor of defendants. The plaintiff appeals.

The land described in the complaint is a part of the pueblo lands of the city of San Francisco, all the right and title of the United States to which was by the act of congress of March 8, 1866, (14 U. S. St. at Large, p. 4,) relinquished and granted to that city upon the following trusts, namely: "That all said land not heretofore granted to said city shall be disposed of and conveyed by said city to parties in the bona fide actual possession thereof, by themselves or tenants, on the passage of this act, in such quantities, and upon such terms and conditions, as the legislature of the state of California may prescribe." The complaint alleges that the plaintiff was in the bona fide actual and exclusive possession of the land described therein at the date of the passage of this act, and that on October 12, 1866, the city and county of San Francisco duly passed an order, known as "Order No. 733," by which said city "relinquished and granted forever to private proprietorship, irrevocably, all the right, title, claim, and interest which the said city then had, or ever had, or may thereafter acquire, in and to the lands in said order referred to, to the person and persons who were in the bona fide actual possession thereof on the 8th day of March, 1866." It is also alleged that this order 733 was repealed by another known as "Order 800," which prescribed different terms and conditions upon which the legal title to said lands was to be acquired by those who were in the bona fide occupancy thereof at the date of the passage of the act of congress of March 8, 1866. It is further alleged that this latter order was passed by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco without any jurisdiction or authority, and that the terms and conditions therein prescribed for acquiring title to said land were unconscionable and oppressive, and the act of the legislature ratifying it was unconstitutional and void. It is nowhere alleged in the complaint that plaintiff ever complied with the terms and conditions prescribed in order 800, or that he was prevented from so doing by any act of defendants; but it is charged in general terms that the defendants other than the city of San Francisco, their predecessors and grantors, by fraud and false evidence procured from the city of San Francisco deeds of the land in controversy, and judgment is demanded that the city and county of San Francisco now holds the legal title to said land in trust for plaintiff, and that the other defendants have no title thereto; that plaintiff be restored to the possession thereof, etc.

The facts alleged in the complaint are not such as to show that plaintiff has any legal or equitable title to the land therein described, and the demurrers thereto were properly sustained. Although plaintiff may have been in the bona fide occupancy of such land on March 8, 1866, as alleged, and, as such, one of the persons entitled to acquire the legal title thereto from the city of San Francisco under the act of congress of that date, and above referred to, still he was only entitled to do so upon complying with such terms and conditions as should be prescribed by the legislature of this state. This was so expressly adjudged in the case of Dupond v. Barstow, 45 Cal. 446. In that case the court said: "The act of congress in express terms conferred upon the legislature the right to prescribe 'the terms and conditions' on which the title should pass to the beneficiaries, and the quantity of land to which each should be entitled. The legislature partially performed this duty by ratifying and confirming order No. 800, and there can be no doubt that the order thereby became to all intents and purposes as definitely valid as though its provisions had been re-enacted by the legislature. Not having paid the taxes or assessment as provided in section eleven, the plaintiff has not performed the condition on which his rights as a beneficiary were made to depend." It is nowhere alleged in this complaint that plaintiff ever paid or tendered the assessment as required by order 800, and for this reason there is a failure to show, in the language of Dupond v. Barstow, supra, that plaintiff is "within the category of those who are entitled to the benefit of the statute." This omission is not covered by the general averment that the "terms and conditions" imposed by order 800, and ratified by the legislature, were oppressive, or that such act of the legislature ratifying that order was unconstitutional. That neither of these objections has any force is the necessary effect of the decision of Dupond v. Barstow, supra. The act of the legislature above referred to did not destroy any vested rights of plaintiff, as plaintiff acquired none under order 733, under which he claims. The "terms and conditions" upon which occupants were to secure the legal title were, by the act of congress, to be prescribed by the legislature, and not by the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco; and, as this order was never ratified by the legislature, it was ineffectual to confer any rights.

The plaintiff, having failed to show that he was entitled to acquire the land in controversy, or that he was prevented by defendants, or either of them, from complying with the conditions of the order ratified and adopted by the legislature of this state, is in no position to call in question the manner in which the defendants acquired their deeds from the city and county of San Francisco, and the averments charging them with having done so by fraud and false evidence are for this reason immaterial. De Toro v. Robinson, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 671, and cases therein cited. Judgment affirmed.

In re CROGHAN'S ESTATE. (No. 14,200.)

HOMESTEAD—RIGHT OF SURVIVOR.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 1474, providing that if the homestead was selected from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same, it shall vest, on the death of the husband or wife, absolutely in the survivor, a homestead selected by a husband from his separate property on his death vests in his wife, and is not affected by Civil Code, § 1265, and Code Civil Proc. § 1468, providing that, if property set apart for the use of a decedent's family be a homestead selected from the separate property of deceased without his consent, it shall go to his heirs and devisees, and that the court can set it apart for only a limited period.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; E. M. GIBSON, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Francis Croghan, deceased. Appeal of the heirs from an order of the superior court. Affirmed.

J. J. Roche, Wm. H. Metson, and D. I. Mahoney, for appellants. A. A. Moore and T. Z. Blakeman, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by certain brothers and sisters and children of deceased brothers and sisters of the deceased from an order setting aside absolutely to the surviving wife a certain homestead. There is no attack made on the general validity of the homestead in question. It was the family residence, was not of greater value than $5,000, a proper declaration had been made and recorded, and it was in all respects in law a valid homestead. But the contention of appellants is that it should have been set apart to the widow only for a limited period, after which it should go, by operation of law, to the appellants as heirs. The facts upon which this contention arises are these: (1) The said homestead was the separate property of the deceased; and (2) the declaration of homestead was made by the deceased himself. Upon these facts we are clear that the homestead vested absolutely in the widow as survivor, and that the order appealed from was right. It is impossible for a state of facts to be more completely covered by a statutory provision than are the facts in this case covered by section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section provides as follows: "If the homestead selected by the husband and wife, or either of them, during their coverture, and recorded while both were living, was selected from the community property, or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same, it vests, on the death of the husband or wife, absolutely in the survivor. If the homestead was selected from the separate property of either the husband or the wife, without his or her consent, it vests, on the death of the person from whose property it was selected, in his or her heirs, subject to the power of the superior court to assign it, for a limited period, to the family of the deceased." The contention is that section 1265 of the Civil Code and section 1468 of the Code of Civil Procedure are in conflict with said section 1474; and a good deal of reasoning is indulged in by counsel to show what the rule is when two different sections of the Codes are contradictory, and irreconcilably conflicting. But such is not the case here. The clear and explicit language of section 1474 deals in detail with the very identical case of a homestead on separate property, created by the owner of such property. The legislative mind, when enacting it, was directed specially to that particular kind of homestead; and its intent, thus directly and clearly expressed, is not to be taken as changed by other sections which use general language, and in which there is no direct reference made to a homestead carved out of separate property by the will of its owner. All the sections cited, when read together, clearly mean that when a homestead has been selected by one spouse out of the separate property of the other without the consent of the latter, then, upon the death of the one from whose property it was selected, it vests in his or her heirs, subject to the power of the court to assign it for a limited period to the family of the decedent; but when the selection has been "from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same," then it goes absolutely to the survivor. The cases cited by appellant do not establish any other doctrine. Order affirmed.

TREWATHA v. BUCHANAN GOLD MINING & MILLING Co. (No. 14,366.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 16, 1891.)

NEGLIGENCE OF FELLOW-SERVANT—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Defendant's employes were raised and lowered in its mine by means of a hoisting tackle, which was also used to hoist the débris from the mine. Plaintiff, about to get into the bucket, gave, as he claimed, the proper signal to the engineer for hoisting a man. The bucket was at first raised slowly, and then at a great speed, and was not stopped at the proper time, but was hurled against the sheave with such force that plaintiff was injured. The engineer testified that he heard the signal for raising rock, but knew there was something lighter than rock in the bucket, and could not explain why he had not stopped the engine at the proper time. He had run engines for several years, and there was no proof of carelessness on his part prior to the accident in question. Held, that the accident was due to the negligence of the engineer, and defendant was not liable therefor, under Civil Code, § 1970, providing that an employer is not liable to his employe for the negligence of a fellow-servant, unless he neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the fellow-servant.

2. A charge that if the bell and appliances used to signal the engineer were out of order, and defendant or its superintendent knew, or had the means of knowing, such fact, and plaintiff did not know, and did not have equally with defendant the means of knowing, this, and if plaintiff gave the proper signal, and the engineer, on account of the defect in the bell and other appliances, did not hear such signal, and for this reason hoisted plaintiff from the mine at such dangerous speed as to result in the accident in which plaintiff was injured, then the jury must find for plaintiff, is erroneous, because ignoring the rule of law that, where the proximate cause of the injury is the negligence of a fellow-servant, no recovery can be had.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; J. F. ROONEY, Judge.

Action by Samuel Trewatha against the Buchanan Gold Mining & Milling Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

James H. Budd and E. A. Rodgers, for appellant. I. M. Kalloch and F. W. Street, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for injuries received by him while he was employed in defendant's mine, known as the "Buchanan Mine," in Tuolumne county. It is alleged in the complaint that on the 3d day of June, 1889, the defendant was working its mine, and one James E. Donahue was the engineer employed by the defendant, and who at that time operated for the defendant its engine and hoisting tackle used upon and in connection with the main shaft of the mine to hoist the rock and débris therefrom, and also to raise and lower the miners and other workmen working at the various levels connected with the main shaft; "that at said time said Donahue was incompetent, negligent, and destitute of ordinary skill as an engineer, and the defendant at such time, and for a long time prior thereto, knew" such to be the fact; "that the defendant on the said 3d day of June, 1889, was guilty of further carelessness and negligence, in that it did willfully and knowingly neglect and fail to furnish said engineer with the necessary and proper appliances and means with which to properly and safely operate said engine and hoisting works, and defendant at said time knew that said engineer was not supplied with the necessary and proper appliances," etc.; that on the 3d day of June, 1889, while Donahue was so acting as engineer, plaintiff was in the employment of defendant, and was working in what is known as the "200-foot level," connected with the main shaft of the mine; and having occasion to go up to the surface of the mine, in obedience to defendant's directions, and after having given to the engineer due notice thereof, he "got into the bucket connected with the said hoisting tackle, whereupon said engineer, by means of said imperfect and unsafe appliances made use of by said defendant in connection with and for the purpose of operating said engine and hoisting tackle, proceeded to hoist plaintiff from said 200-foot level to the surface; and the said Donahue, engineer as aforesaid, negligently, carelessly, and wantonly did hoist said plaintiff from said 200-foot level with such wrongful, unlawful, and dangerous speed that the bucket in which plaintiff had placed himself as aforesaid was thrown with great violence against and over the sheave," whereby plaintiff was greatly injured, etc. The answer denied all the material averments of the complaint, and alleged that any injuries sustained by plaintiff were caused by his own negligence. The case was tried before a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of the plaintiff for $4,000 damages. The defendant moved for a new trial on the ground that the verdict was not justified by the evidence, and that errors in law were committed by the court. The motion was denied, and this appeal was then taken from the judgment and order.

It appears from the evidence that the hoisting-engine was on the surface of the ground, and about 40 or 50 feet from the mouth of the shaft. The hoisting rope or cable was fastened to a drum, which was revolved by the engine, and ran thence over the sheave or pulley to and into the shaft. The sheave was about 30 feet above the mouth of the shaft, and the bucket was attached to the end of the rope, and by it let down into and drawn up from the mine. At the surface of the ground was a platform where men riding up and down got out of or into the bucket, and 6 or 7 feet above the surface was another platform where the rock and dirt brought up was dumped. The methods of working the engine were simple and easily learned, and Donahue had been working it as engineer, on the night shift, since October, 1888. In the mine were five levels, from which drifts ran out, and the bucket was used to hoist from the different levels rock and waste and the laborers employed there. Extending up through the shaft from the lower level was a cord which was attached to a bell hung near the engine. By pulling this, the bell was rung, and certain known signals given to hoist or stop or lower the bucket, and also to indicate whether the load to be hoisted was a man or rock. The signal from the 200-foot level to hoist a man was three bells, and, after a little interval, a fourth one. About the engine and platforms lights were kept burning at night to enable the engineer to see the machinery and watch all the movements. The plaintiff was at work at the 200-foot level of the mine on the night shift, and a little after 12 o'clock had occasion to go to the surface. The bucket was going down the shaft, and was stopped at the 200-foot level. Thereupon the plaintiff got into the bucket, and, as he says, gave the proper signal to hoist him. The bucket started up, and for about 40 feet rose slowly. It then began to go fast, and the plaintiff tried to reach out his hand and catch the cord to signal the engineer to stop it, but whether he succeeded in doing so he does not know. It continued to rise rapidly, and, instead of stopping at one of the platforms where it should have stopped, was hurled up against the sheave, and broken loose. The plaintiff was thrown down, and badly injured.

The engineer was called as a witness for plaintiff, and testified: "The bell I got to hoist was one bell, which indicated that I should hoist anything but a man. * * * When the one bell to hoist was given I commenced slowly. I always commence slowly, to see that the bucket is not caught. Then I increased speed. I knew at the time I had something lighter than rock. Unless a man is aboard, no matter what is in the bucket, I hoist fast. I turned on the steam when I hoisted Trewatha as though for rock: had no idea a man was aboard. I failed to stop the engine; why, I don't know; it was done so quick." And on cross-examination the witness said: "Don't know what caused the accident. I started slowly, as usual. Had no idea a man was in, and turned on steam as if I was going to raise ore. Had I known a man was in the bucket, I would have hoisted slow. I don't know whether I tried to stop the engine or not before it ran the bucket into the sheave. There was nothing to prevent my stopping it, however."

1. That the injuries sustained by the plaintiff were caused by the negligence of the engineer is very clearly shown by the evidence, and the first question is, can the plaintiff recover damages for injuries so caused? Section 1970 of the Civil Code provides: "An employer is not bound to indemnify his employe for losses suffered by the latter in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business in which he is employed, nor in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer in the same general business, unless he has neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employe." The engineer was a fellow-servant with the plaintiff, employed by the same employer, in the same general business, and the evidence wholly fails to show that there was any neglect to use ordinary care in his selection. He had been engaged in running an engine for some years, and there was no proof that he had been careless in attending to his duties prior to the night of this accident. It follows, in our opinion, that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover on the ground that his injuries were caused by the negligence of the engineer. See Collier v. Steinbart, 51 Cal. 116; McLean v. Mining Co., 1d. 255; Congrave v. Railroad Co., 88 Cal. 360, 26 Pac. Rep. 175.

2. It is said in respondent's brief: "It is apparent from the allegations of the complaint that the injuries received by plaintiff were occasioned by the combined carelessness and negligence of the defendant in not supplying the necessary and proper appliances and means with which to operate the engine and hoisting tackle, and carelessness of an engineer known by the defendant to be negligent and careless;" and it is claimed that the evidence as to the defective appliances was sufficient to justify the verdict. The appliances referred to were the lights about the engine and platforms, and the signal bell and its attachments. As to the sufficiency of the lights, the evidence was somewhat conflicting, but the engineer testified: "Question. Had you sufficient light to run by? Answer. Yes, sir. Q. The accident on this occasion was not due at all to the lack of light? A. No; I don't think it was. I had sufficient light to run by." As to the bell, it was proved that the attachments sometimes got out of order, so that it did not always ring when the cord was pulled; and it was claimed by the plaintiff that as he gave, or attempted to give, the proper signal to hoist a man, namely, three rings and then one, the engineer heard but one ring, the attachments must have been out of order at that time, and hence the engineer was put off his guard, and the injury resulted. And, in accordance with this theory, the court, at the request of plaintiff, instructed the jury as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the bell situated at or near the top of the main shaft of the Buchanan mine, with its appliances and appurtenances used by the miners and others in giving signals to the engineer in charge of the engine and hoisting tackle, was not in proper working condition, and did not all times give the signal intended when the rope was properly pulled for that purpose, and that the defendant, or its superintendent or foreman, knew, or had the means of knowing, of said defect in said bell and its appliances, and that the plaintiff did not know, and had not equally with the defendant the means of knowing of such defect in said bell or its appliances and appurtenances, and if you further find from the evidence that, by reason of said bell not working properly, said Donahue was not able to determine the true signal given by the plaintiff, and that plaintiff did give the right signal for the hoisting of a man from the mine, and that, by reason of said bell not giving the signal as rung by plaintiff, said Donahue hoisted the plaintiff from said mine with dangerous speed, and threw the bucket in which plaintiff had placed himself with great force against the sheave, whereby plaintiff was mangled, bruised, wounded, and injured, then you must find for the plaintiff." We do not think the verdict and judgment can be sustained, even if it be admitted that the appliances complained of were as defective as it is claimed they were. The immediate and proximate cause of the injury sustained by plaintiff was very clearly shown to have been the negligence of his co-employee; and this, as we understand it, is in substance the averment of the complaint. Nothing but carelessness can account for the fact that the engineer allowed the bucket to be hurled against the sheave, 23 feet above the upper platform, whether he supposed he was hoisting a man or something else. But the rule is that, where the promoting cause of the injury is the negligence of a fellow-servant, no recovery can be had, even though the machinery or appliances be defective. This was so declared in Kevern v. Mining Co., 70 Cal. 394, 11 Pac. Rep. 740, where the court said: "'The proximate cause of the injury is the object of inquiry, and when discovered must be regarded and relied on.'" Hayes v. Western R. Corp., 3 Cush. 274. Even where machinery is defective, so that otherwise a recovery might be had for an injury received, yet, if the promoting cause of the injury is the negligence of a fellow-servant, no recovery can be had. Wood, Mast. & S. p. 812. The same rule must apply where the appliances for doing work are defective." The instruction quoted ignores this rule, and was therefore misleading and erroneous. We advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

Rehearing granted.

HUGHES v. CANNEDY. (No. 14,292.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 16, 1891.)

TAX-DEED—SUFFICIENCY—NOTICE OF SALE.

1. Under Pol. Code, § 3776, relating to delinquent taxes, which provides that the collector must make out a certificate specifying, among other things, "the time when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed," and under section 3786, which provides that "the matters recited in the certificate of sale must be recited in the deed," a tax-deed which fails to recite the time when the purchaser would become entitled to a deed is void.

2. Under Pol. Code, § 3785, which provides that the purchaser of property sold for delinquent taxes shall, in case the property is unoccupied, post upon it, in a conspicuous place, a written notice "stating that said property, or a portion thereof, has been sold for delinquent taxes, giving the date of sale, the amount of property sold, the amount for which it was sold, the amount then due, and the time when the right of redemption will expire," etc., a notice which fails to state that the property has been sold for delinquent taxes, or to give the date of the sale, or the amount for which the property was sold, is fatally defective.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county; C. H. GAROUTTE, Judge.

Action by Cormack Hughes against W. J. Cannedy to quiet title and to cancel a tax-deed. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Ball, for appellant. Clark & Aram, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. This is an action to quiet plaintiff's title to lots 19 and 20, in block 10, in the town of Winters, county of Yolo, and to cancel a tax-deed issued by the tax collector of that county to the defendant in pursuance of a delinquent tax-sale theretofore made by him of the property in question. The complaint, which is unverified, alleges ownership in fee and possession of the lots by plaintiff, and the adverse claim of an estate or interest therein by defendant, the nature of which is, in brief, as follows: The purchase of the lots by defendant on the 24th day of February, 1886, at a delinquent tax-sale made by the tax collector of Yolo county, and the unauthorized issuance by him, in pursuance thereof, of a deed to defendant to said lots on the 24th day of February, 1888, which deed was duly recorded, and is alleged to be a cloud on plaintiff's title. The answer contains a general denial of the allegations of the complaint, and avers title in the defendant under the tax-deed therein described. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. From the evidence, only a part of which is brought up by the record, it appears that at the time the property in question was sold for delinquent taxes to the defendant the undisputed title thereto was in one Hayes; that it had been redeemed from the operation of the tax-sale by respondent, for his sole use and benefit, before the time for redemption had expired, and that his sole right to redeem was derived from an unrecorded mortgage given by Hayes to respondent 10 or 12 years before to secure the payment of a debt; that subsequent to his redemption as such mortgagee, and prior to the issuance of the tax-deed to the defendant, plaintiff acquired by purchase the title of Hayes to the property; that said property was purchased by defendant at a delinquent tax-sale thereof made by the tax collector of Yolo county on the 24th day of February, 1886, and on the 10th day of March, 1887, the defendant being unable to find the owner, he posted on the premises the following notice of his application for a deed: "Notice. All whom it may concern will take notice that I have purchased at tax-sale the following described real estate, situated in the county of Yolo, state of California, to-wit, lots 19 and 20, block 10, in the town of Winters, and that I will on the 25th day of April, 1887, apply to the tax collector of said county for a deed of the whole of said real estate, unless the same is before that day redeemed. The amount necessary to effect such redemption is the sum of $6.39. W. J. CANNEDY. Winters, March 7, 1887." Afterwards, when he applied to the tax collector for the deed, he made and filed with that officer the following affidavit, to which was annexed at the time a copy of the foregoing notice: "State of California, county of Yolo—ss: On the 21st day of November, A. D. 1887, personally appeared before me W. J. Cannedy, who, being first duly sworn by me, deposed and said that he is the identical W. J. Cannedy who, on the 24th day of February, 1886, became the purchaser at tax-sale of lots 19 and 20, block 10, of the town of Winters, in the county of Yolo, state of California, and that thereafter, on the 10th day of March, A. D. 1887, he posted up on said premises, in a conspicuous place, a notice, of which the annexed is a true copy, and the said premises were unoccupied at the time, and have remained unoccupied ever since. W. J. CANNEDY." Thereupon, on the 24th day of February, 1888, the sheriff and ex officio tax collector of the county issued to the defendant a deed to said lots, which, among other things, contained the following recital: "Whereas, the said R. H. Beamer, tax collector, as aforesaid, thereupon made out in duplicate a certificate of said sale, containing the matters required by law, and on said day delivered one copy of said certificate to said purchaser, and filed the other with the recorder of said county." This is not a substantial recital of the matters required to be contained in the certificate of sale. No objection is made to the regularity of any of the proceedings prior to and including the sale of the property for delinquent taxes, but some of the proceedings subsequent to the sale are claimed to be so materially defective as to vitiate and render void the tax-deed. Section 3776 of the Political Code provides that, "after receiving the amount of the taxes and costs, the collector must make out in duplicate a certificate, dated on the day of sale, stating (when known) the name of the person assessed, a description of the land sold, the amount paid therefor, that it was sold for taxes, giving the amount and the year of the assessment, and specifying the time when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed." And section 3786 provides that "the matters recited in the certificate of sale must be recited in the deed." The certificate of sale is not before us, but the Code expressly declares what matters it shall contain, and, among them, that it shall specify the time when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed. There is no such recital in the tax-deed. The deed is therefore void. Anderson v. Hancock, 64 Cal. 456, 2 Pac. Rep. 31; Grimm v. O'Connell, 54 Cal. 522.

The other defect insisted upon, which is also fatal, arises out of the issuance of the deed to defendant without any notice having been served or posted as required by the provisions of section 3785 of the Political Code.¹ The notice of defendant's application for a deed, which was posted on the premises, and which is above set out in full, is fatally defective, because it fails to state that the property had been sold for delinquent taxes, or to give the date of the sale, or the amount for which the property was sold. Hence it follows that he was not entitled to a deed, and that the one issued to him by the tax collector was issued without authority, and is therefore nugatory and void. Landre-

¹ Pol. Code, § 3785, provides that "the purchaser of property sold for delinquent taxes, or his assignee, must * * * serve upon the owner of the property purchased * * * a written notice stating that said property, or a portion thereof, has been sold for delinquent taxes; giving the date of sale, the amount of property sold, the amount for which it was sold, the amount then due, and the time when the right of redemption will expire, etc. In the case of unoccupied property a similar notice shall be posted in a conspicuous place upon the property," etc.

We would add in conclusion that as the alleged mortgage lien of plaintiff, under which alone he claimed the right to redeem, was absolutely extinguished by the lapse of time before the tax-sale was made, it follows that he was not such a party in interest as was entitled to redeem under section 3780 of the Political Code. Section 2911, Civil Code; Wells v. Harter, 56 Cal. 342; Henderson v. Grammar, 66 Cal. 335, 5 Pac. Rep. 488. But the court having found in its decision that plaintiff is the owner in fee, and in the possession of the lots in controversy, the right of redemption continues in him indefinitely until a notice is given and a deed applied for in accordance with the provisions of section 3785 of the Political Code. We recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

FORRESTER et al. v. SCOTT. (No. 13,863.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 17, 1891.)

PUBLIC LAND—RAILROAD COMPANIES—CONFLICTING LAND GRANTS—LOCATION—NECESSITY OF PATENT.

1. In an action to enjoin defendant from maintaining a ditch upon certain land, plaintiffs claimed title to the land under a grant from the United States to the S. P. R. Co. under Act Cong. March 3, 1871, § 23. The rights and limitations of the grant were the same as those of the grant to the S. P. R. Co. by Act Cong. July 27, 1866, except there was a provision that the grant should not affect or impair the present or prospective rights of the A. & P. R. Co. It was admitted on the trial that the land in suit was within the primary limits of the grant of March 3, 1871, but it was contended that the land did not pass to the S. P. R. Co., because it was subject to the prospective rights of the A. & P. R. Co. Held, that the land was never subject to any right of the A. & P. R. Co. U. S. v. Railroad Co., 39 Fed. Rep. 182, followed.

2. It appeared that a map of the definite location of the line of the S. P. R. was filed with the commissioner of the general land-office; that the road was completed and accepted by the commissioners, and the report approved by the president of the United States; and that all the conditions of the grant were performed prior to defendant's digging the ditch. Held that, although no patent was issued, the S. P. R. Co. had the legal title to the land at the time the ditch was dug, since the grant was in presenti.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by E. H. Forrester and Southern Pacific Railroad Company against J. A. Scott to enjoin defendant from maintaining and using a ditch, etc. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Waters & Gird and Byron Waters, for appellants. H. C. Rolle, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. It is alleged in the complaint in this action that in May, 1886, the defendant wrongfully excavated a water ditch upon and across the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of section 19, township 1 N., range 5 W., San Bernardino base and meridian, then and now the property of the plaintiffs. The prayer of the complaint is that defendant be enjoined perpetually from maintaining or using the ditch upon the land described, and that the ditch be abated, etc. Judgment passed for the defendant, and plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The court found that the plaintiffs were never the owners of nor entitled to the possession of the land described, or any part thereof. Whether or not this finding is justified by the evidence is the only question presented or necessary to be considered on this appeal.

The plaintiffs claim title to the land under a grant of the United States to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, on March 3, 1871, evidenced by the 23d section of an act of congress of that date, entitled, "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes." 16 St. at Large, 573. This grant was made in aid of the construction of a branch line of road from "Tehachapi Pass, by way of Los Angeles, to the Texas Pacific Railroad at or near the Colorado river." The rights, privileges, conditions, limitations, and restrictions of this grant were the same as those of the grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by the act of July 27, 1866, entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the states of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific coast," (14 St. at Large, 292,) except that it contained an express proviso "that this section (23) of the act of March 3, 1871, shall in no way affect or impair the rights, present or prospective, of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, or any other railroad company." It was admitted on the trial that the land in suit is within the primary (20 miles) limits of said grant of March 3, 1871, to the Southern Pacific Company, and also within the indemnity (30 miles) limits of the grant to the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, but not within the primary (20 miles) limits of the latter company. Also, that each of these railroad companies accepted the grant made to it according to the terms and provisions of said acts of congress of July 27, 1866, and of March 3, 1871. Also, that more than 1,000 acres within the primary limits of the Atlantic & Pacific Company's grant had been sold and disposed of by the United States prior to the date of said grant, for which no indemnity has been selected; that the Atlantic & Pacific Company never constructed any railroad in the state of California; and that the Southern Pacific Company did construct that section of its road adjoining the land in controversy within the time designated in said acts of congress, which section of the road was accepted by the commissioners of the United States, and that their acceptance was approved by the president of the United States, as provided for in said acts. The plaintiffs proved by proper official certificates of the register and receiver of the United States land-office at Los Angeles, Cal., and of the United States surveyor general, that prior to April 5, 1885, and after the construction of its road as aforesaid, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company selected the land in question, with other lands, for patent, and filed a list thereof with said register and receiver, amounting to $181.50 on the whole list; and also, on April 4, 1885, paid to the surveyor general of the United States for the state of California the sum of $489.24, as cost of survey, and $163.08 for office work, which sums were in full of the costs of survey and office work for the lands described in said list. The plaintiffs also proved its contract to sell the land in question to the plaintiff Forrester for the sum of $2,400, to be paid in installments, the first of which—$614.40—was paid in advance. This contract was dated January 3, 1885. The defendant makes no claim to the land, and there is no question that plaintiffs are entitled to the relief prayed for if they owned the land when this suit was commenced.

1. It is contended that the land in question did not pass to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by the act of March 3, 1871, because it was then subject to the prospective rights of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company by the effect of the proviso contained in section 23 of that act, above set out. It is unnecessary to discuss the merits of this point, since it was fully considered and overruled by the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of California in the case of U. S. v. Railroad Co., 39 Fed. Rep. 132, wherein it was expressly decided that the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company never had either a present or prospective right to any indemnity or lieu lands within the state of California. This decision was rendered (May, 1889) on a demurrer to the complaint, which stated all the facts and acts of congress relative to the rights of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company substantially as they appear in this case. A final decision on the merits as disclosed by the pleadings and evidence was rendered in the same case in June, 1891, (46 Fed. Rep. 683,) which establishes a perfect title in the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to all odd sections of land within the primary limits of the grant of March 3, 1871, not within the exceptions to that grant, upon substantially the same state of facts admitted and proved in the case at bar, except that no patent appears to have been issued for the land in question in this suit.

2. It appears in this case, by the admissions of the parties and uncontradicted evidence, that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company had performed on its part all the conditions of the grant of March 3, 1871, necessary to entitle it to a patent for the land in suit, prior to the 5th day of April, 1885, and more than one year prior to the digging of the ditch in question by the defendant. A map of the definite location of the line of the road was filed with the commissioner of the general land-office on April 3, 1871. The road (branch road) was completed and accepted by the commissioners in December, 1877, whose favorable report was afterwards approved by the president of the United States. A patent for the land was demanded, and the costs of survey and fees for office work were paid, as above stated, on April 4, 1885. There is no pretense that the land falls within any exception to the grant other than the proviso in favor of the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company, above considered and disposed of.

From the foregoing facts it follows, as matter of law, that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company had the legal title to the land in suit before and at the time the defendant dug the ditch in question by virtue of the congressional grant of March 3, 1871, though no patent has been issued. That grant was in present, the words of it being, "that there be and hereby is granted," etc.,—sections 3, 18, Act July, 1866, (14 St. at Large, 292;) and section 23, Act March 3, 1871, (16 St. at Large, 573,)—and attached itself to the particular piece of land in suit on April 3, 1871, when the map of the definite location of the road was filed in the office of the commissioner of the general land-office. Denny v. Dodson, 32 Fed. Rep. 899; Rutherford v. Greene's Heirs, 2 Wheat. 196; McLaughlin v. Menotti, 89 Cal. 354, 26 Pac. Rep. 880. In Denny v. Dodson it was decided that the plaintiff was entitled to recover in an action of ejectment upon a title similar, in all respects, to that of the plaintiff in this action, derived from the congressional grant of July 2, 1864, to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, (13 St. at Large, 367.) I think, therefore, that the finding of the trial court in this case that "the plaintiffs were not, nor was either of them, at the commencement of this action, * * * or at all, the owners or owner, nor entitled to the possession, of the premises" described in the complaint, is not justified by the evidence, and that for this reason the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial ordered.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE v. MORGAN. (No. 20,801.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 18, 1891.)

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was accused by information in the court below of the offense of petit larceny and two prior convictions of felony. Upon arraignment he pleaded guilty to the charge, and confessed the prior convictions. He was thereupon sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of four years. The case comes here by appeal upon the judgment roll alone. As the record herein is barren of any question involving any merit, we do not deem it necessary to discuss the points raised by appellant. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. AH TEUNG. (No. 20,826.)

CHINESE RESTRICTION ACT—IMPRISONMENT—ESCAPE—RESCUE.

1. Under Act Cong. Sept. 13, 1888, (25 St. 476,) which provides that any Chinese person found in the United States may be brought before a commissioner, and, when adjudged not entitled to be or remain in the United States, shall be removed to the country whence he came, and Rev. St. U. S. § 787, which authorizes a marshal to execute process in the district wherein he was appointed, a Chinaman could not be lawfully imprisoned in a county jail in the northern district of the state by a deputy-marshal of the southern district on a finding of a United States court commissioner of the latter district, which, after reciting certain facts, declared that "now, therefore, from the foregoing facts, I find that the said" Chinaman "was found unlawfully within the United States, and that he is not lawfully entitled to be in or remain" therein.

2. Where one was unlawfully imprisoned, it was lawful for another, without violence, to assist in his escape.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; E. M. GIBSON, Judge.

Ah Teung was convicted of assisting Lee Yick, to escape from imprisonment, and appeals. Reversed.

James F. Smith, Smith & O'Keefe, and J. J. Wests, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to the state-prison for the term of five years for the crime of assisting one Lee Yick, confined in the county jail of Alameda county, to escape therefrom. From this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant has appealed to this court. Upon the trial the defendant requested the court to give the following instruction, which was refused: "It is not unlawful for one who is restrained unlawfully, and without authority and process of law, to withdraw from his place of confinement, and depart therefrom. Such departure is not an escape, within the meaning of the law. And so, likewise, when one assists, without violence, a person who is confined without any authority of law, and without any process of law, to depart from his place of confinement." It appears from the evidence that Lee Yick, whom the defendant is accused of assisting to escape, was, with the consent of a deputy-sheriff in charge thereof, placed in the Alameda county jail by a deputy United States marshal for the southern district of California, and that the only authority of said deputy-marshal consisted of a "finding" made by a United States circuit court commissioner for the southern district of California, at San Diego, which, after reciting that said Lee Yick was charged with having unlawfully come within the United States from a foreign place, and had been examined before him on that charge, proceeded to state as his conclusion from the evidence that "Lee Yick is a Chinese person and laborer; that he came within the United States on the 1st day of August, A. D. 1890, in the county of San Diego, state of California, from the republic of Mexico. Now, therefore, from the foregoing facts, I find that the said Lee Yick was found unlawfully within the United States, and that he is not lawfully entitled to be in or remain in the United States." No formal judgment was ever made or given upon this "finding," nor order or direction given by the commissioner or any court that the said Lee Yick be removed from the southern district of California to some other place in the United States for the purpose of returning him to the country whence he came, and that he be restrained of his liberty for that purpose.

1. It is provided by section 1601 of the Penal Code that "the sheriff must receive and keep in the county jail any person committed thereto by process or order issued under the authority of the United States until he is discharged according to law." Was the said Lee Yick committed to the county jail of Alameda under any process or order issued under the authority of the United States? We think not. Section 13 of the act of congress of September 13, 1888, "to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States," (25 U. S. St. at Large, 476,) provides that any Chinese person found in the United States may be brought before a commissioner of the United States court, "and when convicted upon a hearing, and found and adjudged one not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States, such person shall be removed from the United States to the country whence he came. * * * A certified copy of the judgment shall be the process on which such removal shall be made; and it may be executed by a marshal of the district, or any person having the authority of a marshal under the provisions of this section." It is evident that there is nothing in the language just quoted which would give to the above "finding" or declaration of the United States circuit court commissioner, that Lee Yick was unlawfully in the United States, the effect to justify the action of the deputy United States marshal in taking said Lee Yick into custody, and removing him from the district in which he was found to the county of Alameda; or for the sheriff of the latter county to imprison him in its jail by direction of such deputy-marshal. The authority of a marshal to execute process is confined to the district for which he is appointed, (Rev. St. U. S. § 787; Walker v. Lea, 47 Fed. Rep. 645,) unless in a case otherwise specially provided for by statute, or the lawful order of some court. The original exclusion act of May 6, 1882, (22 U. S. St. at Large, 58,) provided that Chinese unlawfully in this country should be removed by direction of the president. This provision is omitted from the act of September 13, 1888, and the removal is made a consequence of the judgment of the court or commissioner that such Chinese person is not entitled to remain in the United States; but no special direction is given in the statute for the removal of such person from the district in which he is convicted to the port of some other district for the purpose of carrying such judgment into execution. By section 1014 of the United States Revised Statutes it is provided that, when an offender is committed in "any district other than that where the offense is to be tried, it shall be the duty of the judge of the district where such person is imprisoned seasonably to issue, and of the marshal to execute, a warrant for his removal to the district where the trial is to be had." It may be that in analogy to such a proceeding the United States district court for the southern district of California was possessed of authority to make an order directing the said Lee Yick to be removed from that district to some port of shipment beyond its limits, that he might be deported from this country, and could have lawfully committed him to its marshal for that purpose, or possibly the commissioner could have made such order; but the finding of the United States court commissioner, before referred to, is not equivalent to such an order, and without such order the marshal had no more authority to imprison Lee Yick in the northern district of California than he would have had to take him to New York or Alaska for the purpose of returning him to the country whence he came. It follows from this that Lee Yick was never lawfully committed to the jail from which the defendant is charged to have assisted him in making his escape; and this brings us to the point where we must consider whether the departure of Lee Yick from a jail in which he was confined in violation of law was a crime; for, if such departure was not a crime, the defendant was guilty of no offense in assisting him, without violence, to leave the place of his imprisonment, and the court erred in refusing to so instruct the jury.

2. It is contended by the attorney general that the question whether Lee Yick was or was not lawfully confined in jail is immaterial, and that the offense of assisting a prisoner to escape from jail is made out when it is shown that a defendant has assisted a person unlawfully confined therein to free himself from the restraint of a prison. In support of this proposition, it is argued that the purpose of the law is to throw a protection around jails, by making it unlawful for friends of those confined therein to proceed in any other manner than by the writ of habeas corpus, or other legal process, for the enlargement of such persons. We cannot accept this view. An escape is classed as a crime against public justice; and the law, in declaring it to be an offense, proceeds upon the theory that the citizen should yield obedience to the law; that, when one has been by its authority or command confined in a prison, it is his duty to submit to such confinement until delivered by due course of law, no matter whether he was committed to await a future trial or as a punishment after judgment of conviction, or for any other purpose authorized by law. But when the imprisonment is unlawful, and is itself a crime, the reason which makes flight from prison an offense does not exist. In such a case the right to liberty is absolute, and he who regains it is not guilty of the technical offense of escape. And this view seems to be the one which is adopted by the courts, without dissent from any. In the case of State v. Leach, 7 Conn. 452, the defendant was tried for an escape; and, it appearing that his imprisonment was illegal, the court held that the act, instead of being a crime, was justifiable, and further said: "It hence results that the keeper of the gaol is vested with no authority. The building in which the prisoner was confined is not a gaol, but, as to him, a mere private building, and hence he might regain his liberty, of which he was unjustly deprived; and it is no part of the case that he made use of more force than was necessary to accomplish this object." That there can be no escape, in the sense of the law, unless there was a lawful custody, is also held in Housh v. People, 75 Ill. 487; State v. Beebe, 13 Kan. 589; State v. Jones, 78 N. C. 420; 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 1065. The cases cited by the attorney general are not in conflict with the conclusion we have reached, as an analysis of them will show. In Reg. v. Waters, 12 Cox, Crim. Cas. 390, the prisoner was arrested without warrant, taken before a magistrate, and remanded for three days. He broke out of the lock-up and returned to his home, but appeared before the magistrate at the day fixed for his examination, and was discharged, because there was no evidence against him. He was then charged with the escape, and convicted. The conviction was sustained, the court holding that the magistrate had authority to remand him, and that he had escaped from a lawful custody. In this respect that case is like that of State v. Lewis, 19 Kan. 260, in which it was held that the lawfulness of the commitment did not depend upon the actual guilt or innocence of the prisoner, and that, even though innocent, it was his duty to remain until discharged by authority of law. State v. Murray, 15 Me. 103, was a case where there was an informality in the commitment, and the court held that this would not justify an escape. To the same effect is Com. v. Morihan, 4 Allen, 586. The distinction between these two latter cases and the one before us grows out of the wide difference which must necessarily exist between an imprisonment without any process, and wholly without authority of law, and an imprisonment under a process which is simply irregular in form; and this distinction is clearly stated and recognized in 2 Bish. Crim. Law, § 1094; Goodwin v. Griffith, 88 N. Y. 629; Dunford v. Weaver, 84 N. Y. 445. Indeed, for a mere irregularity in the form of a warrant or commitment, the court would not be authorized to discharge a prisoner on habeas corpus, (Pen. Code, § 1488;) and much less would the prisoner himself be justified in treating it with contempt, as he might do if it were wholly void, and incapable of amendment. The cases just referred to, as well as those in which the arrest of a person and his imprisonment for a limited time without any warrant or commitment are authorized by law, are clearly distinguishable from this, in which the alleged escaping prisoner was held without even color of authority. It may be stated, as the clear result of all the cases in which the point has arisen, that mere confinement within the walls of a prison in violation of the law of the state is not an imprisonment from which it is a crime to escape if opportunity offers; and the court erred in refusing to give the instructions requested by defendant on this point. Judgment and order reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 19, 1891.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL.

Where there were no exceptions taken to the instructions, and the evidence warrants the finding of the jury, the verdict cannot be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by William Allingham against E. A. Rix and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Haggin & Van Ness, for appellants. Cope, Boyd & Fifield, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. In their reply brief the appellants abandon all the points made in their opening brief for the reversal of the judgment herein and the order refusing a new trial, except that "there is no evidence to sustain the verdict." There is no merit in that contention. There were no exceptions taken to the instructions given. Under them, upon the evidence for the plaintiff, the jury were warranted in returning their verdict. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

TROMANS v. MAHLMAN et al. (No. 13,149.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 19, 1891.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL — EVIDENCE—SPECIFICATIONS OF ERROR.

Where the specifications of the particulars in which the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court are too general, but there was but one specific issue tried in the case, such insufficiency is thereby cured.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; NOBLE HAMILTON, Judge.

Action by Joseph Tromans against Henry and Mary Jane Mahlman to recover land. Petition for rehearing denied. For decision on appeal, see 27 Pac. Rep. 1094.

Metcalf & Metcalf and Benjamin Williams, for appellant. R. Percy Wright, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a hearing in bank is denied. In regard to the point urged in the argument and in the petition for a rehearing, that there was not in the statement on motion for a new trial any sufficient specification of the particulars in which the evidence was insufficient to sustain the findings of the superior court, we wish to add, to what is said in the opinion of the commissioner, that we should not regard these specifications as sufficient, except for the fact, disclosed by the statement, that all the facts of the case were settled by stipulation of the parties, except the single issue of residence of the Mahlmans on the demanded premises at the date of their declaration of homestead. In other words, the specifications, which are entirely too general in themselves, are aided by the fact that there was but one specific issue tried.

WHALEY et al. v. KING. (No. 14,621.)
(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 21, 1891.)

MANDAMUS—JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—CONTINUANCE.

1. It was error to grant a continuance of a case on an oral statement of an attorney that material witnesses were absent from the county, and had not responded to letters and telegrams sent them.

2. Where a justice refused to proceed with the trial of a cause pursuant to Code Civil Proc. § 873, which provides that the trial must commence within one hour from the time fixed therefor, and continues the same, the remedy was by mandamus to proceed with the trial, rather than to dismiss the action.

In bank.

Application of Whaley and others for mandamus to a justice of the peace of Santa Clara county to dismiss a certain cause. Denied.

Lamar & Castle, for petitioners. Wm. P. Veuve, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The petitioners are residents of the county of Santa Barbara, and are defendants in an action pending before the respondent, a justice of the peace for San Jose township, county of Santa Clara, and were present in said justice's court on July 27, 1891, the time fixed for the trial of said action. Upon that day, and more than one hour after the time fixed for the trial, the attorney for the plaintiff in the action moved for a continuance of the case. The petition alleges "that said motion for a continuance consisted in an oral statement that material witnesses were absent out of the county, and had not responded to letters written and telegrams sent to them," and that no other or further showing was made by oath or affidavit of any person, nor the name of any missing witness given, or any showing of diligence, etc. Thereupon petitioners demanded that the action be dismissed, and judgment of discontinuance given. This motion was denied, and that of the plaintiff therein for a continuance granted. The application here is for a writ of mandamus, commanding the said justice of the peace to dismiss the action. It is very clear that the respondent committed an error in granting the motion for a continuance without any affidavit or other legal evidence showing the necessity therefor, but the commission of an error in ruling upon such a motion does not authorize this court to direct that the action be dismissed because of such error. If a justice of the peace should refuse to proceed with the trial of a case, as required by section 873 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the remedy would be to obtain a writ of mandate compelling him forthwith to proceed with such trial, but upon the service of such a writ the justice would have still a right to entertain a motion for a further continuance, and, if sufficient cause was shown therefor in accordance with the provisions of the Code, he would be justified in granting it. Application for writ denied.

EJECTMENT — PLEADING — ESTOPPEL — EVIDENCE.

1. Where a vendee of land, having entered under a bond for a deed and a contract that, if he failed to pay interest, the vendor might take possession without process of law, subsequently makes default in the payment of the interest, and notifies the vendor that he claims an adverse title, and records an instrument declaring that he surrenders to the vendor the bond for a deed, and all rights conferred thereby, a complaint by the vendor to recover the land need not aver a demand and refusal.

Action to recover land by J. R. Coates against D. H. Cleaves and Hannah M. Cleaves. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chase & Miller, for appellants. W. S. Tinning, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an action to recover the possession of real estate, in which plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendants appeal from the judgment and an order refusing a new trial. Appellants, who are husband and wife, entered into possession of the premises in controversy under a contract with plaintiff dated August 8, 1883, by which they agreed to purchase the same for the sum of $5,200, to be paid on the 8th day of August, 1886, with interest payable monthly. It was also stipulated as follows: "And it is further mutually agreed and contracted that, in consideration that the said obligees have immediate and absolute possession of said property, that, in case they do not pay said interest herein specified to the obligor, he may enter in and take possession thereof without process of law." Appellants have remained in possession ever since, and continued to pay the stipulated interest until about August 8, 1889, when they refused to make further payments, and notified plaintiff that they claimed title adversely to him. October 19, 1889, they executed, acknowledged, and recorded a formal instrument, by which they declared that they "do hereby and now surrender and turn over to J. R. Coates, of the above-named county and state, the bond for a deed, * * * and hereby relinquish and surrender unto the said J. R. Coates all rights and benefits transferred to us by said bond for a deed." After they repudiated the contract, plaintiff offered them $450 and a month's rent to leave, which they refused.

The complaint is sufficient. It was not necessary to aver a demand and refusal. The defendants entered under the plaintiff, agreeing to pay interest on the purchase price in place of rent, and expressly agreed that plaintiff could re-enter in case of a failure to pay. They repudiated the relation in the most formal manner, and set up title in themselves adversely to the plaintiff. In such cases, demand and notice are not necessary. Simpson v. Applegate, 75 Cal. 345, 17 Pac. Rep. 237. And the defendants are estopped from denying the plaintiff's title. Tyler, Ej. 558; Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 20, 27 Pac. Rep. 942. There was no deceit or fraud, and no failure of title. It seems there was outstanding a claim to an undivided interest in the property which the defendants purchased. This outstanding title or claim was known to the defendants when they entered into the contract. The defendant Hannah M. testified that she called attention to this outstanding title at the time they received the bond, and plaintiff promised to purchase it; otherwise she would not have accepted the bond. Whether failure to buy up this title would release defendants from their contract, or whether plaintiff could compel defendants to convey the same to him upon paying the purchase price, is not involved in this case. There was no error in admitting the bond in evidence. It was enough that it was executed by plaintiff, accepted by defendants, and possession taken under it. Besides, defendants admitted its genuineness in their testimony. The finding that plaintiff was the owner, was a sufficient finding that defendants were not; and, besides, defendants were estopped from claiming title. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

OHM v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (No. 12,689.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 23, 1891.)

MEXICAN GRANTS—ADVERSE TITLE—STATUTE OF LIMITATION.

1. In an equitable action to have the title of certain land in the city of San Francisco transferred to plaintiff, to have an accounting of the rents and profits thereof, and to charge defendants with the same, the complaint alleged that, prior to the conquest of California by the United States, the person from whom plaintiff derived title applied for a grant of the land in question, in area 800 varas square, to the prefect of the pueblo of Yerba Buena, (now San Francisco,) who, as required by law, referred the application to the alcalde, who reported the land vacant, and that the applicant had the necessary qualifications, but recommended that only about 50 varas square be granted, whereupon the prefect made a grant of 800 varas square; that the grantee entered into possession thereof, and, after the conquest, presented his claim to the board of commissioners created by congress to ascertain and settle private land claims in California; and that his title thereto was finally confirmed in 1859 by the district court of the United States. The city of San Francisco also presented its claim to land which included the land in controversy, and its claim was confirmed after the confirmation of such grantee's claim. The prefects of pueblos were adjudged by the California courts devoid of authority to grant lands in private ownership. Held, that the title of such grantee was adverse to that of the city of San Francisco as successor of the Mexican pueblo of Yerba Buena, as Act Cong. March 3, 1851, which created the land commission, provided that grants confirmed in accordance with that act would be conclusive against the United States and those claiming under them, but not against third persons.

2. Conceding that the allegations of the complaint on which the prayer for equitable relief is found are mere surplusage, and regarding the action as one at law for the recovery of the land, with its rents and profits, plaintiff has no right of action under St. 1863, p. 325, barring the holder of an imperfect title of Mexican origin after an adverse possession of five years, since the city and those claiming in privity with it have been in adverse possession of the land since before 1859, and plaintiff did not bring his action until 1885.

3. Conceding that the grant was made by an agent of the pueblo, and conveyed the pueblo title, plaintiff's right to maintain the action has been long since barred, as immediately on the confirmation and grant of the pueblo lands to the city of San Francisco by Act Cong. March 8, 1866, (14 St. at Large, 4,) the title either inured to plaintiff ipso facto, or his right to compel a conveyance from the city as his trustee accrued; and at that date St. 1863, p. 325, began to run.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Edward F. Ohm against the city and county of San Francisco and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. For former hearing, see 25 Pac. Rep. 155.

A. Everett Ball and J. M. Kinney, for appellant. Pillsbury & Blanding and Wm. S. Barnes, City Atty., for respondents.

BEATTY, C. J. This is a suit in equity, instituted against the city of San Francisco and a large number of private parties, for the purpose of obtaining a decree ordering, adjudging, and declaring: First. That the plaintiff is the successor in interest of one Peter T. Scherrebeck, and as such the equitable owner of a tract of land 800 varas square, situated in the heart of the city. Second. That the United States, in conveying the premises to the city and county of San Francisco, did so in trust for the plaintiff, thereby imposing upon said city and county the duty of conveying the same to him. Third. That said city and county, as successor of the Mexican pueblo of Yerba Buena, is, with respect to said premises, bound by the acts of the various officials of the former government prior to the conquest, and by the acts and declarations of the United States and its military and other officers pending and since the conquest. Fourth. That said city and county, and the numerous private parties who are alleged to be in possession of the premises, and for that reason united as defendants in the suit, be adjudged to hold and to have held such possession with full notice of the equities of the plaintiff, his grantors and predecessors, and directed to convey their interest and surrender the same to him; that, if they refuse so to do, commissioners be appointed to execute such conveyances, and also to take an account of the rents and profits of the premises, and that defendants be charged therewith. Some other specific relief is asked, and there is a prayer for general relief, but the foregoing epitome of the prayer of the complaint is sufficient to indicate the nature of the action. The defendants demurred to the complaint upon numerous grounds, and their demurrers were sustained, whereupon final judgment was rendered in their favor. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals, and the question to be determined is whether the complaint is insufficient in any of the particulars stated in the demurrers.

For the purpose of this inquiry it is necessary to state at least the substance of the complaint, which it is to be observed is extremely prolix and redundant, especially in its allegations of matters of law, as to which it is not always strictly accurate. It is alleged that the state of California was, prior to July 13, 1848, a political department of the republic of Mexico, and was subdivided into pueblos, constituting political municipalities, supplied with such officials as the republic or governor of the department chose to appoint. That such officers could grant and distribute lands of the municipalities. That the pueblo of Yerba Buena, or San Francisco, was one of such municipalities, and was provided with a prefect appointed by the republic and the governor of California, and empowered, among other things, to make grant and distribution of land to private persons in fee within his district and said municipality. That there was also an alcalde of said pueblo, who had power to represent the community, and express its will as to the propriety of granting lands within the pueblo, and whose acts were binding, unless reversed on appeal to the governor. That at all times mentioned in the complaint prior to the conquest Manuel Castro was prefect and Jose de la Sanchez was alcalde of said pueblo. That prior to the grant hereinafter mentioned the land therein described was vacant, and within the boundary and jurisdiction of said pueblo, and subject to grant by said prefect. That Peter T. Scherrebeck, a resident and naturalized Mexican citizen, presented to said prefect the following petition: "Senor Prefect of the 2d District: I, Peter Scherrebeck, a native of Denmark, a citizen of Mexico, and a resident of this place, appear before your honor, and respectfully represent that, desiring to devote myself to agricultural pursuits, and also to establish a dairy, for which purpose I am in need of a suitable piece of land, I pray your honor, in the exercise of your powers, to be pleased to grant me the place called 'Rincon,' which is situated one-fourth of a league southerly from this place, containing one-half league, bounded by the beach and the wood, as explained in the accompanying sketch. Wherefore, I beseech you to accede to my petition, whereby I should receive favor," etc. "Yerba Buena, Nov. 24, 1845. [Signed] PETER SCHERREBECK." Thereupon said prefect, on receipt thereof, indorsed thereon as follows: "Yerba Buena, Nov. 25, 1845. The chief local authority of this place will report whatever he may deem convenient upon the contents of this petition. [Signed] CASTRO,"—and delivered the same to the said pueblo; and said pueblo of Yerba Buena, by its officer aforesaid, J. de la Sanchez, in its behalf, and as by law authorized, reported to the said prefect the following, to-wit: "Senor Prefect of the 2d District: In obedience to the supreme decree of your honor, I should report that the land which the party in this representation solicits is vacant; that the petitioner possesses the requisite qualifications to be heard, notwithstanding this 'juzgado' is of the opinion that only land upon which to build a house and corral and to plant can be granted to him, upon which questions your honor will determine whatever you may deem most proper. Yerba Buena, November 26, 1845. [Signed] J. DE LA C. SANCHEZ." Which report, with the petition, was made and returned to the said prefect, who thereupon, by and with consent and approval of the pueblo of Yerba Buena and the governor of the territory of California, and approval of the republic of Mexico, granted and confirmed to the said applicant the lands petitioned for,—a tract of 800 varas square; the line bounding the same to correspond with the points of the compass bearing north and south and east and west, as adopted in official surveys, the central and initial central point being an oak tree which stood at the point now known and designated on the official map of the city and county of San Francisco as the "South-West Corner of Third and Harrison Streets;" the grant so made being in words and figures following: "In view of the present petition, the report of the municipal authority of Yerba Buena, and other proceedings had by virtue of the power invested in me by the law of the 20th of March, 1837, I grant to Don Pedro Scherrebeck the ownership of the place called 'Yerba Buena,' to the extent of 800 varas square, he being subject to pay the tax that may be assessed to him by the most excellent departmental assembly. Let this expediente be returned to the party interested, serving him as a title, that he may take possession of said land. The undersigned prefect thus decreed, ordered, and signed in the pueblo of San Jose, this 5th day of December, 1845. [Signed] MAN'L CASTRO." Which said grant was at date of issuance duly recorded by the prefect in the archives and registers of said prefecture, as provided by law, and as was the custom in such cases. That the said prefect, on the 5th day of December, 1845, at the said Yerba Buena, delivered the expediente of the grant last described and named to the said Pedro T. Scherrebeck, who is the same person elsewhere called in this complaint Peter T.

Scherrebeck, who thereupon, with the knowledge, consent, and approval of the authorities of said Yerba Buena, and especially that of the said Jose de la Sanchez, without objections from any one whomever, was placed in possession of the said 800 varas square, with its metes and bounds established, the same being the property granted to him as aforesaid by said Jose de la Sanchez, who was by the law invested with the power of placing parties in legal possession of property granted to them in said Yerba Buena; and said Peter T. Scherrebeck thereupon entered into the occupancy and possession of the said 800 varas square, granted as aforesaid, and described in the expediente heretofore set forth, it being the same 800 varas before described, located by measuring from an initial point now described as the "South-West Corner of Third and Harrison Streets," according to the present official map of the city and county of San Francisco, and running four lines with the points of the compass, as officially recognized by surveyors, 400 varas distant therefrom in each direction, and measuring the same by parallels drawn from the terminal points of the said four lines, so as to include 800 varas square, with said initial point in the center thereof.

It is further alleged that said Scherrebeck inclosed, improved, and occupied said premises, his occupation and ownership being recognized and respected by the government, the pueblo, and all other persons, until the cession of the territory by the treaty of peace between Mexico and the United States. The complaint then alleges the war, the conquest, the treaty and cession, the military proclamations pending the conquest, the terms and effect of the treaty, the admission of California as a state, the obligations she assumed, etc. Next are alleged the several and successive acts of the legislature incorporating the city of San Francisco in 1850 and 1851, and consolidating the city and county in 1856, and it is alleged that within the boundaries established by each of these acts was included said 800 varas so granted to Scherrebeck, and a part or all of the former pueblo. Next is alleged the act of congress of March 3, 1851, to expedite the settlement of private land claims in California, with the pleader's construction of it. It is next alleged that said city, in July, 1852, as trustee of said Scherrebeck, under said last-mentioned act, presented to the commissioners thereby created its claim for 4 square leagues of land, including said 800 varas, prosecuted the same to final decree of confirmation, and obtained a patent for said four leagues in June, 1883, which it took as trustee for plaintiff to the extent of said 800 varas. It is next alleged that, pending said proceedings for confirmation, the said city and county of San Francisco disputed with the said grantee touching the exact location of the said 800 varas square, and the fact of the grant aforesaid, when and whereupon the said grantee presented his petition to said board of land commissioners in his own behalf, praying confirmation and location thereof, etc.; that his claim was finally confirmed and exactly located by decree of the district court in December, 1859. It is next alleged that, pending said confirmation, the city and county of San Francisco assumed the management, control, and occupancy of said land by itself and those holding under it, and does yet control, hold, and enjoy the same, together with the rents, issues, and profits thereof, by itself and the other defendants; that the reasonable value of said use and occupancy is $1,500,000 to August 1, 1885, and $250,000 per month since that time; that plaintiff is successor to Scherrebeck; and that the defendants, and each of them, and their predecessors, have at all times had full knowledge of the relation of trust and confidence existing between the city and county of San Francisco and the plaintiff and his predecessors. Therefore plaintiff prays, etc.

In considering the objections to this complaint, we remark at the outset that its allegations are accepted as true so far only as they relate to matters of fact as distinguished from matters of law. As to the latter, they will be treated as if they were not made, because, so far as they are correct, they are useless, and, when erroneous, worse than useless. This remark applies not only to the allegations respecting the laws enacted and in force since the conquest and cession of California, but also to the laws of Spain and Mexico, which were in force prior thereto. As to the former, we do not understand counsel for appellant as contending for a different rule; but, as to the laws of Spain and Mexico relating to the powers and duties of prefects and other officials respecting the granting of lands, etc., he seems to contend that for the purposes of this appeal the allegations of the complaint must be taken as true. If such is his contention, we cannot accede to it. We understand that our legal tribunals, in adjudicating upon rights originating under and depending upon the laws of Spain and Mexico in force in California prior to the conquest, take judicial notice of such laws in the same manner and to the same extent that they take notice of the common law of England as a part of our own municipal law. The municipal laws of a conquered territory do not cease to exist by reason of the conquest and change of sovereignty, but continue in force so far as they are not repugnant to the paramount laws of the new sovereign, until changed by the legislature. This results from the absolute necessity of preserving the rules by which private rights are governed. Such laws, therefore, become and remain, until repealed or altered, the municipal law of the new sovereignty, which its courts are bound to notice and to enforce. Upon the same principle, and with the same necessity, it results that, so far as private and vested rights of the inhabitants of the conquered territory are dependent upon the exercise of official power by the functionaries of the former government, the rules defining such power must be noticed in the same way. For such purposes they are not to be treated as foreign laws, and alleged and proven as facts. Fremont v. U. S., 17 How. 547.

Looking, then, to the complaint for facts, and to other proper sources for the law, we proceed to consider the principal points made in support of the demurrer.

First. It is contended by the respondent that the grant of Sherrebeck, under which the plaintiff claims, is void, and that it conferred no rights upon the grantee, and gives none to the plaintiff as his successor. We do not think this proposition can be sustained in its full extent. The facts alleged as to the making of the grant, the possession under it, the presentation of the claim to the land commission, and its final confirmation by the district court, show a grant which is valid, at least against the United States and all persons claiming thereunder, although not conclusive against the third persons mentioned in the act of congress of March 3, 1851.¹ And, with respect to this grant, we think the city of San Francisco, as successor to the pueblo, and those claiming under the city, are such third persons. In other words, we think it clearly appears from the complaint that the grant to Scherrebeck was not made by the prefect as an officer of the pueblo, empowered to transmit its title, but that it was made by such prefect by authority from and approval of the governor of the department by virtue of his superior power to grant vacant lands within the boundaries of the pueblos, irrespective of their claim to hold and to dispose of them. We think it was and continued to be a grant held under a title adverse to that of the pueblo. We cannot find in any of the laws or ordinances of Spain and Mexico to which we have been referred any authority conferred upon prefects to make grants in fee of the pueblo lands. It is not contained in the decree of the Spanish cortes of January 4, 1813; nor in the Plan of Pictic; nor in the Mexican law of colonization of 1824; nor in the regulations of 1828; nor, we think, in the law of March 20, 1837, to which the prefect himself refers as the source of his authority. The clause of this act cited and relied on by appellant is given in the original Spanish and in translation at page 314, addenda, Dwinelle's Colonial History of San Francisco. In terms it merely authorizes the prefects in their respective districts to "regulate executively" the distribution of the common lands of the pueblos, provided there are no lawsuits pending in the courts concerning them, saving a right of appeal to the governor. The law-writers do not agree in their construction of this article. Dwinelle thinks it conferred authority to make grants of the pueblo lands for the pueblo. Halleck thinks that it merely conferred a power to regulate the temporary use of the common lands. This court has decided that it did not expressly confer power to grant lands in private ownership. Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530. As a matter of history, it is known that the prefects very rarely attempted to exercise such power,—not more than two or three instances, including this grant to Scherrebeck, appearing in the records of San Francisco, and one of those subsequent to the conquest, by Horace Hawes. It is also well known as a fact and as matter of law that the claim of such power by the prefects has been repudiated by the city from the beginning. The complaint here shows that the validity of this Scherrebeck grant was denied by the city as early as 1853, and ever since. The Van Ness ordinance, passed in 1855, and ratified by the legislature in 1858, practically confirmed all previous grants of pueblo lands made by any ayuntamiento, town council, alcalde, or justice of the peace of the former pueblo or of the city, but was entirely silent as to grants by prefects. Even the allegations of the complaint do not show that the prefect had power as agent, and acting in behalf of the pueblo, to alienate its lands in fee. He is said to have authority to make grant and distribution of lands within the pueblo limits, but this power may have been derived from the departmental authorities, and exercised independently and against the will of the municipal authorities. And this appears to have been the case with the Scherrebeck claim. The making of the grant was opposed by the alcalde, the only municipal officer who appears to have had anything to do with it; but it was approved by the governor and the superior authorities.

The strongest proof, however, of the real character of this grant is found in the circumstances of its presentation to the land commission, and its confirmation by the district court. The city of San Francisco, as successor to the pueblo, had already, in conformity with its right and duty under the act of congress of March 3, 1851, presented its claim to four leagues of land for confirmation by the land commission. Meantime it was denying and repudiating the Scherrebeck claim. In consequence of this dispute the Scherrebeck claim was presented by the grantee, and, pending the confirmation of the city's claim, that of Scherrebeck was in 1859 confirmed by the district court on appeal from the commission. This shows that it was regarded and treated as a claim of a third party, adverse and hostile to that of the city; for the land commission had no jurisdiction, pending the confirmation of the claim of a city or town to lands of a former pueblo, to adjudicate a controversy between the city and the claimant of a grant from the pueblo as to the validity of such grant. Its function was to determine what claims were good against the United States under the treaty of cession. It had nothing to do, except incidentally, with subordinate controversies between the holders of such claims and those claiming under them. Possibly, if a city, as successor to the right of a pueblo, had neglected to present its claim for confirmation, it might have been allowable for one or more holders of pueblo titles, in behalf of themselves and others, to petition for a confirmation of the pueblo claim. But when the city was itself proceeding with its application for confirmation of its claim to the entire four leagues of pueblo lands, we cannot see how, under the law, the holder of a pueblo grant of a smaller parcel could be allowed to proceed in his own behalf, and still less how he could procure from the land commission or the district court a conclusive adjudication that his grant from the pueblo was valid. We do know, on the contrary, as a part of the judicial history of the state, that such individual claims to pueblo lands were frequently presented for confirmation, but were always held to be claims adverse to the city, and confirmed as such. When so confirmed, the question of superior right was left to be determined in the ordinary tribunals, where its determination properly belongs. Of many instances of such claims to tracts of lands situated within pueblo boundaries, and held under grants from the governor and departmental authorities, we cite those litigated in Leese v. Clark, 18 Cal. 535; Lynch v. Bernal, 9 Wall. 315; Steinbach v. Moore, 30 Cal. 505. Our conclusion from all the facts alleged in the complaint is that this claim of Scherrebeck, as confirmed by the district court, stands in the same relation to the city's claim as successor to the pueblo as did the claims above referred to. It is, and always has been, a claim adverse and hostile to that of the city, and the city's claim is adverse and hostile to it. There is no relation of trust between the city and its grantees on the one side and the plaintiff on the other. The city never has held any legal title in trust for the plaintiff, and there is nothing to support this suit in equity, or to justify the granting of any of the specific relief asked. The whole case amounts simply to this: that the city and its grantees are holding the land in controversy under one title, and the plaintiff is claiming it under an independent and adverse title. His remedy, therefore, is by an action at law for the recovery of the land, and not by a suit in equity to compel the transfer of a title under which he can claim nothing. The demurrer was therefore properly sustained on this ground.

Second. Even if it were conceded, as appellant seems to claim, that all the allegations of his complaint upon which is founded the prayer for equitable relief can be treated as surplusage, and the action regarded as one at law for the recovery of the land with its rents and profits, it would still follow that the demurrer was rightly sustained, on the ground that such an action had been barred by sections 318, 319, of the Code of Civil Procedure, long before this action was commenced. The character of plaintiff's claim or title has not changed since 1859. Such as it was then it still continues,—an inchoate title, unperfected by survey and patent. The city and those claiming in privity with it have been in adverse possession of the demanded premises ever since a date prior to 1859, and this action was not commenced until 1885. Five years of adverse possession at any time since the passage of the act of April 18, 1863, (St. 1863, p. 325,) bars an action by the holder of an imperfect (unpatented) title of Spanish or Mexican origin. San Jose v. Trimble, 41 Cal. 536; Gardiner v. Miller, 47 Cal. 576; Montgomery v. Bevans, 1 Sawy. 681; Henshaw v. Bissell, 18 Wall. 269.

Third. These reasons are sufficient to compel an affirmation of the judgment. But the same result would follow if it were allowed that under a proper construction of the complaint the Scherrebeck grant was made by an agent of the pueblo, and conveyed the pueblo title; for, if so, the moment the city's claim to the pueblo lands was confirmed, the title either inured to the plaintiff ipso facto, or his right to compel a conveyance from his trustee accrued. If the theory of the complaint is correct, that the final confirmation of the pueblo title and the grant from the United States in pursuance of such confirmation invested the city of San Francisco with the legal title, in trust for plaintiff, as to the Scherrebeck claim, and if it is true, as alleged, that the city had denied the validity of the grant years before, then certainly the right to sue for a conveyance—the right, in other words, to maintain this action—at once accrued, and the statute of limitations began then to run against it. But the pueblo title was confirmed and the lands granted to the city by the act of congress of March 8, 1866, (14 St. at Large, 4.) The previous grant contained in section 5 of the act of July 1, 1864, (13 St. at Large, 332,) was not, in terms, a confirmation of the pueblo title, but merely relinquished to the city the title of the United States to the lands within the corporate limits as established by the act of 1851, and the conveyance was expressly made for the uses and purposes specified in the Van Ness ordinance, which, as we have seen, did not recognize grants by prefects. It is probable that the plaintiff could not have maintained this action on his own theory of his relations to the city under the act of 1864; but under the act of 1866 he certainly could have done so, unless he admits that by the terms of that act he was excluded from the benefit of the confirmation; and if he makes this admission he gives up his entire case, for what that statute took away no subsequent patent issued by the executive department of the government could possibly restore. His right, then, to commence and maintain this action, if it has ever existed, accrued in 1866, and, however it may be classed, whether as an action to recover land or otherwise, it was barred long prior to 1885. And so, also, if we assume that the grant to the city inured to plaintiff's benefit, passing the legal title to him without the necessity of any further conveyance from the city, (as we think it would have done if his grant had been from the pueblo,) his right to maintain an action at law against those in possession then immediately accrued. The legislative grant was for every purpose as effectual as the patent, so far as the transfer of the title is concerned. All that the patent added was a convenient method of proving the exact boundaries. By the grant the title was perfected, and the statute of 1863 then began to run. It is true that the act makes the issuance of a patent final confirmation of a Mexican grant, but the act does not, by its terms, postpone the running of the statute until final confirmation. On the contrary, it declares that the time shall run irrespective of final confirmation, and it is only by a construction imposed upon the statute by the courts that five years is allowed for suit on a Spanish or Mexican title after it has been perfected. The usual mode of perfecting such titles is, of course, that which is mentioned in the statute, i. e., survey and patent; but when title is perfected by act of congress, the same construction of the act which sets it in motion upon issuance of the patent would set it in motion upon the passage of the act, the reason therefor being in each case the same, viz., that the perfection of the title by grant from the United States in any form confers a new right of entry and a new cause of action. That legislative grants have all the effect of a patent, see the following cases: Montgomery v. Bevans, 1 Sawy. 653; Harris v. McGovern, 2 Sawy. 515; Palmer v. Low, 98 U. S. 16, 17, and cases there cited; Tripp v. Spring, 5 Sawy. 210. Many other decisions might be cited to the same effect, but we do not deem it necessary. There are other objections to the complaint, but they need not be discussed. For the reasons above given, the judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

We concur: MCFARLAND, J.; SHARPESTEIN, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; PATERSON, J.

HARRISON, J., being disqualified, did not participate in the foregoing opinion.

PEOPLE v. WILLARD. (No. 20,823.)

PROOF OF MARRIAGE—TRIAL—REMARKS OF COURT—CONVICTS AS WITNESSES—ATTENDANCE—RECEIVING STOLEN GOODS—EVIDENCE.

1. Where defendant was indicted for receiving goods stolen by W., and the question was whether defendant was the wife of W., her admission of a former marriage, refusal to disclose the name of her former husband, and failure to show a dissolution of the marriage in any manner, were sufficient to discredit her statement that she was single at the date she claimed to have married W., and sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that her marriage with W. was unlawful.

2. In ruling against an objection to the admission in evidence of letters from W. to defendant, it was error for the court to state in the presence of the jury that his chief reason for admitting them was that defendant had several times contradicted herself on the record.

3. Code Civil Proc. §§ 1873-1881, make convicted felons competent witnesses. Const. art. 1, § 13, confers on defendants in criminal cases the right to have the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses. Pen. Code, § 1567, provides that a person imprisoned in the state-prison may, on order for that purpose, be brought before a court sitting in another county. Held, that where notice had been given to the state of an application to produce W. from the state-prison to testify on behalf of defendant, and it was clearly shown that his testimony was the only evidence obtainable, and would exonerate defendant, the application should have been granted.

4. Where the information alleged that the property was received on or about December 8, 1888, and the evidence showed that it was stolen between the 7th and 11th of December, and the purpose was to show guilty knowledge by defendant on December 8th, it was error to admit evidence that other articles found in the house occupied by defendant and W. on March 11, 1889, had been stolen by reason of burglaries committed subsequent to December 8th.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

Information against May Willard for receiving stolen goods. Verdict of guilty, and judgment thereon. Motion for new trial denied. From the judgment, and the order denying such motion, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. W. Taggart and W. S. Day, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. Appeal from a judgment of conviction on a charge of receiving stolen goods, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. A preliminary statement of the leading facts of the case is necessary to a proper understanding of the points urged in support of the appeal. For about 18 months prior to March 11, 1889, the defendant and one Frank Willard lived together in the city of Santa Barbara, holding themselves out as man and wife; and the defendant claims that they were in fact married by contract in San Bernardino in August, 1884, and from that time openly assumed towards each other the mutual relations of husband and wife. The people, on the other hand, contend that they were not married, but were living in a meretricious relation. The rulings of the court as to the evidence offered upon this matter present one of the principal questions in the case. While the defendant and said Willard were so living together under the assumed name of Strohm, during the months of November and December, 1888, and January, February, and March, 1889, a series of burglaries was committed in Santa Barbara, and a large quantity of personal property was stolen. On the morning of March 11, 1889, officers with search-warrants visited the house occupied by defendant and said Frank Willard, and found most of the stolen property therein. The principal portion was found packed in two ordinary packing-cases, which were nailed up preparatory for shipping. The remainder was found in two or three trunks, along with articles of wearing apparel, etc., of defendant and said Frank Willard. One of these trunks was claimed by defendant, and in it were found various articles belonging to Mrs. Hazard, described in the information upon which she has been convicted. Informations against Frank Willard for burglary were filed, upon two of which he was convicted, and sentenced to be imprisoned at Folsom for a long term of years. At the same time an information was filed against the defendant, charging her with receiving certain property stolen from one Williams at about the same time the Hazard property was stolen. Upon this information she was tried and acquitted. Thereafter the present information was filed, charging her with receiving the Hazard property, to which she interposed a plea of not guilty, and a further plea of former acquittal,—or of former jeopardy, as her counsel denominates it,—claiming that the two charges of receiving the Williams property and the Hazard property include the same identical offense, making an acquittal on the first information a bar to any conviction on the second. At her first trial, Frank Willard testified as a witness in her behalf to the effect that he had brought the stolen property into the house in her absence, had packed most of it in the packing-cases and nailed them up, and without her knowledge had put a few articles in her trunk, which was open and to which he had a key. The jury at this trial failing to agree, the case was again set for trial; and, Frank Willard having in the mean time been confined in the state-prison at Folsom, defendant applied to the superior court for an order for his attendance at the trial as a witness in her behalf. Her application being refused, she moved in this court for a writ of mandate to the superior court, commanding it to make such order for the attendance of Frank Willard as a witness. After a hearing this court refused to issue the writ upon the ground that the making of such orders is a matter of discretion which cannot be controlled by mandate. Willard v. Superior Court, 82 Cal. 456, 22 Pac. Rep. 1120. Thereupon the defendant caused Frank Willard's deposition to be taken, which was used on her trial, and the jury again disagreed. The case was then set down for trial a third time, whereupon defendant renewed her application to the superior court for an order for the attendance of Frank Willard as a witness. The court again refused to make the order, and such refusal is one of the errors assigned in support of her appeal. With this preliminary statement, we proceed to consider the points which counsel have urged in the argument.

It is not by any means clear that the bill of exceptions in this record is sufficient to enable us to review the ruling of the superior court on defendant's application for an order for the attendance of Frank Willard as a witness; but, since the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded upon other grounds, and since this question must again arise in the further progress of the case, we consider it better to disregard respondent's objections to the record in this particular, and to pass upon the merits of this question. Convicted felons are by the statute made competent witnesses, (Code Civil Proc. §§ 1878-1881;) and Const. art. 1, § 13, confers upon defendants in criminal cases the right "to have the process of the court to compel the attendance of witnesses" in their behalf. Before the law was so amended as to allow convicted felons to testify, prisoners awaiting trial, and others not rendered infamous by conviction of felony, were competent witnesses; and there was a common-law writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum, which was the appropriate process for securing their attendance in court. Bac. Abr. "Habeas Corpus."

By the Code provisions above cited, prisoners after conviction were put upon the same ground as prisoners awaiting trial, with respect to their competency as witnesses; and the same process that will compel the attendance of the latter will compel the attendance of the former. Section 1567¹ of the Penal Code, so far as it relates to the attendance of witnesses, provides for an order exactly equivalent to the writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum; and, as will be seen by reference to its terms, it is made equally applicable to the case of a prisoner in the state-prison and a prisoner in the county jail. We think the power conferred by this section of the Code should be exercised under the same circumstances and with the same restrictions under which the common-law courts were accustomed to issue the writ of habeas corpus ad testificandum. In order to procure the issuance of that writ, it was necessary to make an application to the court or judge; and it was necessary to make a strict showing of the materiality of the testimony, and the necessity of securing the attendance of the prisoner as a witness. Bac. Abr.; Tayl. Ev. § 1272 et seq. We feel that this is a privilege extended to persons accused of crime which is capable of gross abuse, unless strictly guarded, and we do not wish to be understood as holding that the order should be made except upon a very strict showing, and upon previous notice to the state of the application; but when such notice has been given, and a case of apparent necessity is made out, or, in other words, when the materiality of the evidence and its importance are clearly and satisfactorily shown, and the good faith of the defendant making the application also appears, the court should, in the exercise of its discretion, make the order for the attendance of the prisoner as a witness. In this case it was shown, among other things, that Frank Willard and defendant were the occupants of the house in which the stolen property was found, and that she could prove by him, and no other person, that she had not received it. She set out specifically the testimony he had given on her first trial, which, if true, completely exonerated her. It covered the whole issue in the case, and completely rebutted the charge against the defendant. It was the only evidence obtainable. It related to matters of detail of considerable variety and complication. It was to be offered in rebuttal to testimony of the state which was liable to vary in its details from that previously given. We think this presents a case upon which the court ought properly, in the exercise of its discretion, to have ordered the attendance of the prisoner as a witness. We wish to be understood as expressing ourselves upon this point very guardedly, in order not to open the door to the abuse of the right which the statute and constitution seem to confer.

The information in this case alleges that the property of Mrs. Hazard was received by the defendant on or about the 8th day of December, 1888; and the evidence shows that it was stolen between the 7th and 11th of December. For the purpose of showing that it was received by the defendant with a guilty knowledge that it had been stolen, the prosecution introduced evidence that a large number of other articles found in the house occupied by defendant and Frank Willard on the 11th of March, 1889, had been stolen by means of burglaries committed, some of them prior to December 8th, and some of them subsequent thereto. The defendant objected to the evidence in regard to subsequent burglaries on the ground that they, and the possession of their fruits, could have no tendency to prove guilty knowledge on December 8th. The evidence was admitted over her objection, and she duly excepted. We think the court erred in this ruling. There is no doubt that, when a defendant is shown to have received stolen goods from a thief, evidence of previous dealings with the thief in like transactions is competent to show that defendant at the time knew that the property had been stolen; but we have been cited to no authority, and we know of none, which holds that evidence of subsequent dealings is admissible. Several of the cases cited by respondents show that such evidence is not within the rule, and the reason for the distinction is manifest. The question to be determined is as to the state of mind of the receiver at the date of the receipt, and subsequent dealings can throw no light upon that. It is no answer to this proposition to say that the only evidence of the receiving of the stolen property by defendant was the finding of it in her possession on March 11, 1889,—a date subsequent to any burglary proved. It is true that this evidence did not necessarily show that she had received it before that day. Indeed, it does not by itself prove anything else; but the circumstances of the case, including the manner in which defendant and Frank Willard were living together during the time when the burglaries were committed, might have warranted the inference that he gave to defendant the property stolen from different houses at the time of the respective burglaries. And this, indeed, was the theory upon which the prosecution rested; for if it had been claimed that the goods were received on or about March 11th the defendant's plea of former acquittal could not have been avoided. The same proof, and the only proof, of a receipt of the Hazard goods on or about March 11th, equally proved a receipt of the Williams goods at the same time; and, if both were received at the same time, it was one offense, and the acquittal on the first charge was a bar. People v. Stephens, 79 Cal. 428, 21 Pac. Rep. 856. The prosecution was therefore driven, in order to obviate the plea of former acquittal, to proceed upon the theory that the property described in the information was received at or about the time it was stolen; and that such was the theory of the case for the people is clearly demonstrated by the instructions given to the jury at their request, as well as by the argument here. We are not to be understood as denying that there was evidence to sustain a finding to that effect. All we decide is that, on that theory of the case, evidence of the matters coming to the knowledge of the defendant subsequently to the date charged and relied on was not competent to prove guilty knowledge, and its admission was error.

It is contended by the appellant that the evidence shows that she was the wife of Frank Willard, and therefore could not be guilty of receiving stolen goods from him. The law of this proposition is conceded by the state, but the fact is denied. We think there is evidence to sustain the implied finding of the jury against a lawful marriage. The admission by defendant of a former marriage, her refusal to disclose the name of her former husband, and her failure to show a dissolution of the marriage by death, divorce, or disappearance, were sufficient to discredit her naked statement that she was a single woman at the date she claims to have been married to Willard. The letter, Exhibit B, if written by Willard and received by her, also tends to prove a meretricious union. We think the evidence was sufficient to show that it was so written and received. It was postmarked Los Angeles, and directed to defendant at San Diego, at a date when he is shown to have been at the former and she at the latter place. It begins, "My darling little wife," is signed "Frank," and was found in her possession among a number of other letters addressed to her.

The court, in ruling upon an objection to the admission in evidence of the letter, Exhibit B, in commenting upon the testimony of the defendant in relation to it, remarked in the presence and hearing of the jury that "she had contradicted herself several times in the record," to which language the defendant excepted. Whereupon the court reiterated the statement, adding: "That is the chief reason why I admit those letters in evidence." We do not think these remarks were necessary to explain the ruling of the court, and we do think that, unretracted and unexplained, after they had been objected to, they must necessarily have prejudiced the case of the defendant. She was her own sole witness, and in effect the jury were told by the court that she was unworthy of credit. Even if her self-contradictions had been much more evident than they appear to us, the judge should not have given his opinion to the jury that she had sworn falsely. "Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." Const. art. 6, § 19; McMinn v. Whelan, 27 Cal. 319.

We do not think there was any error in the instructions given at the request of the people. They are purely hypothetical, and contain no assumptions of criminal facts. Nor do we think the defendant can have been prejudiced by the modification of her instruction 15, in view of the theory upon which the prosecution conducted the case with reference to the time of receiving. The evidence would certainly not have justified the finding of the jury against the defendant on her plea of former acquittal, if the prosecution had been based upon the theory of a receiving on or about March 11th. But, as we have seen, the theory was of a receiving at or about the date of the burglary. The evidence was sufficient on that theory to justify a finding against the special plea; but, as we have seen, on that theory incompetent evidence of subsequent dealings was introduced to prove guilty knowledge. The prosecution could not go upon one theory to make out its case, and upon a wholly inconsistent theory to meet the special defense. The evidence of independent and exclusive possession by defendant of the stolen property was sufficient to sustain the verdict as to that point. The record does not show, so far as we can discover, that the talesman, Schofield, was challenged for actual bias, and therefore we cannot review the rulings of the court upon the questions asked him on voir dire.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal, but I fear that some language in the leading opinion will be construed as holding that a defendant has a constitutional right to have a convict brought out of the state-prison whenever the former is ready to swear that the latter is a material witness. It is admitted, however, that whether or not a convict will be ordered out of prison into court (and his term of imprisonment thus interfered with) depends upon the discretion of the court; and I cannot understand how a constitutional right can depend upon the discretion of a judge. I think that the law upon the subject is simply this: The statute gives a court discretion to break the continuity of a convict's term of imprisonment by ordering him to be brought out of prison into court as a witness; and, if the court abuses its discretion by not making the order when it clearly ought to have been made, such abuse is ground for a reversal of the judgment, just as abuse of discretion in refusing to grant a continuance may be ground for reversal. I do not think that there is any constitutional question involved. If the word "process," as used in the constitution, is to be construed as referring to the extraordinary proceeding provided for in section 1567 of the Penal Code, then I see no escape from the proposition that defendants may in all cases have material witnesses brought out of the state-prison, and that the discretion of a court cuts no figure in the matter. And I think, further, that courts would not abuse their discretion in refusing such orders except in peculiar and extraordinary cases,—some of which are referred to in the opinion of Mr. Justice PATERSON in Willard v. Superior Court, 82 Cal. 459, 22 Pac. Rep. 1120. In the case at bar there were some peculiar circumstances which made it, I think, the duty of the court to order the witness brought into court. Upon other questions I concur in the opinion of the chief justice.

PEOPLE v. THOMSON. (No. 20,814.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 29, 1891.)

HOMICIDE—EVIDENCE—THREATS—SELF-DEFENSE —MALICE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. On a trial for murder, where a witness for the prosecution testifies that shortly after the shooting he went to the scene of the homicide, and took his rifle with him, and that he was sorry defendant got into the trouble, it is proper, in order to show the state of the witness' mind, to ask him, on cross-examination, why he took his rifle, and if he expressed his sorrow by going towards the house with a rifle.

2. Where, on a trial for murder under a plea of self-defense, defendant introduces evidence to show that for many years, extending down to the time of the shooting, the deceased had manifested hostility towards him, and threatened his life, and that just before the shooting the deceased advanced towards him three or four steps with a pistol in his hand, the error of the court in charging that testimony of the conduct of the deceased had been introduced by defendant for the sole purpose of showing the unfriendly relation between them, and must be considered for that purpose only, and that in weighing such evidence its remoteness and the difficulty of meeting it owing to the lapse of time must be carefully considered, is not cured by other portions of the charge where the law of self-defense is correctly stated.

3. For the purpose of showing malice on the part of defendant, it may be shown in a general way that he and the deceased had previous difficulties, although such difficulties cannot be examined in detail, for the purpose of seeing which party was in the wrong.

4. On such trial for murder, the fact that defendant's cellar and well were filled with impure water, caused by the deceased irrigating his adjoining tract of land, is irrelevant, since it was not a justification for the killing.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Amador county; C. V. GOTTSCHALK, Judge.

Indictment of Alexander Thomson for murder. Verdict and judgment of conviction. Defendant appeals from an order denying a new trial. Order reversed.

Reddy, Campbell & Metson and W. J. McGee, for appellant. E. C. Farnsworth, Egon & Rust, and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. The appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree, and now appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. At the trial he admitted the killing, and insisted that the homicide was committed in self-defense. The prosecution, against the objection of defendant, offered in evidence a United States patent to the tract of land upon which the deceased was killed, for the purpose, as the district attorney stated, of showing that "he was killed upon his own land." There was no question of defense of property or habitation involved in the trial. The plea was a plea of self-defense, arising from a threatened personal injury, and it was entirely immaterial and foreign to the issue on trial, whether the deceased was killed upon his own land or upon the land of another. Such fact could have shed no possible light upon the question of murder or justification for the commission of the homicide. While the assignment of error has merit, owing to the views we entertain upon other matters, we do not deem it necessary to decide the question as to whether the error is of such a character as to justify a reversal of the judgment. The witness Norris was an important witness for the prosecution. Upon cross-examination he testified that "shortly after the shooting he went to the scene of the homicide, and took his rifle with him. Question. What did you take your rifle with you for?" An objection to this question was sustained, upon the ground that it was not cross-examination. Upon redirect examination the witness stated: "I am sorry the defendant got into that trouble." And defendant's counsel then asked him the following question: "And you expressed your sorrow by going out towards the house with a Winchester rifle?" An objection was sustained to this question upon the grounds already stated. These rulings of the court were erroneous. It is elementary law, supported by all authority, that the state of mind of a witness as to his bias or prejudice, his interests involved, his hostility or friendship towards the parties, are always proper matters for investigation, in order that truth may prevail and falsehood find its proper level. If the inner workings of a witness' mind are actuating his testimony, and the workings of that mind are brought forth to the light and held up in full view before the jury, results will be obtained much more in accord with truth and justice than though the witness' testimony is weighed and measured by his words alone. If the feelings of the witness Norris were so hostile towards the defendant that when he went to the scene of the homicide he took his rifle with him for the purpose of wreaking vengeance upon the slayer of his friend, that would be a fact proper to be placed before the jury, as throwing light upon the state of the witness' mind, in order that they might properly weigh his testimony. See People v. Lee Ah Chuck, 66 Cal. 667, 6 Pac. Rep. 859.

The court gave the jury the following instruction: "Testimony of the acts and conduct of the deceased have been introduced by the defendant for the purpose of showing that the relations existing between the deceased and the defendant were unfriendly, and for that purpose alone, and you are charged to consider it for that purpose only; and, in weighing such evidence, you are to consider the remoteness of it and the difficulty of meeting it, owing to the lapse of time, by contradictory evidence, and weigh it carefully." This instruction has no law to support it, and requires a reversal of the judgment upon various grounds.

There was evidence introduced by the defendant tending to show that for a period of many years, extending down to the very moment of the shooting, the deceased had at various times manifested overt acts of hostility towards the defendant, by drawing and exhibiting deadly weapons, threatening his life, etc. There is nothing in the record to indicate that the acts and conduct of the deceased were introduced for the purpose of showing an unfriendly relation between deceased and defendant. Indeed, it does not seem clear why the defense should be zealous in showing such unfriendly relations, for such evidence more properly would be arrayed upon the side of the prosecution. But the evidence was material, and material for a double purpose, and should never have been passed to the jury, limited in effect and practically handicapped out of all usefulness, as was done by the instruction of the court. The evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing that the defendant, as a reasonable man, did believe that he was in danger of losing his life, or suffering great bodily harm, at the time he fired the fatal shot. The instruction is so broad in its language as to include all the acts and all the conduct of the deceased. The defendant testified that the acts and conduct of the deceased immediately prior to the shooting were that "the deceased advanced towards me three or four steps with a pistol raised in his hand." Of course, no one will maintain that the evidence of such acts and conduct of the deceased should go to the jury, simply for the purpose of showing unfriendly relations. If such were the rule, evidence to support the plea of self-defense would ever be lacking, and the plea itself a myth, for the acts and conduct of the deceased alone furnish the test by which that question is measured and determined. Conceding the instruction was framed with reference to the conduct and acts of deceased occurring at a time prior to the day of the homicide, still the same principles of law would apply, and the evidence be admissible for the purposes already stated. Again, in this case, a deadly encounter took place, one party was killed, and the survivor insists that the killing was done in self-defense, and that the deceased made the first attack. Who was the aggressor was an issue of vital importance to the jury, justice could only be reached by its proper solution, and, as disclosed by the evidence, it was enveloped in doubt. Under these circumstances, all the acts and conduct of the deceased, either in the nature of overt acts of hostility or threats communicated or uncommunicated, were proper evidence to be considered by the jury as shedding light, to some extent at least, upon the issue as to whether the deceased or the defendant was the aggressor in this fatal affray. These principles are elementary in criminal law, and a citation of authorities not demanded, but the general principles are found discussed in People v. Arnold, 15 Cal. 479; People v. Scoggins, 37 Cal. 677; People v. Travis, 56 Cal. 252; People v. Tamkin, 62 Cal. 469.

The latter portion of the instruction under consideration is as follows: "And, in weighing such evidence, you are to consider the remoteness of it, the difficulty of meeting it, owing to lapse of time, by contradictory evidence, and weigh it carefully." Inasmuch as the acts and conduct of the deceased showing hostility towards the defendant, according to the evidence of the defense, extended down to the very moment of the killing, the word "remoteness" is improperly used as not being justified by the facts. It is the duty of the court to instruct the jury as to the law of the case. The jury are the only judges as to the weight to be given any special portion or branch of the evidence. The above suggestions made to them by the court trench upon the province of the jury, and were matters, if borne out by the facts of the case, only proper to be suggested by counsel in his plea to the jury; for they were matters of argument, and not matters of law. In other portions of the court's charge the law of self-defense, and the object and purpose for which the acts and conduct of a deceased can be exhibited to the jury, are fully, clearly, and correctly stated, yet these portions of the charge cannot cure the defects found in the instruction already considered. A serious conflict exists, which must have confused the minds of the jury, for both instructions could not be followed. The former is bad law, and we know not but that the jury acted upon it in rendering their verdict. People v. Wong Ah Ngow, 54 Cal. 154; People v. Bush, 65 Cal. 134, 3 Pac. Rep. 590.

As the case must be remanded for a new trial, there is another matter we will incidentally mention. For the purpose of showing malice on the part of the defendant, the prosecution is entitled to prove that the parties to the homicide had had difficulties upon previous occasions. These matters may be shown in a general way, and it is not proper to enter into an examination of them in detail for the purpose of determining which of the parties was in the wrong. In this case, during the progress of the defense, it was developed that defendant's cellar was at certain seasons of the year flooded with water, and that the water in defendant's well was impure and unhealthy; that these matters caused the serious ill health of defendant's family, and were occasioned by the irrigation of an adjoining tract of land by deceased. Conceding all these matters to be true, the evidence was irrelevant and incompetent, for it formed no kind or part of a justification by the defendant for the killing of the deceased. Upon cross-examination, and in rebuttal, the prosecution attempted to show that the water in defendant's well was always bad, and that at certain seasons of the year chills and fever were common to the people of the entire neighborhood. These matters were entirely foreign to the issue under investigation, and under no aspect of the case could shed any light upon it, whatever the truth may have been regarding them. The entire evidence in this regard was collateral to the issue, and could only have served the purpose of mystifying and confusing the minds of the jury, by leading them far away from the merits of the cause they were impaneled to decide. We find no other error in the record. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; HARRISON, J.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal, on the ground that the court erred in giving the instruction referred to in the opinion of Mr. Justice GAROUTTE. It was error to direct the jury that, in weighing the testimony referred to in the instruction, the jury must "consider the remoteness of it and the difficulty of meeting it, owing to the lapse of time, by contradictory evidence, and weigh it carefully." If the testimony was given by a credible witness, and was not unreasonable or improbable in itself, or when compared with other established facts in the case, it was the duty of the jury to accept and act upon it, and they should have been so instructed, and the force of such testimony could not be weakened upon any supposition that, if the witness had placed the occurrences testified to as of a later date, the prosecution might have been able to contradict the witness.

EXECUTORS—FAILURE TO PRESENT CLAIM—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE.

An action to foreclose a mortgage brought after the death of the mortgagor, in which the complaint waives all recourse against other than the mortgaged property, is not barred by failure to commence within the time for the presentation of claims against the deceased mortgagor's estate. *Corporation v. Action by the German Savings & Loan Society against Michael Fisher and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

B. McFadden and J. B. Richardson, for appellants. Jarboe & Harrison, (John R. Garber, of counsel,) for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This is an action against the executor of a will and others to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. The mortgage was not presented to the executor for allowance; but all recourse against other property is waived in the complaint. This action, however, was not commenced until after the expiration of the time for the presentation of claims against the estate; and appellants contend that respondent's right of action was barred after the expiration of that time. But the point was decided directly against the contention of appellants in the case of Corporation v. Nadeau's Exr's, (Cal.) 27 Pac. BJORMAN v. FT. BRAGG REDWOOD CO. (No. 13,227.)

APPEAL—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—NEW TRIAL.

An order of the trial court granting a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of evidence to sustain the verdict will not be reversed on appeal unless it appears that there was a manifest abuse of the trial court's discretion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. MCGARVEY, Judge.

Action by Henry Bjorman against the Ft. Bragg Redwood Company. Judgment for plaintiff. From the order of court below granting a new trial plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. Morgenthal and J. M. Mannon, for appellant. J. A. Cooper, T. L. Carothers, and C. E. Wilson, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an appeal from an order granting the defendant's motion for a new trial. The action was brought to recover damages for an injury to plaintiff, resulting in the loss of his right leg, and alleged to have been caused by the negligence and gross carelessness of the defendant. The answer denied all the averments as to negligence and carelessness on the part of defendant, and alleged that the injury to plaintiff was caused by the negligence and carelessness of his fellow-servant. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of plaintiff for $7,000, on which judgment was entered. The defendant moved for a new trial upon the ground, among others, that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, and on this ground alone, as appears from the order, the motion was granted. It is earnestly contended by counsel for appellant that the verdict was sustained by a clear preponderance of the evidence, and hence that it was error to set it aside. But the rule is well settled in this court that, though the evidence is conflicting, if the judge of the trial court is satisfied that the verdict is contrary to the weight of the evidence, it is his duty to grant a new trial. Hall v. The Emily Banning, 33 Cal. 522; Dickey v. Davis, 39 Cal. 565; Sherman v. Mitchell, 46 Cal. 576; Irving v. Cunningham, 58 Cal. 306. And the rule is also equally well settled that a motion for new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or decision is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court, and that an order granting a new trial on this ground will not be reversed on appeal, unless it appears that there was a manifest abuse of such discretion. Gerold v. Brunswick & Balke Co., 67 Cal. 124, 7 Pac. Rep. 306; Pico v. Cohn, 67 Cal. 258, 7 Pac. Rep. 680; Breckenridge v. Crocker, 68 Cal. 403, 9 Pac. Rep. 426; Nally v. McDonald, 77 Cal. 284, 19 Pac. Rep. 418. It would subserve no useful purpose to state at length the facts of the case, as they are shown by the record. We have carefully read all the evidence, and, while we are not entirely satisfied that the conclusion reached by the learned judge of the court below was correct, still we cannot say that any such abuse of the discretion with which he was clothed appears as would justify this court in reversing the order. We advise, therefore, that the order be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

FRANCAIS v. SOMPS. (No. 13,524.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 29, 1891.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — TITLE OF ACT — MINING CORPORATIONS—POSTING ACCOUNTS.

1. Act March 30, 1874, entitled "An act for the better protection of the stockholders in corporations formed under the laws of the state of California for the purpose of carrying on and conducting the business of mining," and imposing on directors of mining corporations the duty of making and posting itemized monthly accounts or balance-sheets, is not invalid under Const. art. 4, § 24, as containing more than one subject.

2. The directors of a corporation formed for the purpose of mining, which chooses officers, disburses money, incurs liabilities, etc., must make and post the itemized accounts required by this statute, although they never carried on or conducted the business for which they were formed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by Francais against Somps. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

T. I. Bergin, for appellant. J. J. Dwyer, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This action is brought to recover $1,000 against the defendant as a director of the Yosemite Queen Gold, Silver & Lead Mining Company, a corporation, for omitting to cause to be made and posted an itemized account or balance sheet on the first Monday of November and December, 1886, and the first Monday of January, 1887, as required by the provisions of an act amendatory of an act entitled "An act for the better protection of the stockholders in corporations formed under the laws of the state of California, for the purpose of carrying on and conducting the business of mining," approved March 30, 1874. That an action of this kind may be maintained has been settled in Loveland v. Garner, 71 Cal. 541, 12 Pac. Rep. 616; Beal v. Osborne, 72 Cal. 305, 13 Pac. Rep. 371; Schenck v. Bandmann, 81 Cal. 231, 22 Pac. Rep. 654; Chapman v. Doray, 89 Cal. 52, 26 Pac. Rep. 605. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The first point presented in appellant's brief is that the subject of the act is not sufficiently expressed in its title. But under the decision in People v. Parvin, 74 Cal. 552, 16 Pac. Rep. 490, the title is sufficient to satisfy the provision of the constitution relating thereto.¹

The second point is that, if the statute be constitutional, this case is not within its provisions; the argument being, in effect, that the object of the act as expressed in the title is for the better protection of the stockholders in corporations formed for the purpose of carrying on and conducting the business of mining, and that the evidence shows, without conflict, that this corporation was not carrying on or conducting the business of mining. We think the findings of the court are justified by the evidence, and the court finds that at all the times in the complaint mentioned the corporation had a duly-appointed president, superintendent, and secretary, and that during the months of October, November, and December, 1886, said corporation disbursed certain sums of money and incurred indebtedness and liabilities, and had a certain sum of money on hand during said month of October, 1886, and thereafter, till and including the first Monday of November, 1886; and that during said months of November and December, 1886, and January, 1887, the directors, of whom the defendant was one, failed and neglected to make or cause to be made the itemized accounts or balance-sheets of the business of said corporation, or the accounts or reports or statements of the superintendent by said act required to be made, or any itemized accounts or balance-sheets whatever, and failure to cause said superintendent to make or file with the secretary, or forward to the office of said company, the monthly and weekly reports, accounts, and statements, or any or either of them, as are by said act required. If the law imposed the duties specified upon the directors of corporations actually carrying on or conducting the business of mining, the contention of appellant's counsel would be unanswerable; but the law imposes such specified duties upon the directors of corporations formed for the purpose of carrying on and conducting the business of mining. There can be no question of the formation of this corporation for that purpose, although it was very feebly, if at all, prosecuted. The itemized accounts or balance-sheets and reports would have shown very little, but that little might in some cases be of interest to stockholders, and we cannot apply the maxim, de minimis non curat lex, in this case, because we think the law under which this action is prosecuted does care for small things. It does not except them, and we do not feel authorized to. Judgment and order affirmed.

BLUM v. McHUGH, Constable. (No. 13,952.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 29, 1891.)

APPEAL—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—NEW TRIAL.

Where a new trial is granted on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict, the supreme court will not disturb the ruling, unless there has been a clear abuse of discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; Jos. P. JONES, Judge.

Action by Simon Blum against William McHugh. Judgment for defendant. Judgment set aside, and new trial ordered. Defendant appeals from the order granting new trial. Affirmed.

Chase, Chase & Miller, for appellant. W. S. Tinning, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an appeal by defendant from an order of the court below setting aside a verdict and judgment in favor of defendant and granting a new trial. The new trial appears to have been granted upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict; and in such a case we do not disturb the ruling, unless where there has been a clear abuse of discretion. The action was to recover certain hay on a farm that had been leased by Stewart, the owner of the farm, to Chubbuck & Son. The defendant, McHugh, who was a constable, claimed to have taken the hay by virtue of a writ of attachment against said Chubbuck at the suit of one McHarry. Stewart had assigned the lease and all rights which he had under it to the plaintiff, Blum. The lease provided that "the title to and right of possession of all crops" on the farm "shall be in" the lessor Stewart, until the rent shall be paid. The whole amount of rent which Chubbuck was to pay was $950; and it seems from the evidence—stated in the opinion of the court when granting the new trial—that when this action was commenced the rent had all been paid except about $100, and that Blum had in his possession, in his warehouse, 40 tons of the hay raised on the farm, which Chubbuck had delivered to him. This 40 tons would have been more than sufficient to pay the balance of the rent due. The court seemed to lay some stress on the fact that the defendant (the constable) did not prove that he had a valid writ of attachment under which he acted. But in this case that matter was immaterial. If plaintiff owned the hay still on the farm, the defendant could not have legally taken it as the property of Chubbuck under any writ of attachment, however valid; and if the plaintiff did not own it, then he could not have reclaimed it, although the constable was a mere trespasser. Whether or not plaintiff owned the hay still remaining on the land, or had any lien on it, depended upon the question whether or not the rent had all been satisfied. Plaintiff had another account against Chubbuck, in addition to the rent; and it seems that he (or the firm of Blum Bros.) had also sued out a writ of attachment intending to levy on the hay on the farm as the property of Chubbuck, but, finding that McHarry's attachment was ahead of his, he fell back upon the theory of his ownership or lien under the lease. Now, whether the rent had been all satisfied, or whether some of the hay which Chubbuck had delivered to Blum, or the money arising from its sale, could have been and was rightfully applied on the other account, and not on the rent account, was a question about which there was conflict and confusion of evidence; and therefore, upon this point, we cannot say that the court abused its discretion in granting a new trial. If the fair understanding of the parties was that the hay delivered by Chubbuck and the proceeds of its sale were to be applied first to the payment of the rent; and if, thus applying it, all the rent had been satisfied except about $100, and Blum had still under his control at the warehouse sufficient hay to more than satisfy the balance of the rent due,—then we do not see how he had any ownership of or lien upon the hay still remaining upon the farm. And in that event it would make no difference whether or not the defendant acted under a valid writ of attachment. We have said this much in view of the probability of a new trial. The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order directing the appellant to pay to respondent certain money for counsel fees, expenses, and alimony pendente lite. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground, among others, that no bill of exceptions in the matter of said order has been "served, settled, allowed, approved, or filed." The precise question here presented was passed upon in White v. White, 88 Cal. 429, 26 Pac. Rep. 236, and upon the authority of that case the motion to dismiss the appeal herein must be granted. ALEXANDER v. JACKSON et ux. (No. 13,489.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 29, 1891.)

HOMESTEAD—EQUITABLE INTEREST IN LAND.

J. bought a lot on a contract providing for a deed to him upon payment of deferred payments, in default of which the contract should become void, and the amount paid "forfeited." J. built a dwelling, and made valuable improvements on the lot, and his wife filed for record her declaration of homestead thereon. Several years later, when J. was in default on his contract, he agreed with A., who had full knowledge of the declaration of homestead, to sell to him the dwelling-house and improvements, and assigned to him the contract. A. paid the amount due on the contract, and received a deed in fee to himself, whereupon he demanded possession, when J.'s wife was, for the first time, informed of A.'s claim. A. did not demand of her the balance of the purchase money paid by him, nor was there any notice of forfeiture given. Held, under Civil Code, § 1237, providing that the homestead consists of the dwelling on which the claimant resides, and the land on which it stands, and section 1263, providing that the premises shall be a homestead from the time of the filing of the declaration, that the homestead of J.'s wife attached when she filed her declaration, and that, when A. received a deed, he acquired the legal title subject to the homestead interest, and would be compelled to convey the legal title on repayment of the purchase money paid by him. PATERSON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; WILLIAM O. MINOR, Judge.

Proceeding in equity by W. H. Alexander against W. A. Jackson and Mary Jackson. Judgment for defendant Mary Jackson. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part.

Wright & Hazen, for appellant. L. J. Maddux, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The defendant W. A. Jackson, in the year 1884, purchased from Charles Crocker the property described in the complaint for the sum of $150, paying a portion of the price, and taking from him an agreement for a conveyance upon the payment of the remainder in 2 equal payments within 6 and 12 months thereafter. In September of that year, Jackson erected a dwelling-house and made other improvements upon the land, at a cost of about $1,300, and upon the completion of the house the defendants, with their children, moved into the house, and have since occupied it as their home. The money paid for the purchase of the lots and the construction of the dwelling-house was the community property of the defendants; and on August 12, 1885, the defendant Mary duly executed and acknowledged a proper declaration of homestead upon said land and dwelling-house, and on the same day filed it in the office of the county recorder of said county. Jackson made a further payment on account of his purchase from Crocker in October, 1885, and took from him a new agreement, providing for the payment of the remainder in 30 days; and on February 8, 1886, he paid a still further sum, and took an agreement providing for the payment of the remainder in 30 days from that date. Each of these agreements contained the following clause: "If paid as above stated, with three dollars as cost of conveyance, the above-named W. A. Jackson will be entitled to a deed for the above-described lots; otherwise, this agreement becomes null and void, and the amounts now paid shall be forfeited. If forfeited, the said W. A. Jackson shall thereafter be, and he hereby consents to be, tenant of Charles Crocker, liable to be dispossessed upon three days' notice." At the time the last agreement was given him, there was unpaid upon the contract price of the lots the sum of $47.21. October 6, 1887, the plaintiff made an agreement with the defendant W. A. Jackson for the purchase of said dwelling-house and improvements for the sum of $1,500, less such an amount as was to be paid to Crocker upon the agreement for the conveyance of the land, and at the same time Jackson made the following indorsement upon the agreement of February 8, 1886, viz.: "I hereby surrender and relinquish all claims to receive a conveyance of the within property to W. H. Alexander, and authorize him to take and demand the conveyance therefor in his own name. Dated, Modesto, October 6, 1887. W. A. JACKSON,"—and delivered the same, so indorsed, to the plaintiff, receiving from him $100 as part payment for the improvements. A few days thereafter the plaintiff presented the agreement with the indorsement to Crocker, and received from him a conveyance of the land, paying him the balance on said purchase price, amounting at that date to $40.21, and on the 28th of October placed the deed on record in the county recorder's office. On the 3d of November, 1887, the plaintiff paid to Jackson the further sum of $325, and executed to him his promissory note for $1,000, with a mortgage upon the property to secure its payment, thus completing the payment of the $1,500 under his agreement for the purchase of said improvements. Immediately after, he demanded possession of the land and premises from the defendants, which was refused, and in May, 1888, commenced this action in ejectment to recover possession thereof. The defendant Mary had no knowledge or notice of the plaintiff's right or title to the land and premises until November 6, 1887, and at the time of his demand for the possession repudiated any interest of his therein. The defendant Mary has alone made answer to the complaint, and alleges therein her claim of homestead and the invalidity of her husband's assignment of the agreement to the plaintiff. It does not appear whether the defendant W. A. Jackson was ever served with the summons in the action or not, but the court found that he refuses to make answer to plaintiff's complaint, or to join with defendant Mary in making answer thereto. The action was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment was rendered against plaintiff and in favor of the defendant Mary alone. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed upon the judgment roll.

Upon the execution of the contract of sale by Crocker to Jackson on the 8th of February, 1886, the latter became vested with the equitable title to the land, and thereafter Crocker held the legal title to the land in trust for Jackson, to be conveyed to him upon the payment of the remainder of the purchase price. The estate in the land thus conveyed was subject to be impressed with the lien of a homestead as fully as an estate in fee. The declaration of homestead thereon was subordinate to the rights or claim of Crocker; but upon the ripening of the equitable estate into a fee by a conveyance to Jackson of the legal title, in accordance with the terms of the agreement, the homestead claim would attach to the fee and be superior to any claim to the land which accrued after the declaration of homestead was filed for record. The Civil Code does not require a person who desires to make a declaration of homestead to have a fee in the land, or any particular title thereto. "The homestead consists of the dwelling-house in which the claimant resides, and the land on which the same is situated, as in this title provided." Section 1237. "From and after the time the declaration is filed for record the premises therein described constitute a homestead." Section 1265. Whatever be the character of the title or interest in the land held at the time of the filing of the declaration, the claim will attach to such title or interest, and whatever may inure to or grow out of that title will be impressed with the lien equally with the original title. Moore v. Reaves, 15 Kan. 150; Stinson v. Richardson, 44 Iowa. 373; McKee v. Wilcox, 11 Mich. 359; McCabe v. Mazzuchelli, 13 Wis. 478; Thomp. Homest. & Ex. §§ 170-172. After the declaration of homestead had been filed by Mary, her husband could not, by any act in which she did not join, transfer the estate created by the contract with Crocker, and upon which the homestead claim had been impressed. The instrument by which the estate was created was not itself the estate in the land, but the evidence by which that estate was manifested, and in accordance with whose terms such estate could be ripened into a fee. This instrument, being in the name of Jackson, was, after the declaration of homestead was filed, held by him in trust for the community for the purpose of perfecting the title to the land represented thereby, and without any right by his individual assignment thereof to alienate the estate which it represented. The statute has conferred upon the wife as well as the husband the right to create a homestead out of the community property, and when the wife has made the declaration the husband is bound by its effect as fully as though the declaration had been made by himself. Although Jackson had the opportunity, by reason of the instrument being in his name, to make a transfer of the right to receive a conveyance from Crocker by mere indorsement upon the instrument, yet the effect of such transfer to the plaintiff, who took it with full knowledge of the circumstances under which Jackson had held it, and of the rights of defendant Mary in the land which it represented, was to render it, in the hands of the plaintiff, subject to the same trust as it was in the hands of Jackson, and make him a trustee thereof for the same purposes as was Jackson.

The court finds that at the time of the assignment to the plaintiff, and long prior thereto, the "plaintiff had full, actual knowledge and notice of said declaration of homestead, and that defendant Mary claimed and occupied the premises as a homestead," and that on the 6th day of October, 1887, the plaintiff made the agreement with Jackson for the purchase of the dwelling-house and improvements on the land, and that on that day Jackson made the transfer of the agreement hereinbefore set out, and that "the plaintiff never received any assignment or made any contract for the purpose of cheating said defendant Mary out of her homestead." Assuming, then, as we must from these findings, that the transaction between Jackson and the plaintiff was in good faith towards the defendant Mary, and that the plaintiff received the transfer of the Crocker agreement with full knowledge that the land therein described was impressed with the homestead claim, and was charged with knowledge of the law that such homestead or the means by which the title to the land was held could not be alienated by Jackson alone, we must hold that the plaintiff became in equity merely the custodian of the right to obtain the deed, and that, when he received the deed from Crocker, he held the legal title to the land thereby conveyed in trust for the Jacksons, according to their rights, and subject to the homestead claim of the defendant Mary. The court does not find that the plaintiff ever made any purchase of the land from Jackson, but that they merely "made an agreement for the purchase and sale of said dwelling-house and improvements;" and it appears from the findings that Jackson did not, by the terms of his assignment of the contract, attempt to transfer to the plaintiff any right to the land, the assignment itself being but the equivalent of an authority to the plaintiff to receive from Crocker in his own name the deed provided for therein. Viewing these transactions in the light of the circumstances under which they were had, and considering that they were had without any purpose to deprive the defendant Mary of her homestead, we can only say that the good faith under which the plaintiff then acted, as well as all principles of equity, will prevent him from saying now that he thereby acquired any estate in the land which he can hold adversely* to her, or that his relation to her is other than that of a trustee of the estate so acquired by him.

The respondent Mary was not, however, by virtue of such relation, entitled to demand that the plaintiff should immediately make a conveyance to her of the land. Although he held the land in trust for the defendants, as above stated, still it was subject in his hands to the same superior claim for the unpaid amount of the purchase money that it was in the hands of Crocker; and, until that claim had been satisfied, Mary could not demand a conveyance from him. The plaintiff could not, however, assume a hostile relation to her until after she had herself renounced her obligation to discharge this claim.

The provision for a forfeiture at the maturity of the time fixed in the agreement for such payment had not been enforced by Crocker, and his subsequent execution of the deed to plaintiff was a recognition by him that such forfeiture had been waived. If it should be conceded that that provision was not extinguished by his failure to avail himself of it at the time it accrued, yet it could not afterwards be enforced without a demand for payment on his part, and a refusal on the part of Jackson. Armstrong v. Pierson, 5 Iowa, 317. "A condition involving a forfeiture must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created." Civil Code, § 1442. When time is not made of the essence of the contract, it is incumbent upon the party who would terminate the contract to give notice to the other, and a reasonable time within which to do any act required on his part before he can be absolved therefrom. By the terms of the agreement with Jackson, Crocker had a right, in case of non-payment, to declare the agreement null and void, and the previous payment forfeited. Mere failure to make the payment did not, ipso facto, make the agreement void except at the option of Crocker; and such option must have been expressed by proper notice to Jackson. The plaintiff could not enforce this claim assigned to him by Crocker upon any other terms than could Crocker, and his failure to make a demand for the payment left the agreement still in force. The plaintiff obtained the deed from Crocker October 15th, and "immediately after November 3d"—that is, as early as November 4th—made a demand upon the defendants for the possession of the premises. No demand was made by him for the purchase price, nor did he give any notice that he elected to treat the agreement as at an end. Considering the relation which he bore to the defendants in respect to the title to the land held by him for them, he was not, at the time of his demand for the possession or at the commencement of this action, entitled thereto. The fact that when he made such demand the defendant Mary repudiated his title is immaterial. She did not, until the 6th of November, have any knowledge that he had any interest in the premises, or was entitled to receive the unpaid portion of the purchase money; and, after she had such knowledge, no demand was made upon her. It was incumbent on him, in order to put her in default, to inform her of his relation to the property, and his failure to do so took from her repudiation of his claim all significance.

At the trial of the cause the equitable defense presented in the answer was considered by the court, and many transactions between the plaintiff and the defendants not presented by the answer were incorporated by it into its findings. It is evident that the parties presented to the court their respective rights to the premises without much regard to the form of the pleadings, and that the judgment of the court was based more upon the facts disclosed at the trial than upon the issues presented for trial. In its judgment the court directs that the defendant Mary pay to the plaintiff the balance of the purchase price on the lots in question, but makes no direction to the plaintiff respecting a conveyance thereof. There is no averment in her answer of any offer by her to pay to the plaintiff this amount of money, and the plaintiff commenced his action without making any demand therefor. Unless the judgment should direct a conveyance from the plaintiff upon the payment of the money for which he holds the title as security, the payment by Mary would still leave the question of title to the premises unsettled. Considering the entire case as presented by the record, we are of the opinion that complete justice can be best administered to all parties by reversing the judgment and directing a new trial, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings as they may be advised; and it is so ordered.

We concur: BEATTY, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; SHARPESTEIN, J.

PATERSON, J. I dissent. By the conveyance from Crocker the plaintiff became vested with the legal title and the right, as grantee of Crocker, to enforce the contract made between Crocker and Jackson. After the conveyance, he stood in the same position Crocker would have held if no conveyance had been made. Dwight v. Phillips, 48 Barb. 118; sections 1083, 1084, Civil Code. Crocker could not have declared a forfeiture without giving defendants an opportunity to pay the balance, and thus avoid the forfeiture provided for in the agreement. He never had claimed a forfeiture by reason of a failure to make payments at the times required by the contract, and a court of equity would not allow a forfeiture without a reasonable notice to defendants that a forfeiture would be declared unless payment was made. Plaintiff paid Crocker and received his deed on October 15, 1887. On November 3, 1887, plaintiff paid Jackson $335.20, gave him his promissory notes for $1 000, secured by mortgage on the premises, and on the following day he demanded possession of the land; but defendants refused, and ever since have refused, to deliver the same, and no offer has ever been made by defendants, or either of them, to pay plaintiff the balance of the purchase price. In this I think Mrs. Jackson made a mistake. If Crocker had made a demand for possession of the premises, it would have been the clearest kind of a notice that he claimed a forfeiture on account of a failure to pay the balance of the purchase price. It then would have been the duty of the defendants, if they desired to avoid the forfeiture, to immediately, or as soon as they could do so, tender the amount remaining unpaid. The same duty was owing to plaintiff, the grantee of Crocker. His demand was a proper one to make, and was unmistakable proof of his claim of forfeiture, and the right to possession under the terms of the contract. Pom. Spec. Perf. § 393; Doe v. Birch, 1 Mees. & W. 402; Dendy v. Nicholl, 4 C. B. (N. S.) 376. Instead of offering to pay the balance due, as she ought to have done, Mrs. Jackson, the court finds, "repudiated any right, title, or interest of plaintiff in or to said premises, and threatened him with violence if he attempted to take or have possession thereof; and said defendant ever since has denied, and now does deny and repudiate, any right, title, interest, or claim of plaintiff in or to said premises, or any part thereof." Under the contract, payment of the purchase price was a condition precedent. The parties intended—and their intention is expressed in clear language—that the fee should not pass until the purchase money was fully paid. Before defendant Mary can claim a deed, or the right to retain the possession given under the contract, she must pay the purchase price. She cannot claim under the contract, and at the same time repudiate it. The legal title is in plaintiff. He paid a valuable consideration for it; and if the defendants, or either of them, have any defense to his claim for the possession, it must be an equitable defense. One who asks the interposition of a court of equity between himself and the owner of the legal title must show that he is not in fault. That he who seeks equity must do equity, and do it promptly, is a rule especially applicable to contracts of this kind, and particularly in this state. Green v. Covillaud, 10 Cal. 324. Defendant Mary had notice of plaintiff's claim as early at least as November 4, 1887, and had full notice of his rights two days later. This action was not commenced until May 8, 1888. The court finds that each of the defendants was at all times able to pay the balance of the purchase price. Neither of them offered to do so. Six months had passed before plaintiff commenced this action. In view of the fact that no tender of the balance had been made up to that time, it is not likely that a court of equity, after such delay without excuse, would have relieved the defendant Mary from the forfeiture that had been incurred, even if she had offered in her answer to pay the balance and all costs that had been incurred by the plaintiff; but not only was no such offer made, but she still repudiated the claim of the plaintiff, and, so far as the record shows, still denies that he has any interest in the property, or that the defendants owe him any duty. To entitle a party who is in default under such circumstances to relief, it must appear that he has promptly and in good faith offered to do what his contract required him to do, and neither infancy nor ignorance of his rights is a sufficient excuse. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 452; Conrad v. Lindley, 2 Cal. 175; Steele v. Branch, 40 Cal. 11; Grey v. Tubbs, 43 Cal. 364; Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 18, 20; Marshall v. Means, 12 Ga. 68; Cross v. Carson, 8 Blackf. 138; McClartey v. Gokey, 31 Iowa, 509; Jones v. Robbins, 29 Me. 353; Wells v. Smith, 2 Edw. Ch. 83; Hancock v. Carlton, 6 Gray, 58, 59. The indulgence or non-action of the plaintiff from the time he demanded possession until the commencement of this action cannot be taken as a waiver of the forfeiture. Kerns v. McKean, 65 Cal. 416, 4 Pac. Rep. 404. "The vendor is not bound to wait indefinitely after the failure of the purchaser to comply with the terms of his agreement. If the payments are not made when due, he may, if out of possession, bring his ejectment and recover possession." Railroad Co. v. Mudd, 59 Cal. 590. The court below, recognizing the rule that "he who asks equity must do equity," say that it would be inequitable to allow the defendant to retain the possession of the land without paying to plaintiff the balance of the purchase price. It was adjudged and decreed, therefore, "that defendant Mary Jackson pay to plaintiff the sum of forty-seven 21-100 ($47.21) dollars, balance of purchase price paid on the lots involved, with interest on the same at seven per cent. per annum from date hereof." In this I think the court erred. There is no power in a court of equity to grant relief on a ground not claimed, and on which one of the parties has not had an opportunity to be heard. The question whether defendant Mary should be relieved from the forfeiture was not in issue, and the court could not consider it. Bank v. Mitchell, 73 N. Y. 415. Even where evidence was given of an offer to pay the full amount due after the action was commenced, this court held that it was new matter, which ought to have been pleaded. Hegler v. Eddy, 53 Cal. 599. In the case at bar, defendant Mary has never offered to pay the plaintiff anything, but has at all times denied that he had any interest in or right to the property, and has asserted that he conspired with her husband to cheat and defraud her out of her homestead right. Judicial amnesty of one who has without just cause expressed such repudiation, charges, and defiance continuously down to the date of the decision, it seems to me, would be mutilated equity. There is no precedent for relief from forfeiture under such circumstances. To add to the injustice of allowing the defendants after such conduct to tender to plaintiff the balance of the purchase price, and require him to convey the legal title to them, it appears from the record that the plaintiff paid the full value of the property to Jackson, and that the latter and his wife have ever since remained in possession of the property. The record does not show affirmatively that the defendant Mary has had the benefit of the money paid by plaintiff to her husband; but, as the money paid was community funds, and they have always lived together, it must be presumed that they enjoyed it jointly.

MATTHEWS v. JONES et al. (No. 14,227.)²

APPEAL—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

Where an appeal is brought on a judgment roll in which there is no bill of exceptions, exceptions to the instructions of the court, printed in the transcript, cannot be considered, as they form no part of the judgment roll.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Benito county; JAMES F. BREEN, Judge.

Ejectment by Hugh Matthews against James M. Jones and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Montgomery & Scott, for appellants. Briggs & Hudner, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The action is ejectment for the recovery of 320 acres of land situate in the county of San Benito. The case was tried by a jury; verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring this appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll, in which there is no bill of exceptions. There was a general demurrer to the complaint, which was properly overruled by the court, and no specific objection to the complaint is made here. What purport to be instructions of the court to the jury are printed in the transcript, and appellants contend that some of them are erroneous. As they constitute no part of the judgment roll, they were improperly included in the transcript, and cannot be considered. As it appears that the appeal is without merit or plausible excuse, and was evidently taken for delay alone, I think the judgment should be affirmed, with $200 damages.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed, with $200 damages.

PEOPLE v. MITCHELL. (No. 20,787.)³

FORGERY—INFORMATION—INSTRUCTIONS—VERDICT—EVIDENCE.

1. An information which charges that defendant did "unlawfully, feloniously, and fraudulently make and forge a certain check," and did "falsely, fraudulently, knowingly, feloniously, and with intent to defraud, prejudice, and damage one M., utter, publish, and pass the" same, is fatally defective, in that the part charging the forgery fails to allege that it was done with intent to defraud. DE HAVEN, J., dissenting.

2. The second part of such information, charging the passing of the forged instrument, is also fatally defective, in that it fails to allege that defendant knew that the instrument was forged; Pen. Code, § 470, providing that a person passing a forged paper must, to be guilty of a crime, know that the paper was forged. DE HAVEN, J., dissenting.

3. Such information gains no additional strength when its charging parts are joined together and taken as a whole. DE HAVEN, J., dissenting.

4. To say that "defendant forged a check" implies a false making as fully as to say that he "falsely forged a check."

5. Conceding that one part only of such information was defective, a verdict of guilty as charged will be set aside, where the court instructed the jury that they should convict if the evidence showed either a forgery of the check or the passing thereof, the evidence being such that, under the instructions, it would be impossible to say on which portion of the information such verdict was based.

6. Where all the evidence against defendant on trial for forgery was given by an expert on handwriting, who by a comparison with the genuine writing of defendant testified that in his opinion the face of the check was written by defendant, such evidence is insufficient to sustain a conviction, even if the words "face of the check" included the signature.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. MURPHY, Judge.

Fred Mitchell was convicted of forging and uttering a certain check, and appeals. Reversed.

Carroll Cook, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The charging part of the information is as follows: "That the defendant did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, and fraudulently make and forge a certain check, an instrument in writing, in the words and figures following, to-wit, * * * and, having indorsed thereon the words 'Fred J. Mitchell,' did," etc., "willfully, unlawfully, falsely, fraudulently, knowingly, feloniously, and with intent to defraud, prejudice, and damage one M. J. McBride, utter, publish, and pass the said false and forged check and instrument in writing hereinbefore set forth, and said indorsement thereon, to said M. J. McBride as true and genuine." There are various matters relied upon by appellant as error arising during the progress of the trial, but it will only be necessary to notice a few of the more important assignments. The information is fatally defective, and the motion in arrest of judgment should have been granted. It will be observed that the charging part of the information consists, as it were, of two branches; that the defendant is charged with making and forging a certain check, and with uttering and passing the same with intent to defraud. This character of pleading has been recognized and approved in the cases of People v.

Shotwell, 27 Cal. 394, and People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 513; and it is there decided that, under such an information, evidence of the false making of the check, or of uttering and passing the same knowing it to be forged, or evidence both of the making and uttering, will sustain a verdict of guilty. Under the portion of the information charging the felonious making and forging of the check, there is no allegation that such acts of the defendant were done with intent to defraud. Forgery is a statutory offense, and the intent to defraud is the essential element, and must be alleged in the information in order that the judgment of conviction upon such a charge will have sufficient support.

As to the portion of the information charging the passing and uttering, it is alleged that the defendant "did willfully, unlawfully, falsely, knowingly, and feloniously, with intent to defraud, utter, pass, * * * as true and genuine, the said false and forged check." Section 470 of the Penal Code provides that the defendant, at the time he utters and passes the instrument as genuine, must know the same to be "false, altered, forged, or counterfeited;" and the allegation that he falsely and knowingly uttered and passed as genuine a false and forged check cannot be construed to mean that he knew the check was false and forged at the time he uttered and passed it. For these reasons we think the charging part of both branches of the information is fatally defective when taken separately, and it gains no additional strength when joined together and taken as a whole.

Appellant insists that the information is also defective, in alleging that "the defendant did make and forge," the statute using the words "falsely make and forge." The Century Dictionary thus defines the verb "forge:" "To fabricate by false imitation; specifically, in law, to make a false instrument, in similitude of an instrument, by which one person could be obligated to another, for the purpose of fraud and deceit." The words "forge," "forger," and "forgery," when used in law, have no honest meaning, but imply fraudulent deceit; and to say that "the defendant forged a check" would imply the false making fully to the same extent as if it was said "he falsely forged a check."

In this case the court instructed the jury that it was their duty to convict the defendant if the evidence sufficiently disclosed either a forgery of the check or an uttering and passing of the check. This instruction was entirely correct if those two elements of the charge had been properly pleaded, but, as we have seen, neither was properly alleged, and consequently the instruction was wrong in both regards; but, aside from that, the jury found the defendant guilty as charged in the information. He was charged with forging the check, and uttering and passing it, and the jury was told he could be convicted of either under the law. Now, even conceding that one of these elements of the offense only was fatally defective by reason of bad pleading, then the judgment must be reversed; for it is impossible to say, under the instructions of the court and the evidence introduced, but that the jury based their verdict upon the portion of the information which was absolutely void. No presumption can be indulged in to support the judgment in this respect, for the jury was told that it could find the defendant guilty under either branch of the information.

The evidence in the case is very weak. All the testimony indicating that the defendant forged the check was given by one Gumpel, an expert upon handwriting, who, by comparison with genuine writing of the defendant, testified that in his opinion the face of the check was written by the defendant. Conceding that the face of the check included the signature, still there is no evidence in the record to indicate but that Thompson, the purported drawer of the check, had authorized the defendant to attach his signature thereto. Indeed, there is no evidence that there is or ever was such a person in existence as the said Thompson. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; HARRISON, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

DE HAVEN, J., (concurring specially.) In my opinion, the information in this case is sufficient, but I concur in the judgment upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. The only evidence that the check described in the information was a forgery, or that defendant knew its character when he transferred it, consisted of the testimony of one Gumpel, based upon a comparison of the check in question with certain writings proven to be in the handwriting of defendant. This witness was asked whether, in his opinion, the face of the check and the writings referred to were in the same handwriting. In answer to which "the witness testified that, in his opinion, the check and examples in evidence were all written by the same person." This is not sufficient proof that the signature to the check was a forged one. Whether the signature to this check was genuine or false was a material fact in the case, and the attention of the witness should have been directed to this. The record in this case leaves it in doubt whether the witness meant to say anything more than that the body of the check was in the handwriting of the defendant, but the jury should not have been compelled to guess as to his meaning, when a specific question would have made the matter clear.

GREEN v. REDDING. (No. 13,308.)

LEASE — REPAIRS — ABANDONMENT OF PREMISES.

Under Civil Code, § 1941, requiring the lessor to put buildings intended for human occupation in a condition fit for occupancy, and section 1942, providing that the lessee, after notice to the landlord of dilapidations, may either repair at the expense of the landlord or vacate the premises, a lessee of a dwelling who discovers the premises to be in an untenable condition cannot abandon the premises, so as to relieve himself from liability on the lease, without notice to the landlord to repair, where the lease was executed by both parties in good faith.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. HOGE, Judge.

Action by Fred H. Green against Joseph D. Redding. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Horace W. Philbrook and Arthur Rodgers, for appellant. W. H. L. Barnes, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action is for the recovery of $400 for rent claimed to be due by virtue of a written lease of a "residence and premises, including the furniture therein, on the corner of Octavia and Pine streets, in the city of San Francisco, and known as 'Number 1,716 Octavia Street,' with the appurtenances, for the term of six months." The lease is an exhibit to, and made a part of, the complaint. The answer admits the due execution of the lease, but denies that any rent is due under it, and sets up as a defense that, at the time of the execution and delivery of that instrument, the leased premises were in an untenable condition, and unfit for the occupation of the defendant and his family; that they were filthy from want of care upon the part of the landlord, and unsafe for that reason for the occupation of defendant and his family; that as soon as he ascertained their condition he vacated and delivered up the premises, and has not occupied them at any time during the period covered by the lease. It is not alleged therein that the landlord was guilty of the least bad faith or deception towards the defendant, or that the latter entered into the contract in any other way than of his own free will and accord, and with full opportunity to demand and make inspection of the premises, and satisfy himself of their condition, before entering into the contract. The proposition advanced by him seems to be that it is the duty of the landlord, in all cases where he rents such premises as here involved, to see to it at the peril of a rescission of a contract of lease that the premises shall be clean and safe to live in, notwithstanding the tenant may not have insisted, as a careful man would, as a condition precedent to entering into the lease, that he should inspect the premises, and be satisfied with their condition, and although the lease does not contain a warranty or anything whatever putting any responsibility for the condition of the premises upon the landlord. In other words, that there is an implied warranty in such a letting that the premises shall be fit for the purpose for which they are leased. The findings of the court were responsive to the issues raised by the pleadings, and found that the matter set up in defense was true. Upon them a judgment was given and made in favor of the defendant, from which this appeal is taken.

The question for determination is whether, under such a contract, entered into by both parties in good faith, the tenant can rescind the contract after abandoning the premises, and be free of all responsibility for rent, when the landlord, as in this case, was willing to put the premises in such condition, upon short notice, as they might require, so as to render them safe and habitable, and where the tenant had given him no notice even that they must be put in that condition. The evidence as to the condition of the house is conflicting, so that the whole matter depends for its solution upon whether the facts set out in the findings are sufficient in law to uphold the judgment. In Van Every v. Ogg, 59 Cal. 565, it was said: "The tenant takes the premises for better or for worse, and cannot involve the landlord in expense for repairs without his consent;" quoting Mumford v. Brown, 6 Cow. 475. The Civil Code, § 1942, however, gives the option to the tenant, after notice to the landlord, to make repairs not requiring an expenditure of more than a month's rent,—the same to be deducted from the rent,—or to vacate the premises discharged from performance of the conditions of the lease. The preceding section of the same Code (1941) provides that "the lessor of a building for the occupation of human beings must, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, put it in a condition fit for such occupation, and repair all subsequent dilapidations thereof which render it untenable, except such as are mentioned in section 1929," being deteriorations occasioned by the hirer's "ordinary negligence." It is insisted that the section last cited by operation of law inserts in every lease a covenant on the part of the landlord to repair. But, bearing in mind that at the common law no such covenant was implied, and reading the two sections together, the intent seems clear that the obligation of the landlord should be limited by the extent of the privilege conferred upon the tenant; that is, it is the duty of the landlord to repair upon notice, and if he does not perform this duty he is to be compelled to pay by deducting from the rent to the extent of a month's rental, or, at the option of the tenant, the term be concluded without redress to the landlord. In the present instance no notice was given, as we have seen, to the landlord, nor was he allowed to repair to the fullest extent, as he offered; but the tenant threw up the lease, abandoned the premises, and refused to abide by his contract entered into by both parties in good faith. We do not think that he can, under the law, be permitted thus to escape the effect of his contract, uninfluenced by any act of the landlord of deception or fraud, when, as a proposed tenant, he had it in his power, before entering into the contract, to visit and inspect the premises if he chose to do so, and, if inspection could not be had from any cause whatever, could have refused to enter into the contract. To say otherwise is to declare that an individual desiring to rent premises may see the outside thereof, never insist on looking minutely inside, and when he is satisfied, after taking possession, that they are not safe, can, notwithstanding the contract of the lease he has made, which does not contain any warranty of the landlord, and which is entered into honestly and fairly upon both sides, rescind the contract, without notice to the landlord to put the premises in proper condition, and even going further, and refusing him any opportunity to do so. This would be placing the burden of looking out for the health of one's family on the landlord, and leaving the husband and father without any responsibility therefor in renting a house for them to live in. An inspection of the decision just quoted and sections 1932, 1941, and 1942 of the Civil Code is, it seems to us, conclusive of the matter. The findings do not support the judgment, and we are therefore of opinion that it should be reversed, and we so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order refusing a new trial are reversed.

PEOPLE v. CARROLL et al. (No. 20,778.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 30, 1891.)

ALTERATION OF INDICTMENT—HARMLESS ERROR—OBSOLETE INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In a trial for robbery the information was against defendants "and John Murphy," but was withdrawn against Murphy, and some one connected with the court, after arraignment and before trial, erased the words "and John Murphy" by drawing a black-ink line through them. Defendants were convicted. Held, that while the act of erasing was unauthorized, yet, as it did not prejudice defendants, it was not ground for reversal.

2. In a trial for robbery, defendants asked the court to instruct the jury that "any fact in favor of a defendant is sufficiently established when proven by a preponderance of evidence, and, even though as to such fact the jury have some doubt, if it has been proven by a preponderance of evidence, they must acquit." Held, that the instruction asked for was too obscure to warrant a reversal for its refusal.

PATERSON, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. McM. SHAFER, Judge.

James Carroll and James Bradley were convicted of robbery, and appeal. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellants. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The defendants were convicted of robbery, and appeal from the judgment, from an order denying a new trial, and from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment. The main point made by appellants is that the original information was altered after arraignment and plea, and before trial. The facts are that the information charged the appellants and also one John Murphy. It appears that afterwards the information was withdrawn as against Murphy, and that some one connected with the court erased the words "and John Murphy," and the word "and," where it occurred in another place, by drawing a black line through the same. This was certainly an unauthorized and dangerous act; and if it did not appear clearly what the alterations were, and that they could not have prejudiced or injured appellants, the consequence might have been serious. But as the alterations clearly appear, and as they could not "have actually prejudiced defendants, or tended to their prejudice, in respect to a substantial right," they are not good grounds for a reversal of the judgment, no matter how censurable the act of making them. We hope, however, that this case will not be taken as a precedent for similar conduct hereafter.

We do not think that, under the circumstances detailed by the bill of exceptions, the court abused its discretion in curtailing the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness, or of sustaining the objections to the questions asked him.

The objection to evidence of a certain conversation between appellants and a police officer, upon the ground that it did not appear that appellants were acting voluntarily, and uninfluenced by promises or threats, is not tenable. It does appear that the conversation was voluntary, and without being influenced by the officer. Neither was there any material error in sustaining objections to certain questions asked by appellants' counsel of the witness Egan. It does not appear that he was present at the time of the alleged assault. Moreover, he testified without objection as follows: "I saw the Chinaman, the prosecuting witness, there. I did not see the defendants there at all. I did not see anybody doing anything to the Chinaman at all."

We see no error in the instructions to the jury. In the instruction mainly objected to, given by the court of its own motion, the word "evidence" is either a misprint or was used inadvertently instead of "defendant," and could have done no harm. Moreover, the precise instruction, with the word "defendant" in its proper place in the sentence, was given at the request of defendant, as follows: "No fact in the case can be considered as sufficiently proven by a preponderance of evidence, and facts against the defendant must be proven by even more than a preponderance of evidence; they must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt." As this instruction was asked by appellants, they cannot object to it. And there was no error in denying the fourth instruction asked by appellants. It was as follows: "Any fact in favor of a defendant is sufficiently established when proven by a preponderance of evidence; and even though, as to such fact, the jury have some doubt, if it has been proven by a preponderance of evidence they must acquit." This language is obscure, and before a judgment will be reversed for a refusal to give an instruction the meaning of the proposed instruction must at least be clear. The meaning of the proposed instruction here is probably that, if a jury have "some doubt" whether a fact in favor of defendant has been proven by a preponderance of evidence, "they must acquit." But this proposition cannot be maintained. In People v. Bushton, 80 Cal. 160, 22 Pac. Rep. 127, 549, and kindred cases, the lower court had affirmatively instructed that on a trial for murder the defendant must show circumstances of mitigation, justification, or excuse by a preponderance of evidence,—by evidence stronger than that of the prosecution; and this court held that such affirmative instruction was wrong, and that the defendant should be acquitted "if, upon the whole case, they entertained a reasonable doubt from the evidence of his guilt." But that is very different from saying that, if a jury had some doubt whether a defendant had proven a fact in his favor by a preponderance of evidence, they should acquit.

We think that the case was fairly submitted to the jury. The real question in the case was whether the evidence warranted a conviction. But the determination of that question rested upon the credibility of certain testimony, a matter clearly within the proper province of the jury. The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

PATERSON, J. I dissent. The court erred, I think, in permitting the prosecution to show that the defendant had asked a police officer whether the charge could be reduced to petty larceny. Whart. Crim. Ev. § 655; State v. Emerson, 48 Iowa, 172. I think the court erred in excluding the question asked by defendants in the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness, Loo Goon.

SHEPPERD v. TYLER. (No. 13,044.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 30, 1891.)

SURVIVAL OF ACTION—DEATH OF PARTY PENDING APPEAL—LIABILITY OF ADMINISTRATOR.

Where a defendant in ejectment died after executing an undertaking on appeal, pursuant to Code Civil Proc. § 945, that, if the judgment be affirmed, or the appeal dismissed, he would pay the value of the use and occupation of the premises pending the appeal, the right of action for such use and occupation survived against his estate, to be collected from it as any other claim, or from the sureties on the undertaking, and not against the administrator personally, who collected rents of the premises.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by one Tyler against one Shepperd for rents collected as administrator of the estate of one McCauley of certain premises during the pendency of an appeal from a judgment in ejectment. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

D. H. Whittemore, for appellant. E. P. Cole, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. In an action of ejectment for certain land in San Francisco,—Brumagin v. McCauley,—pending in the superior court of San Francisco, judgment was rendered June 9, 1882, in favor of the plaintiff from which an appeal with an undertaking staying execution was taken to this court. That judgment was affirmed, and the remittitur filed in the superior court April 4, 1885. Pending this appeal the plaintiff herein, February 2, 1884, succeeded to the rights of the plaintiff in that action, and on the same day the defendant herein was appointed the administrator of the estate of McCauley, who had died intestate after the appeal was taken. The land in controversy had been rented by McCauley in his life-time, and after his death the tenant attorned to the defendant herein as administrator, paying him as rent for the premises in the aggregate the sum of $75, which was applied by him in the administration of the estate of McCauley. Upon the affirmance of the judgment in this court the defendant herein directed the tenant to attorn to the plaintiff herein, and thereafter to pay the rent of the premises to her. The plaintiff afterwards brought the present action, alleging ownership of the premises on the 2d day of February, 1884, an ouster by the defendant on that day, and that thereafter until April 4, 1885, the defendant took and received the rents and profits of the land, amounting to $495, and prayed judgment for the value of the same. Judgment was rendered in her favor for $242, from which, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

The court found as facts "that on 2d February, 1884, the defendant unlawfully entered on the possession of said land, and ousted and ejected the plaintiff therefrom, and kept her so ousted and ejected for the period of eight months; that during said eight months defendant took and received to his use all the rents, issues, and profits of said land and the tenements thereon." These findings are unsupported by the evidence. There was no evidence before the court that the defendant was ever in possession of the land, or had ousted the plaintiff therefrom, nor was there any evidence that the defendant took or received more than $75 of the rents, issues, and profits of the land; and it was shown that he took and received them not to his own use, but for the use of the estate of which he was administrator. There can be no ouster of a person from the possession of land unless such person was entitled to the possession. The undertaking staying execution pending the appeal, which was given by McCauley, deprived the plaintiff in ejectment of all right to any possession of the land until the determination of such appeal, and the plaintiff herein could have no greater right of possession than had her predecessor. The undertaking on the part of McCauley "that he will pay the value of the use and occupation of the property from the time of the appeal until the delivery of possession thereof" (Code Civil Proc. § 945) operated, by virtue of the statute, to give to him a lease of the land during that period in consideration of the obligations contained in the undertaking; and when the plaintiff herein became the owner of the land she took it subject to this outstanding lease. And, as in the case of any other lease, the agreement to pay the value of the use and occupation was a personal obligation of the defendant who appealed, and upon his death survived against his estate, to be collected as any other claim against it. The profits which he might receive from its use, or the rents which he might collect from his tenant, was his own property, and such rent, as well as the term created by such statutory lease, belonged to his estate. The defendant herein, as his administrator, incurred no personal liability by collecting such rent during the period that the statute authorized him to retain possession of the land. The remedy of the plaintiff herein must be sought from the estate of McCauley in the ordinary mode of prosecuting claims against an estate, or from the sureties upon such undertaking. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

FARNUM V. HEFNER. (No. 14,195.)

ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE—WHAT AMOUNTS TO.

A lessee executed an assignment of the lease, and gave it to the lessor for his written consent, as required by the terms of the lease. The lessor refused to consent to the assignment, and retained possession of it, so that it was never delivered to the assignee. Held, that there was no breach of the covenant against assigning, and the leasehold was subject to execution against the lessee.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; P. O. HUNDLY, Judge.

Action by C. E. Farnum against Philip Hefner. Judgment for defendant. Affirmed.

Carter P. Pomeroy, for appellant. H. V. Reardan, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This cause has been here before, (79 Cal. 575, 21 Pac. Rep. 955,) where the facts pertaining to it are fully stated. It was contended on that appeal that Hefner, the defendant, was entitled to certain wheat which had been grown upon Farnum's land by a tenant named Butler, by virtue of an execution sale of the interest of Butler to Hefner in the leasehold; and in support of this view the judgment roll in the action of Hefner against Butler was offered in evidence by Hefner, and refused by the court. The court here held that this should have been admitted, because the transfer of the leasehold interest of Butler by the execution sale was an involuntary assignment of the lease, which was not specified in the lease as a forfeiture thereof; the opinion on the point reading thus: "The covenant in the lease is the ordinary kind, which applies, it seems to us, to a voluntary, and not an involuntary, assignment of the lease. It is firmly established by authority that under such a covenant an involuntary assignment by sale under execution—bankruptcy and the like—is not a violation of the covenant, and does not work a forfeiture." 79 Cal. 580, 21 Pac. Rep. 957, and authorities cited. The effect of the decision, then, was to reverse the judgment which Farnum had obtained against Hefner for damages for conversion of the wheat raised on the leased premises by Butler, and claimed by Farnum, as also the order denying Hefner a new trial. It is now contended by Farnum, the appellant, that the lease was forfeited by a written assignment to one Gibbs by Butler before the judgment of Hefner against Butler was obtained; and this seems to be the only point made as against the decision of the court below on the last trial. The court found, among other things, "that at the date of the levy of the said execution the interest or estate vested in said D. L. Butler by virtue of the execution and delivery of said lease was still vested and remained in him." The facts pertaining to that matter, as they appear in the record, are that the assignment of the lease, although written out and acknowledged, was never delivered to the proposed assignee, Gibbs, who had been the foreman of Butler in raising the wheat, and was upon the premises for Butler; the reason for the non-delivery thereof being that the permission of Farnum, which was sought to be indorsed on the assignment, was refused when the document was sent to him for that purpose, and he thereafter retained possession of it, and it never reached the hands of Gibbs or any one for him. There was, therefore, no breach of the condition against assigning the lease growing out of that transaction. We therefore conclude that there is no prejudicial error appearing in the record, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

In re TAYLOR'S ESTATE. (No. 14,251.)

WILLS—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—OPINION EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1870, declaring that an intimate acquaintance may give in evidence his opinion respecting the mental capacity of a person, in connection with the reasons upon which it is based, the opinion of such a witness, in the contest of a will on the issue of testamentary incapacity, is admissible only as to the mental soundness of the deceased, and not as to his capacity to make the will.

2. Where evidence is erroneously admitted in the contest of a will, in regard to the lack of testamentary capacity on the part of the deceased, and the jury find that certain fraudulent representations were made to the deceased by one of the legatees, and that by reason of such representations the deceased was induced to execute the will, it cannot be said that these issues were so independent of that relating to testamentary capacity that the jury may not have been influenced in their findings by the said evidence, and the error in admitting it must therefore be deemed to have been prejudicial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge.

This was a proceeding to annul and set aside an order admitting to probate the will of Simpson P. Taylor. From a judgment annulling and setting aside the said order this appeal is taken. Reversed.

J. A. Barham, (A. E. Bolton, of counsel,) for appellant. D. R. Gale, for respondent. J. R. Leppo, for Maud M. Berghstrom.

DE HAVEN, J. On December 24, 1889, the superior court of Sonoma county admitted to probate a certain will of Simpson P. Taylor, deceased, dated October 29, 1889. Thereafter a petition was filed in that court asking that the order admitting said will to probate be annulled and set aside upon the alleged grounds of the incompetency of the deceased to make said will, and also because at the time of making the same he was acting under the influence of certain fraudulent representations, alleged to have been made by one C. C. Taylor, one of the legatees named in the will. Special issues were submitted to the jury, involving every question in issue, and the jury found, in substance, that all the allegations of the petition were true. Judgment was thereupon entered annulling and revoking the probate of said will, and this appeal is from that judgment and an order denying a motion for a new trial.

1. Mrs. Harriet Wetmur was a witness for contestants, and during her direct examination she was asked: "Will you tell the jury whether or not, in your judgment, from conversations you had with him, seeing what you saw, and knowing what you knew, and now know, about it whether, in your judgment, on the 29th day of October, 1889, Simpson P. Taylor was capable of making a will?" This question was objected to as incompetent and irrelevant; the objection was overruled, and the witness answered, in substance, that the deceased was not capable of making a will. The court erred in overruling the objection to this question. Under section 1870, Code Civil Proc., the opinion of an intimate acquaintance respecting the mental capacity of a person is admissible, the reason for the opinion being given; but there is a wide difference between such an opinion and one as to the quantum of intelligence or mental capacity that in law is deemed sufficient to enable one to make a valid disposition of his property. The latter involves a question of law as well as of fact, and was in this case the very thing for the jury to determine from the evidence, and under the instructions of the court. The precise question was before the supreme court of Alabama, in the case of Walker v. Walker, 34 Ala. 470; and the court, in passing upon it, said: "Capacity to make a will is not a simple question of fact. It is a conclusion which the law draws from certain facts as premises. Hence it is improper to ask and obtain the opinion of even a physician as to the capacity of any one to make a will. Under our system, that question was addressed to the jury. All evidence which tended to shed light on his mental status—the clearness and soundness of his intellectual powers—should have gone before them. This being done, however, the witness should not have been made to invade the province of the jury." The case from which we have just quoted was cited and expressly approved by this court in Conner v. Stanley, 67 Cal. 315, 7 Pac. Rep. 723. In that case the validity of a contract made by a deceased person in his life-time was a question in issue, and the court held that it was error to allow the witness to give an opinion as to the competency of the deceased to make contracts with people who came to him and claimed to be mediums, and "whether or not they would have any undue influence over him." So, also, in Gibson v. Gibson, 9 Yerg. 329, the inquiry was as to the competency of a testator to make a will, and a witness was asked "whether, from the situation in which he saw the old man on that morning, and from the facts which he had just stated to the jury, he believed the old man was then in his senses, and capable of making a will." The court held this to be improper, saying: "The latter part of the question, 'capable of making a will,' as it involved a question of law and fact, and the very question to be determined by the jury, was entirely illegal." To the same effect are the cases of Fairchild v. Bascomb, 35 Vt. 398; Farrell v. Brennan, 32 Mo. 328; Runyan v. Price, 15 Ohio St. 1. In this case it would have been proper for the witness to have given an opinion as to the mental soundness of the deceased in connection with the facts upon which the opinion was based. The jury could then have judged of the value or weight of such opinion, by a consideration of the reasons upon which it was based; and if they deemed the opinion correct, and that the testator was not mentally sound, the next question for them would be whether such mental unsoundness affected his capacity to make a will; and in passing upon this, in addition to considering the fact of such mental unsoundness, the jury would have to be guided by the instructions of the court as to the nature and degree of mental unsoundness which would render the testator incapable of disposing of his property. But, in allowing this witness to answer the question referred to, not only was the province of the jury invaded, but that of the court also, and the whole issue of law and fact was determined by the mere opinion of the witness. What has been said applies also to evidence of the same general character given by other witnesses.

2. The jury also found that certain specific fraudulent representations were made to the deceased by one of the legatees, C. C. Taylor, and that by reason of such false and fraudulent representations the deceased was induced to execute the will in question. We think the evidence was sufficient to justify these findings; but we cannot say that these issues were so entirely independent of that relating to the testamentary capacity of the deceased that the jury may not have been influenced in their findings upon this branch of the case by the erroneous evidence already referred to, in regard to the want of testamentary capacity upon the part of the deceased. It cannot, therefore, be said that, upon the whole case, the error in admitting this evidence was harmless. The jury may have in a great degree based their finding that the deceased was influenced by the false representations of C. C. Taylor, and thereby induced to execute the will in question, upon his want of capacity to make a will,—his inability to understand the true relation of things. If the jury had believed him to have had the capacity to make a will, it may be they would have found that he was not unduly influenced by the alleged false representations. Judgment and order reversed.

CRIMINAL LAW—OPENING STATEMENT OF COUNSEL—CHALLENGES TO JURORS.

1. Where the evidence is sufficient in a criminal prosecution to justify the verdict, it is immaterial whether or not the district attorney fully stated it in his opening to the jury.

2. Where a defendant is represented by counsel, the neglect of the court to inform him of his right to challenge jurors, as required by Pen. Code, § 1066, is not prejudicial.

Carrol Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

McFARLAND, J. The appellant was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and appeals from the judgment and order denying him a new trial. The evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict; and it was immaterial whether or not the district attorney fully stated all the evidence and facts in his opening statement to the jury. There was sufficient proof of the venue, (People v. McGregor, 88 Cal. 140, 26 Pac. Rep. 97,) although, as to that matter, the prosecution showed great carelessness. We see no error in the matter of instructing the jury.

The appellant suffered no prejudice from the neglect of the court to inform him of his right to challenge jurors, as provided in section 1066 of the Penal Code, as he was represented by counsel, (People v. Mortier, 58 Cal. 266,) unless we are to assume that his counsel was incompetent. Courts, however, should never allow such a point to get into a case. If judges, when trying criminal cases, would keep the Code before them, and look into it occasionally, they could avoid many technical exceptions which arise out of the failure to perform mere routine duty. We see no error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

RODDAN v. DOANE. (No. 13,901.)

CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE—EVIDENCE—PARTNERSHIP DEBT.

1. Where the notice required creditors to present their claims against an estate at a certain attorney's office, a claim left with the clerk of the attorney for the administratrix on the day specified was a valid presentation of the claim.

2. Where plaintiff, in an action against an estate for money received to plaintiff's use, claimed under a contract with decedent and his copartner, and the evidence failed to disclose that any money belonging to plaintiff was individually received by decedent, a judgment for plaintiff was not sustained by the evidence.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Action for money had and received by Hugh Roddan against Carrie O. Doane, administratrix. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. W. McGraw, for appellant. Young & Powers, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Defendant appealed from the judgment on a bill of exceptions within 60 days after its rendition. The action was for money had and received by defendant's intestate, and it is contended that the claim presented to the administratrix had not been rejected before the commencement of the action. The notice to creditors required them to present their claims to the administratrix at the office of E. W. McGraw, Esq., 318 California street, San Francisco. June 25, 1889, plaintiff went to the office indicated, and the administratrix not being present, left his claim for her, and took a receipt for it signed by McGraw, through his clerk. McGraw was an attorney at law, and the place indicated was his office, and presumptively his clerk was authorized to receive papers for him. But the notice did not require or authorize the presentation to McGraw, but to the administratrix at this office. Is such a presentation good, in the absence of the administratrix? The precise question does not seem to have been passed upon by this court, but in Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 7, 21 Pac. Rep. 375, the court considered the sufficiency of a notice requiring claims to be presented to the administrator at the office of his attorneys; "the same being his place for the transaction of the business of the estate." This was held to be a compliance with the Code, which directs the administrator to publish a notice requiring presentation of claims "at the place of his residence or business to be specified in the notice." The court said: "It seems to us that the words, 'place of his business,' should be construed to include the place where the administrator transacts the business of the estate, though he may be engaged in transacting some kind of business elsewhere. To hold otherwise would often render it quite inconvenient for creditors to present their claims at all. For example, the administrator may live and be carrying on a farm many miles distant from the county-seat, where most or all of the creditors reside, or he may live and be employed in a workshop in some obscure part of a city, not easily accessible." The rationale of this decision goes the full length of respondent's contention; for, to avoid the inconvenience supposed, it is necessary to hold good a presentation at the office while the administrator is absent at his farm or workshop. The requirement that claims must be presented before suit can be instituted is for the protection of the estate, and implies that an opportunity will be afforded to creditors to present their claims. Here the administratrix certainly did not expect to remain at McGraw's office; and it seems necessary to hold either that such a presentation is good in her absence, or that such a notice is void. We think it must be held that such a presentation is good. We see no point in the suggestion that the claim was left with the clerk. The Code requires that it be presented to the administrator, and does not authorize the attorney to act for him. It follows, also, that it must be held that the claim was presented when left at the office. It is important for the claimant to know when the claim was presented and to be able to prove such fact. The administrator cannot prejudice the claimants by requiring claims to be left with his attorney, to be by him presented at his convenience, or not at all. The claim having been duly presented on the 25th day of June, and not acted on for 10 days, the claimant had the right to consider it rejected; and this right was not affected by the fact that the administratrix demanded proofs and vouchers.

The next important question raised is whether the evidence shows that Marshall Doane did receive any money belonging to plaintiff or his assignors, Steinman & Roddan. Doane & McBean contracted with the state of California to do work under the drainage act (St. 1880, p. 123,) and Steinman & Roddan were subcontractors. The contract under which they performed work is not set out or proven, but McBean testified that they sublet to them a portion of the work. Steinman & Roddan were to furnish the material and do the work. That seven-twelfths of $6,060.34 and two-thirds of $4,179.10 belonged to them. He gave them an order on the comptroller for the amount, because they were to be paid in warrants. The suit is against the estate of Marshall Doane, and the point is made in the answer that McBean is a necessary party. It is necessary for plaintiff to show, not that Doane & McBean received the money, but that it came to the personal possession of Marshall Doane. The drainage act having been declared unconstitutional, (People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624,) a contract was drawn purporting to be between Doane & McBean, as partners, of one part, and Steinman & Roddan of the other part; but it was signed by Doane individually. This agreement specifies the amount due from first parties to second parties for work and materials, recites that the money is being withheld by the state, and expenses will be incurred, and the parties therefore stipulate to pay the expenses in proportion to their claims, and "that after said claims shall have been fully adjusted, and all expenses paid, and before any warrants shall issue for the payment of the same, or any part thereof, the proceeds or residue of said sums of money shall be owned, held, and possessed as follows." The proportion in which the parties shall then be owners of the funds is then repeated. The contract then sets out that the parties of the first part sell and assign to the parties of the second part their proportion of the claims, to take effect from the date, Doane to represent and manage the claims, without the power to alienate except as to 15 per cent., which he may dispose of without being accountable therefor. July 22, 1889, McBean, surviving partner of Doane & McBean, executed a document wherein he states that he desired to ratify and confirm the conveyance by Doane, above recited, and therefore "I hereby sell and assign and set over to Hugh Roddan * * * all my right and interest of said firm of Doane in and to," etc., said proportion of the claim. In 1885 the legislature passed an act appropriating money for the payment of these claims, and this act was held valid by this court. Miller v. Dunn, 72 Cal. 462, 14 Pac. Rep. 27. It would appear from these facts that plaintiff became the owner, as between himself and Doane & McBean, of a fixed proportion of the claims against the state, but here plaintiff's case seems to break down. There is no evidence at all that Doane individually received any money from the state on account of any claims in which plaintiff was interested. The evidence which plaintiff claims establishes this essential fact is: First. The payment of the warrants by the state. These were all paid to the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. upon the indorsement of Doane & McBean, and presumably placed to the credit of that firm. The evidence fails to show whether the indorsements were made by Doane or McBean, or either of them, or who received the money from the bank. And, second, certain statements of Doane that he had received all his money without paying the 15 per cent. These declarations do not show that any money was received by Doane individually. They are all just as consistent with the idea that the money went to the firm, when the surviving partner would be liable. The evidence does not show that Doane had the sole management of the affairs of Doane & McBean, nor that McBean after a few months had nothing further to do with the management. On the contrary, it appears that he did participate; for we find that he gave an order on the comptroller in favor of plaintiff and himself which transferred to them warrants for more than $5,000. This finding of the court is properly excepted to, and we think is not sustained by the evidence. The judgment should be reversed and a new trial had, and we so advise.

Peter J. C. Campbell, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to require Hon. E. P. Colgan, state comptroller, to draw his warrant on the treasurer in favor of the petitioner for the sum of $250. The application is based upon an act of the legislature, approved March 31, 1891, the material portion of which reads as follows: "The sum of $250 is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay James W. Rankin for services in the state treasurer's office, during the period elapsing from November 13, 1884, to December 15, 1884, both dates inclusive, under appointment by Governor George Stoneman, on account of the delinquencies of Arthur January, deputy state treasurer." Respondent filed an answer denying that the petitioner has ever performed any services for the state except such as had been fully paid for, and claiming that the act referred to is unconstitutional and void, in that it violates the provisions of subdivision 29 of section 25 and sections 31 and 32 of article 4 of the constitution, because it attempts to award extra compensation to an officer after the service has been rendered, or is a gift of public money. The act is not void on its face. It does not purport to award extra compensation, and we cannot assume that the legislature intended to do so. The nature of the services rendered under and by virtue of his appointment by Gov. Stoneman does not appear. As chief executive of the state, the governor always has full power to protect public property. We must presume that the legislature before passing the act, and the governor before approving it, made inquiry as to the nature of the services for which the petitioner claimed compensation, and found that the claim was legal and just. The act, on its face, is at least as fair and free from suspicion as the one which we had under consideration in Stevenson v. Colgan, 27 Pac. Rep. 1089, (filed November 16, 1891.) We held there that, the act being valid on its face, no authority is conferred upon the court to look into evidence aliunde to determine whether it was a gift in violation of the provisions of the constitution. It follows that the matters set up in the answer of the respondent herein cannot be considered, and that the petitioner is entitled to the writ prayed for. It is ordered that writ of mandate issue under the seal of this court commanding the respondent, as comptroller of the state, to draw his warrant on the treasurer of the state in favor of the petitioner for the sum of $250.

CONVERSION OF PLEDGE.

1. Where friends of defendants paid certain creditors the full amount of their several demands, with the knowledge, but without the direction, of defendants, and not out of their assets, nor under any promise or expectation of repayment, and thereby made a preference of such creditors, and induced them to sign a composition deed, by which the other creditors agreed to receive pro rata the proceeds of the sale of defendants' assets, and thereupon to release them from all claims, and the preferred creditors thereby received a larger sum than they were entitled to under the composition deed, such preference is fraudulent, and the deed invalid.

2. In an action for the conversion of $18,000 worth of stock, the court found that the stock was deposited as security for money loaned to plaintiffs by defendants; that when plaintiffs demanded the stock there was due on the loan $8,000, with $37 interest; and that the $8,000 was paid. Defendants contended that the conversion alleged was not established, because the interest was not paid or tendered. Held, that defendants' point was of no avail, on the maxim of de minimis non curat lex.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Jarhoe, Harrison & Goodfellow, (Edward R. Taylor, of counsel,) for appellants. Wal. J. Tuska, for respondents.

McFARLAND, J. The main question in this case is about the validity of a composition deed, by which the respondents and the other creditors of appellants agreed to receive pro rata the proceeds of the sale of appellants' assets, and thereupon to release them from all claims and demands. Respondents contend that said agreement is invalid because a fraudulent preference was given to certain of the creditors who signed it, and the court below so found. The court found as facts that some of the creditors at first refused to sign the agreement, and that, to induce them to sign, "some of the relatives and friends of the defendants did pay such creditors the full amount of their several demands, with the knowledge, but without the direction, of the defendants, and not out of the assets of the said defendants, nor under any promise or expectation of repayment, and thereby did make a preference of such creditors, and induced them to sign the said composition; and that such creditors did receive a larger proportion or sum than secured by said agreement; of all of which facts the plaintiffs at the time of signing such composition were ignorant, and upon the discovery thereof notified the defendants," etc. We think that the ruling of the court below was right, and in line with the current of authorities. The general rule is correctly laid down in Story, Eq. Jur. § 378; and we stated it quite fully in the recent case of O'Brien v. Greenebaum, (Cal.) 28 Pac. Rep. 214. It is strenuously argued by counsel for appellants that the principle does not apply here, for the reasons that the payments to the preferred creditors were not made by the debtors or their agents; and particularly that the payments were not made out of the debtors' assets,—that is, out of the actual and disposable property which they then had. It is to be noticed, however, that the appellants knew of these secret payments to preferred creditors; and, as the utmost good faith is required in such transactions, the appellants can hardly be said to be innocent of the imposition practiced upon respondents. But, beyond all that, the rule does not, by any means, rest solely upon the participation of the debtor in the fraud, and the diminution of the actual assets. In a composition agreement each creditor is a party as to each other creditor as well as to the debtor. "Creditors sign upon the consideration that others sign upon the same terms, and, if they are deceived, they are misled into an act to which they might not otherwise have assented." See Story, Eq. Jur. § 379, and notes. Solinger v. Earle, 82 N. Y. 393, was a case where a brother-in-law (as in the case at bar) had given his note to induce a creditor to sign a composition deed; and in the opinion of the court in that case there is aptly expressed the views which are determinative of the point in question against appellants in the case at bar. The court say: "The agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants to secure to the latter payment of a part of their debt in excess of the ratable proportion payable under the composition was a fraud upon other creditors. The fact that the agreement to pay such excess was not made by the debtor, but by a third person, does not divest the transaction of its fraudulent character. A composition agreement is an agreement as well between the creditors themselves as between the creditors and their debtor. Each creditor agrees to receive the sum fixed by the agreement in full of his debt. The signing of the agreement by one creditor is often an inducement to the others to unite in it. If the composition provides for a pro rata payment to all the creditors, a secret agreement, by which a friend of the debtor undertakes to pay to one of the creditors more than his pro rata share, to induce him to unite in the composition, is as much a fraud upon the other creditors as if the agreement was directly between the debtor and such creditor. It violates the principles of equity, and the mutual confidence as between creditors, upon which the agreement is based, and diminishes the motive of the creditor who is a party to the secret agreement to act in view of the common interest in making the composition. Fair dealing and common honesty condemn such a transaction."

2. We think that there was sufficient evidence to support the finding of the court that the shares of stock mentioned in the complaint were deposited by respondents with the appellants as security for certain loans of money made by the latter to the former, and not upon any other account; and that when respondents demanded said stock of appellants there was due upon said loan account $8,000, and $37 interest. At the time of the demand respondents paid to appellants (and the latter received it) the said $8,000, but nothing was said about the $37 for interest, and it was not paid. And it is now contended by appellants, among other things, that respondents did not establish a technical conversion of the stock mentioned in the complaint, because said $37 was not paid or tendered. But it is evident that the item of interest was overlooked or forgotten by both parties. Appellants did not refuse to deliver the stock because this item of interest was not tendered. They received the $8,000 as the amount due on the loan, and did not demand or call attention to the interest. They delivered to respondents at the time they received the $8,000 other stocks which had been pledged in the same way; and they evidently refused to deliver the stocks mentioned in the complaint because they contended, as they still contend, that they were held upon the stock account as well as upon the loan account. Under these circumstances, and without considering other views presented on the question by counsel for respondents, it is sufficient to say that the item of interest was so small, when compared with the $8,000 received and the $18,000 worth of stock involved, that we are justified in determining the point against appellants upon the maxim, de minimis non curat lex. Judgment and order affirmed.

An ordinance which fixes the license of a peddler of meats "from a vehicle" at $75 per quarter, and the license of all other peddlers at $10, irrespective of the commodity peddled, is valid. BEATTY, C. J., and DE HAVEN, J., dissenting.

In bank. Petition by George Heyleman for habeas corpus.

The petitioner was tried before the police court of the city and county of San Francisco, and committed to jail upon a sworn complaint charging that upon August 1, 1890, "he did unlawfully engage in and carry on the business of peddling meats from a vehicle in said city and county," thereby violating the provisions of sections 2 and 8 of order 1589 of the board of supervisors, as amended by order 2216 of the said board. Prior to the passage of order 2216 there had been one general provision, uniform in its character, fixing the rate of license for peddlers, viz., $10 per quarter, irrespective of the character of the commodity peddled. This had been the rate established for the 10 years next preceding. Order 2216 left the rate the same as to all peddlers except as to a peddler of meats from a vehicle or basket, and fixed the latter's license at $75 per quarter. The petitioner contended that this was an unreasonable and unjust discrimination, and that his commitment to jail was consequently illegal. Petition dismissed.

PER CURIAM. Ordinances similar to that which petitioner was convicted of having violated have frequently been considered by this court. The validity of such ordinances is not now an open question here. We are unable to discover any legal ground upon which the petitioner could be discharged. Petitioner remanded to the custody of the chief of police of the city and county of San Francisco.

St. 1887, (Ex. Sess. 1886,) p. 29, providing for the organization of irrigation districts, and for the issuing of bonds for irrigation improvements with the assent of a majority of the voters of the district, is not in violation of Const. art. 11, § 18, prohibiting certain public corporations from incurring indebtedness "without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof;" the constitutional prohibition being limited to "county, city, town, township, board of education, or school-district" corporations.

This is a petition for a rehearing. The case was previously argued and decided against the petitioners in 28 Pac. Rep. 272. Rehearing denied.

PER CURIAM. In their petition for a rehearing appellants have called attention to the fact that in the opinion heretofore rendered the court has failed to pass upon two propositions urged by them in their appeal, and request that, if in the opinion of the court these propositions are untenable, it be so stated, in order that there may be no occasion for another appeal in which to present them for consideration. It does not follow from the fact that the propositions were not discussed in the former opinion that they were not fully considered. Because each proposition urged in the briefs of an appellant is not taken up and discussed seriatim, it does not follow that they have not all received due consideration. A due regard for the amount of business before the court and the time allowed for its disposition compels us to limit the opinions in the several cases to such principles and rules of law as will be a guide to the courts below in disposing of the case upon its return, and a rule of action for the citizens of the state in their subsequent transactions. The proposition again called to our notice by the appellants in their petition for a rehearing, that the act in question is in violation of the provision of article 11, § 18, of the constitution, prohibiting certain public corporations from incurring indebtedness "without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof, voting at an election to be held for that purpose," cannot be maintained. This prohibition in the constitution is limited to the public corporations enumerated in that section, viz., "county, city, town, township, board of education, or school-district," and, under familiar rules of construction, cannot be extended to any other public corporation. Many of the sections of this article of the constitution include in their provisions "any public or municipal corporation," (sections 10, 12, 16,) while the provisions of section 19 are limited to a "city," and of section 11 to a "county, city, town, or township." In view of the fact that different provisions are made in the constitution for different classes of public corporations, it must be held that the prohibition in section 19 is limited to the corporations which are therein designated. For such other corporations for municipal purposes as under the provisions of section 6 the legislature might, by general laws, authorize to be incorporated, the constitution has left to the legislature power to provide the terms and conditions upon which an indebtedness may be created, as well as its amount. At the time that the constitution was framed and adopted there were many other public corporations in the state, such as reclamation and irrigation districts, that had been organized for many years, and, if it had been the intention to subject all such corporations to the prohibition, we must conclude that express language therefor would have been inserted in the constitution. The case of Harshman v. Bates Co., 92 U. S. 569, cited by the appellants, is inapplicable. The constitution of Missouri had required the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors of a "county, city, or town" as a prerequisite to a subscription for building a railroad, and it was held that the legislature could not confer authority upon a "township" to vote a credit for such subscription; that while counties, cities, and towns had a corporate character and organization, a township was only a geographical division of the county, and that the provision of the constitution prohibiting a county from voting such credit could not be evaded by authorizing these several geographical subdivisions of the county to vote such credit. The fact that the town of Madera is included within the boundaries of the Madera irrigation district neither renders the act unconstitutional nor invalidates the organization of the district. This principle was discussed and was sustained in Board v. Tregea, 88 Cal. 334, 26 Pac. Rep. 237. The objection that the land within a town or city cannot be benefited by a system of irrigation, and therefore cannot be taxed for such improvement, proceeds upon an erroneous view of the power of taxation. While the benefit to the land is assumed as the basis of the assessment, still, as was said in Lent v. Tillson, 72 Cal. 428, 14 Pac. Rep. 71, such benefit is not the source of the power. Even though the land is not susceptible of irrigation, yet it may be benefited by the improvement, and should bear its proportion of the burden upon the same principle that land in a city which can make no use of a sewer or other street improvement is nevertheless deemed to receive a benefit from its construction, and is required to pay a portion of its cost. The object of the act is the improvement of the district as an entirety, and the extent of the district, as well as the lands to be included therein, has been left to be determined by the discretion of the board of supervisors. Whether they have properly or improperly exercised such discretion cannot be investigated by the courts. The act cannot be declared unconstitutional by reason of any improper exercise of such discretion. Neither is it in violation of the constitution to incorporate into such district a town or city that has been incorporated for other municipal purposes. A system of irrigation contemplated by the act in question cannot be considered as a "municipal purpose," within the scope of the organization of a city or town, and there can be no conflict between a corporation organized under the act to produce a system of irrigation within the district and the municipal incorporation of the town of Madera. A water supply for the two corporations is distinct and for different purposes. The liability of the inhabitants of the town of Madera for the bonded indebtedness of the Madera irrigation district, as well as for that of their own municipality, does not impair the validity of the organization of the district. It is a liability of the same character as rests upon the inhabitants of any town for its proportion of all the indebtedness of the county within which it is situated. Rehearing denied.

TOWN OF ARCATA v. ARCATA & M. R. R.
Co. (No. 13,929.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 9, 1892.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—CONTROL OF STREETS —RAILROAD COMPANIES—GRANT OF RIGHT OF WAY—FORFEITURE OF GRANT.

1. Under Civil Code, § 465, conferring authority on railroad companies to lay their tracks on any highway or street subject to the condition of section 470, that the right to do so within any incorporated city or town must be granted by a two-thirds vote of the municipal authority from which the right must emanate, a board of trustees of an incorporated town may grant the use of the streets to a railroad for a side track.

2. Where such right is granted, it is not revocable at the mere pleasure of the board, but there must be failure on part of the road to comply with the terms of the grant before the privilege can be recalled.

3. Civil Code, § 468, providing that, after beginning the construction of its road, a railroad company must complete, every year, at least five miles of the road, under penalty of forfeiture of the right to extend its road beyond the point completed, does not apply to the construction of switches and side tracks.

4. Where a town has granted the use of a street to a railroad for the purpose of laying a side track, the right of the company thereto, in the absence of a statutory provision declaring a forfeiture for a failure to complete the work within a reasonable time, can be determined only by judgment of forfeiture in an action commenced directly for that purpose.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Ejectment by the town of Arcata against the Arcata & Mad River Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Turner & Coonan and J. N. Gillett, for appellant. Buck & Wheeler, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The defendant was incorporated in July, 1881, for the purpose of constructing and operating a railroad from the northern end of Humboldt bay to the north fork of Mad river, on a line passing through Arcata, which is an incorporated town. In due time thereafter the road was constructed. In March, 1885, the defendant applied to plaintiff's board of trustees for the privilege of constructing and operating a side track between certain points within the town limits, and an order was made by the board granting to defendant "the right to lay and maintain a side track from Dean & Campbell's switch across Seventh street, to and down J street, to Tenth street, to intersect with the said track in Sharp's field, subject to such rules and conditions as the board of trustees may think proper and just." Nothing was said in the order as to the time within which the work was to be commenced or completed. The distance between the points named is about four and a half blocks. Two disconnected pieces of track covering a distance of about three and a half blocks were laid in 1885. Nothing further was done until September 10, 1888, when the gap between the two sections was filled, and the switch or side track was completed. On August 8, 1888, the board of trustees passed an order—of which defendant had notice before the work was completed—rescinding the order of March 9, 1885, granting defendant the privilege of constructing a side track, it appearing to the board that, up to that time, the company had not taken advantage of the privilege granted; and on July 16, 1889, a resolution was adopted directing the institution of a suit to compel defendant to remove the track. The complaint is in ejectment form. It alleges plaintiff's ownership, subject to the right of the public to use the land as a street, defendant's unlawful entry, and ouster of plaintiff, and its continued obstruction of the street. The answer consists of a general denial, and a claim that defendant is rightfully in possession under the order of March 9, 1885, and by virtue of the acts performed and money expended in pursuance of the franchise therein granted. It is claimed by appellant that the trustees had no power to grant the use of the streets to the defendant for a side track on which to run cars for loading and unloading; but there can be no question, we think, as to the right of the legislature to delegate to municipal boards the power and discretion to say whether a railroad shall be laid in the streets, and, if so, where and under what conditions. The authority to construct the road on any highway or street is conferred by the legislature, (section 465, Civil Code,) subject to the condition that the consent of two-thirds of the members of the council or board must be obtained before any street or avenue of an incorporated city or town can be taken for such purpose. Section 470, Civil Code. Defendant obtained such consent in 1885.

There is no merit in the contention that the order of March 9, 1885, was a mere license revocable at the pleasure of the board. After the defendant had acted upon the terms of the order, and expended money in the construction of the road, the board could not rescind or recall the privilege it had granted, unless the company failed to comply with the terms or conditions of the grant.

If this or any other action can be maintained against defendant, it must be upon the ground that the defendant, through its failure to complete the construction of the side track when it should have been completed, has forfeited its right to maintain the same. Respondent insists that such a question cannot be considered in an action of this kind; that a forfeiture must be judicially established in a direct proceeding on the part of the people, and cannot be brought up collaterally in an action of ejectment. At common law a forfeiture did not operate to divest the title of the owner, or to restore to the government the thing granted, until a judgment of forfeiture had been obtained in a suit instituted for that purpose. After such judgment, under the doctrine of relation, the title was carried back to the owner as of the time of the happening of the event or the commission of the offense upon which the estate was conditioned; but where the statute provides that a failure to pay at a certain time or to complete the contemplated work within a certain time shall work a forfeiture, no action is necessary to enforce the forfeiture. In such a case, upon the happening of the event of the commission of the offense which is the statutory basis of forfeiture, the title to the thing forfeited immediately vests in the state. Rush v. Jackson, 24 Cal. 316; Borland v. Lewis, 43 Cal. 572; Oakland R. Co. v. Oakland, B. & F. V. R. Co., 45 Cal. 379; Upham v. Hosking, 62 Cal. 257. There is some language employed in the opinion in People v. Railway Co., (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 673, which appears to hold that a forfeiture must in all cases be judicially declared, but the learned justice who wrote the opinion was not then considering the question of forfeiture based upon a failure to perform the work within statutory time. We do not think that section 468 of the Civil Code is applicable to this case. That section is as follows: "Every railroad corporation must, within two years after filing its original articles of incorporation, begin the construction of its road, and must every year thereafter complete and put in full operation at least five miles of its road, until the same is fully completed; and upon its failure so to do for the period of one year, its right to extend its road beyond the point then completed is forfeited." These provisions apply to the main road provided for in the company's articles of incorporation, and not to every switch or side track which the company may find necessary for the proper conduct of business and the convenience of the public after the road has been put in operation. The switch or side track under consideration was a mere convenience in the operation of the road which defendant was incorporated to construct and operate. It was no more a part of the work referred to in section 468 than the site for a depot or landing-place in a street of the town would be. The right to use the street for a switch upon which to run cars for the purpose of loading and unloading was a privilege that operated to the mutual benefit of the defendant and its patrons, the public. The board of trustees could have named the conditions upon which the company might exercise the privilege granted, including the time of the commencement and completion of the work, and could have provided that, upon a failure to perform such conditions, the right to the franchise would be forfeited. The order of March 9, 1885, stated that the privilege was granted "subject to such rules and conditions as the board of trustees may think proper and just." But the board has never fixed any time, or named any conditions, upon which the right of the company to act and enjoy the franchise granted should depend.

It is a general rule, applicable to legislative grants of the right to use public lands for a particular purpose, that, where the time within which the grantees are to accept the franchise is not fixed in the grant, the grantees must signify their acceptance by commencing the work within a reasonable time, and by prosecuting the same to completion with ordinary diligence. Rush v. Jackson, supra. But if it be conceded that such a rule is applicable to a municipal order like the one before us, it does not follow that this action can be maintained. In the absence of a statutory provision or municipal ordinance or order declaring a forfeiture for a failure to complete the work within a reasonable time, the right of the company to the use of the street could be terminated only by a judgment of forfeiture in an action commenced directly for that purpose. U. S. v. Grundy, 3 Cranch, 351.

WESTPHAL v. NEVILLS. (No. 13,611.)

ACTION ON NOTE—WANT OF CONSIDERATION

In an action against joint makers of a note, one of defendants pleaded want of consideration, in that the money was loaned to his co-defendant on the verbal agreement that it should be repaid in a few days, and for no other consideration, and that defendant received no part of the money so loaned. Held insufficient.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. HOGE, Judge.

Action by Henry Westphal against W. A. Nevills and R. L. Hopkins on a note. Judgment for plaintiff. Nevills appeals. Affirmed.

Campbell & Wright, for appellant. L. J. Hardy, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The complaint alleges that on the 22d day of May, 1888, the defendants, in consideration of the sum of $850 then and there loaned to them, made their promissory note, as follows, viz.: "$850.00. San Francisco, May 22d, 1888. On the 22d day of June, 1888, we promise to pay to the order of Henry Westphal eight hundred and fifty dollars, with interest at the rate of — per cent. until paid. Principal and interest payable in United States gold coin, for value received. R. L. HOPKINS. W. A. NEVILLS." The only defense presented by the appellant was a want of consideration, in this: That the money "was loaned and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant Hopkins upon the verbal agreement, then and there made to the plaintiff by the defendant Hopkins, to pay said sum of money to the plaintiff in a few days, and upon and for no other further or additional inducement or consideration whatever, and before the execution of said promissory note by this defendant; that this defendant received no part of the said sum of money so loaned by the plaintiff to the defendant Hopkins, and received no benefit or advantage whatever therefrom." This allegation presented no defense to the action. By the terms of the note the appellant is liable as a maker. The matter set up in his answer would have the effect to contradict his express promise. It was not necessary that the appellant should have received any benefit for his promise; a detriment to the plaintiff—the time given to Hopkins within which to make the payment—was sufficient consideration to support the promise of the appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

BARNEY v. VIGOREAUX. (No. 13,641.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 5, 1892.)

ACTION ON NOTE—COMPLAINT.

In an action on a promissory note, part of which has been paid, a complaint which fails to allege that some part of the note has not been paid is fatally defective.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. HOGE, Judge.

Action by Barney against Vigoreaux. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

I. N. Thorne, for appellant. W. H. Allen, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The record shows that the plaintiff brought his action against the defendant upon a promissory note, of which a copy is contained in the complaint. Copies of several receipts of payments which it is alleged were indorsed upon said promissory note are set out in the complaint, and plaintiff demands judgment for $340, balance of principal, with interest, etc. There is no allegation that no part of the sum for which said note was given, except the sums indorsed upon it, has been paid. The defendant did not appear in the action, although there was proof of the service of summons upon him, and his default was regularly entered, and judgment thereon entered against him, and within 10 days thereafter he gave notice of a motion to vacate said judgment. The motion was heard and denied, and from the order denying that motion, and the judgment, the defendant appeals. The omission to allege in the complaint that some part of the said note had not been paid constituted a fatal defect, for which the judgment must be reversed. Frisch v. Caler, 21 Cal. 71; Davanay v. Eggenhoff, 43 Cal. 395; Scroufe v. Clay, 71 Cal. 123, 11 Pac. Rep. 882. It is unnecessary to consider the questions raised and discussed by counsel upon the motion to vacate the judgment, as the reversal of it accomplishes all that was sought by that motion. Judgment and order reversed.

ANDERSON v. RICHARDSON. (No. 14,042.)

BOUNDARIES—MONUMENTS—COURSE AND DISTANCE.

1. For the purpose of identifying and locating artificial monuments in a deed to plaintiff, the court admitted in evidence a written contract to convey made by a former owner of the land in dispute, together with parol testimony showing that, in pursuance of the contract, the monuments in question were located by a surveyor, and that the descriptions in the deed to plaintiff's predecessor were made from the report of the surveyor. Evidence was also admitted, by one of the surveying party, as to the location of the monuments. Held, that all this evidence was competent.

2. Where monuments mentioned in a deed are identified, they control both courses and distances given, whether they were seen by the parties to the deed or not.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; J. G. PRESSLEY, Judge.

Ejectment by Anderson against Richardson. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. Rutledge, W. E. McConnell and J. A. Barham, for appellant. A. B. Ware, J. J. Geary, and H. A. Powell, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Action of ejectment, and the matter in dispute is as to the true location of the line separating the land of plaintiff from that of defendant. The defendant recovered judgment.

1. The evidence is sufficient to justify the findings, and the court did not err in its rulings upon the admission of evidence. It appears that on March 22, 1882, the Gualala Mill Company and William Bibler were the owners of the land described in the complaint, and upon that day conveyed the same to Platt and Boyd, to whose title the plaintiff has succeeded; so that the real question in controversy is whether any part of the land of which defendant is in possession, and to which he claims title, is within the description contained in the deed made by said mill company and Bibler to the grantors of plaintiff. The description of the land so conveyed to the grantors of plaintiff, so far as necessary to be here stated, is as follows: "Commencing at the upper gatepost on the county road leading from Fisk's Mills to Fisherman's bay; * * * thence north, 36½ degrees west, 51 chains, to a stake with rock mound on shore; thence, leaving the shore, north, 37 degrees ten minutes east, 100 chains, to a stake; thence * * * to a redwood tree with three stems; * * * thence * * * to Kruse & Uhler's fence," etc. It will thus be seen that in describing the boundaries of the land conveyed the deed refers to certain artificial monuments; and for the purpose of identifying them, and ascertaining their location, the court admitted in evidence a written agreement, dated January 23, 1882, made by the Gualala Mill Company with one Boyd, (one of plaintiff's predecessors,) whereby the mill company agreed to convey to said Boyd within 60 days, or as soon before that time as a proper survey could be made, a portion of the German rancho, together with parol evidence that one Wackenreuder was selected by the parties to make the survey, which he did, and that he located on the ground the stakes referred to in said deed, and that the description given in the deed was made from the report of his survey, and that the deed to Boyd and Platt was executed in performance of the former agreement to convey to Boyd. There was also evidence given by one of the persons who assisted in the Wackenreuder survey as to the location of the stakes set in making that survey. All of this evidence was competent. The deed made by the mill company and Bibler to Boyd and Platt refers to certain artificial monuments on the ground, and which, necessarily, must have been erected by some one before its date. The evidence of the prior contract and the survey of Wackenreuder were relevant and competent for the purpose of identifying these monuments; and, when identified, such monuments would control both the courses and distances given in the deed, if there was any conflict. It is not a material circumstance that Boyd did not, in fact, see the line as actually located on the ground by the Wackenreuder survey. The monuments are controlling, whether in fact seen by the parties to the deed or not. Judgment and order affirmed.

SALE OF DECEDENT'S LAND.

Where a testator devises all his property in trust to his executor, and the executor, in proceedings by him for confirmation of a sale of land, moves to dismiss his own petition before the hearing, on a satisfactory showing that the sale had in fact been made by him as trustee, it is error for the court to deny the motion.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 28 Pac. Rep. 227.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing of this cause is denied, but the court desires to modify its opinion heretofore filed. The case does not require a decision going to the extent of holding that the probate court had no jurisdiction to hear and decide upon the report of sale and petition for confirmation, showing, as it did, a sale by the ex-executor in that character. Anything in the opinion which seems to affirm this proposition is withdrawn. We desire to be understood as deciding only this: that the executor having moved to dismiss his own petition before the hearing, upon a satisfactory showing that the sale had in fact been made by him in his character of devisee in trust, and no creditor of the estate or distributee objecting, the court should have dismissed the proceeding, and left the sale to stand upon the same footing with other sales made by the trustee as such. By this course the rights and powers of the trustee under the will would have been left undisturbed, and no rights of creditors or distributees—whatever they may be—would have been concluded or affected, except so far as, under the law and the terms of the will, it is in the power of the devisee to bind them by sales made of his own motion.

PEOPLE v. AH SUM. (No. 20,805.)

PERJURY—INDICTMENT—USE OF ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

Defendant was convicted of perjury for testifying falsely in a charge against him for selling a lottery ticket. A photographic copy of the ticket was set out in the information. It was in Chinese characters, and was not translated into English, nor was there any allegation of its contents in English. Held, under Pen. Code, § 950, providing that an information must contain a statement of the offense in ordinary language to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended, and under Const. art. 4, § 24, requiring judicial proceedings to be conducted in English, that the court erred in overruling defendant's motion in arrest of judgment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; JOHN ELLSWORTH, Judge.

Defendant was convicted of perjury, and appeals. Reversed.

Robert Ferral, M. C. Chapman, and E. C. Chapman, (G. W. McEnerney, of counsel,) for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Appellant was tried and convicted upon an information charging him with perjury, committed as follows: That on the 4th day of April, A. D. 1890, there was pending and on trial, in the police court of the city of Oakland, "a certain action and proceeding wherein the people of the state of California were plaintiffs and said Ah Sum was defendant, and said court, having competent jurisdiction to hear, decide, and determine said trial, action, and proceeding, according to the laws of the state of California, was then and there fully empowered to administer the law in said trial, action, and proceeding. That it then and there became and was material on said trial, action, and proceeding to know whether or not the said defendant, Ah Sum, did furnish, sell, and transfer to one John Ferrin, in the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, state of California, on or about the twenty-second day of January, 1890, a certain document, instrument, paper, and lottery ticket in the words and figures following, to wit:" (A space of about two inches square is occupied by Chinese characters, and then the information proceeds as follows:) "And said defendant, Ah Sum, was then and there duly called as a witness on said trial, action, and proceeding on his own behalf, and said Ah Sum was thereupon duly sworn as a witness by William S. O'Brien, then and there the duly appointed, qualified, and acting clerk of said police court, and an officer then and there authorized by law to administer oaths and to administer an oath to the said Ah Sum; and then and there before said William S. O'Brien in said police court the said Ah Sum took his corporal oath that the testimony he should give upon the trial of said issue then and there pending in said police court in said trial, action, and proceeding should be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and being so sworn the said Ah Sum did then and there on said fourth day of April, 1890, in said police court upon the said trial of said issues, willfully, knowingly, corruptly, falsely, and feloniously, and contrary to said oath, state, testify, and declare under oath, among other things, in substance, as follows, to-wit: That he, said Ah Sum, did not on said 22d day of January, A. D. 1890, at the said city of Oakland, or at any other time or place whatsoever, furnish, sell, and transfer, or furnish or sell or transfer to and for, or to or for, said John Ferrin, or to and for, or to or for, any other person whatsoever, the said or any instrument, document, paper, and lottery ticket. Whereas, in truth and in fact, as was then and there well known to the said Ah Sum, all of the said testimony and declaration hereinbefore in substance set forth was and is false and untrue, and then and there was material matter to the issues then and there being tried in said police court, as aforesaid, whereby he, the said Ah Sum, did then and there, as aforesaid, feloniously, willfully, knowingly, and corruptly swear falsely, and feloniously commit willful perjury, contrary," etc. To that information the defendant pleaded not guilty. A trial was had, which resulted in a verdict of guilty. Defendant made a motion in arrest of judgment upon all the statutory grounds. The motion was denied, as was also a motion for a new trial, and the court sentenced the defendant to imprisonment in the state prison for the term of 18 months. This appeal is from the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial.

The first point raised by counsel for appellant is that "the paper or certificate about which appellant is charged with having given false testimony is in the Chinese language. It was capable of translation into English. But instead of translating it, the information contains a photographic copy, without any allegation of its tenor in English." To one not versed in any language other than the English language the "certain document, instrument, paper, and lottery ticket," alleged to be in the words and figures set out in the complaint, would be wholly unintelligible. An indictment or information must contain "a statement of the acts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended." Section 950, Pen. Code. An information partly in English and partly in Chinese, cannot be said to be in "ordinary" language. The constitution requires judicial proceedings to be conducted, preserved, and published in no other than the English language. Const. art. 4, § 24. Mr. Bishop says: "In some of our states there are statutes expressly excluding all languages but the English, and such is clearly the general American law." 1 Bish. Crim. Proc. § 342. The attorney general says: "Assuming for the purpose of the argument, and only for the purpose of the argument, that a mistake was made by the pleader by inserting in the information in this case the alleged lottery ticket in question, still we claim that the setting out of the alleged original lottery ticket, in the manner and character in which it is set out in the information, constitutes an objection to the information, if such an objection exists at all, on the ground that the information is 'defective in matter of form' only, and not in matter of substance." Who can determine that question without first knowing all that it contains? Whether the unknown matter is a matter of substance, or of form only, cannot be determined until it ceases to be unknown. The allegation of the information is that, on the trial at which the appellant is alleged to have committed perjury, "it then and there became and was material on said trial, action, and proceeding to know whether or not the said defendant, Ah Sum, did furnish, sell, and transfer to one John Ferrin, in the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, state of California, a certain document, instrument, paper, and lottery ticket in the words and figures following, to-wit:—"which are said to be words and figures in the Chinese language; certainly not in English. The section of the Penal Code under which the defendant was prosecuted and tried in the police court reads as follows: "Every person who sells, gives, or in any manner whatever furnishes or transfers to or for any other person any ticket, chance, share, or interest in, or depending upon the event of, any lottery, is guilty of a misdemeanor." The thing which the defendant is alleged to have sold is alleged to have consisted of certain words and figures set out in the information. On examination of the matter set out as words and figures, we discover no words, and but few figures,—nothing to indicate that the thing alleged to have been sold by the defendant to John Ferrin was a lottery ticket. A translation of it might have shown that it was not. And so long as we do not know what it was we have no right to assume that the selling of it constituted a misdemeanor. If we strike out of the information everything except what is expressed in English, there will remain no allegation of the sale of anything by the defendant to anybody.

The court erred in overruling the motion in arrest of judgment, and for that error the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

CHACE v. JENNINGS, Sheriff, et al. (No. 13,-510.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 4, 1892.)

INJUNCTION—SALE OF LANDS ON EXECUTION—DIS-SOLUTION ON ANSWER.

1. In an action to restrain the sale of land under execution against plaintiff's grantor the court should continue the restraining order pending final determination, and it is an abuse of discretion to dissolve it upon the filing of an answer denying the allegations of the bill.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. § 437, authorizing denials upon information and belief, such denials, while sufficient to raise an issue, will not justify the dissolution of a temporary injunction on the ground that the bill is fully denied by the answer.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Cruz county; F. J. McCANN Judge.

Action by one Chace against Jennings sheriff of Santa Cruz county, and others, for an injunction. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. S. Kittredge, for appellant. T. H. Laine and Z. N. Goldsby, for respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The case is not materially different from Porter v. Jennings, 89 Cal. 440, 26 Pac. Rep. 965. As admitted by respondents' counsel, "it is against the same defendants. The purpose is to restrain the sale of the same premises, threatened to be sold by the defendant Jennings (as sheriff) under the same execution in favor of Mary A. Cummings vs. William N. Cummings." The only difference between that case and this is the party plaintiff. We think that case was correctly decided, and on its authority the order appealed from is reversed, with directions to the court below to issue the injunction as prayed for by plaintiff pending the final determination of the action upon its merits.

SPRING VALLEY WATER-WORKS v. DRINKHOUSE. (No. 12,623.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 29, 1891.)

EMINENT DOMAIN—LAND FOR RESERVOIR—NECESSITY—COMPENSATION—EVIDENCE.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 1238, which provides that the right of eminent domain may be exercised in taking land for conducting water for the use of the inhabitants of any county, incorporated city, or city and county, and under Code Civil Proc. § 1239, which provides that a fee-simple may be taken for a reservoir, a corporation organized for the purpose of supplying the city and county of San Francisco with water may condemn land for a reservoir site. Lake Pleasanton Water Co. v. Contra Costa Water Co., 8 Pac. Rep. 501, 67 Cal. 657, followed.

2. Whether the land is reasonably required is a question of fact to be determined by the court or jury, and the burden of proof is on the plaintiff.

3. In an action to condemn land for a reservoir site, it is not proper for defendant to ask one of her witnesses on direct examination how much plaintiff paid for certain other tracts of land, or to inquire as to the amount offered, since such questions are only admissible by way of cross-examination to test the fairness of the witness' opinion in regard to the value of the property involved in the action.

4. Defendant is entitled to the market value of the land, to be determined in view of all the facts which would naturally affect its value in the minds of purchasers generally.

5. Where the land sought to be condemned is, because of its situation and adaptability for reservoir purposes, regarded by purchasers generally as more valuable than if it did not possess such advantages, defendant should be allowed to show it, and for that purpose should be permitted to ask whether a witness has the means of knowing, and does know, the value of the land for reservoir purposes. McFARLAND and SHARPESTEIN, JJ., dissenting.

6. Where defendant, as a witness in her own behalf, testifies that she has owned the land sought to be taken for 20 years, and has lived on it, a sufficient foundation has been laid to ask her the value of the land. McFARLAND and SHARPESTEIN, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Mateo county; E. F. HEAD, Judge.

Action by Spring Valley Water-Works against one Drinkhouse to condemn certain land for a reservoir site. Judgment of condemnation and damages awarded defendant, from which she appeals. Case remanded, with directions to retry the issues as to the value of the land sought to be taken, and the damages to the remaining portion of the land not taken.

Ben Morgan and A. Ruef, for appellant. Wm. F. Herrin, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The respondent is a corporation organized under the laws of this state for the purpose of supplying the city and county of San Francisco and its inhabitants with water, and is engaged in that business. This action is brought to condemn certain land of the defendant as part of a reservoir site, and which is alleged by the plaintiff to be necessary for it in the prosecution of the said business for which plaintiff was created. The answer of defendant, among other things, denies that such intended use of the land sought to be taken is a public use, or that the same was necessary for the purpose of enabling plaintiff to effect the purpose for which it was created.

1. It was held by this court in the case of Lake Pleasanton Water Co. v. Contra Costa Water Co., 67 Cal. 657, 3 Pac. Rep. 501, in construing sections 1238 and 1239 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that the power of eminent domain extended to the taking of land for such purposes as are named in the complaint in this action. We there said: "The supplying of inhabitants of an incorporated city with pure, fresh water is by section 1238 declared to be a public use, in behalf of which the right of eminent domain may be exercised, and section 1239 provides in effect that the entire estate in a given piece of land may be taken when needed for a reservoir in behalf of such use." We have no doubt of the correctness of this conclusion, and therefore hold that the purpose for which plaintiff alleges that it desires to acquire the appellant's land, by this proceeding, is a public use, and consequently one in behalf of which the power of eminent domain may be exercised.

2. There is no doubt of the proposition that, before land can be taken for a public use, it must appear that the taking is necessary for such use. This is a question of fact to be determined by the court or jury in view of all the evidence in the case, and the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff. The evidence must be sufficient to show that the land is reasonably required for the purpose of effecting the object, or carrying on the business, for which the plaintiff was organized; and, in this case, not only the present demands of the public upon the plaintiff, but those which may be fairly anticipated on account of the future growth of the city, are to be considered. We think the evidence was sufficient to show a necessity for the taking of defendant's land within the meaning of the law, and we cannot disturb the finding of the court below on that point.

3. The court did not err in sustaining objections to the questions asked the witness Howard as to how much the plaintiff had paid per acre for the Sherwood and Howard tracts, or as to offers made by plaintiff to purchase these tracts. Howard was a witness for defendant, and these questions were asked by defendant in the examination in chief of the witness. However the rule may be in other states, it is settled here that such facts are not admissible as evidence in chief, but only by way of cross-examination for the purpose of testing the fairness or honesty of an opinion which the witness may have given upon his direct examination in relation to the value of the property involved in the action. Railroad Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 262.

4. The witness Howard was also asked the following questions: "Do you know what the value of that land is down there for reservoir purposes? Have you any means of knowing the value of this land for reservoir purposes?" The questions were objected to by plaintiff as irrelevant and incompetent. The objections were sustained. The witness was the president of the plaintiff corporation, and the objections made to these questions do not proceed upon the ground that the witness was not competent to answer them, or that the proper foundation had not been laid by proof that in point of fact the land did have, by reason of its situation and surroundings, an added, distinctive value for reservoir purposes. The question is thus presented whether, assuming that the land sought to be taken was specially valuable for the purpose named, it was relevant and competent to show such value. There is undoubtedly some conflict in the authorities as to the admissibility of questions put in this form; but we think the point was decided in favor of the admissibility of such evidence in the case of Land & Town Co. v. Neale, 78 Cal. 63, 20 Pac. Rep. 372, and in the same case on a second appeal to this court. 88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. Rep. 977. Nor would this rule, as supposed by respondent, justify the admission of speculative opinions based upon the necessities of the plaintiff, or what the plaintiff could afford to give for the land rather than to do without it. If it should appear, during the course of the examination, that a witness had given an opinion as to value formed upon any such considerations, it would be the duty of the court to strike such opinion evidence out, as resting upon an illegal and improper basis. The rule is that the owner is entitled to the market value of his land, to be determined in view of all the facts which would naturally affect its value in the minds of purchasers generally, which necessarily makes it proper to consider for what purpose it is most valuable. "Any existing facts which enter into the value of the land in the public and general estimation, and tending to influence the minds of sellers and buyers, may be considered." Russell v. Railway Co., 33 Minn. 213, 22 N. W. Rep. 379. If, therefore, the land sought to be condemned in this action, by reason of its situation, and because it is part of a basin adapted for reservoir purposes, would be regarded as more valuable by purchasers generally than if it did not possess such advantages of location and adaptability for use as a reservoir, the defendant should be permitted to show its value with reference to such facts by the testimony of competent witnesses; and, as said in Land & Town Co. v. Neale, 78 Cal. 69, 20 Pac. Rep. 372, this is not in reality any departure from the rule which requires the evidence of value to be confined to what the property is worth in the market, having regard to the most valuable use to which it may be devoted. The court there said: "What is done is merely to take into consideration the purposes for which the property is suitable, as a means of ascertaining what reasonable purchasers would, in all probability, be willing to give for it, which, in a general sense, may be said to be the market value."

4. The defendant, Mrs. Drinkhouse, was a witness in her own behalf; and after testifying that she had owned the land sought to be taken for over 20 years, and was using it for a summer residence for herself and family, she was asked: "Question. Do you know the value of this land? Answer. I know what the water company has paid other people. Q. Do you know the value of this land of yours? A. What do you consider value? Q. Answer yes or no. A. I think I do. Q. What is its value?" An objection was made to this last question upon the ground that no foundation had been laid for it, which was sustained. This was error. All that is necessary to be shown to entitle a witness to give an opinion is to show "that he has some peculiar means of forming an intelligent and correct judgment as to the value of the property in question, or the effect of a particular improvement, beyond what is presumed to be possessed by men generally." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 437. In this connection the same author says: "These peculiar means may consist in * * * a long acquaintance with the particular property, and the neighborhood where it is situated, accompanied with the occupation or ownership of similar property, and especially if accompanied with a knowledge of sales of similar property." We think the witness was competent to give an opinion as to the value of her own land within the general rule on that subject. She had a particular knowledge of it, being a resident upon it, and had owned it for over 20 years. The natural presumption would be that she had during that long period acquired sufficient acquaintance with it, and of the value of the land in that neighborhood, to be able to give an intelligent estimate as to the value of her own property. Railroad Co. v. Schlunz, 14 Neb. 423, 16 N. W. Rep. 439; Lehmiecke v. Railroad Co., 19 Minn. 464 (Gil. 406.) See, also, Walker v. City of Boston, 8 Cush. 279; Pierce, R. R. 227. In the first case cited the court, in passing upon the competency of the owner of the land to testify to its value, said: "He swore explicitly that he knew its value, and from the fact that he had lived there for twelve years, had made the improvements upon it, and appears to have possessed ordinary intelligence, at least, I am satisfied he was qualified to give his opinion on that point." The witness should have been permitted to testify to the value of the property. It may be that a cross-examination would have shown that such opinion was entitled to but little weight, but that does not affect the question of its admissibility.

We find no errors in the record other than those we have pointed out, and these do not require a retrial of any of the issues except those relating to the value of the land sought to be taken, and the damage to the remaining portion of defendant's land not taken. Judgment and order reversed, with directions to the court below to retry the issues as to the value of the land sought to be taken, and the damage to the remaining portion of the land not taken, and, thereupon, to enter judgment in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, and in favor of the defendant for such value and damage, and costs.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J. ; PATERSON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

HARRISON, J., (concurring.) The court erred in not permitting the witness Howard to answer the questions: "Do you know what the value of that land is down there for reservoir purposes? Have you any means of knowing the value of this land for reservoir purposes?" The "just compensation" which is guarantied to the owner whose property is to be taken or damaged for public use is its market value, and the market value of land is determined by a consideration of all of the uses to which it may be applied, as well as the purposes for which it is adapted. For the purpose of ascertaining this value, it is proper to show its condition and surroundings, the uses to which it has been applied, and its capabilities for other uses, including that for which its condemnation is sought. Its value is not limited either by that of its present use or by the use for which it is sought, since either of these may be less than its actual market value.

The owner is entitled to its highest market value for any use to which it is adapted; and any advantage that the property has, present or prospective, by virtue of its position, and for which it may be available, constitutes an element in its value, which is to be considered by the jury in determining the compensation to be awarded him, and which the owner is entitled to show to the jury by any competent evidence. The market value of the land is neither the aggregate nor the average of the different values of the uses to which it may be applied, but it is the result to be determined from a consideration of each of these uses in connection with all the other conditions. A tract of land may be eligible as a site for a railroad station, but its value would vary with the contingency of its being selected for such a purpose. It may be adapted for a reservoir site, but its value for such a purpose would be qualified by the prospect, greater or less, of any one seeking to build such a reservoir. Its market value is affected by such contingency, but is not to be determined by the fact that the party seeking to condemn it has already determined to build a reservoir. To allow that element to enter into the computation would be to make the plaintiff's necessity the owner's opportunity.

It appears to have been conceded at the trial that the territory of which the land of the defendant forms a portion is a suitable site for a reservoir, and as a consequence it has a value for such a purpose. Whether that purpose gives it a higher market value than any other to which it is adapted was to be determined by evidence; but, if it does, the owner is entitled to compensation for such value. The general rule is that witnesses are to give evidence only of facts, and that the inference from those facts is to be drawn by the jury; but, in determining the value of land, opinions of those who, from their familiarity with the subject, are supposed to have learned its value, are received in evidence. Such witnesses are not experts, in the strict sense of that term,—that is, they are not persons skilled in any science or art; but their opinions are received more from the necessity of the case, as being the most satisfactory, and often the only attainable, evidence of the fact to be proved, and upon the theory that, from their knowledge of the locality and its surroundings, they have acquired a better means of determining the value of the land than the jury could from all the evidence which it would be practicable to place before it. Swan v. Middlesex, 101 Mass. 177. When, therefore a witness is called upon to prove such value, it is essential in the first place to show that he has the qualification and ability to give an opinion, and for that purpose to call his attention to the elements which go to make up its market value; and in order that his opinion may be listened to by the jury, and receive from them its proper consideration, it is also proper that, after he has given his opinion, he be allowed to give the basis upon which it has been formed, or the elements out of which it is composed. The jury can then readily perceive the force of the reasons upon which it is based, and the soundness of his conclusion, and can judge of his capacity to give the opinion, as well as the weight to which it is entitled. The capacity of the expert is generally tested upon cross-examination, but it is equally competent for the party calling him to support his opinion after he has given it by having him give the details upon which it is based. Keith v. Lothrop, 10 Cush. 457; Dickenson v. Fitchburg, 13 Gray, 557; Hawkins v. Fall River, 119 Mass. 94. Inasmuch, however, as such evidence is admissible only for the purpose of testing the weight to be given to his general opinion of its market value,—to corroborate it or to defeat it,—it is evident that the principle upon which it is admitted demands that he shall first give his estimate of such value in consideration of all of those uses and elements; but he is not to be allowed in the first instance to give an opinion of its respective values for those independent uses. Such evidence would not be competent, independent of the main question of what is its market value, or for any other purpose than in support of his general opinion. Burt v. Wigglesworth, 117 Mass. 306. And it might be that, after having given his opinion of its value for a specific use, he would not be able, or might not be asked, to give an opinion of its market value. The land might be very valuable, abstractly considered, for reservoir purposes, while such value would be greatly diminished by the want of a demand for such purpose, and its market value therefore less than for any other purpose. The jury would not be authorized to determine its market value from its own consideration of only the elements of value that might be given by the witness, as there might be many other elements going to determine its market value, of which they had no knowledge.

In Land & Town Co. v. Neale, 78 Cal. 80, 20 Pac. Rep. 380, this distinction was not sufficiently presented in the opinion of the court; and, while some of the language in the opinion might lead to the conclusion that it was proper to introduce testimony of the value of the property for a reservoir site as an independent fact to be considered by the jury, yet the reasoning of the opinion, and the authorities cited in support of it, as well as the facts in the record, show that the question really determined was whether the jury had the right to take such value into consideration for the purpose of determining the market value of the land. To the extent that the opinion countenances the right to offer evidence of such value as an independent fact to be considered by the jury as a measure of the compensation to be awarded, it is at variance with an almost unbroken line of authorities, and in my opinion ought not to be followed. It appears from the record in that case, although not so stated in the report, that the witnesses had first given their opinion of the market value of the land for general purposes, and were then asked its value as a reservoir site. The form of the question was obnoxious to objections stated herein, but the ground upon which its admission was argued was the right to have such value considered as an element in determining its market value. When the case came here upon the second appeal (88 Cal. 50, 25 Pac. Rep. 977,) the court, in commenting upon its opinion as construed in Allo-way v. Nashville, 88 Tenn. 518,¹ said, speaking through Mr. Justice PATTERSON: "It was decided on the former appeal, and is the law of the case, that the value of the land for any special purpose may be taken into account as one of the elements tending to show its market value. The fact that the land is suitable for such purpose, and a chance exists that it may some time bring an enhanced value therefor, has a tendency to increase its market value, and may properly be considered in determining what its present market value is." "We did not hold that the value of the land for reservoir purposes was a measure of damages independent of any other consideration or element of market value. On the contrary, the opinion distinctly states that the market value is to be the measure of damages, and that evidence of value for a special purpose is only to be considered as an element of the question." Page 56.

Inasmuch, then, as the owner is entitled to receive as compensation for his land its highest market value for any use to which it is adapted, and as such value is to be shown to the jury by the opinions of witnesses who must at the same time satisfy the jury of their qualification to give the opinions, it is proper for the party calling the witness to show by preliminary questions whether the witness has such qualifications. As it was proper in the present case for the jury to take into consideration the fact that the land had a value for reservoir purposes, it was equally proper for the witnesses, in giving their estimates of its value, to take the same element into consideration, and unless they knew, or had the means of knowing, such value, their testimony would not accomplish its purpose. The witness Howard was not asked at this point of examination to state what such value was, but was merely asked whether he knew the value. If he had such knowledge, it would greatly strengthen any testimony he might give on the subject, while, if he should state that he had no such knowledge, the party calling him might not question him any further. The court should also have allowed Mrs. Drinkhouse to answer the question asked of her. She was the owner of the land, and had lived upon it for 20 years, and must be presumed to have some knowledge of its value. All opinions respecting values of real estate (even of those who are dealers therein) are based more or less upon hearsay,—the statements of others, for what different parcels have been sold. The fact that she knew only of sales to the plaintiff affected her capacity only in degree. The weight to be given to her testimony could easily have been determined by the jury. "The market value of land is not a question of science or skill, upon which only an expert can give an opinion. Persons living in the neighborhood may be presumed to have a sufficient knowledge of the market value of property with the location and character of the land in question. Whether their opinion has any proper ground to rest upon, or is mere conjecture, can be brought out on cross-examination." Pennsylvania, etc., Co. v. Bunnell, 81 Pa. St. 426. Upon the other points involved in the case, I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice DE HAVEN. I also concur in the order of reversal, and the direction to the court below.

McFARLAND, J. I dissent from the judgment. I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice DE HAVEN, except as to the two points upon which the judgment is reversed.

1. I think the objection to the question asked Mrs. Drinkhouse about her opinion, as to the value of the land was properly sustained. The only knowledge she showed upon the subject was her knowledge of what "the water company has paid other people." But if, as is admitted, what the company paid other people for other lands could not be received in evidence, how could the knowledge of what they so paid be a proper foundation for allowing the opinion of the witness?

2. It is doubtful if the question asked Howard, "Do you know what the value of that land is down there for reservoir purposes?" referred to the land involved in this action. The questions immediately preceding it referred to another piece of land, called the "Sherward Tract," which plaintiff had purchased; and defendant had been trying to find out what plaintiff had paid for that tract. But, assuming that the land "down there" may have meant the land of defendant, it is plain from the whole course of the examination that defendant was seeking to show what the land was worth to plaintiff; that is, what plaintiff, from necessity, would be compelled to pay. The object of the question, under the circumstances, was to show, not what the general value of the land was, but what it was worth to the particular party who was compelled to have it. There has been a good deal written upon the subject of value in condemnation proceedings, and a good deal of loose language has been (sometimes inadvertently) used; but I apprehend that a comparison of all the authorities will show that the rule to be gathered from them goes no further than this: The condition of the property, all its surroundings, its availability for any purpose,—any use to which it could be profitably put,—all these things can be shown; but, when a witness is asked as to value, the proper question is, what is its market value? and not, what is its value for the particular purpose for which the plaintiff wants it? Lewis, Em. Dom. § 479; Stinson v. Railway Co., 27 Minn. 291, 6 N. W. Rep. 784. I think that the case at bar was fairly tried, and that the judgment should stand.

SHARPSTEIN, J. I concur in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice McFARLAND.

KOCKEMANN v. BICKEL et al. (No. 14,355.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 15, 1892.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION — CLAIM UNDER TAX-DEED.

The grantee of land conveyed under a tax-deed immediately entered thereon and inclosed it by a fence, except a gate-way, and claimed title. Shortly afterwards he sold the land. His grantee at once entered, and began to improve the land, and built a house thereon. Afterwards the land was conveyed to defendants, who have ever since resided thereon. Plaintiff contended that the evidence was insufficient to establish adverse possession, in that the gate-way was not closed, and that there was no verbal expression as to how defendants and defendants' grantor claimed to occupy the land. There was no question but that they had occupied the land more than five years. Held sufficient to prove all that is required by Code Civil Proc. § 322, providing that the possession of land for five years by one entering under a written instrument purporting to convey it shall be deemed adverse, and section 323, providing that, for the purpose of constituting an adverse possession, land is deemed to have been possessed where it has been improved.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Action by one Kockemann, executor, against Charlotte Bickel and husband. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Mortimer & Harris and Hutton & Swanwick, for appellant. J. D. Bicknell and Brosseau & Hatch, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to quiet title to a lot of land in the city of Los Angeles. Besides denying the material allegations of the complaint, the defendants pleaded the statute of limitations, (section 318, Code Civil Proc.) under which they claim title by prescription. The trial was by the court without a jury; and the court found for the defendants on all the issues, and gave judgment accordingly. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for new trial.

It is clear that the defendants and their grantors were in the possession of the lot in controversy continuously during the period of more than five years immediately preceding the commencement of this action, and the only question presented for decision is, was such possession continuously adverse to the plaintiff and his testator? Defendants' grantor entered into possession under a tax-deed executed by the proper officer, definitely describing the lot, and otherwise in due form, except it recited, in substance, that the lot in question was offered for sale, together with three other lots in the same city, to pay the delinquent taxes assessed on the four lots, to unknown owners; and that, the lot in question being the smallest portion for which any bidder would pay said taxes, it was struck off to N. P. Campbell, who was the lowest bidder, and who paid said taxes, with costs and charges, etc. Campbell assigned the certificate of this sale to Frank Ellis, and upon it the tax-deed was executed to Ellis on November 12, 1883. Ellis testified that he bought the tax-title from Campbell, September 24, 1883, (this refers to his purchase of the certificate of sale,) and within a week or ten days after that he inclosed the lot by a fence, except a gate-way about four feet wide, and claimed to own as good a title as a man could under a tax-sale. Other witnesses testified as to the character of the fence; and the court found that Ellis took possession immediately after the assignment of the certificate of sale, and "inclosed and protected the same with a substantial fence, excepting a small gate-way on the front end of said lot which opened on the street; that said fence was composed of posts, boards, and wires, and sufficient to turn stock; that said Ellis claimed title to said lot * * * founded upon the tax-deed; * * * and that he occupied the same solely, exclusively, notoriously, and adversely to every other person in the world." On December 3, 1883, Ellis conveyed the lot to Mrs. O. A. George, who, with her family, immediately moved upon and commenced to improve the lot, and built a good, substantial house thereon, and resided thereon until March 26, 1886, when she conveyed the lot to the defendant Charlotte Bickel, who, with her husband, has ever since resided thereon. And the court found that Mrs. George and Mrs. Bickel "have been in the open, exclusive, notorious, and adverse possession of the said land and premises, and the whole thereof, claiming title to the same by an instrument in writing, duly executed and acknowledged, and of record in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county, Cal., for a period of more than five years immediately prior to the commencement of this action, holding and claiming the same adversely to the said plaintiff and his testator, and against all and every person."

The tax-deed, though invalid as a conveyance of title, was sufficient to give color of title. It "was a written instrument, purporting to convey the real estate in controversy by a proper description. It was properly executed, and there is evidence tending to show that the defendant and her grantor claimed title under it as being a conveyance of the property." Wilson v. Atkinson, 77 Cal. 485, 20 Pac. Rep. 66. The evidence was sufficient to make a prima facie case of adverse possession, under section 322 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides: "When it appears that the occupant, or those under whom he claims, entered into possession of the property under claim of title exclusive of other right, founding such claim upon a written instrument as being a conveyance of the property in question, * * * and that there has been a continued occupation and possession of the property included in such instrument, * * * or some part of the property, under such claim, for five years, the property so included is deemed to have been held adversely." There was no attempt to overcome the prima facie case, except in regard to the character of the fence; and the only grounds upon which it is contended here that the evidence was deficient are that the gate-way was not closed, and that there was no evidence tending to show "how or in what way either Mrs. George or her husband, or either of the defendants, claimed to own or occupy the premises." That is to say, no verbal expression, as to "how they claimed to own or occupy" was proved. It was proved, however, that Ellis entered, improved the lot, and claimed, under the tax-sale and deed, as good a title as could be acquired by a tax-sale; that Mrs. George and Mrs. Bickel, by conveyances from him, entered, resided upon, and improved the property as none but owners usually do,—thus indicating that they claimed absolute title, founded upon the tax-deed and conveyances from Ellis, "exclusive of other right." These acts tended to prove all that is required by sections 322 and 323 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and, in the absence of countervailing evidence, were sufficient to justify the finding of adverse possession; for, conceding that the inclosure was not complete, yet the lot was "used * * * for the ordinary use of the occupant," viz., that of a city residence. Subdivision 3, § 323, Code Civil Proc. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

APPEAL—SETTLEMENT OF CASE IN SUPREME COURT.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 652, which provides that where the judge has refused to allow an exception a petition will lie to the supreme court to prove the same, the supreme court has no authority to correct the settlement of a case, and decide what matters of evidence were erroneously included therein. Hyde v. Boyle, 24 Pac. Rep. 1059, 86 Cal. 352, followed.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES McM. SHAFTER, Judge.

Action by Cox against Delmas. Decision in favor of plaintiff. Defendant filed a proposed statement of the case in support of his motion for a new trial, and, claiming that plaintiff's amendments to the statement were improperly allowed, he petitions the supreme court to settle the statement correctly. Petition denied.

Galpin & Zeigler, for appellant. W. H. L. Barnes and Garber, Boalt & Bishop, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petition of the above-named defendant shows that said cause was decided by the superior court in favor of the plaintiff; that in support of his motion for a new trial the defendant filed a proposed statement of the case, to which the plaintiff proposed amendments, which the superior court allowed; that such amendments were not properly allowed, because they set forth evidence that was never introduced at the trial. Wherefore petitioner prays this court to settle said statement correctly. The proceeding is based upon section 652¹ of the Code of Civil Procedure, and assumes that this court is empowered by said section to reverse the proceedings of the superior court in settling statements of cases, and in so doing to examine witnesses, and decide as to what matters of evidence included in a statement as settled were, in point of fact, erroneously included therein. This precise question was decided adversely to the claim of petitioner in the case of Hyde v. Boyle, 86 Cal. 352, 24 Pac. Rep. 1059, and on the authority of that case the petition is denied.

DOUGLASS v. McFARLAND et al. (No. 14,003.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 13, 1892.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—LIENS ON PERSONAL PROPERTY—UNLAWFUL SEIZURE BY CONSTABLE.

1. The refusal of the trial judge to grant a new trial will not be reviewed on appeal, where the proposed statement on motion for new trial was not signed or certified by the judge, as required by Code Civil Proc. § 659, subd. 3.

2. Under Civil Code, § 3052, which provides that any person who "makes, alters, or repairs" any article of personal property, at the request of the owner, has a lien on the same for his reasonable charges, and may retain possession until the charges are paid, a person who under contract manufactures ties for the owner on the latter's land has a lien thereon, and can recover the ties or the amount of his lien from a constable who, without his consent, takes the ties on execution against the owner.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Mendocino county; R. MCGARVEY, Judge.

Action by J. C. Douglass against W. McFarland and others to recover possession of personal property unlawfully seized on execution. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. G. Knox and Henley, Swift & Rigby, for appellants. J. A. Cooper, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. This action is brought by plaintiff against the defendant McFarland as constable, and the defendants Markle and Cameron as sureties on his official bond, to recover the possession of certain lots of redwood railroad ties and redwood shakes, alleged to have been wrongfully and unlawfully seized and taken from his possession by said McFarland, as constable, under and by virtue of certain writs of attachment and execution theretofore issued against the property of one Matt Harney, and by said McFarland wrongfully detained from the possession of plaintiff, or for the sum of $689, the alleged value thereof, in case delivery could not be had. The complaint contains allegations that plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the property, and of a demand, before the commencement of this action, upon McFarland by plaintiff for its delivery, and of his refusal to do so. The answer denies generally the allegations of the complaint, and, for a further separate answer and defense, justifies under a writ of execution. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment given in favor of the plaintiff, against the defendants, for the recovery of the possession of the property in question, or for the sum of $226, the amount of plaintiff's lien thereon, in case delivery cannot be had. The transcript on appeal contains what is designated therein as "defendant's proposed statement on motion for a new trial," but as it is not signed and certified by the judge, as required by the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it must be disregarded, and the order denying the motion for a new trial affirmed. The case must therefore stand on appeal upon the judgment roll alone.

¹Section 652 provides that, where the judge has refused to allow an exception, a petition will lie to the supreme court to prove the same.

It appears from the findings that at all the times mentioned in the complaint the defendant McFarland was a duly-qualified and acting constable, and that his co-defendants, Markle and Cameron, were the sureties on his official bond. That about the 1st day of October, 1888, plaintiff entered into a contract with one Matt Harney, by which he agreed to manufacture railroad ties and shakes for Harney, on Harney's land; and for such ties and shakes so manufactured plaintiff was to receive the sum fixed by the terms of the contract, which sum was due and payable on the 1st day of June, 1889. That for the purposes of manufacturing said ties and shakes the plaintiff was allowed to enter upon said lands. That on the 3d day of June, 1889, plaintiff had manufactured on said land the ties and shakes in controversy, and that they were piled up by him on said land in piles of 1,000 each, and each pile was marked on the top with a cross; and that there was due and payable to him from said Harney, for the manufacture thereof, the sum of $286. That on said last-mentioned date plaintiff was in the possession of said property, and claimed the right to the possession thereof until said sum of money was paid. That on the 3d day of June, 1889, the defendant McFarland, in his official capacity as constable, under and by virtue of a writ of execution issued upon a judgment theretofore recovered against Harney, levied upon and took into his possession, as the property of Harney, the ties and shakes in controversy. That said property was taken from the possession of plaintiff without his consent by the defendant McFarland, who wrongfully withholds it from plaintiff's possession. These facts bring the case at bar, as we think, within the provisions of section 3052¹ of the Civil Code, and gave plaintiff a lien upon the property and the right to retain possession thereof until the lien thereon should be discharged by the payment of the amount due him for the manufacture of the same. We are of the opinion that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and so advise.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

¹ Civil Code, § 3052, provides: "A person who makes, alters, or repairs any article of personal property, at the request of the owner or legal possessor of the property, has a lien on the same for his reasonable charges for work done and materials furnished, and may retain possession of the same until the charges are paid," etc.

TAYLOR v. REYNOLDS, Judge. (No. 14,555.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 30, 1891.)

JURY TRIAL—VIOLATION OF CITY ORDINANCE.

Where defendant is prosecuted under a city ordinance for an offense which is declared a misdemeanor by the city charter and Penal Code, he is entitled to a jury trial, under Pen. Code, § 1042, providing that issues of fact in criminal cases must be tried by a jury unless the right be waived in cases not amounting to felony.

Commissioners' decision. In bank.

Proceeding by F. A. Taylor for a writ of mandamus commanding the court to allow plaintiff a jury trial to determine a charge against him for violating a city ordinance. Writ granted.

Morehouse & Tuttle, for plaintiff. W. B. Hardy, City Atty., for defendant

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff was convicted in a justice's court of the violation of a municipal ordinance of the city of San José, and sentenced to pay a fine of $30, or be imprisoned in the city prison for 30 days. He appealed the case to the superior court of the county, where the judgment was reversed, and a new trial granted. Thereafter the case was set down for trial in that department of the superior court of which the defendant herein was judge. When the case was set, the defendant (plaintiff here) demanded a trial by jury; but the judge of the court denied the demand, and refused, and still refuses, to comply therewith. Thereupon this proceeding was commenced to obtain a peremptory writ of mandate commanding the defendant to grant plaintiff a jury trial. The answer admits all the facts alleged, and waives all objections that might be made to the writ, to the end that the questions sought to be raised may be decided upon their merits.

The city of San José is a municipal corporation existing under a charter passed by the legislature, and approved March 17, 1874. St. 1873-74, p. 395. Section 9 of the charter provides that the common council shall have power "to lay out, open, vacate, improve, cleanse, water, and repair streets and sidewalks; * * * to define, prevent, and remove nuisances; * * * and any violation of any lawful order, regulation, or ordinance * * * is hereby declared a misdemeanor, and all prosecutions for the same may be in the name of the state of California." The ordinance which the plaintiff is charged with violating provides: "Section 1. No person shall place, erect, or maintain any business stand or other obstruction on any portion of any street or sidewalk of the city of San José. Sec. 2. Any person violating any of the provisions of this ordinance, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding one hundred ($100) dollars, or be imprisoned for a term not exceeding thirty days." The obstruction of a public street or sidewalk in a city is a public nuisance. Pen. Code, §§ 370, 372, declare: "Every person who maintains or commits any public nuisance, the punishment for which is not otherwise prescribed, or who willfully omits to perform any legal duty relating to the removal of a public nuisance, is guilty of a misdemeanor." The action was then a criminal proceeding, and the accused was authorized to plead to the charge, (as he did,) "Not guilty;" and, when he was convicted in the justice's court, he had a right to appeal from the judgment to the superior court of the county, and, a new trial being therein granted, it had to be in that court. Pen. Code, §§ 1466, 1469. The plea raised an issue of fact which could only be tried in the manner prescribed by statute. As to the manner of such trials in the superior court, the Penal Code, § 1042, declares: "Issues of fact must be tried by jury, unless a trial by jury be waived, in criminal cases not amounting to felony, by the consent of both parties, expressed in open court, and entered in its minutes." By this section it is clearly provided that all offenses amounting to felony must be tried by a jury, and all amounting to misdemeanor must be so tried unless a jury is waived. The attorney for respondent urges that there are many minor or petty offenses arising from the violation of municipal police regulations which are not intrinsically criminal, and may be prosecuted summarily without a jury, and that the offense charged against the plaintiff is of this character. In support of this position, he cites Callan v. Wilson, 127 U. S. 540, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1301, where, after reviewing the authorities, the court says: "The doctrines of many of the cases are thus summarized by Mr. Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations, (volume 1, § 433:) 'Violations of municipal by-laws proper, such as fall within the description of municipal police regulations,—as, for example, those concerning markets, streets, water-works, city officers, etc.,—and which relate to acts and omissions that are not embraced in the general criminal legislation of the state, the legislature may authorize to be prosecuted in a summary manner, by and in the name of the corporation, and need not provide for a trial by jury. Such acts and omissions are not crimes or misdemeanors to which the constitutional right of trial by jury extends.'" It will be observed that it is said "the legislature may authorize" the summary trial without a jury of the above class of cases spoken of, they not being embraced in the general criminal legislation of the state; but the offense charged here is declared by statute to be a misdemeanor, and the legislature of the state has not attempted to authorize the trial of such a case without a jury, unless a jury be expressly waived. And the learned author goes on further in the same section to say: "So, here, where the act or omission sought to be punished by imprisonment under a municipal ordinance is in its nature not peculiarly an offense against the municipality, but rather against the public at large, and where it falls within the legal or common-law notion of a crime or misdemeanor, and especially where, being of such nature, it is embraced in the criminal code of the state, then the constitutional guaranties intended to secure the liberty of the citizen, and the right to a trial by jury, cannot be evaded by the nature of the powers vested in the municipal corporation, or the nature of the jurisdiction conferred upon the municipal courts." This case clearly falls within the rule last declared, and the plaintiff is entitled to a trial by jury. We therefore advise that a writ of mandate be issued as prayed for.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, ordered that a writ of mandate issue as prayed for.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment, not because I think the constitution secures the right of trial by jury in prosecution for petty misdemeanors created by statute or municipal ordinance, but solely upon the ground that the right seems to be conferred by the provisions of the Penal Code. In my opinion, the legislature has the power to provide for summary proceedings to enforce municipal regulations without a jury trial, but I cannot discover that such power has been exercised. By sections 1430-1435 of the Penal Code, relating to proceedings in justices' and police courts, and section 1042, relating to proceedings in the superior court, the defendant in a criminal action, who pleads "Not guilty," is entitled to demand that the issue be tried by a jury. In other words, the statute, irrespective of the constitution, secures the right. The evil involved is one which may well engage the serious attention of the legislature; but, as long as the law remains as it is, I see no escape from the conclusion that in any criminal action prosecuted in the name of the people of the state the defendant must be tried by jury, unless in cases of misdemeanor a jury is waived.

PEOPLE ex rel. ENGLISH et al., State Harbor Commissioners, v. ROBERTS. (No. 12,989.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—TONNAGE DUTY LEVIED BY STATE—"DOCKAGE" AND "WHARFAGE."

1. The assessment by a state of rates of dockage to be paid by barges and lighters for the use of docks and slips owned and maintained by the state does not violate Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, which provides that "no state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any duty of tonnage."

2. The assessment by state harbor commissioners of rates of "dockage" or charges upon vessels for the privilege of mooring to docks or in slips does not violate St. 1880, p. 11, providing that no "wharfage" shall be collected on commerce within the state, since "wharfage" is a charge against merchandise for the use of wharves.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JAMES G. MAGUIRE, Judge.

Action by State of California ex rel. William D. English, John H. Wise, and A. C. Paulsell, state harbor commissioners, against M. R. Roberts, to recover dockage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rosenbaum & Scheeline, for appellant. F. C. Coogan and F. S. Stratton, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. This is an action to recover from the owner of a barge and lighter employed in the business of transferring merchandise to and from vessels in the harbor of San Francisco the amount of dockage due under the regulations of the relators, the board of harbor commissioners. The judgment of the superior court was for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment only upon the ground that the facts, as found, do not support it. The findings, among other things, show: "(2) That, bounding upon and within that portion of said bay, there are a large number of wharves, docks, and slips, all of which have been constructed by and are owned by the people of the state of California, and plaintiffs, as such board, have jurisdiction over, and possession and control of, said wharves, docks, and slips. These wharves are about six hundred feet long, extending from the main-land into the waters of the bay, and are about one hundred feet wide, and between them there are spaces, called 'slips,' of about two hundred feet in width. The wharves are kept in repair, and the slips kept dredged to a sufficient depth to permit vessels of all tonnage to enter them, and make fast to and use the wharves; and defendants could not have used said wharves, docks, and slips, as hereinafter found, if they had not been kept in repair and dredged by plaintiffs as such board. (3) Prior to the 20th day of November, 1885, said board of state harbor commissioners, pursuant to the powers conferred upon it by law, by an order duly given and made and entered in the records of its proceedings, fixed and regulated the rates of dockage to be paid by and collected from lighters at one cent per ton per day, whenever said lighters discharged or loaded at any wharf within its jurisdiction and control, or when they discharged into or loaded from any vessel while lying at any of said wharves, or while lying with cargo on board in any of the slips within its jurisdiction and control, and said board on the 25th day of June, 1885, fixed and regulated the rates of dockage to be paid by and collected from vessels and all classes of water craft that might use or make fast to any of the wharves, pier, slips, quays, landings, or thoroughfares within its jurisdiction and control, and at the same time and by the same order fixed and regulated the rates of dockage to be paid by and collected from barges of two hundred registered tons or under at two cents per ton per day, and that said barges, while taking in cargo, or receiving or discharging ballast, or occupying outside berths, or moored in any of the docks, slips, basins, or canals, should be subject only to half rates, namely, one cent per ton per day. (4) Defendant was and is the owner and in possession of the lighter Contra Costa; and on divers days between the 20th day of November, 1885, and the filing of the said complaint herein, said lighter, Contra Costa, by permission of said board of state harbor commissioners, used and occupied various wharves, docks, slips, within the harbor of San Francisco, and within the jurisdiction and control and possession of said board, in discharging and loading at and upon said wharves, and in discharging into and unloading from vessels lying at said wharves and within said slips; and at all said times said lighter was attached to said wharves by hawsers and lines fastened to the mooring piles which had been placed there for that purpose by said board. That there is due and unpaid for said dockage, as found in this paragraph, according to the rates established by said board, the sum of one hundred and six dollars and ten cents. (5) That during the same period the same lighter, by permission of said board, used and occupied the various docks and slips within the harbor of San Francisco, and within the jurisdiction and control of said board, in discharging into and loading from vessels lying at said wharves within said slips, and not from the wharves; and at all said times said lighter was attached to the side of said vessels, and not to the wharf, but the vessels were moored up against and fastened to said wharves with hawsers and lines attached to said mooring piles. The vessels paid the regular rates of dockage to said board. That there is due and unpaid for the dockage of said lighter, as found in this paragraph, according to the rates established by said board, the sum of eleven dollars and fifty cents. (6) Defendant was and is the owner and in the possession of the barge Edison, which barge was and is a vessel of one hundred and forty four tons measurement; and on divers days between the 20th day of November, 1885, and the filing of said complaint, said barge Edison, by permission of said board, used and occupied various wharves, docks, and slips within the harbor of San Francisco, and within the jurisdiction and control of said board, in discharging and loading at and upon said wharves, and discharging into and loading from vessels lying at said wharves and within said slips, and at all said times said barge was attached to said wharves by hawsers and lines fastened to said mooring piles. That there is due and unpaid for said dockage, as found in this paragraph, according to the rates as established by said board, the sum of thirty-six dollars and twenty-five cents. (7) That during the same period of time the same barge, by permission of said board, used and occupied the various docks and slips within the harbor of San Francisco, and within the jurisdiction and control of said board, in discharging into and loading from vessels lying at said wharves, and within said slips, and not from the wharves; and at all times said barge was attached to the side of said vessels, and not to the wharves, but the vessels were moored up against and fastened to said wharves with hawsers and lines attached to said mooring piles. These vessels paid the regular rates of dockage to said board. That there is due and unpaid for the dockage of said barge, as found in this paragraph, according to the rates as established by said board, the sum of thirty-one dollars and ninety cents. (8) Both said lighter and said barge were engaged in transporting freight between different points in the state of California."

It is contended by appellant, upon these facts, that the judgment of the superior court must be reversed, for two reasons: First. Because the charges assessed against the barge and lighter are a duty on tonnage, and therefore that the state law and the regulations adopted by the board are in conflict with section 10 of article 1¹ of the constitution of the United States, which forbids the states, without consent of congress, to lay any duty of tonnage. Second. Because, by section 5 of an act of the legislature passed March 17, 1880, (St. p. 11,) no wharfage is to be collected upon commerce within the state.

We do not think that either proposition can be maintained. As to the first, we find that the supreme court of the United States has decided in a number of cases that for the use of wharves, landings, and other artificial means for facilitating the loading of merchandise, a charge proportioned to the tonnage of the vessels using such accommodations may be exacted by individuals or municipal corporations authorized by the states; and the distinction is clearly drawn between such charges for the use of facilities provided at state expense, and tonnage duties levied in the exercise of sovereign power. Cannon v. New Orleans, 20 Wall. 577; Packet Co. v. Keokuk, 95 U.S. 84; Packet Co. v. St. Louis, 100 U.S. 423; Vicksburg v. Tobin, Id. 430. The facts of this case, we think, bring it fully within the principle of these decisions. No charge is made against the lighter or barge, except for the use of artificial facilities created by the labor and expenditure of the harbor commissioners; and there is a plain distinction between the privilege of mooring in the slips which are dredged out between the wharves, and anchoring in the bay or along the unimproved water-front. The finding is that, but for the dredging, defendant's vessels could not have used the slips; and, this being so, we think, on the principle of the decisions above cited, they are bound to pay for such use, and that the exaction of reasonable charges therefor is no infraction of the constitution of the United States.

As to the second proposition, it is clear that the word "wharfage" in the act of 1880 is used in the same sense in which it is used in section 2524 of the Political Code; that is to say, in contradistinction to the word "dockage." Section 2524 of the Political Code, along with many other important provisions, limits and defines the power of the board of harbor commissioners, and prescribes their duties as to the collection of harbor dues, etc. Throughout the section the word "wharfage" is used to designate the charge against merchandise for the use of the wharf, while the word "dockage" is used to designate the charge against vessels for the privilege of mooring to the wharves or in the slips. By the act of 1880, domestic shipments were only exempted from wharfage, the authority to collect dockage being left intact. This being a suit for dockage, exclusively, the act of 1880 is inapplicable. The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; HARRISON, J.

PATERSON and McFARLAND, JJ. We concur. When this case was first argued, our attention was not called to the distinction between wharfage and dockage. The case was argued, considered, and decided upon the assumption that the action was for the recovery of wharfage. An inspection of the various provisions of the statute bearing upon the subject shows that the legislature has preserved the etymological distinction between the two terms.

BRADBURY v. MCCLURE. (No. 14,484.)

ASSUMPSIT — MONEY HAD AND RECEIVED — EVIDENCE—VIOLATION OF TRUST.

In an action for money had and received it was proven that the money was deposited with defendant's intestate by plaintiff's intestate in pursuance of an agreement by the latter and a third party who had sued him and attached some of his property; and that defendant's intestate agreed to hold the money and other property as security for any judgment that the attaching creditor might recover. The court then admitted evidence that defendant's intestate immediately paid the money to plaintiff's intestate. Held, that the evidence was properly admitted, since, regarding the transaction as a trust, the plaintiff's intestate could end it at any time with the consent of defendant's intestate so far as the latter's obligations to the former were concerned.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM WALLACE, Judge.

Action by W. B. Bradbury, administrator, against J. S. McClure, administrator. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gordon & Young, for appellant. G. W. McENERY, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and order denying a new trial. The action is for money had and received. There is but one finding, as follows: "That on the 7th day of June, 1888, David McClure received the sum of $2,790, to and for the use and on behalf of James McCord, and that on the same day he, said David McClure, paid the same sum of $2,790, and the whole thereof, to said James McCord." There can be no doubt that there is evidence to sustain this finding, but it is contended that the evidence was improperly admitted, and that is really the only question that is involved on this appeal. It seems that the money was deposited with McClure by McCord in pursuance of an agreement between himself and one Schmitt, who had sued him, and attached some of his property. The property was released in pursuance of this agreement, McClure agreeing to hold the money and other property as security for any judgment Schmitt might recover. Notwithstanding this agreement, the evidence tended to show, and the court found the fact to be, that McClure immediately paid the money to McCord. It is contended that such payment, if made, would be a violation on the part of McClure of his trust; that he could not, and his estate cannot, defend on that ground; that therefore, the evidence should have been excluded on plaintiff's objection, and, being in, the court should construe it so as not to find that McClure failed in his duty as trustee. McClure died before the suit was determined. When judgment was finally recovered by Schmitt, it was satisfied out of other property of McCord. Schmitt therefore has no further interest in the trust. If this had been otherwise, and Schmitt were plaintiff here, the rule invoked by appellant would have prevailed. But McClure had violated no confidence of which McCord could complain. Regarding the transaction as a trust, McCord was both trustor and beneficiary, and, with the consent of his trustee, could end it at any time, so far as McClure was under obligations to him, leaving McClure still responsible to Schmitt. McClure's contract with McCord was to pay the money to Schmitt in satisfaction of McCord's debt, or directly to McCord. McCord could not be injured by having the money paid at once to himself. So far as the fact that the payment would be in violation of a trust would affect the value of the evidence in determining the question as to whether McClure had paid McCord, we must presume the trial court gave it its proper weight. It seems to us that the question was properly determined. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; VANCE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

LEACH v. AITKEN. (No. 14,540.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1891.)

SETTLING BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—EXPIRATION OF JUDGE'S TERM—MANDAMUS.

Though Code Civil Proc. § 653, authorizes a judge to sign and settle a bill of exceptions after as well as before he ceases to be judge, yet, under section 1085, which provides that a writ of mandate may issue to compel the performance of an act which the law enjoins as a duty, such writ will not lie to compel a judge before whom an action has been tried to settle a bill of exceptions after his term of office has expired.

In bank.

Application of Leach for a writ of mandate to John R. Aitken, former judge of the superior court of San Diego county, whose term of office had expired, to compel him to settle a bill of exceptions. Writ denied.

Wellborn, Parker & Stevens and Homer & Wood, for petitioner. Luce, McDonald & Works and Gibson & Titus, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Application for a writ of mandate to issue out of this court, commanding respondent to settle a bill of exceptions.

The only question to be considered is, whether respondent, who was the judge before whom an action was tried, can be compelled, after his term of office has expired, to settle a bill of exceptions in such action. The Code authorizes him to "settle and sign a bill of exceptions after as well as before he ceases to be such judge or judicial officer." Code Civil Proc. § 653. A writ of mandate may be issued to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station. Id. § 1085. "It is the very essence of this proceeding that there be some officer or officers in being, having the power, and whose duty it is, to perform the act. If there be no such officers, it is obvious that the writ cannot go, nor the mandate of the court be enforced." State v. Supervisors, 21 Wis. 280. Respondent holds no office, trust, or station. Therefore no duty is enjoined on him which can be said to result from an office, trust, or station. The legislature could not enjoin upon a private citizen the duty of settling a bill of exceptions, nor require a person who had been a judge to continue to discharge judicial duties after his term of office had expired. The legislature might authorize him to perform such an act as it has authorized him to perform in settling a bill of exceptions, but it could not enjoin it upon him as a duty. No person can be compelled to perform judicial or official duties unless he is a judge or other officer at the time when the duty is required to be performed. We cannot issue a writ of mandate to compel any one other than an officer to perform an official act. Application denied.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; DE HAVEN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; HARRISON, J.; PATERSON, J.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. STAUDE et al. (No. 14,056.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 30, 1891.)

ACTION ON BAIL-BOND—PLEADING—SUFFICIENCY OF ANSWER—DENIAL.

A city sued the sureties on a forfeited bail-bond. The answer contained no denial of any of the material allegations of the complaint, but set up as a defense that the woman for whose release the undertaking was executed had been confined upon two charges; that she had previously been tried upon one of them, and acquitted; and that by reason of such acquittal, and the improbability that she would be convicted upon another trial of the cause, the defendants, without any knowledge of the other charge, and having been led by the officers of the city to believe that there was no other charge, executed the undertaking. It also alleged that the attorney who brought the suit had no authority from the city. Held that, as the complaint was to be taken as true, under Code Civil Proc. § 462, because none of its material allegations were controverted by the answer, and the answer failed to present anything by way of new matter to defeat the action, a motion for judgment upon the pleadings was properly allowed.

Commissioners' decision. Department I. Appeal from a superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. HOGE, Judge.

Action by the city and county of San Francisco against John Staude and Charles E. Kelly as sureties on a bail-bond. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellants. Frank J. Fallon and Curtis H. Lindley, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. This action is brought by plaintiff against the defendants as sureties on a forfeited undertaking of bail. The answer contains no denial of any of the material allegations of the complaint, but sets up two so-called "separate defenses," which are, in substance, as follows: First. That the woman whose release was procured by the execution of the undertaking herein was previous thereto tried by a jury for the crime of grand larceny, and they, having failed to agree upon a verdict, were discharged from the further consideration of the case. That by reason of such disagreement and the insufficiency of the evidence adduced at the trial, all apprehension or fear on the part of defendants that she would be convicted upon another trial of the case was entirely removed, in consequence of which, and without any knowledge on their part of the pendency of any other charge against her, and having been led by the acts of plaintiff, its officers and agents, to believe there was none, they executed the undertaking herein. That there was at the time of the execution of said undertaking another charge pending against her in the police court of San Francisco for larceny, which fact, though well known to plaintiff and its officers, was suppressed and concealed by them from the knowledge of defendants, and that they allowed her to be released and discharged from custody on said charge without requiring bail for her appearance. "That upon said last-mentioned charge the proofs against said Fanny Lyle were strong, and the presumption of guilt great; and she, the said Fanny Lyle, as defendants are informed and believe, feared conviction upon trial thereof, and that, by reason of such fear, and not in fear of the charge in the complaint herein mentioned, she, the said Fanny Lyle, departed from the state of California before the date of the alleged forfeiture of the bail-bond mentioned in the complaint herein." The second so-called "separate defense" avers generally upon information and belief that the attorney herein had no authority to bring this action, and that his appearance as such attorney was unauthorized by the plaintiff. Upon the filing of this answer plaintiff moved the court for judgment upon the pleadings on the usual grounds. The motion was granted, and the defendants excepted. The defendants then moved for and obtained leave to amend their answer, "if they were so advised," within 10 days; but they afterwards declined to do so, and judgment was thereupon given in favor of the plaintiff. The case comes here by appeal upon the judgment roll alone. Section 462 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "every material allegation of the complaint, not controverted by the answer, must, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true." As the complaint herein is sufficient in all respects, and the answer does not deny any of the material allegations thereof, and further fails to present anything by way of new matter to bar or defeat the action, it follows that the motion for judgment on the pleadings was properly granted by the court. Felch v. Beaudry, 40 Cal. 439; Hemme v. Hays, 55 Cal. 337; Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 298, 15 Pac. Rep. 844. We recommend that the judgment be affirmed.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

EYRE v. HARMON et al. (No. 13,497.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 30, 1891.)

MINING CORPORATIONS—DUTIES OF OFFICERS—FAILURE TO FILE REPORT.

1. St. 1880, p. 134, § 1, providing that the directors of a mining company shall cause to be made and posted every month an itemized account "or" balance-sheet for the previous month, embracing a full statement of all receipts and disbursements, showing the sources from which the receipts were derived, and for what the disbursements were made, must be construed as referring to two separate papers,—a balance-sheet and an itemized account,—either of which may be posted; and the detailed statement mentioned in said section is intended to apply only to the itemized account, and to show what such an account should contain, when posted instead of a balance-sheet.

2. St. 1880, p. 134, § 1, provides also that the superintendent of the company shall file with the secretary reports of all discoveries of ore, upon the occasion of such discovery, and weekly reports showing the work done in the mine, the amount of ore extracted and sent to the mill, the amount of bullion shipped to the office of the company or elsewhere, and the amount, if any, retained by the superintendent. Section 3 provides that, in case the directors shall fail to have the "reports and accounts made and posted" as provided in the foregoing section, they shall be liable to an action by any stockholder to recover $1,000 as liquidated damages. Held that, as the only reports mentioned are those of the superintendent, the statute, although they are not required to be posted, must be construed as applicable thereto, and as making the directors liable for a willful failure to have the superintendent make such reports, but not for the mere neglect of the superintendent; and the fact that the mine is being operated in a distant state does not prevent the reports from being made, since they are not required to be on file on any particular day, but only to be made and forwarded weekly.

McFARLAND, J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

This was an action by Eyre, a stockholder of a mining corporation, against A. K. P. Harmon and others, directors, to recover a penalty provided by statute for the failure to have made and posted certain accounts for the better protection of the stockholders of such corporations. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Manual Eyre, for appellants. Newlands, Allen & Herrin, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff is a stockholder of a mining corporation formed under the laws of this state, and this action is to recover from the defendants, who are directors of said corporation, a penalty of $1,000 for the alleged failure to have made and posted in the months of October and November, 1888, certain accounts provided for by the statute for the better protection of stockholders of mining corporations, approved April 23, 1880. St. 1880, p. 134. The act provides: "Section 1. * * * It shall be the duty of the directors on the first Monday of each and every month to cause to be made an itemized account or balance-sheet for the previous month, embracing a full and complete statement of all disbursements and receipts, showing from what sources such receipts were derived, and for what and to whom such disbursements or payments were made, and for what object or purpose the same was made; also all indebtedness or liabilities incurred or existing at the time, and for what the same was incurred, and the balance of money, if any, on hand. Such account or balance-sheet shall be verified under oath by the president and secretary, and posted in some conspicuous place in the office of the company. * * * It shall also be the duty of the superintendent to file with the secretary a weekly statement, under oath, showing the number of men employed under him, and for what purpose, and the rate of wages paid to each one. He shall attach to such account a full and complete report, under oath, of the work done in said mine, the amount of ore extracted, from what part of the mine taken, the amount sent to mill for reduction, its assay value, the amount of bullion received, the amount of bullion shipped to the office of the company or elsewhere, and the amount, if any, retained by the superintendent. It shall be his duty to forward to the office of the company a full report, under oath, of all discoveries of ore or mineral-bearing quartz made in said mine, whether by boring, drifting, sinking, or otherwise, together with the assay value thereof." "Sec. 3. * * * In case of the failure of the directors to have the report and accounts current made and posted as in the first section of this act provided, they shall be liable, either severally or jointly, to an action by any stockholder * * * for one thousand dollars liquidated damages, with costs of suit." The court below made an order striking from the complaint certain allegations which charged the defendants with failure to cause the superintendent to make and file the reports mentioned in section 1 of the act above mentioned, and also with a failure to have posted in the office of the company the superintendent's itemized account. This ruling of the court was excepted to. The case was then submitted to the court upon an agreed statement of facts, showing that a paper, in the following form, and duly verified, was posted in the month of October, 1888:

"A. K. P. HARMON, President.

"C. L. McCoy, Secretary."

There was also posted a statement, in similar form, for the month of November, 1888.

It was further agreed that each of the statements referred to was a balance-sheet, according to the understanding of the meaning of that term by book-keepers and merchants, and that both were made and posted in supposed compliance with the act of the legislature before referred to, and for the purpose of so complying; that such had been the form of the accounts since the passage of the act, and that no stockholder, prior to the commencement of this suit, had ever complained; and further, that complete books were kept, showing in detail the items from which such balance-sheets were made. Upon these facts the court gave judgment in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff appeals. It will thus be seen that the question arising upon the ruling of the court below in striking out parts of the complaint, and in giving judgment upon the agreed facts, involves a construction of the provisions of sections 1 and 3 of the statute above referred to.

1. It being conceded by the agreed statement of facts that there was properly posted in the office of the corporation, of which defendants are the directors, a paper which was in fact a balance-sheet, according to the understanding of merchants and book-keepers, we think this was a sufficient compliance with the law in that respect. The proper construction of the statute is that the directors shall cause to be posted either a balance-sheet or an itemized account, showing in detail all the matters especially enumerated in section 1. This would appear with greater clearness if in the formation of the sentence requiring such posting the word "balance-sheet" had been placed before the words "itemized account." But it is very certain that the statute refers to and expressly names two papers, a "balance-sheet" and an "itemized account," either one of which may be posted. Each of these words has a well-known and definite meaning, entirely different from the other, and they cannot be construed to mean the same thing, and both to designate a paper, stating in minute detail all the separate items of an account. A balance-sheet, as that word is uniformly used by book-keepers and business men, is a paper which shows a "summation or general balance of all accounts," but not the particular items going to make up the several accounts; and it is therefore essentially different from a paper embracing "a full and complete statement of all the disbursements and receipts, showing from what sources such receipts were derived, and for what and to whom such disbursements or payments were made, and for what object or purpose the same was made;" but such matters may find an appropriate place in an itemized account, and the clause just quoted from section 1 of the statute under consideration must therefore be construed as applying only to such an account, and the section is to be read as if such clause immediately followed the words "itemized account," in accordance with the familiar rule of construction which permits the transposition of words or sentences whenever it is necessary to do so, in order that every word may have a practical effect, according to its appropriate meaning. French v. Teschemaker, 24 Cal. 539. See, also, Waters v. Campbell, 4 Sawy. 121, in which case a section was construed as if a proviso found in the middle of a clause were placed at the end, in order to give effect to the obvious meaning of the section.

2. The remaining question before us arises upon the ruling of the court striking out certain portions of the complaint, and, in our opinion, the court erred in so far as such ruling relates to the allegations of the complaint charging the defendants with a failure to have the superintendent make the reports referred to in section 1. Section 3 declares that, "in case of the failure of the directors to have the reports and accounts made and posted, as in the first section of this act provided they shall be liable, either jointly or severally," to an action by any stockholder to recover $1,000 as liquidated damages. The natural and obvious meaning of this language is that for a failure upon the part of the directors to have such reports made and accounts posted as are provided for in the first section of the act, they shall be liable to the penalty named. Any other construction is forced and unnatural, and opposed to well-settled rules adopted by courts in the interpretation of statutes. The only reports directed by section 1 to be made are the weekly reports of the superintendent, showing the work done in the mine, the amount of ore extracted, from what part of the mine taken, the amount and assay value of the ore sent to mill for reduction, the amount of bullion received and shipped to the office of the company or elsewhere, and the amount, if any, retained by the superintendent; and the other report, in relation to discoveries of ore, to be made on the occasion of such discovery. Now, unless these are the reports referred to in section 3, it is evident that the word as there found must be given no meaning whatever. It must be eliminated entirely, and the section read as if it did not appear therein; and, in addition to this, there must also be attributed to the legislature the absurdity of declaring in elaborate detail what reports shall be made by the superintendent, and yet making no provision for the enforcement of the duty enjoined. It will not do to say in answer to this that the section only refers to reports which are to be made and posted, and therefore cannot apply to those of the superintendent, as they are not to be posted, for that is only another way of stating that nothing whatever was meant by the use of the word "reports." The language of section 3 is plain, not only in itself, but becomes even more so, if possible, when considered, as it must be, with reference to the general scope and purpose of the act of which it forms a part. The statute proceeds upon the theory that the stockholders, whether in the minority or majority, have a right to be informed as to the manner in which the business of the corporation is being conducted, the receipts and disbursements, the number of men employed, and the wages paid each, and also the value of the bullion shipped from time to time, and how much ore or bullion remains with the superintendent, and also whether any discoveries of ore have been made in the prosecution of the work, which, if known, would affect the value of the mine in which they own an interest. The means by which the stockholders are to receive this information are provided with great particularity in section 1. These means are: (1) Full and complete books of account to be kept by the secretary, and to be open to the inspection of the stockholders; (2) the monthly balance-sheet, or, in place thereof, an itemized account, to be posted in the office of the company; and, lastly, the reports of the superintendent, which are to be forwarded to the office of the company, and kept there, subject to the inspection of stockholders. Now, undoubtedly, it is the intention of this law that all of these accounts and reports shall be made as directed. There is nothing unreasonable in what is required, and it is the duty of the court, unless there is some fatal omission which defeats its intention, to so construe the statute that it shall have effect. It is urged that the duty of making reports cannot be compelled, because no penalty is imposed upon the superintendent for a failure to make them. This argument, however, does not meet the real question involved here, which is only whether the act has made the directors of the corporation liable for their failure to have these reports made. The directors are the governing body of the corporation, and as such have the power to employ the superintendent, to prescribe his duties, and to dismiss him if he fails to discharge such duties. They have the right to direct the superintendent to make these reports; and, if such direction were given in good faith, it would doubtless be obeyed, as it would be unreasonable to suppose that an officer would refuse to obey when such action might insure his dismissal from their service. Now, it was in view of these obvious considerations, which must have been in the minds of the legislators as men of ordinary experience, that the act in its penal clause addresses itself to the governing and controlling body of the corporation, and makes the directors liable for a failure to have made the reports referred to in section 1. This does not, as respondent contends, make the directors liable for the mere neglect of the superintendent, without any fault on their part. The statute is both remedial and penal in its nature. Its general purpose is to secure to stockholders their right to have general information of the manner in which the business of the corporation is being conducted, and in order to enforce this right they are permitted to institute actions for liquidated damages for a failure on the part of the directors to give them the information referred to in the statute, and in order to justify a recovery it must appear that there has been an intentional disregard of the law, a willful neglect to comply with its requirements. Under this construction directors are only liable for a willful and intentional failure to have the superintendent perform his duty. Impossibilities are not required of them, but only that they shall in good faith direct this officer, who is at all times subject to their control, to obey the positive requirements of the law in the matter of these reports. The fact that the mine is being operated in a distant state or territory does not place it beyond the power of the superintendent to make these reports. They are not required to be on file on the first Monday of the month, or at any other particular date; they are to be made and forwarded weekly, and, if so made, will be received weekly; and that is all that is required, and this is easy of accomplishment. The reports in regard to discoveries of ore are only to be made upon the occasion thereof.

As thus construed, this statute imposes no unreasonable burden upon directors of this class of corporations. It requires only good faith and common honesty in their management of property intrusted to them, and enforces from them a proper regard for the rights of those for whom they are trustees, so far at least as giving information of the working and development of the mine, and of all receipts and expenditures and discoveries attending the same. It is true that this class of statutes in their penal clauses ought to be strictly construed, but this rule does not mean that when the intent and object of the law is plain such object may be defeated by an overnice construction. In the language of the supreme court of the United States in U. S. v. Hartwell, 6 Wall. 396: "The rule does not exclude the application of common sense to the terms made use of in the act in order to avoid an absurdity, which the legislature ought not to be presumed to have intended." To hold that the word "reports," as found in the penal clause of this act, is meaningless, is not only to refuse to give effect to a word which in the connection used obviously and naturally refers to the reports of the superintendent, which by section 1 are required to be made, but such construction defeats the general purpose of the statute itself. But it is a general rule, applicable to the construction of penal as well as other statutes, that no word is to be eliminated from a section by the court if a sensible meaning can be given to it, unless by giving such word its meaning the real object of the statute would be defeated. With much greater reason is the court required to give effect to each word in a sentence, when not to do so is to deprive the law of the vitality necessary to secure respect for its commands. Applying this rule, there is no difficulty in the construction of section 3 of this act. It simply makes the directors liable to the penalty named for a willful failure to have such reports made and accounts posted as are referred to in section 1. If the directors cause the reports of the superintendent to be made and the monthly accounts to be posted as required by the statute, the law is complied with, otherwise not; and they incur the statutory penalty if the failure to do so was intentional on their part. Judgment reversed.

HOMICIDE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An objection that an instruction as to reasonable doubt, given by the court on its own motion in a murder trial, "would exclude from the consideration of the jury a doubt founded upon a knowledge of natural laws inconsistent with the hypothesis contended for by the prosecution," is not available, where defendant made no request to charge, and it does not appear from the record that the prosecution contended for any hypothesis claimed to be inconsistent with any natural law, or that evidence of any natural law would have been relevant or material.

2. Defendant on trial for murder having made no request to charge, it was not error in the court to charge the jury that, to justify the killing in self-defense, it "must be done under a well-founded belief that it was absolutely necessary for such person to kill the deceased at that time to save himself from great bodily harm. * * * It must appear to you that the danger to defendant must be present, apparent, and imminent, and the killing must have been done under a well-founded belief that it was absolutely necessary for the defendant to kill Ryan at the time to save himself from death or from great bodily harm."

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. BUCKLES, Judge.

Donguli was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. A. Lamont, M. C. Chapman, and L. L. Chamberlain, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder in the second degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state's prison for a term of 11 years. Defendant appeals on the judgment roll alone, containing no bill of exceptions; and the only points made relate to the propriety of certain instructions given to the jury. It does not appear that any instructions were requested by either party, and those given appear to have been given by the court of its own motion, and, in the absence of any part of the evidence, seem to be correct.

1. The defendant contends that the court erred in giving the following instruction: "I instruct you that a reasonable doubt is that state of the case which, after entire comparison and consideration of all the evidence, leaves the minds of the jurors in that condition that they cannot say they feel an abiding conviction to a moral certainty of the truth of the charge. I instruct you further, under this head, that in a legal sense a reasonable doubt is a doubt which has some reason for its basis; it does not mean a doubt from mere caprice or groundless conjecture. If you should entertain a reasonable doubt, then you should be able to give some reason, founded upon the evidence or want of evidence in this case, for such doubt. And you are not at liberty, under the law and your oath, to go outside of this case to hunt for or find a reason for doubting the guilt or innocence of the defendant, or the existence, or non-existence, of any fact or circumstance necessary to a conviction or acquittal of the defendant, but you must look only to the evidence in this case. A doubt, to justify an acquittal, must be reasonable, and arise from a candid and impartial consideration of all the evidence in the case. Therefore, if, after a careful and impartial consideration of all the evidence which has been submitted to you in this case, you can say and feel that you have an abiding conviction of the guilt of the defendant, and are fully satisfied of the truth of the charge, then you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, and should convict." The only part of this instruction objected to is the part italicized. It is said that "it would exclude from the consideration of the jury a doubt founded upon a knowledge of natural laws inconsistent with the hypothesis contended for by the prosecution." It does not appear from the record that the prosecution contended for any hypothesis claimed to be inconsistent with any natural law, or that evidence of any natural law would have been relevant or material. When the record contains no part of the evidence, "it is well settled that this court will not reverse the judgment on account of instructions alleged to be erroneous, 'unless it appears that such instruction would have been erroneous under every conceivable state of facts.' People v. Smith, 57 Cal. 130.

2. It is contended that the court erred in giving the italicized parts of the following instruction: "To justify a person for killing another upon the ground of self-defense, the killing must be done under a well-founded belief that it was absolutely necessary for such person to kill the deceased at that time, to save himself from great bodily harm. Should you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant did kill the said John Ryan, then, in order that he may avail himself of self-defense, it must appear to you that the danger to the defendant must be present, apparent, and imminent, and the killing must have been done under a well-founded belief that it was absolutely necessary for the defendant to kill Ryan at the time, to save himself from death or from great bodily harm, or to save some one in his habitation from great violence from Ryan or his associates." It is contended by counsel for defendant that "if the appearances were such as would have led a man of ordinary courage, firmness, and intelligence to believe the danger imminent, and the killing necessary to avoid death or great bodily harm, such killing was justifiable, even though there may have been in truth no danger at all. It is the appearance of danger, not the actual danger, which justifies." Conceding this to be correct, it is not inconsistent with the instruction properly construed by reading all parts of it together. So read and construed, it means only that to justify the killing on the ground of self-defense it must have been done under a well-founded belief that it was absolutely necessary to save the defendant from death or great bodily harm, and does not mean that the danger must have been real or actual. The expression, "it must appear to you that the danger to the defendant must be present, apparent, and imminent," read by itself, is not clear, and perhaps might be understood as requiring the danger to be actual, but, read in connection with what precedes and that which immediately follows it, I think it could not have been so understood by the jury. But the principal objection is to the expression that the belief must be "a well-founded belief." A belief that the danger is such as to justify the killing may be "well founded," although there may be no actual danger. Of this counsel's supposed case is an example in point. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

McFARLAND, J. I concur in the judgment, because I think that, taking the charge to the jury as a whole, the appellant was not prejudiced. But I do not think that courts hereafter should adopt that part of the charge which deals with the subject of reasonable doubt as an entirely proper instruction. For instance, the jury are told that if they have a reasonable doubt, then they "should be able to give some reason * * * for such doubt." Now, there are intelligent and sensible jurors able to come to correct conclusions, which are expressed by the formula "guilty" or "not guilty," whose minds have not been trained in the exercise of expressing in language the train of reasoning by which they arrive at their verdicts. They are not required to "give" their reasons,—that is not their business.

In re SHARP. (No. 14,835.)

INSOLVENCY—APPEAL OF ASSIGNEE—STAY.

Under Insolvent Act 1880, § 67, which provides that an appeal may be taken from an order settling the account of an assignee, and that the notice, undertaking, and procedure on appeal shall conform to the laws regulating appeals in civil cases, where an assignee perfected an appeal from an order settling his account, he is entitled to a stay of proceedings in execution of the order appealed from pending the appeal, though the appeal pertains to the disallowance of only one item in the account.

In bank.

Application of Charles R. Allen for an order to the superior court staying proceedings in execution of an order settling his account as assignee of J. H. Sharp, insolvent, pending an appeal therefrom. Order granted.

Walter D. Mansfield, for petitioner. E. P. Cole, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Charles R. Allen, the petitioner herein, is the assignee in insolvency of one Sharp, an insolvent debtor, and has given a bond for the faithful discharge of his duties as such assignee. On November 10, 1891, the court in which said insolvency proceeding was pending made an order settling the final account of said Allen as such assignee, in which order a certain credit of $250, claimed in the account filed by him, was disallowed by the court, and, as a part of the same order, directed him to pay over to the creditors of the insolvent the amount of money adjudged to be in his hands by the order settling the final account, to-wit, the sum of $3,662.86. Thereafter the assignee perfected an appeal to this court from the order settling his account, and filed an undertaking for the payment of all damages and costs which might be awarded against him on the appeal, not exceeding $300. The assignee, having failed to distribute the money belonging to the estate of the insolvent, as required by the order before referred to, was cited to appear before the judge of the superior court, and show cause why he should not be punished as for a contempt of court. This is an application for an order of this court directing a stay of all proceedings under and in execution of the order settling the account of said assignee pending the decision of this court on the appeal therefrom.

1. The petitioner is entitled to the order which he asks. By section 67 of the insolvent act of 1880 it is provided that an appeal may be taken from an order settling the account of an assignee, and it is further provided: "The notice, undertaking, and procedure on appeal shall conform to the general laws of this state regulating appeals in civil cases, except that when the assignee has given an official undertaking and appeal(s) from a judgment or order in insolvency, his official undertaking stands in the place of an undertaking on appeal, and the sureties therein are liable on such undertaking." Under this section the bond of the assignee itself operates as an undertaking on appeal when the assignee appeals from any judgment or order in the insolvency proceedings, and also has the effect to stay proceedings on that judgment or order when it directs him to pay over money, as effectually as if a new undertaking were given for that purpose. The object of this provision of the statute is apparent. The official bond of the assignee is a security for the proper distribution of all money or property found to be in his hands by the final judgment settling his accounts, and hence, when he appeals from such an order, it is not necessary for the security of the creditors whom he represents that another undertaking should be given, binding him to the performance of the same obligation. It is urged, however, that the assignee was not aggrieved by the order settling his account, except in so far as it disallowed the credit of $250, which he claimed in his account, and that he has no right to appeal from the entire order, and, by staying all proceedings, be permitted to retain in his hands over $3,000, about which there is no dispute. That is a question, however, which goes to the merits and the good faith of the appeal, and cannot be considered in this collateral proceeding. The order settling the account has the effect of a judgment, and draws a like rate of interest, and if, upon the hearing of the appeal, the court should be of opinion that the interest allowed by law is not sufficient compensation for the delay, and that the appeal is not taken in good faith, but for delay, it has the power to make an additional allowance by way of damages. Ordered, that a stay of proceedings be granted in accordance with the prayer of the petition.

We concur: MCFARLAND, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.

HARRISON, J. I concur in the order staying proceedings, but I am not prepared to say that an order settling the account of an assignee in insolvency, and directing the payment of a dividend to the creditors, is such a judgment as will bear interest from its entry. The assignee is an officer of the court, and his relation to the creditors is only that of a trustee; and the general rule is that a trustee is not liable for interest upon moneys of which he is only the custodian, until he repudiates the trust, or does some act inconsistent therewith. The assignee's relation as trustee is not terminated by the entry of the judgment, and his trust would not be repudiated until after a demand of payment by the creditors and a refusal on his part. If, when such demand is made, there is a sufficient reason for his refusal, he cannot be said to have repudiated his trust. The statute gives to an appeal from the order the effect of staying proceedings, and to prevent him from making payment of the dividend. The question, however, is not involved in the present motion, and, as any dictum in reference thereto will not be authority upon the court when the question may be presented for decision, I am unwilling to concur in any statement that might hereafter be treated as prejudging the case of some one who may desire to present it with argument for actual decision.

MICKLE v. HEINLEN. (No. 14,384.)

PLEADING PAYMENT.

In an action for wages in conducting defendant's business, under the denial that there is now due from defendant to plaintiff any sum whatever for services, defendant may show payments made by plaintiff to himself out of the business, and which he had not charged to himself, though he kept the books, though no payment was pleaded.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Action by Porter Mickle against J. R. Heinlen for work and labor and money had and received. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

N. O. Bradley, G. A. Heinlen, and A. B. Hunt, for appellant. Brown & Daggett and Daggett & Adams, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Defendant appeals from a judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The complaint, which is verified, charges that plaintiff performed work for defendant from the 1st day of December, 1887, to and including the 23d day of March, 1889, under an agreement whereby defendant agreed to pay him $100 per month, amounting to $1,576.66, of which sum part has been paid, leaving a balance of $1,000.73 still due. There is also a count for $110, for money had and received. The answer contains specific denials, and, among them, denies that defendant has not paid plaintiff in full, or that there is now due from defendant to plaintiff any sum whatever for work, labor, or services, or at all. On the trial the plaintiff, being a witness, testified that as defendant's agent he carried on the business of butchering, and kept a shop and sold meat at the town of Hanford. That he managed the business himself, kept the books, paid himself out of the business as he saw fit. That he purchased cattle, made deposits in the bank, and drew it out on checks as required. That at the end of the year he added up what he had drawn for his own use, and either charged or credited himself with the difference between that and his salary on the books. In that way he ascertained the balance due him, for which suit was brought. On cross-examination plaintiff admitted that hay, oats, and barley, to the amount of $71.64, had been paid for out of the business, and taken by him to his own use, and that he had never been charged with it or settled for it in any way. Plaintiff's counsel objected to the evidence because there was nothing in the answer that calls for a statement of an account, and asked to have it stricken out so far as it would show a counter-claim or payment. The court held that payment could not be proven under the answer; there was no recoupment, set-off, counter-claim, or payment pleaded; and therefore sustained the objection and motion, defendant reserving his exception. An answer was then made substantially to show that plaintiff had paid himself, out of the business, the entire sum claimed as wages, which offer was objected to on like grounds, with a similar ruling and exception. This court has often held that, under denials such as are contained in the answer in this case, payment may be proven, though not affirmatively averred. The question then is, did the evidence ruled out tend to prove payment? As the plaintiff had entire charge of the business and kept the books, was in fact his own pay-master, and was in the habit of paying himself from the business by taking what and when he chose, these appropriations must have been intended as payments or embezzlements. The fair conclusion is that he intended to charge himself, and forgot it. But, if he intended a misappropriation, the result would be the same. Under the pleadings the defendant could not recover judgment if the balance were found against the plaintiff. But to the extent of paying the debt the motive would be immaterial. We do not appreciate the suggestion that this may necessitate going through the books and stating an account. If that be necessary, to ascertain the balance due plaintiff, it is part of his case. As there must be a new trial, it is unnecessary to express an opinion as to the issue of fact, so fully argued in the briefs. We think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

ROSS v. CONWAY et al. (No. 13,341.)

CANCELLATION OF DEED—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE.

1. A trust-deed by one in weak mind and a dying condition, made principally for the benefit of one in whom the grantor had for many years imposed great confidence as her spiritual adviser, and for which there was no consideration, will be canceled on the ground of undue influence.

2. In a suit to annul a trust-deed, made by a woman but a few days before her death, for the benefit of her spiritual adviser, on the ground of undue influence, a finding that the grantor had no independent advice on making the deed is sustained by the evidence that the scrivener was employed and introduced to her by the cestui que trust at a hospital where no one else was present; that her last will was destroyed, and the deed made at the suggestion of the cestui que trust, who was present, with the exception of a few minutes, while directions for the deed were given.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge.

Suit by James E. Ross against John M. Conway et al. to annul, on the ground of undue influence, a trust-deed made by his mother, Elizabeth G. Ross, for the benefit of defendants. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

George D. Collins and George A. Johnson, (D. M. Delmas, of counsel,) for appellants. John A. Wright, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff, as the sole heir of his mother, Elizabeth G. Ross, brought this action to cancel and annul two certain deeds of trust conveying certain real estate in Santa Rosa, executed by his mother, August 11, 1888, and August 18, 1888, respectively, alleging that at the time of their execution his mother was weak in body, and that her mind was impaired, and that the defendant Conway, who was the pastor of the Roman Catholic church of Santa Rosa, of which she had been for many years a member, and who was also her spiritual adviser, had thereby acquired great influence over her, and, taking advantage of such influence and of her mental weakness, had caused her to execute the said deeds of trust for the benefit of himself and of the church of which he was the pastor. The defendants denied these allegations, and the cause was tried by the court, a jury having been called in as advisory to the court upon certain issues. The verdict of the jury and the findings of the court were in support of the allegations of the complaint, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial having been made and denied, an appeal has been taken from both the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

The two deeds of trust are substantially the same, the last one having been executed merely for the purpose of correcting an erroneous description in the first. Under the trust created by the deeds the trustees are directed to sell one of the parcels of land "as soon as practicable," and out of the proceeds thereof apply $8,000 in the improvement of the other parcel, and pay the remainder of the proceeds to the defendant Conway. Out of the income to be derived from the parcel to be improved, $75 per month was to be paid to the plaintiff, and the remainder monthly "to the pastor of the Roman Catholic church in Santa Rosa, to be disbursed by him in such manner as he may deem charitable." Other provisions contingent upon the death or change in circumstances of the plaintiff are unnecessary to be repeated here. The issues before the court were, in substance, whether Mrs. Ross was, at the respective dates on which the deeds of trust were executed, of weak mind, or able to comprehend the provisions of the instruments; and whether the defendant Conway used the influence which he had acquired over her, by virtue of being her spiritual adviser, for the purpose of procuring her to make such disposition of her property. Upon these issues there was much conflicting evidence before the court, both in the testimony of the witnesses who were examined, as well as in the circumstances under which the instruments were executed, and the purposes held by Mrs. Ross with reference to her son and to the church. Upon the evidence before it the court found in favor of the plaintiff. This finding was in accordance with the verdict of the jury, and upon a motion for a new trial, in which the evidence was again brought before the court for consideration, it adhered to its former conclusion. Under these circumstances we cannot disregard its finding. Inasmuch, however, as counsel have elaborately argued the facts, we have examined the record, and are of the opinion that the evidence fully justifies the findings of the court.

The court finds that at the dates of the execution of the deeds of trust Mrs. Ross was of weak mind, and in a dying condition, and that she died on the 20th of August; that the defendant Conway was, and had for a long time previously been, the pastor of the Roman Catholic church at Santa Rosa, and the spiritual adviser of Mrs. Ross; that a confidence was reposed in him by her, and that there existed on his part an influence and apparent authority over her arising out of his relation to her as her spiritual adviser, and that he took an unfair advantage of this influence, and used this confidence and authority for the purpose of procuring her to execute the two deeds of trust. The court also finds that Mrs. Ross had in December, 1887, executed a will of all her estate, with the exception of some minor legacies, in favor of the plaintiff herein, and that the provision in the deeds of trust for the defendants, other than the defendant Conway, were without any consideration from them, but were made solely through the influence of Conway.

The rule is inflexible that no one who holds a confidential relation towards another shall take advantage of that relation in favor of himself, or deal with the other upon terms of his own making; that in every such transaction between persons standing in that relation the law will presume that he who held an influence over the other exercised it unduly to his own advantage; or, in the words of Lord LANGDALE in Casborne v. Barsham, 2 Beav. 78, the inequality between the transacting parties is so great "that, without proof of the exercise of power beyond that which may be inferred from the nature of the transaction itself, this court will impute an exercise of undue influence;" that the transaction will not be upheld unless it shall be shown that such other had independent advice, and that his act was not only the result of his own volition, but that he both understood the act he was doing and comprehended its result and effect. This rule finds its application with peculiar force in a case where the effect of the transaction is to divert an estate from those who, by the ties of nature, would be its natural recipients, to the person through whose influence the diversion is made, whether such diversion be for his own personal advantage, or for the advantage of some interest of which he is the representative. It has been more frequently applied to transactions between attorney and client or guardian and ward than to any other relation between the parties, but the rule itself has its source in principles which underlie and govern all confidential relations, and is to be applied to all transactions arising out of any relation in which the principle is applicable. It is termed by Lord ELDON "that great rule of the court that he who bargains in any matter of advantage with a person placing confidence in him is bound to show that a reasonable use has been made of that confidence." Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 278. It was said by Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY in his argument in Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 300, that "the relief stands upon a general principle applying to all the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another,"—a principle which was afterwards affirmed by Lord COTTENHAM in Dent v. Bennett, 4 Mylne & C. 277, saying that he had received so much pleasure from hearing it that the recollection of it had not been diminished by the lapse of more than 30 years.

That the influence which the spiritual adviser of one who is about to die has over such person is one of the most powerful that can be exercised upon the human mind, especially if such mind is impaired by physical weakness, is so consonant with human experience as to need no more than its statement; and in any transaction between them, wherein the adviser receives any advantage, a court of equity will not enter into an investigation of the extent to which such influence has been exercised. Any dealing between them, under such circumstances, will be set aside as contrary to all principles of equity, whether the benefit accrue to the adviser, or to some other recipient who, through such influence, may have been made the beneficiary of the transaction. These principles have been so invariably announced whenever the question has arisen that a mere reference to the authorities will suffice. Norton v. Rely, 2 Eden, 286; Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 273; Thompson v. Heffernan, 4 Dru. & War. 291; Dent v. Bennett, 4 Mylne & C. 269; In re Welsh, 1 Redf. Sur. 246; Richmond's Appeal, 59 Conn. 226, 22 Atl. Rep. 82; Ford v. Hennessy, 70 Mo. 580; Pironi v. Corrigan, 47 N. J. Eq. 135, 20 Atl. Rep. 218; Connor v. Stanley, 72 Cal. 556, 14 Pac. Rep. 306; 1 Bigelow, Fraud, 352; Story, Eq. Jur. § 311.

The finding of the court that Mrs. Ross did not have any independent advice upon the subject of making the deeds of trust is fully sustained by the evidence. It appears from the record that the attorney who prepared the instruments was introduced to her by Conway, and that the only persons with whom she had any interview, or from whom she could receive any advice respecting the same, were this attorney and the defendant Conway. On the 9th of August she had expressed to Conway a desire to make a testamentary disposition of her property, and, upon his suggestion that Mr. Collins was a suitable person, she requested that he would send him to her at the hospital where she was lying. He thereupon sought Collins, and, telling him the wish of Mrs. Ross, accompanied him to the hospital. On their way he told Collins of the mode in which she proposed to dispose of her property, and, after their arrival, remained in the room with them while she was giving directions about the will, going out, however, occasionally, for short intervals to visit other people in the hospital, and leaving the building before the will was formally executed. Two days later he visited Collins at his office, and, after hearing the will read, he made to Collins a suggestion of some changes, and whether a deed of trust would not be preferable to a will. An appointment was then made between him and Collins to meet that afternoon in the room of Mrs. Ross at the hospital. After their arrival at the hospital, Conway made a suggestion to her that she execute a deed of trust instead of a will, and also other suggestions in reference to her disposition of the property. Only himself and Collins were in the room during this consultation, he, however, leaving it temporarily a few times during the period over which the interview extended, but remaining until Collins had received all the directions that she gave. Assuming that, by virtue of his relation to her, he had acquired an influence over her, it must be held that in the transaction under investigation there was an undue exercise of such influence; that by not insisting that she should have independent advice, and by continuing to remain in her presence during the interview with the only other person whom he permitted to see her, he exercised an influence over her actions which, though unseen and inaudible, was none the less effective in its results. "The question is," said Lord ELDON in Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 300, "not whether she knew what she was doing, had done, or proposed to do, but how the intention was produced; whether all that care and providence was placed round her, as against those who advised her, which from their situation and relation with respect to her they were bound to exert on her behalf." While the contract of purchase made between the defendant Conway and the trustees under the instruments sought to be annulled was irrelevant to any material issue before the court, and would have been properly excluded from evidence, we are unable to see that its admission could in any way have been prejudicial to the rights of the appellants. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

LUCK v. LUCK. (No. 13,567.)

DIVORCE—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN.

1. Although a mother is naturally and presumptively entitled to the custody of minor children, especially girls of tender age, it is for the trial court to say upon all the evidence, in di-vorice, whether she is in fact more worthy of their custody than the father.

2. Where a wife, having left her husband without cause, and taken with her the minor children, applies for a divorce, the court may, although it denies the application, direct that the children be given to the custody of the husband; and the fact that the husband lives in an adjoining county can make no difference, since, under Civil Code, § 156, he is the head of the family, and may choose any reasonable place or mode of living.

Department 1 Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

Petition by Minnie Luck against William Luck for divorce. There was a judgment denying the petition, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. KIERCE, for appellant. Chase & Chase, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action for a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, and for the custody of two minor children on the ground that defendant is not a fit and proper person to have the care, custody, or control of them. The answer denied specifically the charges of cruelty and defendant's unfitness to care for the children, and alleged that the plaintiff abandoned defendant, and took with her the children, without cause, and against his will and consent. Findings were waived, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, denying the prayer of the plaintiff, and giving to him the custody and control of the children. As the case is before us on the judgment roll alone, we must presume that the evidence was of such a character as to warrant the court in finding that the defendant was better qualified than the plaintiff to care for the children. Naturally and presumptively the mother is entitled to the custody and care of minor children—girls—of tender years; but it is for the trial court to say, upon all the evidence adduced at the trial, whether she is in fact more worthy of such a trust than the father. It is claimed by appellant that the court below—the superior court of Alameda county—had no power, after it denied the plaintiff's application, to direct that the children be cared for by defendant at Martinez, which is in an adjoining county. There is no merit in this contention. "The husband is the head of the family. He may choose any reasonable place or mode of living, and the wife must conform thereto." Section 156, Civil Code. It appears that the husband lives at Martinez, and that the wife has no just or legal cause for not living with him, nor for taking the children away. His home is the legal domicile of the family, and, if he is entitled to the custody of the children at all, he has the right to name any reasonable place in which they shall abide with him. So long as the husband is satisfied with the decree, and is without fault, the wife cannot complain. The order giving to defendant the custody of the children is one within the control and subject to the discretion of the court below. If circumstances occurring hereafter should render it desirable that the order should be revoked or modified, the learned judge who decided the controversy will no doubt act for the best interests of all the parties, and make the proper order with respect thereto. Judgment affirmed.

WICKERSHAM V. CRITTENDEN et al. (No. 14,507.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 20, 1892.)

BANKS—ACTION BY STOCKHOLDER—MISAPPROPRIATION OF FUNDS BY DIRECTORS—SALARIES—PLEADING—PARTIES—RIGHT TO SUE.

1. A complaint for injunction to restrain the misappropriation of money alleged that plaintiff and defendants were stockholders of a bank corporation; that defendant C. was a director and the president, and at a meeting of himself and two other directors voted to appropriate to himself a salary of $400 per month, and also a loan of $40,000 of the bank funds, and gave his unsecured demand note at 4 per cent. for the money received; that at a subsequent meeting he voted to loan another stockholder the sum of $45,000 for one year on an unsecured note; that his loan was made for the benefit of C., whose demand note was thereupon canceled, and the difference between the two notes immediately turned over to him and used for his own purpose. Held, that the complaint stated a cause of action, under Civil Code, § 2229, which provides that no trustee shall use the trust property for his own profit, and for purposes unconnected with the trust.

2. In the absence of an agreement that the directors, before their election as such, should receive such salary, a resolution to pay C. $400 per month was unauthorized.

3. A regular meeting of the directors was had on January 14th, and an adjournment taken until February 14th. On January 20th C. and two other defendants held a meeting, at which such $45,000 loan was made and such salary voted to C. Held, that the action taken at such a meeting was not binding on the stockholders.

4. Where the resignation of one of defendants as a director had been accepted at the meeting on January 14th, he could not take part in such meeting.

5. Though the complaint alleged but one cause of action,—the misappropriation of the funds,—it was not objectionable that the relief sought was not single, but was for an injunction and for restitution.

6. Where each of the other defendants was alleged to have been in some way connected with the transactions complained of, they were properly joined as defendants.

7. Where the action, though in the name of plaintiff, was in behalf of the bank, it was a proper party to the action.

8. Plaintiff's allegations in reference to actions brought by another stockholder and himself to determine the rights of certain of defendants to hold the offices of directors were not separate causes of action in behalf of plaintiff, but were immaterial, and did not vitiate the cause of action alleged.

9. The facts alleged in the complaint were sufficient to obviate the necessity of making any previous demand on the corporation or defendants that they institute an action to secure the relief which plaintiff sought.

10. Where plaintiff had the right to bring the action in his own name and for his individual account, as well as on behalf of the other stockholders, if his allegations were not sufficient to entitle the action to be considered as brought in behalf of others than himself, its sufficiency as an action in his own behalf was not impaired by his averment that he brought it for them as well as for himself.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

Action by I. G. Wickersham against James L. Crittenden and others to enjoin the misappropriation of certain funds and for the restitution of funds misappropriated. From an order sustaining defendants' demurrer to his complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Henley & Swift, Lippitt & Lippitt, and Wilcoxon & Bondlin, (Crittenden Thornton and F. H. Merzbach, of counsel,) for appellant. James L. Crittenden and Graves & Graves, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff, as a stockholder in the Bank of San Luis Obispo, brought this action against certain individuals assuming to be directors of the corporation, making the corporation also a defendant, for the purpose of protecting his interests in the corporation against certain acts of the defendants alleged by him to be unauthorized and done with the purpose and effect of injuring his stock therein. To this complaint the defendants demurred upon several grounds, and, their demurrer having been sustained, judgment was entered dismissing the complaint, from which the plaintiff has appealed. It is alleged in the complaint that the Bank of San Luis Obispo is a corporation incorporated under the laws of this state, having 1,000 shares of capital stock, and that the defendant Crittenden is the owner and in the control of a majority of the shares of said stock; that on the 16th day of October, 1890, at the annual election for directors of the corporation, the defendants Crittenden, Murphy, and Stewart, together with J. W. Smith and C. A. Pitkin, were, by the unanimous vote of the stockholders, elected as such directors for the year next ensuing, and that thereafter they organized as a board by electing Crittenden as president and Stewart as secretary and cashier of the corporation, and at the same time fixed the salary of the president at $200 per month, and required him to give a bond, with satisfactory sureties, in the sum of $15,000. The complaint further alleges that on the 12th day of December, 1890, at a regular meeting of the directors, at which only Crittenden, Stewart, and Smith were present, Crittenden called Smith to the chair, and then offered certain resolutions, releasing the president from the necessity of giving a bond, increasing his salary to $400 per month, and authorizing the president and cashier of the bank to make a loan to himself (Crittenden) of the moneys of the bank to the amount of $40,000 upon call, at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum; that only Crittenden and Stewart voted in favor of these resolutions; that thereupon Crittenden, on the same day, received from Stewart $37,120 of the money of the bank, for which he gave his note without security, payable on demand, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly; and that he thereafter received $400 per month as his salary as president. It is also alleged that the regular rate of interest upon loans made by the bank, and the usual and customary value of money, was at that time from 10 to 12 per cent. per annum, and that the money received by Crittenden was used to pay a debt then due from him, which was secured and bore interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum; and that the salary of $400 per month is greatly excessive, and beyond the value of any services rendered by said Crittenden. The complaint then alleges that at the next regular meeting of the directors, viz., January 14, 1891, at which all except Crittenden were present, the board rescinded the resolution increasing the salary of the president to $400; fixed the amount of the bond to be given by him at $20,000; disapproved of the aforesaid loan to Crittenden, and directed the cashier to notify him to return the money to the bank, or give a new note with security, and bearing interest at 10 per cent. per annum. At this meeting the defendant Murphy handed in his resignation as a director, which was accepted by the board, and the plaintiff was elected a director in his place, and thereupon the board, having directed notice of his election to be given to the plaintiff, adjourned until Monday, the 19th day of January. The plaintiff arrived at San Luis Obispo on Monday night, the 19th of January, but prior to his arrival the directors Crittenden and Stewart met as a board and adjourned the meeting until the next regular meeting in February, 1891. Thereupon the plaintiff, finding that no business could be done, left San Luis Obispo for San Francisco about noon of Tuesday, the 20th of January. Immediately after he left the defendants Crittenden and Stewart induced the defendant Murphy to meet with them as a director of said corporation, and thereupon these three defendants assumed to act as a board of directors of said corporation, and the following proceedings took place: Murphy moved that his resignation, which had been offered and accepted on the 14th of January, be withdrawn, and the three then present assented thereto, and declared the same withdrawn. Thereupon, upon motion of Murphy, the resolutions and proceedings passed by the board of directors on January 14, 1891, were annulled and rescinded by the vote of the three then present, and ordered stricken from the minutes. The resignation in writing of Director Pitkin was then presented, and upon the motion of Murphy was accepted, and the defendant Brittan was thereupon elected director in his place by the votes of Murphy, Stewart, and Crittenden. The office of director, held by Joseph W. Smith, was then declared vacant by the vote of the defendants Brittan, Murphy, Stewart, and Crittenden, and by the same vote the defendant Graves was declared elected as a director in his place. Thereupon Murphy assumed to act as president of said meeting, and upon the motion of Crittenden the following resolutions were adopted and declared carried by the votes of Crittenden, Stewart, Brittan, and Graves: "Resolved that each and all the resolutions and proceedings purported to have been adopted at the pretended meeting of the board on January 14, 1891, be, and are hereby, vacated, set aside, and annulled and rescinded, and declared null and void, and that the same be stricken from the minutes of this board; resolved, that the pretended acceptance of the resignation of P. W. Murphy, entered on the minutes of January 14, 1891, be, and is hereby, vacated, set aside, rescinded, and annulled, and declared null and void; resolved, that the pretended election of I. G. Wickersham as a director of this corporation, entered on the minutes of January 14, 1891, be, and is hereby, vacated and set aside, rescinded, and annulled, and declared to be null and void; resolved, that there has been only three directors of this corporation since the election of directors on October 14, 1890, viz., James L. Crittenden, C. A. Pitkin, and P. W. Murphy, and that said Crittenden, Pitkin, and Murphy were on the 14th day of this month the only persons authorized or entitled to act as directors of the corporation; and that, as the by-laws of this corporation, section 4, provides and declares that three directors constitute a quorum of the board of directors, there was not a quorum of said board present at or during the meeting of said board purported to have been held on the 14th day of January, 1891, and that no act or proceeding or resolution had, done, or adopted at said meeting was valid or binding upon this corporation, or upon its board of directors, or upon its officers." Crittenden, Murphy, Brittan, and Graves then proceeded to elect a director in place of Stewart, who by the last of these resolutions was declared never to have been a director, and elected Stewart to fill said vacancy, and also re-elected him as secretary, cashier, and treasurer of the corporation; and at this meeting the salary of the president was again fixed at $400 per month, from December 15, 1890. It is also alleged that on the 17th of January, 1891, the defendants Crittenden and Stewart loaned to the defendant Brittan of the money of the bank the sum of $45,000, without security, upon his note, payable in one year thereafter; that the said loan was made, and said note taken, for the benefit of Crittenden, and with the express purpose of applying the money so loaned for his benefit, and to obtain the use of that amount of the money of the bank for a year; that upon making the loan the aforesaid note of Crittenden to the bank was canceled, and the difference between the amount of that note and the $45,000 was immediately turned over to Crittenden, and used by him for his own purposes. The complaint alleges that after the election in October the defendants, Crittenden and Stewart, willfully and fraudulently conspired and combined to injure the business of the bank, destroy its credit, and depreciate the value of its stock; that the other defendants have been but the instruments in their hands and under their control for this purpose; that the foregoing acts and transactions were had and done in furtherance of such purpose, and in order to carry out the same in the interests of the defendant Crittenden, and that said acts and transactions have in fact greatly injured the business and credit of the bank and the value of its stock; and that the defendants, unless restrained, will make further misappropriations of the funds of the bank, to the injury of the plaintiff.

Upon the facts thus alleged, which by their demurrer the defendants admit to be as stated in the complaint, the plaintiff has shown a cause of action, and the demurrer should have been overruled. Divested of all circumstances of narration, the complaint alleges that the defendant Crittenden, who is trustee of the plaintiff and other stockholders for the management of the funds of the bank, has violated his trust by diverting $45,000 of those funds from the purpose for which he was intrusted with their management, to his own use and benefit, and has also without authority appropriated to himself the sum of $400 per month as a salary for his services as such trustee. The other allegations merely set forth the persons with whom he has combined, and the means adopted by him for the purpose of effecting this result. It is one of the peculiar functions of a court of equity to protect a cestui que trust against any violation by his trustee of his obligation, and to prevent any impairment of the trust fund, and, in case of diversion or misappropriation of such fund by the trustee, to direct a restitution thereof, and to enforce such direction by some process appropriate to the exercise of its jurisdiction. The directors of a corporation hold a fiduciary relation to the stockholders, and have been intrusted by them with the management of the corporate property for the common benefit and advantage of each and every stockholder, and by their acceptance of this office they preclude themselves from doing any act, or engaging in any transaction, in which their private interest will conflict with the duty they owe to the stockholders, and from making any use of their power or of the corporate property for their own advantage. Cook, Stocks, § 648; Mor. Corp. § 516; Coal Co. v. Sherman, 30 Barb. 571; Hoyle v. Railroad Co., 54 N. Y. 328; Barnes v. Brown, 80 N. Y. 535; San Diego v. Railroad Co., 44 Cal. 106; Wilbur v. Lynde, 49 Cal. 290; Bank v. Downey, 53 Cal. 466. For the reason that it is against public policy to permit persons occupying fiduciary relations to be placed in such a position that the influence of selfish motives may be a temptation so great as to overpower their duty and lead to a betrayal of their trust, the rule is unyielding that a trustee shall not, under any circumstances, be allowed to have any dealings in the trust property with himself, or acquire any interest therein. Courts will not permit any investigation into the fairness or unfairness of the transaction, or allow the trustee to show that the dealing was for the best interest of the beneficiary, but will set the transaction aside at the mere option of the cestui que trust. Story, Eq. Jur. § 322; Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 252; Taussig v. Hart, 58 N. Y. 428; Elevated R. Case, 11 Daly, 486; Michoud v. Girod, 4 How. 503; Davis v. Rock Creek Co., 55 Cal. 364. "So strictly is this principle adhered to that no question is allowed to be raised as to the fairness or unfairness of a contract so entered into. It obviously is or may be impossible to demonstrate how far in any particular case the terms of such a contract have been the best for the interest of the cestui que trust which it was possible to obtain. It may sometimes happen that the terms on which a trustee has dealt or attempted to deal with the estate or interests of those for whom he is a trustee have been as good as could be obtained from any other person; they may even at the time have been better, but still so inflexible is the rule that no inquiry on that subject is permitted." Railway v. Blakie, 1 Macq. 461. It is declared in Civil Code, § 2229: "A trustee may not use or deal with the trust property for his own profit, or for any other purpose unconnected with the trust in any manner."

The transaction of January 17, 1891, by which Crittenden and Stewart loaned to the defendant Brittan the sum of $45,000 of the money of the bank, must be regarded, under the allegations of the complaint, as a violation of their trust. The money was loaned for an unusual term, and without security, contrary to the rules and customs of banking, and for the benefit of the defendant Crittenden. His own promissory note for the sum previously received by him from Stewart was canceled, and the difference between that sum and the $45,000 was turned over to him and used for his own interests and purposes. The transaction was had by them without any previous authorization from the board, and as president and cashier they had no authority to thus dispose of the funds of the bank. The president of a bank has no more power of management or disposal over the property of the corporation than any other single member of the board. He is not the executive officer who has charge of its moneyed operations, and it is not among his functions to withdraw or remove its funds, or to use them for any purpose whatsoever. Morse, Bank, § 144. The cashier is the executive officer of a bank, and the one who transacts its financial operations, but his office is purely executive, and his power is limited to transacting such business as the board of directors have authorized. Morse, Bank, § 152. It hence results that, as alleged in the complaint, Crittenden and Stewart, without any authority therefor, took of the moneys of the bank the sum of $45,000, and loaned it to the defendant Brittan with the intent and purpose to apply it to the benefit of Crittenden.

Whether the transactions objected to could have been avoided by the plaintiff if Crittenden had taken no part in them, or if they had been had under the authority of a majority of the board of directors who were competent to act, need not be considered, since in each of these transactions the act was done either at the instance of Crittenden or by his vote.

The meeting of January 20th may be laid out of consideration, as the doings at that meeting could neither be binding upon the corporation or its stockholders, nor give authority to the parties engaged therein. Whether or in what manner it was called is not alleged. It was, at most, but a special meeting,—the regular meeting having been adjourned until February 14th. There were only two directors present,—Crittenden and Stewart,—for Murphy, whose resignation had been accepted by the board on the 14th of January, was as devoid of authority to form a component part of the board as would have been any other by-stander. Upon the basis, however, of this unauthorized meeting was built all the structure by which the defendants herein claimed to represent the corporation, and to have authorized the transactions in question; but, as the stream can never rise higher than its source, the meeting could gain no authority beyond what the two directors could give it, nor could these two directors, by adopting any resolutions, even though they were spread upon the records of the corporation, give to themselves any greater authority than they had without them.

The attempted resolution to increase the salary of the president from $200 to $400 per month conferred no authority to withdraw that money from the bank. A director in a corporation is not entitled to compensation for his service as director, in the absence of any agreement in advance that he shall receive such compensation. If, in the course of his office, he render to the corporation any unusual services, that may be the basis of a quantum meruit; but the directors have not the authority to vote salaries to themselves after their election as directors, (Cook, Stocks, § 657,) nor can they in any instance vote a salary to one of their number as president when he takes part in the proceeding, or his vote is essential to the adoption of the resolution. Butts v. Wood, 37 N. Y. 317; Kelsey v. Sargent, 40 Hun. 155; Copeland v. Manufacturing Co., 47 Hun. 235; Gardner v. Butler, 30 N. J. Eq. 702; Ward v. Davidson, 89 Mo. 445, 1 S. W. Rep. 846; Chamberlain v. Wool Co., 54 Cal. 103. The right of Crittenden to withdraw the money of the bank as compensation for such services was not increased by his causing to be spread upon its records a resolution that he might receive that amount as his salary.

The other grounds of the demurrer are untenable. There is only one cause of action set forth in the complaint, viz., the fraudulent misappropriation by the trustee of the funds with which he had been intrusted; the other matters alleged being merely averments of the facts constituting the fraud, and the means and instruments by which it was accomplished. The relief that is sought has reference only to this cause of action. It is no objection to the complaint that the relief sought is not single. It is often necessary, in order that the plaintiff may obtain full justice, that the relief granted him be as varied and diversified as the means that have been employed by the defendant to produce the grievance complained of. If a trustee is shown to have been unfaithful, the court may not only compel restitution, but may also restrain him by injunction from similar acts, or, if deemed necessary, may remove him from his trust. If he has called to his aid other confederates, they also may be enjoined from further participation in the acts which infringe upon the rights of the plaintiff. A court of equity will always find the means of enforcing its decrees against a delinquent defendant, and its power, in this respect, is as extensive as the exigencies of the case.

The defendants are neither of them improperly joined in the action. Andrews v. Pratt, 44 Cal. 319. Each of them is alleged to have been in some way connected with the transactions complained of, and complete justice cannot be done in the absence of either of them.

Nor was it necessary that either Pitkin or Smith should have been made parties to the action. The plaintiff makes no complaint against the bank, or against any act in which they have participated, but seeks relief against the individuals who are diverting the funds of the bank from their legitimate channel. It was necessary that the bank should be a party to the action, as the action, though in the name of the plaintiff, is in reality in behalf of the corporation. Beach v. Cooper, 72 Cal. 99, 13 Pac. Rep. 161.

The allegations in reference to the actions brought by Smith and the plaintiff to determine the rights of the defendants Graves, Murphy, and Brittan to hold the office of director are not separate causes of action in behalf of the plaintiff herein. These allegations are in reality immaterial, and might have been struck out of the complaint on that ground, but they do not vitiate the cause of action which he has alleged.

The facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient to obviate the necessity of making any previous demand upon the corporation or the defendants that they institute an action to secure the relief which the plaintiff seeks herein. Beach v. Cooper, 72 Cal. 99, 13 Pac. Rep. 161; Moyle v. Landers' Adm'rs, 83 Cal. 579, 23 Pac. Rep. 798; Kelsey v. Sargent, 40 Hun. 150.

It was not necessary that the plaintiff should join with him the other stockholders as plaintiffs, or that he should make them defendants in the action. He had the right to bring the action in his own name and for his own individual account, as well as on behalf of the other stockholders. If his allegations are not sufficient to entitle the action to be considered as brought in behalf of others than himself, its sufficiency as an action in his own behalf is not impaired by his averment that he brings it for them as well as for himself. The judgment is reversed, and the court below is directed to enter an order overruling the demurrer, and granting to the defendants 20 days to answer the complaint.

WICKERSHAM v. BRITTAN. (No. 14,506.)

CORPORATIONS—ELECTIONS—REMEDY OF PERSON AGGRIEVED.

An "appointment" by the board of directors of a corporation is not an "election" by the corporation, within Civil Code, § 315, authorizing the district court to inquire into "any election held by any corporate body" on the application of any person aggrieved by such election.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

Action by I. G. Wickersham against N. J. Brittan to determine the right of defendant to be a director in the Bank of San Luis Obispo. Defendant's demurrer was sustained. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henley & Swift, Lippitt & Lippitt, Wilcoxon & Bouldin and Crittenden Thornton, (F. H. Merzbach, of counsel,) for appellant. James L. Crittenden and Graves & Graves, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff commenced this action under the provisions of section 315 of the Civil Code for the purpose of determining the right of the defendant to be a director in the Bank of San Luis Obispo, a corporation organized under the laws of this state. In his petition he alleges the incorporation of the bank; that he is a stockholder therein; that at the annual election of directors, on October 15, 1890, J. L. Crittenden, J. W. Smith, P. W. Murphy, C. A. Pitkin, and W. E. Stewart, were elected directors for the year next ensuing; that on the 14th day of January, 1891, Pitkin tendered his resignation as such director; "that said resignation was handed to the said Crittenden, Stewart, and Murphy, who then and there assumed to be and act as members of the board of directors of said corporation, and to constitute a quorum thereof; that said Murphy was not then and there a member of said board, because he had resigned, and his resignation had been accepted, and his successor had been elected;" "that thereafter the said Crittenden, Stewart, and Murphy, assuming to act as a board of directors of said corporation, and as a quorum thereof, passed a pretended resolution, purporting to appoint the defendant, N. J. Brittan, a director of said bank, and since that time the said defendant, N. J. Brittan, has usurped and unlawfully exercised the office of a director of said bank;" and prayed "that the claim of said defendant, N. J. Brittan, to be a member of said board be adjudged to be utterly invalid and void." To this petition the defendant demurred, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and that the petition did not state sufficient facts to entitle the petioner to any relief. The court sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the petition, and from the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed.

Section 315 of the Civil Code provides: "Upon the application of any person or body corporate aggrieved by any election held by any corporate body, the district court of the district in which such election is held must proceed forthwith to hear the allegations and proofs of the parties, or otherwise inquire into the matters of complaint, and thereupon confirm the election, order a new one, or direct such other relief in the premises as accords with right and justice." Section 302, Civil Code, provides that the directors of a corporation must be elected annually by the stockholders or members; and sections 307 and 312 provide the manner in which such elections may be held; and in section 305 it is declared that, "whenever a vacancy occurs in the office of director, unless the by-laws of the corporation otherwise provide, such vacancy must be filled by an appointee of the board." It is maintained by the respondent that the provisions of section 315 apply only to the annual elections by the stockholders, while the appellant contends that they are applicable as well to the appointment of a director to fill a vacancy. There is a marked distinction of meaning between the words "election" and "appointment," which is recognized in legal as well as in political nomenclature. Each of the words, indeed, signifies choice or designation of some person to fill an office or discharge a duty, but the manner in which the selection or designation is to be made determines the word which should be used; and, as words are but a symbolical expression of the act which they represent, the word which is used in any instance must be construed to signify the act which it is intended to represent, rather than in accordance with its strict etymological meaning. In Sturgis v. Spofoord, 45 N. Y. 446, an act of the legislature provided that three of the commissioners of pilots should be "elected" by the members of the chamber of commerce, and the other two by the presidents and vice-presidents of the marine insurance companies of the city of New York, and it was contended that this act conflicted with the provision of the constitution which required that all officers whose election or appointment was not provided for by the constitution should be elected by the people, or appointed as the legislature might direct. The court, however, said: "Although the word 'election' is used in the statute, it cannot be supposed that the legislature intended it in any such sense as that word is used in the constitution, or as the result of a choice by the ordinary mode of voting by the people. The mode prescribed by the statute for selecting these officers is, in legal effect, an appointment, and comes within the meaning of that word as used in the constitution; and the misnomer of the legislature cannot change the real character of the act provided for."

The term "election" carries with it the idea of a choice in which all who are to be affected with the choice participate; whereas, from the word "appointment" we understand that the duties of the appointee are for others than those by whom he is appointed. As distinguished from an election, an appointment is generally made by one person, or by a limited number, acting with delegated powers, while an election is the direct choice of all the members of the body from whom the choice can be made. Bouvier, under the word "Election," says: "Etymologically, 'election' denotes choice, selection out of the number of those choosing. In common use, however, it has come to denote such a selection made by a distinctly defined body." In Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, under the heading "Appointment," it is said: "The 'appointment' to a public office is made by one or more possessing delegated powers, as distinguished from 'election,' where the right is exercised by many;" and the term "elect" is therein defined: "To select or choose by the popular voice or vote, as distinguished from 'appoint,' which is by an individual." In Rap. & L. Law Dict., under the term "Appointment," it is said: "'Appointment' to an office or trust implies the conferring of the dignity by the act of one or more individuals having power to select the person appointed. 'Election' is the selection of the person by the votes of an entire class." "No latitude of construction can justify the reading of 'elected' as the synonym of 'appointed.'" Magruder v. Swann, 25 Md. 214. See, also, State v. Irwin, 5 Nev. 111; Commissioners v. Louisville, 3 Bush, 602; Speed v. Crawford, 3 Metc. (Ky.) 207; State v. Barbour, 53 Conn. 76; Conger v. Gilmer, 32 Cal. 75. The fact that the selection of the officer is made by ballot is not controlling. This is but a means that the appointing body may adopt for making its choice of the individual to be appointed; nor does a direction to the appointing body to "elect" the one whom it will designate for the office require such election to be made by ballot, or render its act any the less an "appointment." Conger v. Gilmer, supra. Although the words are sometimes used interchangeably in statutes, yet, for the purpose of giving construction to the statute, courts must give to the word used a meaning according to the connection in which it is found. Section 308 of the Civil Code provides that "immediately after their election the directors must organize by the election of a president,—who must be one of their number,—a secretary and treasurer." Here the word "election," as first used, refers to the election by the stockholders, and is the proper term to signify the choice by the votes of the entire body; whereas, in its subsequent use it signifies only the appointment by the board of its own officers. In section 303 authority is given to a corporation to provide by its by-laws for "the manner of election and the tenure of office of all officers other than directors." This provision also has reference technically to the appointment of such officers, rather than to an election of them in the mode provided by statute for the election of directors. We are of the opinion that the provisions of section 315 have application only to the elections which are by the statute authorized to be made by the stockholders, and that it would violate recognized rules of construction to include under that term an appointment made by the board of directors to fill a vacancy. It cannot have been intended by the legislature that the courts should supervise the appointment of all subordinate officers and employes of a corporation that may be made by the board of directors; but, if the contention of the appellant in the present case is correct, we see no good reason for not holding that the term "election," as found in section 315, is applicable also to such appointments as are made under the provisions of sections 303 and 308. This construction is also sustained by the fact that it is only when some one is aggrieved by an election held by "any corporate body" that section 315 authorizes the court to take any action. The "corporate body" here referred to is the corporation itself, and not the board of directors. Mor. Priv. Corp. § 33. "The persons signing the articles, and their associates and successors," are by the statute declared to be a "body politic and corporate," (Civil Code, § 296;) while the board of directors are only the persons by whom "the corporate powers, business, and property" of the corporation are to be "exercised, conducted, and controlled," (Civil Code, § 305;) and the elections which the statute authorizes to be held by the corporate body are those at which only the stockholders or members vote. The judgment is affirmed.

WICKERSHAM v. MURPHY. (No. 14,508.)

CORPORATIONS—ELECTIONS—PERSON AGGRIEVED.

In an action to determine the right of defendant to continue to act as a director of a corporation, after his resignation has been accepted, and plaintiff regularly appointed by the board of directors to fill the vacancy, plaintiff is not a "person aggrieved by any election," within Civil Code, § 315, providing that on the application of any "person aggrieved by any election held by any corporate body" the district court must inquire into such election.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

Action by I. G. Wickersham against P. W. Murphy to determine the right of defendant to be a director in the Bank of San Luis Obispo. Defendant's demurrer was sustained. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henley & Swift, Lippitt & Lippitt, Wilcoxson & Bouldin, and Crittenden Thornton, (F. H. Merzbach, of counsel), for appellant. James L. Crittenden and Graves & Graves, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The present case involves a consideration of the same facts as the case of Wickersham v. Brittan, 28 Pac. Rep. 792, (No. 14,506, just decided.) In addition to the facts in that case the petition herein alleges that on the 14th of January, 1891, the defendant, Murphy, who had been elected a director at the annual meeting in October, resigned his office as such director, and, his resignation having been accepted by the board, the plaintiff was thereafter on the same day chosen a director in his place by the unanimous vote of the remaining members of the board. The petition then alleges that "the said P. W. Murphy claims and pretends still to be a director of said corporation, and he and the said James L. Crittenden and W. E. Stewart have refused to acknowledge your petitioner as a member of said board, or to meet with him as a member thereof, and have excluded and threatened to exclude your petitioner from all participation in the acts of said board or the government of said corporation, in the interest of and in support of the claim of said P. W. Murphy." We do not think that the provisions of section 315 of the Civil Code are intended to apply to this case. The plaintiff does not claim to be aggrieved by any "election" of any corporate body, but rather by the fact that, after he had been regularly and properly chosen as a director, some of the remaining members of the board refused to recognize his right to the office. For such a grievance his remedy must be sought in a different proceeding. The judgment is affirmed.

FRANKEL v. DEIDESHEIMER et al. (No. 13,412.)

APPEAL—DIVIDED COURT—AFFIRMANCE.

Const. Cal. art. 6, § 2, provides that the supreme court shall consist of a chief justice and six associate justices, and the concurrence of four justices present at the argument shall be necessary to pronounce a judgment in bank, but, if four justices so present do not concur in a judgment, then all the justices qualified to sit in the cause shall hear the argument; but to render a judgment a concurrence of four judges shall be necessary. On an appeal it appeared that one of the justices was disqualified from participating, and the six others were equally divided as to the disposal of the case, and there was no probability of any change in the opinions or personnel of the court. Held, that the judgment of the court below would be affirmed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; G. G. CLOUGH, Judge.

Action by Frankel against Deidesheimer and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed. For former report, see 23 Pac. Rep. 136.

Const. Cal. art. 6, § 2, provides that the supreme court shall consist of a chief justice and six associate justices, and the concurrence of four justices present at the argument shall be necessary to pronounce a judgment in bank, but, if four justices so present do not concur in a judgment, then all the justices qualified to sit in the cause shall hear the argument; but to render a judgment a concurrence of four judges shall be necessary.

W. F. Herrin and H. L. Gear, for appellant. Hunley & Gale, S. B. Davidson, and Smith & Ford, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This cause has been long pending in this court, and has been reargued twice. One of the justices is disqualified from participating in its decision; and of the six other justices three are of opinion that the judgment should be affirmed, and three are of opinion that the judgment should be reversed. Repeated consultations have ended in the same disagreement; and there is no probability of any change in the opinions of those now constituting the court, or of any immediate change in the personnel of the court. Under these circumstances, we think that the judgment should be affirmed, for the reasons stated in Luco v. De Toro, 88 Cal. 26, 25 Pac. Rep. 983. The judgment and order are affirmed.

HARRISON, J., being disqualified, did not participate in the foregoing.

PEOPLE v. KRUSICK. (No. 20,847.)

SEDUCTION—BURDEN OF PROOF—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action under Pen. Code, § 266, imposing a penalty for the seduction of "an unmarried female of previous chaste character," the fact that the woman alleged to have been seduced was unmarried must be proven by direct evidence.

2. On trial for seduction it was error to charge that previous chaste character could be established by showing association with reputable families, and that, when the prosecution named the people with whom the prosecutrix had associated, the presumption of law is that they were reputable, and that the burden of showing that they were otherwise was on defendant.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; JOHN C. GRAY, Judge.

One Krusick was convicted of seduction, and appeals. Reversed.

Hundley & Lloyd, (John Gale, of counsel,) for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, Lewis Frees, and J. D. Sproul, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The defendant was tried and convicted upon an information charging him with the crime of seducing an unmarried female of previously chaste character under the promise of marriage. Section 266 of the Penal Code, under which the information was filed, provides: "Every person who, under promise of marriage, seduces and has sexual intercourse with an unmarried female of previous chaste character, is punishable by imprisonment in the state-prison for not more than five years, or by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

1. In order to convict the defendant of the crime defined in this section it is necessary for the state to prove that the person seduced was an "unmarried female of previous chaste character," and that she consented to sexual intercourse with the defendant upon the sole consideration of his promise to marry her. Unless all of these elements are established by competent evidence the crime is not proved. It is as essential for the prosecution to show that the person against whom the offense was committed is of the character named in the statute as it is to show that the sexual intercourse was had under a promise of marriage. The statute does not attempt to punish the seduction of a married woman, or of one whose character was not previously chaste; nor does it attempt to punish illicit cohabitation, or the seduction of an unmarried woman, whose character was previously chaste, which is accomplished either in whole or in part by any other means, or from any other motive, than a promise of marriage. This construction of the statute was taken by the court below. It instructed the jury: "To convict the defendant in this case of seduction the jury must find from the evidence in the case that the prosecuting witness was at the time of and prior to the 15th day of April, 1889, of previous chaste character and unmarried." And also: "You have no right to infer or presume that the prosecuting witness was an unmarried female. It devolved upon the prosecution to establish that fact, if it be a fact, by the evidence, to the entire satisfaction of the jury; and, if the prosecution has failed to do so, it is your duty to acquit the defendant." The record, however, fails to show that there was any evidence before the jury that the prosecuting witness was unmarried. She did not herself so state, nor did any witness give evidence upon this point. The fact that some of the witnesses in their testimony, when referring to her, called her "girl," "young lady," "Miss," does not furnish any evidence of this fact. Such statements were no more than the opinions of the witnesses, given without having their attention called directly to this issue, and would not have been admissible as direct evidence to prove the issue. The jury were not authorized to found an inference thereon that she was unmarried; nor can the defendant be convicted upon a mere inference of this fact, any more than upon an inference of the other facts which are necessary to constitute the crime. State v. Carr, 60 Iowa, 453, 15 N. W. Rep. 271. Nor does the fact that she stated that the defendant promised to marry her, or that he made arrangements to marry her, furnish any evidence that she was unmarried. Whether she was unmarried was a fact peculiarly within her own knowledge; and in a case like the present, where the proof of the offense of necessity depends very materially upon the testimony of the prosecuting witness, it is incumbent upon the state to establish all the elements of the crime by as satisfactory evidence as it is within its power to produce, and upon those points of which the prosecutrix can herself give direct testimony not to allow the jury to draw an inference from less satisfactory evidence. The cases cited on behalf of the people in which it has been held that direct proof of the venue was unnecessary have no application here. In this case the fact that she was unmarried is an essential element of the crime, and until it is shown the presumption of innocence prevails in favor of the defendant; whereas, the proof of venue has reference only to the jurisdiction of the court to try the offense, and may be shown by evidence of a less direct character. For the reason that there was no evidence before the jury that the prosecuting witness was unmarried, their conviction of the defendant was unauthorized.

2. The court gave to the jury the following instruction: "Previous chaste character is established by showing that the party lives with respectable and reputable families, and that her daily associations were with such people; and when the prosecution gave the names of the persons with whom the complaining witness had lived and associated the presumption of law is that they were respectable and reputable people, and the burden of showing that they were otherwise was upon the defendant." The effect of this instruction was to say to the jury that by her testifying that she lived and associated with certain people, whose names she stated, she thereby "established" her previous chaste character, because the presumption of law is that those persons were respectable and reputable people. Even if it had been shown at the trial that the persons whose names she gave were respectable and reputable people, the fact that she had lived and associated with them would be only evidence from which the jury might infer her character; but it would not "establish" it. Her previous chaste character was an essential element to be shown by the prosecution before the crime could be established, and was a fact to be determined by the jury from all the evidence before it. The effect of the above instruction was, however, to take from the jury all consideration of any other evidence than that referred to in it. For these errors the judgment and order of the court below are reversed.

HURLBUTT et al. v. N. W. SPAULDING SAW Co. et al. (No. 14,175.)

FORM OF ACTION—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PARTIES.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. §§ 307, 426, which provide that there shall be but one form of civil action, and that the facts constituting the cause of action shall be stated in ordinary and concise language, where plaintiff sues for money expended in the operation of defendant's mill, and the complaint is in clear, intelligible language, defendant cannot complain that plaintiff has mistaken his remedy, and that the action should have been for an accounting, instead of in assumpsit; but the court is authorized to try the case as made, and to grant any relief embraced in the issues.

2. Where a bill of exceptions makes no specification of the particulars wherein a finding is not justified by the evidence, the finding must be deemed conclusive.

3. Where suit is brought on a contract, a person who is not a party to the contract, and has no interest therein, is not a necessary or proper party to the suit.

4. Where a number of persons sign a contract binding themselves "jointly and severally," they are within Code Civil Proc. § 383, which allows suit to be brought, at the option of the plaintiff, against one or all of the persons severally liable upon the same obligation.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

This was an action by Nathaniel Hurlbutt and others against the N. W. Spaulding Saw Company and others to recover upon a contract. There was judgment for plaintiffs and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Buck & Wheeler and E. W. Wilson, (Galpin & Zeigler, of counsel,) for appellants. H. L. Smith, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover judgment for moneys alleged to have been paid out and expended by them at the special instance and request of the defendants, and under and in pursuance of a written contract made by the parties. A copy of the contract is set out in the complaint, and its execution is not denied. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment given for the plaintiffs. From that judgment the defendants appealed, and have brought the case here on a bill of exceptions.

1. It is claimed for appellants that the plaintiffs have mistaken their remedy; that the action should have been for an accounting, and not in assumpsit. The moneys sought to be recovered were expended by plaintiffs in taking charge of and operating a saw-mill; and they alleged that, after applying all the proceeds of the business and all payments made to the discharge of their claim, the sum for which judgment was asked remained due and unpaid, though payment thereof had been demanded. The court found that certain other sums should be deducted from the amount claimed, but that the balance remaining was due and owing by the defendants, and plaintiffs were entitled to a judgment therefor. There is in this state but one form of civil actions for the enforcement or protection of private rights, and the redress or prevention of private wrongs, (section 307, Code Civil Proc.;) and the facts constituting the cause of action are required to be stated in ordinary and concise language, (section 426, Code Civil Proc.) Here the plaintiffs stated in their complaint their cause of action in clear and intelligible language, and the defendants answered thereto. The court was therefore authorized to try the case as made, and to grant any relief embraced in the issues.

2. It is claimed that no right of action accrued against the defendants until "the trust-estate was exhausted." But the court found that all of the trust property and estate had been exhausted; and there are, in the bill of exceptions, no attempted specifications of the particulars wherein it is claimed that this finding was not justified by the evidence. As the correctness of the finding is not questioned, it must be treated as conclusively settling this point against appellants.

3. It is claimed that one Damon should have been joined as a party plaintiff in the action, and certain other persons as defendants. But Damon was not a party to the contract relied on, and, so far as appears, had no interest in the moneys expended and paid out by the plaintiffs under the contract. He was, therefore, not a necessary, and would not have been a proper, party to the action. The other persons referred to signed the contract with the defendants, and they all bound themselves "jointly and severally" to pay, etc. The Code provides that persons severally liable upon the same obligation or instrument may, all or any of them, be included in the same action, at the option of the plaintiff, (section 383, Code Civil Proc.;) and the rule is well settled in this state that "a plaintiff may, at his election, sue one or more or all the persons severally liable upon the same obligation or instrument," (People v. Love, 25 Cal. 521.)

4. The other points made by appellants do not require special notice. They all relate to matters considered and disposed of by the findings, which were very full and specific. It is true the evidence was in some respects conflicting; but we think it sufficient to justify each of the findings, and hence that there is no good ground for a reversal. We advise, therefore, that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

ROBINSON et al. v. EASTON, ELDRIDGE & Co.
(No. 13,619.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—OPTION CONTRACT—PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

1. Plaintiffs authorized defendant to sell land for them, no terms being stated in the agreement, at a certain price, within five days, agreeing to pay as commission whatever the land brought over the price fixed. Defendant found a purchaser, who paid down a bonus on condition that, if the title was not insured by a certain title insurance company, the bonus was to be refunded. The title was not insured, and defendant refunded the money paid. Plaintiffs then sued defendant, claiming that it had received this money as plaintiffs' agent. Held, that defendant was more than a mere agent of plaintiffs, the agreement being in the nature of an option for five days, and defendant was not liable for such money.

2. Conceding that defendant was nothing more than an agent, plaintiffs could not recover, for, if the agreement was not within the agent's authority, they were not bound by it until they ratified it, and a ratification of it would have subjected them to all its terms.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Action by C. H. Robinson and C. B. Hobson against Easton, Eldridge & Co. to recover money. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. T. Rogers, for appellants. A. C. Ellis, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiffs executed to the defendant the following instrument: "We hereby authorize Easton & Eldridge for us, and within five days from date hereof, and until this authority is canceled in writing by us, to sell for the sum of $10,000—net dollars—the following described property, situated in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, to-wit: All of block 935, outside lands,—and we will pay said Easton & Eldridge a commission of all over said sum of $10,000, net, for which they may sell said property with our consent. Witness our hand and seal this 24th day of August, A. D. 1887. C. B. HOBSON. C. H. ROBINSON." Thereafter, on the same day, the defendant bargained with one Z. S. Eldridge for the sale of the land at the price of $10,500, upon the condition that the title to the property would be insured by the Title Insurance Company, and received from him $1,050 as a deposit, agreeing to return the same in case the insurance company would not insure the title, giving to him the following receipt: "San Francisco, August 24, 1887. Received of Z. S. Eldridge the sum of $100, being deposit on purchase of block 935, outside lands. Price agreed upon, ten thousand five hundred dollars ($10,500) in gold coin. Thirty days allowed for search of title, and, if title is found imperfect and cannot be made good, said deposit will be returned. EASTON, ELDRIDGE & Co., Agents." A similar receipt for $950 was given the next day. The Title Insurance Company refused to insure the title, and thereupon, before the expiration of the 30 days, viz., September 6th, the defendant repaid the deposit to Eldridge. The plaintiffs commenced this action to recover from the defendant the money paid it by Eldridge, upon the theory that the money so paid was received by the defendant in its capacity as agent of the plaintiffs, and was their money in its hands the moment it was received from Eldridge. The court rendered judgment in favor of the defendant, from which and an order denying a new trial an appeal has been taken.

The relation of the defendant to the plaintiffs was not that of a mere agent. While its authority to sell the land was derived from the plaintiffs, yet the sale was to be made for its own account and benefit, as well as for that of the plaintiffs. Although the authority to sell was not so coupled with an interest as to create in the defendant an interest in the land, or to prevent the plaintiffs from revoking the authority, yet by the terms of the authorization the defendant acquired such a right to a portion of the proceeds of sale as to enable it to make a contract of sale upon terms of its own choosing. The plaintiffs, in effect, gave to the defendant an option for five days to endeavor to sell the block of land for whatever sum it could obtain, and upon whatever terms it might make, provided they should receive therefor the sum of $10,000, and agreed that defendant should have whatever sum it could realize therefor above that amount. The relation thus created between them was rather that of a vendor and purchaser under a contract of sale than one of principal and agent, and a sale by the defendant thereunder was in the capacity of a vendor upon its own account, and not for the account of the plaintiffs. Inasmuch as the defendant was entitled to all the proceeds of the sale in excess of $10,000, it had the right to make the sale upon such terms as in its judgment would enable it to realize the highest price for the land. Upon a sale by it the plaintiffs were entitled to the immediate payment of the $10,000, but the defendant could sell the land either for cash or upon time, as it might choose, and its terms of sale did not require ratification by the plaintiffs.

Even if it be conceded that the defendant was but the agent of the plaintiffs, their right to recover from it the money paid by Eldridge was no higher than the right of the defendant to retain the money from Eldridge; and its right to refund the money to him was co-extensive with the obligation created by the agreement under which it had been paid. If the agreement with him was contrary to the terms of the authority conferred by the plaintiffs, it could not be enforced against them, and they could enforce it against Eldridge only in case they ratified the act of the defendant; but a ratification of that act subjected them to all the terms of the agreement. The agreement between the defendant and Eldridge was conditioned upon the approval of the title by the Title Insurance Company, and by the terms of that agreement the money received from him was to be refunded in case the Title Insurance Company did not approve the title. Upon the disapproval of the title by that company Eldridge had the right to demand, and the defendant had the right to refund, the money that had been received by it as a deposit upon the sale. Ex parte White, (In re Nevill,) L. R. 6 Ch. App. 397, is illustrative of the principles applicable to the present case. Goods had been consigned by Towle & Co. to Nevill for sale, and if sold to be accounted for at a fixed price. Nevill sold the goods upon such terms and at such prices as he chose, and it was held that the moneys received by him upon such sales, and standing to his credit upon the books of his banker, were his own moneys, and did not belong to Towle & Co.; that the contracts of sale made by Nevill were made by him on his own account, and not as agent for Towle & Co., the court saying: "The business which Nevill carried on with the goods of Towle & Co. has been called a cotton agency business, and the word 'agency,' in its prima facie sense, seems to imply the relation of principal and agent, and not of vendor and purchaser. But it has been admitted in the course of the argument that there is no magic in the word 'agency.' It is often used in commercial matters where the real relationship is that of vendor and purchaser, and the question is whether the dealings between Mr. Nevill and Messrs. Towle & Co. with reference to these goods resulted in the relationship of vendor and purchaser, or in the relationship of principal and agent." "If the consignee is at liberty, according to the contract between him and his consignor, to sell at any price he likes, and receive payment at any time he likes, but is to be bound if he sells the goods to pay the consignor for them at a fixed price and a fixed time, in my opinion, whatever the parties may think, their relation is not that of principal and agent. The contract of sale which the alleged agent makes with his purchasers is not a contract made on account of his principal, for he is to pay a price which may be different, and at a time which may be different, from those fixed by the contract." Id. 403. We think that the rule there laid down should control the present case. The objection of the plaintiffs to the letter from Grimwood was properly overruled. It had already been received in evidence without objection during the testimony of the plaintiff Hobson. Neither did the court err in refusing to admit the evidence offered by the plaintiffs that subsequent to the repayment to Eldridge of the deposit the Title Insurance Company did insure to the plaintiffs the title to the land. It was not controverted that the agreement on the 24th of August between Eldridge and the defendant was made upon the condition that that company would insure the title, or that the company did thereafter refuse to insure it. Its subsequent agreement to insure the title to the plaintiffs would not defeat the effect of its prior refusal to insure it to Eldridge. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

PRIET v. REIS, Treasurer. (No. 14,043.)

MANDAMUS TO CITY TREASURER—APPLICATION OF FUNDS—PAYMENT OF WARRANT.

St. 1875-76, p. 439, relating to widening Dupont street, in San Francisco, provides for the sale of bonds, and that the proceeds be held to pay damages awarded to property holders. Section 9 provides that the treasurer of the city and county shall hold such money, to be known as the "Dupont-Street Fund." Section 13 provides for the levy and collection of a tax for the payment of the interest on the bonds, and for a tax for redeeming the bonds. In an application for a mandate to the treasurer to pay the balance of a certain warrant for damages under said act, it appeared that the fund derived from the sale of bonds had been illegally used in paying interest on the same, and with the fund collected for the interest bonds had been redeemed, leaving the fund derived from the sale of bonds exhausted. Held, that under Code Civil Proc. § 1085, which provides for the issuance of a mandate to enforce an act specially enjoined by law, plaintiff was not entitled to the writ to compel the treasurer to divert the fund collected for payment of interest or to redeem the bonds, to the payment of damage. Bates v. Porter, 15 Pac. Rep. 732, 74 Cal. 224, followed.

TEMPLE, C. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, as treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, to pay a warrant for damages, under the act of the legislature for widening of Dupont street. That act (St. 1875-76, p. 439) provided for the sale of bonds, and that the proceeds should be held to pay expenses and damages awarded to property holders. In case of a dispute as to whom the damages should be paid, the commissioners were to place a warrant for the amount in the hands of the clerk, and the claimants could sue the treasurer, joining other claimants, and the treasurer was to pay in accordance with the determination. Among the awards was that mentioned in the complaint for $10,932, the warrant for which was deposited with the county clerk, because the claimants could not agree. Judgment was entered in a suit to determine the rights of the claimants in 1883. Section 9 of the act provides for the payment of the money realized from the sale of the bonds to the treasurer, to be devoted to paying expenses and damages, the fund to be called the "Dupont-Street Fund." Section 13 provides for the levying of a tax, and that "when collected the said moneys shall be paid over to the treasurer of the said city and county, and constitute a part of the Dupont-Street fund, and to be paid out by said treasurer only in payment of the coupons attached to said bonds as the same from time to time become due." The same section provides for a tax to create a similar fund, and that the moneys so realized "shall constitute a part of the Dupont-Street fund, and shall only be paid out in redeeming bonds issued in pursuance of the act." The Dupont-Street fund then consisted of three parts, each derived from a specified source, and devoted to specific purposes; in short, three distinct funds. The moneys derived from any specific source could not be legally used in discharge of obligations other than specified as payable from such moneys; and, as we have seen, it was expressly enacted that the moneys raised by taxation should be expended only in payment of coupons and bonds. After paying all the damages awarded, except the claim here in question, and all expenses of the commissions, there was in the Dupont-Street fund more than $55,000 derived from the sale of bonds; but on or about the 1st day of December, 1878, the then treasurer illegally used $55,000 of said money to pay interest on the bonds, and thereafter used of the money collected from taxes to pay interest $50,000 to redeem 50 of the bonds, leaving in the fund $1,869.18, which has been paid upon the warrant. No taxes were collected for this fund after the determination of the suit to settle the rights of the claimants to the award in question, until 1888, since which time there had been collected the sum of $152,199.84, which was there at the time this proceeding was commenced, March 1, 1889. It is averred that from the 6th day of January, 1883, when the partial payment mentioned was made on the warrant, until the 17th day of May, 1888, there was no money in the Dupont-Street fund. Nor does it appear that there has been at all, since that date, any money in the fund which was derived from the sale of bonds. There is still due upon the warrant $9,062.82, for which due demand has been made, but the treasurer refuses to pay, on the ground that he has no funds in his hands properly applicable thereto. These facts appear in the petition, and the case went against the plaintiff on demurrer. He appeals from the judgment.

The writ is issued to enforce an act specially enjoined by law, as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station. Section 1085, Code Civil Proc. Is there money in the Dupont-Street fund which the law makes it the duty of respondent to pay upon this warrant? To answer this question in the affirmative would be to hold that the money collected from taxation for the specific purpose of paying coupons, and expressly made payable only for their redemption, by operation of law, as soon as collected, passed to the damage fund, to replace that illegally taken therefrom. The statute only authorizes a tax levy sufficient to pay the maturing coupons. It would seem, therefore, that some coupons must remain unpaid if this money can be diverted to replace the misappropriated funds. The petition does not show whether the money in the treasury was collected on the tax levy to pay interest or the bonds. The petition states that, although the money in the damage fund was at first used to pay interest on the 1,000 bonds, yet, when the money was collected from taxes to pay this interest, $50,000 of it was used to redeem 50 of the bonds. If the theory be correct, that the first money collected to pay interest, after the misappropriation of the damage fund for the benefit of the interest fund, would by operation of law replace the money wrongly diverted for its benefit, it was then replaced, and again misappropriated. Even on that theory, this fund could not again be drawn upon to supply the deficiency. But all the money in the Dupont-Street fund may be money collected to pay interest. But the whole contention is fallacious. The act provides a tax for 20 years to pay interest and principal. A tax levy each year sufficient to pay the interest and one-twentieth part of the bonds is authorized, and it is especially enjoined that the money so raised shall be used for no other purpose. Evidently it cannot be so diverted without to some extent impairing the rights of the bondholders. It is said that the bondholders have had the benefit of the misappropriation, and will not be injured by the payment. The bondholders are presumably many. It does not appear that those who held the 50 bonds, wrongly paid, own any others. The present bondholders were not benefited by the illegal payment, and the fact that others were paid furnishes no ground for depriving them of their interest when due. Probably the same reason would be applicable if it had appeared that all the money in the general Dupont-Street fund was collected for the payment of bonds, but such fact does not appear. This question seems to have been decided in Bates v. Porter, 74 Cal. 224, 15 Pac. Rep. 732. In this state, under our Code, the writ of mandate can perform no such function as was allowed in People v. Comptroller, 77 N. Y. 45. We think the judgment should be affirmed.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. MARTIN et al. (No. 13,413.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 11, 1891.)

FINDINGS OF FACT—ABSENCE OF—POWER OF SUPREME COURT TO MAKE—LANDS DEDICATED TO SCHOOLS—ACQUISITION BY ADVERSE POSSESSION—RES JUDICATA.

1. By the Van Ness ordinance, passed June 20, 1855, the city of San Francisco granted all its right to the lands within its limits to the parties in the actual possession thereof during a certain period, reserving certain lands for "public" purposes, to be determined by ordinance. Held, that where, in an action by the board of education to recover lands, alleged to have been reserved by the city for public purposes, from persons claiming an adverse possession thereof for over 30 years under the ordinance, the trial court makes no findings on the essential issue as to whether the lands were reserved, the supreme court, on appeal on the judgment roll alone, must reverse the judgment for lack of findings, though the record presents evidence from which a reservation might be inferred; since the supreme court cannot assume original functions, and deduce findings from the evidence.

2. On appeal from a judgment upon the judgment roll alone, the sole question is whether the findings of fact sustain the judgment.

3. The use of the reserved lands for schools was a "public" purpose, within ordinance of June 20, 1855.

4. Land dedicated to a public use cannot by adverse possession be acquired by individuals, though the title is held by a municipal corporation. Yolo Co. v. Barney, 21 Pac. Rep. 883, 79 Cal. 375, followed.

5. St. 1863, p. 601, creating the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco, gave it sole power to prosecute and defend all actions relative to land belonging to the school department, which power had previously to such act been in the city and county of San Francisco. Held, that a subsequent judgment against the city and county, to which the board was not a party, quieting title in a third person to lands dedicated to school purposes, was not binding on the board.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; T. K. WILSON, Judge.

Action by the board of education of the city and county of San Francisco against Wheeler Martin and others to recover land. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

C. H. Parker and Parker & Eells, for appellant. T. B. Bishop, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action for the recovery from the defendants of a parcel of land in San Francisco, claimed by it to have been reserved as a school lot, under the provisions of the Van Ness ordinance, and to belong to the school department of that city. The defendants in their answer, in addition to denying the title of the plaintiff, alleged title in themselves, and pleaded as a special defense to the action the statute of limitations, and also pleaded a former judgment recovered by their predecessors against the city and county of San Francisco, as a bar to the plaintiff's right of action. The cause was tried by the court, and upon its findings of fact the court found, as a conclusion of law, that the plaintiff's right of action was barred by the statute of limitations, and ordered judgment in favor of the defendants. From the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff has appealed upon the judgment roll alone.

The land in question is a portion of the pueblo lands which were confirmed to the city of San Francisco by the decree of the circuit court of the United States, May 18, 1865, and are within the charter line of 1851 of the city of San Francisco, being east of said charter line, and west of Larkin and Johnston streets, and are a part of the lands relinquished to said city by the act of congress of July 1, 1864. The rights of the respective parties to the land are derived under the Van Ness ordinance. By that ordinance, passed June 20, 1855, the city of San Francisco granted all its right and claim to the lands within its corporate limits, as defined by the charter of 1851, "to the parties in the actual possession thereof, by themselves or tenants, on or before the first day of January, A. D. 1855, * * * provided such possession has been continued up to the time of the introduction of this ordinance in the common council." By section 4 of said ordinance the city, however, as a consideration for said grant, "reserves to itself * * * such lots and lands as may be selected and reserved for streets and other public purposes, under the provisions of the next succeeding sections;" and in section 6 provided, further, that it should have "the right to select and set apart from the lands west of Larkin street, and south-west of Johnston street, as many lots, not exceeding 137½ feet square each, as the mayor and common council may by ordinance determine to be necessary for sites for school-houses, hospitals, fire-engine houses, and other public establishments necessary and proper for the use of the corporation." The court finds that the predecessors and grantors of the defendants were in the actual possession of the land in question on and prior to January 1, 1855, and continued to remain in such possession up to and including the 20th day of June, 1855; and that the defendants and their predecessors and grantors had ever since, and up to the commencement of this action, held and remained in the actual, open, and exclusive possession of said land, claiming to hold and own the same in their own right and adversely to the plaintiff and the whole world. This finding is sufficient to sustain the judgment, if the land in question is not included within the lands which were reserved to the city under the provisions of the aforesaid ordinance. If the land was so reserved, it was not granted to the predecessors of the defendants by the ordinance, and they obtained no title thereto by virtue of any of its provisions. "These lots, so set apart or reserved by the corporation for its own use, did not pass under the Van Ness ordinance to a person who might have been in the actual possession of the lots in 1855. To suppose that the city so intended would convict its officers of the inconsistency of declaring by its two boards that the lots should be reserved to the uses of the schools, and then making by ordinance a gratuitous disposition of them in favor of third persons." Board v. Fowler, 19 Cal. 25.

The court has made no finding upon the issue of title presented by the pleadings, but has included in its findings certain evidence which was introduced at the trial. Neither has it found the probative facts from which the ultimate fact of title can be determined. It has been stated in several cases in this court that, when the findings of the court below contain such probative facts that the ultimate fact in issue necessarily results therefrom, this court will make the deduction of such ultimate fact; but that, unless such ultimate fact necessarily follows from the facts found, the findings are insufficient, and the judgment must be reversed for want of findings. It has never been held, however, or even stated, that findings of the court below, which consist either in whole or in part of evidence presented at the trial, and do not purport to be probative facts involved in the issue, are a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the Code. The jurisdiction of this court is appellate, and not original, and it is the function of a court of original jurisdiction to determine in the first instance whether the evidence offered in support of an issue is sufficient to sustain that issue. This court cannot pass upon that question until after the trial court has determined it, and then only in a proceeding to set aside such determination. When an appeal from a judgment is heard upon the judgment roll alone, the only question to be considered is whether the findings of fact sustain the judgment. Whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings cannot be considered upon such appeal, except in the single instance when it is brought here upon a bill of exceptions on an appeal taken within 60 days after the rendition of the judgment. In no case can this court determine whether the evidence, irrespective of findings, is sufficient to support the judgment; and, when the findings are merely of evidence, this court cannot make the findings of fact from that evidence which it was incumbent upon the trial court to make.

The title of the plaintiff to the land in question depended upon the fact that it had been reserved by the city under the provisions of the ordinance aforesaid, and the title of the defendants, as derived under the ordinance, depended upon the fact that it had not been so reserved. Whether or not there had been such reservation was therefore an essential fact to be found by the court. If there had been no such reservation, the possession of the land by the defendants was sufficient to defeat the claim of the plaintiff; but, if the land had been reserved for a public use, such fact was a material finding, and would overcome the effect of a finding of adverse possession to such an extent as to prevent the defendants from availing themselves of the statute of limitations to defeat the right of the plaintiff. This issue was directly presented to the court for decision. Instead, however, of finding whether the land in question had been reserved under the ordinance, it incorporated into its findings evidence upon that subject which would support a finding that such reservation had been made, but which, as we have shown, cannot be assumed by this court as equivalent to a finding by the trial court upon that issue. In its finding it has set out the various steps taken by the city for the purpose of making the reservation authorized under the ordinance,—the appointment of commissioners therefor; their preparation of a map or plan of the city; its presentation to the common council with their report accompanying it; the character of the map; the delineation thereon of certain spaces colored brown, corresponding in number with the numbers named in the report as selected for school lots; the size of the respective lots so colored; the effect of the testimony of the draughtsman in reference thereto; and many other circumstances connected with said map; but, instead of making the inference from this evidence that thereby a reservation was or was not made by the city,—an inference which, as we have shown, was to be made by that court, (Carpentier v. Mendenhall, 28 Cal. 487,)—it has only set out the evidence from which the inference should have been drawn. That such inference of fact should have been found by the trial court appears to have been felt by the respondents, inasmuch as in their brief they urge that the facts found are insufficient to show any reservation, whereas the insufficiency of evidence to justify a finding cannot be considered upon an appeal on the judgment roll, but only upon an attack on the finding through a motion for a new trial. That a finding upon this issue is material to such an extent as to require a reversal of the judgment for failure to make it is evident from the fact that, if the court had found that the land in question had been reserved by the city, its conclusion of law that the plaintiff's right of action is barred by the statute of limitations would have been unauthorized.

The reservations to be made under the provisions of the ordinance were for "public purposes," and the purpose for which the lots were reserved was none the less "public" because it was to be "for the use of the corporation." The corporation was a public corporation, and had been established as an appropriate means of subserving the needs of the people in matters of government and social administration. For purposes of convenience the state is divided into counties, which are clothed with certain functions of local government, and invested with the management of public property within their respective boundaries. For the same reason, and with the same purpose, municipal corporations have been established, and whether their territories and jurisdiction are co-extensive with the county within which they are organized, or are limited to a portion thereof, the public functions which they exercise and the public property which they manage is not alone for that limited portion of the public which may be within their boundaries, but is also for and in behalf of the whole public by which such management has been intrusted to them, although the exercise of such functions and the use of such property may be chiefly enjoyed by those who constitute the limited public within such corporations. The fact that in matters not pertaining to their governmental functions such corporations may have private property, as well as incur private obligations, does not deprive them of this public characteristic. In all matters relating to such government and management they are but agencies of the state, with an authority limited to the territory designated in their organization. The property which is intrusted to their management is not divested of its public character, nor is it any the less subject to the control of the state, or to the rules which are applicable to other property of the state, because it is situated within the boundaries of such corporation. The jails, court-houses, hospitals, school-houses, engine lots of such corporation are as much public property, and to be governed by the same rules and limitations, as are the streets and highways and public squares which such corporation may have caused to be opened or set apart for public use. Their public character is not taken away because they are subject to local regulations in their management and use. The proprietary interest in all such property belongs to the public, and, whether the legal title to such property be in the municipality or any of its officers or departments, it is at all times held by it or them for the benefit of the whole public, and without any real proprietary interest therein. The legislature, unless restrained by constitutional limitations, can dissolve the corporation at any time, and upon such dissolution the whole of such property would revert to the state, and may be by it transferred to another similar corporation, or the legislature may, without dissolving the corporation, at any time transfer the management of such property to different bodies or commissions. A municipal corporation is for all purposes of government, or the exercise of public duties, or the administration of public trusts, made by the state one of its instruments or the local depository of certain limited and prescribed political powers, to be exercised for the public good in behalf of the state, and not merely for itself, or for its own inhabitants. "The school department of the municipality is only a part of its government. A reservation of property for school purposes is not a disposition of it for the benefit of third persons, but a keeping of it for its own purposes. The resolution amounts only to a setting apart of the property of the town for a particular town purpose, and in this respect is not different from a similar act, if such had been done, declaring that the plaza should be reserved as a public garden, or a lot for a jail, or a house for the holding of courts." Board v. Fowler, 19 Cal. 27.

The lands in question were originally held by the pueblo in trust for the public, and subject to the control of the Mexican government. After the cession of California to the United States the management of this trust was subject, in the first place, to the control of the general government, and became vested in the state of California upon its establishment as a sovereign member of the Union. Upon the organization of the city of San Francisco, its boundaries embraced a portion of these lands, but their title continued to remain impressed with the same trust. The property, as well as the trust upon which it was held, and the corporation to whose management it was intrusted, was municipal, and therefore subject, as all political institutions, trusts, and property, to the direction and control of the superior authority of the sovereign. By the act of March 11, 1858, ratifying and confirming the Van Ness ordinance, it was declared by the state that the lands that had been reserved under that ordinance were reserved for public purposes, and this reservation was afterwards confirmed by congress by the act of July 1, 1864. These principles have so often been affirmed by the courts of this country that it is only necessary to refer to a few leading cases in which they may be found: Hart v. Burnett, 15 Cal. 530; Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 224; San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 541; Townsend v. Greeley, 5 Wall. 326; San Fran-

If the land was reserved by the city from the operation of the grant contained in the ordinance, it was reserved for public use, and the confirmation of the ordinance in 1858, as well as the grant by congress in 1864, had the effect to affirm the reservations contained in the ordinance, and the lands so reserved could not thereafter have been divested by any adverse possession. Counsel for respondents urge that this rule is applicable only when the property is reserved for the entire public, like streets, squares, or highways, in which not only the people of the municipality, but those of the state at large, have an interest. In our opinion there is no reason for not applying the same rule to property which is dedicated or reserved to a public use, when the title is held by the municipality, as is applicable when it is held by the state. The same principles which prevent an adverse possession from ripening into a title when the title to the property belongs to the public, and is held for public use, apply in the one case as in the other. It is immaterial where the title, that is, the record title, is held, whether by the state at large, or by a county, or by some municipal department or other official body. There can be no adverse holding of such land which will deprive the public of the right thereto, or give title to the adverse claimant, or create a title by virtue of the statute of limitations. This rule is universal in its application to all property set apart or reserved for public use, and the public use for which it is appropriated is immaterial. The same principles which govern in the adverse holding of a street, a public square, a quay, a wharf, a common, apply to the adverse holding of a court-house, a jail, or school-house. The public is not to lose its rights through the negligence of its agents, nor because it has not chosen to resist an encroachment by one of its own number, whose duty it was, as much as that of every other citizen, to protect the state in its rights. This question has been determined, and these principles have already been established in this state in the case of County of Yolo v. Barney, 79 Cal. 375, 21 Pac. Rep. 833.

Upon the issue relating to the former judgment which is set up in the answer as a bar to the action, the court did not find whether that judgment was a bar, but merely found the facts connected with the rendition of the judgment, and made the judgment roll in that action a part of its findings. The court finds that on the 29th day of August, A. D. 1862, one Edward W. Jones, who was then in the actual possession of a tract of land including the premises in controversy, commenced an action in the late fourth district court against the city and county of San Francisco to quiet his title to said land, and that the defendant therein appeared and answered in said action by the city and county attorney, and thereafter said action was tried upon its merits, and a finding and decree entered therein in favor of the plaintiff, and against the said city and county. The court also finds that the plaintiff here in "derives and obtains" its title to and right of possession of the demanded premises under and through the city and county of San Francisco, the defendant in that action, and that the defendants herein "had long before the commencement of this action" acquired and still hold all the right, title, and interest in said premises which said Jones had at the time of the commencement of that action and the entry of judgment therein. The court does not find, nor does it appear from the judgment roll, that any summons was ever issued in said action, or served upon the defendant therein. It appears therefrom, however, that on the 31st of July, 1863, the defendant therein by its attorney filed a general denial to the allegations of the complaint upon a stipulation of the plaintiff's attorneys to the effect that said answer should be regarded as a specific denial of the said allegations, (the complaint being verified,) and that on the same day the case was tried by the court, and findings and a decree signed by the judge thereof were filed, wherein it is "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said plaintiff was at the time of the commencement of this action the owner in fee of the lands described in his said complaint, and that all claims of the said defendants to any right, title, estate, or interest in the said lands, or any part thereof, adverse to the said title of the said plaintiff, are wholly unfounded, illegal, and void, both at law and in equity." By an act of the legislature passed April 27, 1863, (St. 1863, p. 601,) which took effect immediately, the plaintiff herein was created, and its powers and duties defined. By section 2 of that act it is declared: "Sec. 2. The board of education shall have sole power: * * * Eleventh. To sue for any and all lots, lands, and property belonging to or claimed by the said school department, and to prosecute and defend all actions at law or in equity necessary to recover and maintain the full enjoyment and possession of said lots, lands, and property." By another act of the legislature, passed on the same day, (St. 1863, p. 771,) defining the powers of the attorney and counselor of said city and county, that officer was authorized to "perform such duties as attorney and counselor, in and for the said city and county, as the board of supervisors of said city and county shall from time to time prescribe." The question presented here does not, however, so much involve the authority of the city and county attorney to appear in the action without any request therefor from the board of supervisors, as it does the effect of a judgment against the city and county after the state had conferred upon the plaintiff herein the sole power to defend all actions necessary to maintain the full enjoyment and possession of the land in question. The court does not find at what time or by what means the plaintiff herein "derives and obtains" its title to the premises in question from the defendant in that action, and its finding in this respect is somewhat at variance with its other findings, since, if the land had been reserved as public property, it was at all times thereafter subject to the control of the state, and, its management having been merely transferred by the state from the city and county to the plaintiff herein, the plaintiff cannot properly be said to have derived any title whatever, but has merely assumed the management of property the title to which has at all times remained in the public. If the plaintiff, however, obtained and derived such title prior to the commencement of that action, or even prior to the time when the court obtained jurisdiction of the defendant therein, the judgment therein would not affect its title, or be a bar to the present action. If the land in question was one of the lots reserved for public use under the provisions of the Van Ness ordinance, the management and control thereof were at all times subject to the direction of the legislature, and it alone was authorized to determine whether such management and control, including the right to sue for and defend the same, should be intrusted to the city and county, or to the board of education, or to any other public body or officer. After having once given such management and control to the city and county, it had the same right to transfer them to the plaintiff herein that an individual has to remove his agent and clothe another with the same power. After such transfer of authority the city and county, or its attorney in her behalf, had no authority to submit to any court the determination of the rights of the plaintiff herein to the ownership or right of possession of the land in question, and any judgment rendered against the city and county would have no effect upon the right of the plaintiff herein to assert its title or right of possession for the same land. For the reasons contained in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v.
BRADBURY et al. (No. 13,004.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 18, 1891.)

EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE OF LOCATION—REVIEW ON APPEAL—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. In ejectment for a lot claimed to have been reserved for a fire-engine lot, plaintiff city introduced the ordinance reserving the lots, and a map prepared in pursuance thereof, the report accompanying the map of the commissioners under whose direction the same was prepared, and the testimony of two of the commissioners. The evidence showed that the map was prepared on a scale of 300 feet to the inch, and on it block 56, within which the lot in question is located, is delineated with six subdivisions, which, as the map was originally prepared, were designed to represent 50-vara lots; that within the middle one of three of these subdivisions are two parallel lines, running through the lot; that one of the streets on which block 56 abuts was afterwards widened from the outer lots, leaving the middle 50-vara lot of its original dimensions: that the number of lots reserved for fire purposes were 25, in size 30x137½ feet and 30x100 feet; that there appears on the map 25 spaces included within parallel lines similar to those on block 56; that the original color of the lot on block 56 within small parallel lines was red, and there were 25 lots on the map colored red, including the lot on block 56; that the selection of the lot by the commissioners was in the middle of the block. Held, that the evidence authorized the finding that the spaces within the parallel lines on the map were reserved for engine lots.

2. In ejectment, where the witnesses were before the court to assist in examining maps and making measurements, the evidence being conflicting, the finding in relation to the location of the lot in question will not be disturbed on appeal.

3. Where land was reserved by a municipal corporation for public purposes, it cannot be divested thereof by adverse possession. Yolo Co. v. Barney, 21 Pac. Rep. 833, 79 Cal. 375, and Board v. Martin, (Cal.) 28 Pac. Rep. 799, followed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Ejectment by the city and county of San Francisco against W. B. Bradbury and another, for a certain lot reserved for public purposes. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant Bradbury appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph R. Brandon, for appellant. Craig & Meredith and Lloyd & Wood, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action of ejectment to recover possession of an engine lot reserved to the city of San Francisco by virtue of the Van Ness ordinance. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and judgment rendered for the plaintiff for a portion of the land sued for, and in favor of the intervener for the remainder. A motion for a new trial was made by the defendant Bradbury, and denied, and from this order, as well as the judgment, he has appealed.

The court finds as facts in the case that the land sued for had been reserved for public use as a fire-engine lot, and that the defendant Bradbury unlawfully entered into possession of it in the year 1874, and had ever since deprived the plaintiff of its possession. The appellant assails the findings upon the ground that the evidence before the court was insufficient to justify it in finding that the lot had been reserved for public use, and insists that upon the finding of an adverse possession in favor of the appellant he was entitled to judgment in his favor. The objection to the finding that the lot in question had been reserved for public use is two-fold, viz., it is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to show that by virtue of the ordinance there had been a reservation of any engine lots whatever, and further, that there was no sufficient evidence that the lot in question was one of those attempted to be reserved. For the purpose of establishing the reservation the plaintiff offered in evidence the several ordinances of the common council, and the map prepared in pursuance thereof, known as the "Van Ness Map." These ordinances and the map were validated by the legislature in 1858 (St. 1858, p. 52) by an act in which the ordinances are set forth at length, and all courts are directed to take judicial knowledge of them "without further proof, as if they were public acts of the state legislature." And in Sawyer v. San Francisco, 50 Cal. 370, it was held that "the act of the legislature of 1858 operated to impart validity to the reservations as defined and delineated on the map reported by the commission." In addition to this, there was in evidence before the court the report accompanying the map, made by the commissioners who had been appointed by the common council to make the selection of lots to be reserved, and under whose directions the map had been prepared, and also the testimony of two of the commissioners. The map was prepared upon a scale of 300 feet to the inch, and upon it block 56, within which the lot in question is located, is delineated with six subdivisions, which, as the map was originally prepared, were designed to represent 50-vara lots. Within the middle one of the three of these subdivisions which front on Bush street are two parallel lines apparently in or near the middle of the lot, and running northerly from Bush street through the lot. After the map had been prepared, Van Ness avenue was widened by taking portions of the adjacent blocks, and the portion taken from block 56 was taken from the outer lots in the block, leaving the middle 50-vara lot of its original dimensions. There was nothing upon the map to indicate specifically that the lot in question was one of those reserved. The commissioners, however, who had been appointed under the provisions of section 8 of the Van Ness ordinance to make selection of "sites for school-houses, hospitals, fire-engine houses, and other public establishments necessary and proper for the use of the corporation," as provided in section 6 of the ordinance, stated in their report aforesaid that they had adopted the map then presented by them, (the Van Ness map above named,) and (with other recitals) that "the number of lots selected for fire purposes is twenty-five, (25;) their size thirty feet by one hundred and thirty-seven and a half feet, (30 ft. by 137½ ft.) except those located on the Potrero, which are thirty feet by one hundred feet, (30 by 100 ft.)" The map contained an inscription signed by the commissioners to the effect that it had been prepared by them in pursuance of said ordinance "for the location and dimensions of the streets, with the lots or grounds selected or set apart for the several public uses, as herein designated;" and upon the map itself, which by stipulation is made a part of the record herein, there appear 25 spaces included within parallel lines similar to those delineated in block 56. It was also in evidence before the court that the original tint or color of the lot in block 56 within the small parallel lines was carmine or red, and that there were 25 lots on the map colored red, of which this was one; and also that the selection by the commissioners had been made in the middle of the block previous to the widening of Van Ness avenue. There were no figures to indicate the dimensions of the space within the parallel lines in block 56, but on the lines of some of the spaces south of Market street the figures "30" and "137.6" are inscribed, and on others the figures "30" and "100" are found.

This evidence, we think, fully authorized the court to find that the spaces within the parallel lines referred to were reserved for engine lots. There is no appreciable distinction between the evidence thus presented to the court and that which was before the court in the case of Board v. Donahue, 53 Cal. 190. While the mere fact that within block 56 the two parallel lines referred to would not, taken by themselves, indicate any reservation, yet when that fact is considered in connection with the object for which the map was prepared, the report of the commissioners who prepared the map that they had made selection of 25 lots for fire purposes, and designating their size; that upon the map are to be found 25 spaces within parallel lines similar to the one in block 56; that upon some of those spaces are found the figures indicating the size of the lots to correspond with the report of the commissioners; that from other portions of the map those figures are intended to represent feet and inches; that the map was originally white, and that the spaces within these parallel lines were originally colored,—the conclusion is irresistible that those 25 spaces of which this is one were reserved under the provisions of the ordinance for public use for engine lots. For the purpose of showing that the lot described in the complaint is within the parallel lines above named in block 56, witnesses were called to assist the court in the examination of the map, and gave testimony in reference thereto. This testimony was quite conflicting, some of the witnesses declaring that on a map prepared upon so small a scale it is impossible to define so small a lot within 10 or 20 feet, while other witnesses had no hesitation in placing the lot in the middle of the block. Under this conflict of testimony we must accept the finding of the court as correct. The map was before it for examination with all the aid which it could derive from the various figures of reference upon it, and the testimony of witnesses with reference thereto. The court had the opportunity to make a personal examination and measurement, and we cannot say that its conclusion is not justified by the evidence in the case. In the case of Board v. Martin, (No. 13,413,) 28 Pac. Rep. 799, we have recently had occasion to consider the character of the reservations for public purposes made by virtue of the Van Ness ordinance, and the effect of an adverse possession upon the title to the lots so reserved. We held in that case that, inasmuch as the reservation was for a public use, the title to the land remained in the public, irrespective of the particular municipal agency which was charged with its custody and management, and that an individual could not by mere adverse possession acquire any title to such land, or invoke the aid of the statute of limitations as a defense to its recovery. The principles there laid down apply as fully, if not more forcibly, to the present case; and upon the authority of that case we affirm the judgment of the court below upon this point. The plaintiff has not appealed from the judgment in favor of the intervener, Stone, and it is therefore unnecessary to consider their respective rights to the land adjudged to him. We find nothing in the record, however, showing that the rights of the appellant are in any respect impaired by this portion of the judgment. The judgment and order of the court below are affirmed.

LIEN FOR TAXES—LIMITATION—APPLICABILITY OF STATUTE.

Pol. Code, § 3716, declares that a tax shall have the effect of a lien against all the property of a person, and that the lien shall not be removed "until the taxes are paid or the property sold for the payment thereof." Section 3717 declares that every tax due upon personal property shall be a lien upon the real property of the owner. Code Civil Proc. § 312, declares that civil actions shall only be commenced within certain periods, "except where, in special cases, a different limitation is prescribed." Held, that the latter section does not apply to the liens created by sections 3716, 3717. *San Francisco v. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

This was an action by Lewis against Rothchild to recover a sum of money under a contract for the purchase of land. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Jones & O'Donnell, for appellant.
Brewton A. Hayne, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Appeal from a judgment in an action brought to recover from the defendant the sum of $350, alleged to have been deposited by plaintiff with defendant on the purchase by plaintiff of defendant of certain real estate described in the complaint. The written contract of purchase is copied into the complaint, and it stipulates that said deposit shall be returned to plaintiff if any valid liens for taxes be found to exist upon said premises, unless removed within five days after plaintiff shall give defendant notice in writing of the existence thereof. Plaintiff alleges that during the fiscal years 1878-79, and for many years prior thereto, one H. Cummings was the owner of said premises, and was assessed for said fiscal years for his personal property, situated in the city and county of San Francisco, $7.30 for state, city, and county purposes, which plaintiff alleges has not been paid, and constitutes a valid lien upon said premises. And plaintiff further alleges that one Elizabeth Mitchell was the owner of said premises during the fiscal years 1884-85, and for many years prior thereto, and that she was assessed for said fiscal years for her personal property, situated in said city and county, $2.72 for state, city, and county purposes, which has never been paid, and constitutes a valid lien upon said premises. And plaintiff further alleges that 10 days before the commencement of this action he notified defendant in writing of the existence of said liens, and requested him to remove the same, which he refused and neglected, and still refuses and neglects, to do, and that said taxes remain wholly unpaid and unsatisfied, and the premises unsold for the payment thereof. And on the 2d day of November, 1889, plaintiff demanded the return of said $350 deposited by him with defendant, but defendant refused and neglected, and still refuses and neglects, to return the same, and that the same, or any part thereof, has never been returned; wherefore he brings this action to recover the same. The complaint was demurred to on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because it appears that the alleged liens are barred by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and by subdivision 1 of section 339 of said Code, and by the provisions of section 343 of said Code. The demurrer was sustained. Plaintiff declined to amend his complaint, and judgment was entered in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appeals therefrom. The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure relied on to justify the ruling of the court in sustaining the demurrer are the following: "An action upon a liability created by statute, other than a penalty or forfeiture." Subdivision 1, § 338, Code Civil Proc. "An action upon a contract, obligation, or liability, not founded upon an instrument of writing, or founded upon an instrument of writing executed out of the state." Subdivision 1, § 339, Id. "An action for relief, not hereinbefore provided for, must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued." Section 343, Id. The appellant relies upon sections 3716 and 3717 of the Political Code, and section 312 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which read as follows: "Every tax has the effect of a judgment against the person, and every lien created by this title has the force and effect of an execution duly levied against all property of the delinquent. The judgment is not satisfied nor the lien removed until the taxes are paid or the property sold for the payment thereof." Section 3716, Pol. Code. "Every tax due upon personal property is a lien upon the real property of the owner thereof from and after 12 o'clock M. of the first Monday in March in each year." Section 3717, Id. "Civil actions can only be commenced within the periods prescribed in this title, after the cause of action shall have accrued, except where, in special cases, a different limitation is prescribed by statute." Section 312, Code Civil Proc.

The main contention of appellant's counsel is that section 312 of the Code of Civil Procedure shows that it was not the intention of the legislature to apply the statute of limitations to sections 3716 and 3717 of the Political Code, as those sections prescribe a different limitation as to liens created by the title to which those sections belong. The provision that the lien shall not be removed until the taxes are paid or the property sold for the payment thereof is certainly inconsistent with a provision that the lien is extinguished by the lapse of a certain number of years after it attaches to the property. We think a different limitation is prescribed by section 3716 of the Political Code, as to liens created by title 9 of that Code, from that prescribed anywhere in title 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It has been held that an action to recover city and county and state taxes, under an act entitled "An act to legalize the assessment of taxes in the city and county of San Francisco, and to ratify and confirm a resolution of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco," (approved March 19, 1878,) cannot be maintained unless commenced within three years after the tax becomes delinquent. San Francisco v. Jones, 20 Fed. Rep. 188. The court, SAWYER, J., in that case said that the suit was not one to enforce a lien at all. And in San Francisco v. Luning, 73 Cal. 610, 15 Pac. Rep. 311,—an action to recover delinquent taxes under the act of April 23, 1880,—the action was commenced more than seven years after the cause of action accrued, and the court held that it was barred by the statute of limitations, but said that it was not an action upon a judgment or to enforce a lien, and that it was possible that there was a subsisting judgment or lien for the taxes sued for, which the tax collector might enforce by sale in the usual way. "It is possible," said the court, "an action might lie upon the tax as a judgment, or to enforce the lien." Neither of these cases supports the contention that a lien on real property for a delinquent tax can be extinguished without paying the taxes, or selling the property for the payment thereof. By implication, at least, both of them favor the contention of appellant's counsel,—that the liens for unpaid taxes upon the real estate which defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff were subsisting liens upon said property at the date of said agreement, and have never been removed. Respondent does not claim that the demurrer to the complaint could be sustained upon any other ground than that of the bar of the statute of limitations, and we are satisfied that it was improperly sustained on that ground. Therefore the judgment must be reversed. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to overrule the defendant's demurrer to plaintiff's complaint, with leave to defendant to answer said complaint, if he shall be so advised, within 10 days after being notified of the overruling of said demurrer.

ARBITRATION AND AWARD — STAY OF JUDGMENT.

On motion of one of the parties to an arbitration to vacate the award, the court below, concluding that the submission to arbitration was not a statutory submission, refused to entertain the motion, and ordered the judgment entered, and all proceedings under it to be perpetually stayed. Held, that the ruling was proper, it appearing that the judgment on the award was void.

ty of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by L. Kreiss against A. P. Hotaling. On submission to arbitration an award was rendered, on which judgment was entered and perpetually stayed. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. N. Drown, for appellant. Henry E. Highton, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from an order perpetually staying a judgment of award and all proceedings under it. It appears that a motion was made by the respondent to vacate the award. The learned judge of the court concluded that the submission to arbitration was not a statutory submission, and therefore refused to entertain the motion, but ordered the judgment entered in form, and all proceedings under it to be perpetually stayed. This appeal is from that order, and there is no bill of exceptions, nor are the papers used on the hearing identified. It is claimed that the order is erroneous on various grounds, and among them, that there was no notice or showing, or even motion, before the court at the time. But, in the absence of a bill of exceptions, how do we know that? The order does not show this. On the contrary, it seems to imply that some showing was made. It is as follows: "In this cause, the motion of L. Kreiss, one of the parties above named, made June 11, A. D. 1888, for the purpose of vacating and setting aside the award in this proceeding, coming on regularly this day for hearing, the said L. Kreiss being represented by Henry E. Highton, Esq., his attorney, and A. P. Hotaling, the remaining party to said alleged arbitration, being represented by A. N. Drown, Esq., his attorney, it appearing to the court that the submission to arbitration filed herein on April 17, A. D. 1888, is not a statutory submission under title 10, sections 1281 to 1290, inclusive, of the Code of Civil Procedure of this state, it is hereby ordered that upon this ground, and for this cause, and for want of jurisdiction thereof, the said motion is now dismissed; and it is further ordered that the judgment entered in form in the said proceeding by the clerk of this court be, and all proceedings thereunder be, and the same hereby are, perpetually stayed. Affidavits of A. P. Hotaling, M. E. Knoph, Augustus Laver, and R. Blum read and filed in opposition to said motion." The appellant claims that this contains two orders. How do we know, then, that there was not a motion and showing, in pursuance of which the second order was made, from which he appeals? However, we think the proper construction of the whole order is that the court denied the specific relief asked for by the moving party, and, in lieu of it, made the order of which appellant now complains. The statement that the motion is dismissed means no more, under the circumstances, than that the application is denied. The judge, therefore, had before him whatever showing was made on the motion, and both parties were present in court. It may be conceded that the order of perpetual stay cannot be justified unless it appeared to the court that the award was wholly void as a judgment. For instance, it may have been made to appear affirmatively that the affidavit and notice required by section 1286, Code Civil Proc., were not filed or given. The clerk is a mere ministerial officer, and could enter such a judgment only when the necessary showing was made, and presumptions, if they are to be indulged in favor of such a judgment, may have been overcome. As the respondent's only remedy was by motion made before the entry of the judgment, this notice was of vital importance. Unless given or waived, the judgment would not be valid. It was not waived in the submission,—conceding that it could have been,—but the importance of the notice was emphasized by the stipulation that, when entered upon the judgment book, the parties would ask for no reduction, new trial, or appeal. In the transcript there is copied what purports to be a judgment roll, and among the papers so designated is an affidavit of respondent which seems to show that he had some kind of notice. If there be any such thing as a judgment roll in cases of arbitration,—which is not conceded,—we still know of no rule which would make this affidavit, made to obtain a stay of proceedings, a part of it. And the same is true of respondent's exceptions, which purport to be a part of his affidavit. We think there can be no doubt of the propriety of an order directing the clerk not to issue execution upon what in form may appear to be a judgment, but which in fact is void. We think the order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. ADAMS, Attorney General,
v. CITY OF OAKLAND. (No. 14,468.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1891.)

CITY CHARTER — ANNEXATION OF TERRITORY — AMENDMENT — REINCORPORATION — QUO WARRANTO.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 803, declares that an action may be brought by the attorney general in the name of the people against any "person" who usurps or unlawfully exercises any franchise. Pol. Code, § 17, declares that the word "person" shall include a corporation, as well as a natural person. Held, that a municipal corporation is a person, within the meaning of said section; and that, where such a corporation claims the right to govern and tax the inhabitants of territory other than that described in its charter, the right thus claimed is a franchise in addition to and distinct from that of being a corporation, and the exercise of such right is a usurpation, for which the attorney general is authorized to bring an action.

2. Const. art. 11, § 8, provides that when a city charter has been presented to the legislature and approved it shall become the charter and organic law of such city, and shall supersede any existing charter, and all amendments thereof, and all special laws inconsistent therewith. Held that, as a description of the territory, whose inhabitants are incorporated, is an essential part of the charter, an amendment of such description by proceedings to annex additional territory is an amendment of the charter, which is wholly superseded by a new charter.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

This is an action in the nature of quo warranto, brought by the attorney general against the city of Oakland. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James A. Johnson, Wm. R. Davis, and Olney, Chickering & Thomas, for appellant. H. S. Brown, George Leviston, W. W. Foote, and George A. Johnson, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an action in the nature of quo warranto, brought by the attorney general of the state for the purpose of ousting the defendant from municipal jurisdiction over certain territory alleged to be outside of its charter limits. The city of Oakland was incorporated by a special act of the legislature, passed March 25, 1854, (St. 1854, p. 183;) and by a special act of February 19, 1876, it was divided into seven wards, described in the act, (St. 1876, p. 62.) On December 10, 1887, a board of freeholders was elected to prepare and propose a new charter for the city of Oakland, as authorized by section 8 of article 11 of the constitution. This board reported the draft of a new charter, March 8, 1888, which was ratified by a vote of the people at an election held on November 6, 1888, and was approved by a majority vote of each house of the legislature on February 14, 1889. On September 5, 1888, the requisite number of electors petitioned the common council, in accordance with section 7 of the general act of the legislature of March 13, 1883, (St. 1883, p. 93,) to include within the boundaries of the city the territory which is the subject of dispute in this action. For this purpose the council ordered an election, which was held on October 27, 1888, in accordance with section 7 of the said act of 1883, and the result of which was in favor of the annexation petitioned for; and this result was duly reported to the secretary of state, and filed in his office November 21, 1888. The findings of the court, according to the stipulation of the parties, show that the proceedings to adopt a new charter were such as are required by the constitution, and that the proceedings to annex additional territory were strictly in accordance with section 7 of the general act of March 13, 1883. It will be observed that the proceedings to annex additional territory were commenced after the board of freeholders had prepared and reported their draft of the new charter, but were completed more than two months before the new charter was adopted by the legislature, and that the election ratifying the new charter was held 10 days later than the annexation election. The new charter contains a definite description of the territory of the city of Oakland, which does not include any part of the annexed territory, but corresponds with the original charter boundaries. Upon the stipulated findings of fact judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, ousting the defendant of all jurisdiction and control of the territory in question. From this judgment the defendant appeals upon the judgment roll, and contends that, upon the facts found, the judgment should have been for the defendant.

1. The first point made for appellant is that quo warranto is not the proper remedy. Section 803 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "An action may be brought by the attorney general, in the name of the people of this state, upon his own information, or upon the complaint of a private party, against any person who usurps * * * or unlawfully holds or exercises * * * any franchise within this state." No doubt a municipal corporation is a person in the same sense in which the word is used in this section. Pol. Code, § 17. The facts found according to stipulation of the parties show that the city of Oakland is a municipal corporation, and as such claims and exercises the right and power to govern and tax the inhabitants of certain territory in addition to that described in its charter. The right and power thus claimed and exercised is a franchise in addition to and distinct from that of being a corporation, (Gas Co. v. January, 57 Cal. 616; Spring Valley W. W. v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 106-109; Memphis & L. R. Co. v. Commissioners, 112 U. S. 619, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 299; Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H. 507; Willamette Woolen Manuf'g. Co. v. Bank of British Columbia, 119 U. S. 191, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187;) and the exercise of such power by a municipal corporation over the inhabitants of territory outside of its charter limits is the usurpation of a franchise, for which the attorney general is authorized to bring an action in the name of the people.

2. It is insisted that the territory in question was lawfully annexed to the city of Oakland by the proceedings above stated, which were completed November 21, 1888; and that the annexed territory was not detached by the new charter, adopted February 14, 1889. Admitting, for the purposes of the argument only, that the territory became lawfully annexed on November 21, 1888, I think the effect of the new charter, adopted February 14, 1889, was to detach it. Section 8 of article 11 of the constitution, by the authority of which the new charter was adopted, provides that, when approved by a majority of each house of the legislature, "it shall become the charter of such city, * * * and shall become the organic law thereof, and shall supersede any existing charter, and all amendments thereof, and all special laws inconsistent with such charter." It is not questioned that the new charter was regularly adopted, nor that it became the charter and organic law of the city, on the 14th day of February, 1889; but counsel for appellant contend that a description of the territory of a municipal corporation is no part of its charter, and therefore is not superseded by the new charter, containing a different description from that contained in the original charter. The charter of a municipal corporation being a grant of privileges and powers to a perpetual succession of inhabitants of a particular place or district, how are such inhabitants to be identified without a definite description in the grant (charter) of such place or district? Dill. Mun. Corp. (4th Ed.) § 20. In his outlines of an ordinary municipal charter, after enumerating several features thereof, the same author (section 39) says: "The charter then defines the territorial boundaries of the town or city thus incorporated." At section 171 he says: "The name of an incorporated place may be changed, and its boundaries enlarged or diminished, and its mode of government altered, and yet the corporation not be dissolved, but in law remain the same." Again, (section 182,) he says: "Since the leading object of an American municipal corporation is to invest the inhabitants of a defined locality or place with a corporate existence, chiefly for purposes of local government, it is obvious that the geographical limits or boundaries of the corporation ought to be defined and certain. These boundaries are usually described in the charter or constituent act, or a method is prescribed therein by which they may be ascertained and settled. Because residence within the corporation confers rights and imposes duties upon the residents, and the local jurisdiction of the incorporated place is, in most cases, confined to the limits of the corporation, it is necessary that these limits be definitely fixed. They are established by legislative authority. The power to incorporate a place necessarily includes power to fix its boundaries." None of the questions that have arisen in some of the cases as to what extent, and for what purpose, a municipal corporation may exercise authority beyond its corporate boundaries,—as to abate a nuisance or to obtain water, etc.,—are involved in this case. Here the sole question is, what have been the corporate boundaries of the city of Oakland since the adoption of the new charter? since it is not claimed that the city has power to govern or tax the inhabitants of territory outside of its charter boundaries. As a description of the territory whose inhabitants are incorporated as a municipal corporation is an essential part of the charter, an amendment of such description of the territory of the city of Oakland by the proceedings to annex additional territory was an amendment of its charter, which was wholly superseded by the new charter framed and adopted under and in accordance with section 8 of article 11 of the constitution. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

CONBOY et al. v. DICKINSON. (No. 13,719.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 31, 1891.)

ADJOINING OWNERS—EXCAVATIONS—LAND-SLIDES —DAMAGES—REASONABLE PRECAUTIONS.

1. Where plaintiff contends that defendant so carelessly and maliciously excavated his lot as to cause a part of plaintiff's lot to slide into it, and defendant proves that his motive for making the excavation was not malicious, but for a useful purpose, the question of malice becomes immaterial, and an inquiry as to what use the lot could be put to if not excavated is immaterial.

2. Plaintiff sued for damages to his house and lot occasioned by the caving of the lot into an excavation which defendant made on an adjoining lot. Defendant testified that the caving did not injure plaintiff's lot. Plaintiff testified that the house and lot cost him about $2,300, and another witness testified that the value of the property before the excavation was about $3,000, and that afterwards it was about $1,300. The highest estimate of the damage to the house was $350. The court instructed that, if the jury found for plaintiff, he could only recover for the damage to the lot, and not for the damage to the house. Held, that a verdict for $500 was not contrary to the instruction, on the ground that there was no evidence of damage to the lot.

3. Civil Code, § 832, provides that each coterminous owner is entitled to the lateral support which his land receives from adjoining land, subject to the right of the owner of said land to make usual excavations for purposes of construction, on using ordinary care and taking reasonable precautions to sustain the land of the other. Held that, where the surface of land consists of 12 or 14 feet of earth, and the owner makes an excavation through this to the depth of 40 feet, leaving a bank which slopes to a point at the bottom 20 feet from a perpendicular, and the only precaution taken to sustain the adjoining land is the beginning of the excavation 4 feet from the boundary, it cannot be said that reasonable precautions were taken.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

This was an action by M. J. Conboy and others against Harvey Dickinson, to recover damages occasioned by the caving of his lot into an excavation which the defendant was making on an adjoining lot. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. F. Cowdery, for appellant. Wm. & Geo. Leviston and Thomas D. Riordan, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiffs owned a lot fronting on the south side of Vallejo street, in the city of San Francisco. On the lot was a one-story dwelling-house, which covered the whole of it, except a yard at the rear end, about seven feet deep. The lot was on a level with the grade on the street in front of it. The defendant owned a lot fronting on the west side of Montgomery street, which adjoined the south end of plaintiff's lot. For the purpose of building on his lot, defendant commenced excavating it in 1888, and continued the work until one of the first days in March, 1889. At the front end of the lot he excavated it to a depth of 8 or 10 feet below the grade of Montgomery street, and at the rear end to a depth of 40 feet below its natural surface. Adjacent to the rear end of plaintiff's lot he left undisturbed a strip about 4 feet wide, from which there was a slope extending out at its base about 20 feet from a perpendicular line from the top. On the surface the earth was about 12 or 14 feet deep, and underneath was a sandy rock, with seams running back through it. On the 11th of March, 1889, a heavy rain fell, and there was a slide into defendant's excavation, which extended back for some distance under the south-east corner of plaintiffs' house. Plaintiffs brought this action to recover damages, caused by this slide to their property, in the sum of $3,000; and they alleged that defendant "carelessly, negligently, and maliciously excavated his lot close up to the south line and southeastern corner of plaintiffs' lot to a depth of about 40 feet below the surface of plaintiffs' lot, and without taking any precaution to sustain the land of plaintiffs;" that by reason of such excavation a large quantity of earth slid off the south-east corner of plaintiffs' lot, destroying, etc. The defendant denied these averments, and denied that by reason of any excavation made by him on his lot plaintiffs had been damaged in the sum sued for, or in any sum whatever. The case was tried by a jury, and a verdict returned in favor of plaintiffs for $500, on which judgment was entered. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was denied, and then appealed from the judgment and order. At the trial "it was admitted by stipulation that the slide of land from plaintiffs' premises was not caused or assisted in any respect by the plaintiffs' house, which covered the entire lot except the rear seven feet, nor by any structure on said lot, nor by the weight of the house or structures." And at the conclusion of the evidence "the court, among other things, instructed the jury that in case they found for the plaintiffs the plaintiffs were only entitled to recover for the damage done the land, and not for damage done the house."

1. When the defendant was on the stand as a witness in his own behalf, he was asked by his counsel: "Do you know of any use that lot of yours could be put to if it had not been excavated?" The question was objected to by plaintiffs as irrelevant and immaterial, and the objection sustained. It is now urged that this ruling was erroneous, because the question was asked to meet the plaintiffs' charge that defendant made his excavation for a malicious purpose; and counsel says: "Defendant proposed to show absence of malice by showing that his excavations were made for a useful purpose." But defendant did testify, without any objection: "I was engaged in excavating my lot for the purpose of building on it;" and his counsel say that "all the evidence showed that the defendant was grading his lot for a useful purpose." It must be admitted, therefore, that it was proved, without conflict, that his motive in making the excavations was proper, and not malicious. Besides, it does not appear that any exemplary damages were awarded by the jury, and hence the question of malice becomes immaterial.

2. It is also urged that the verdict was contrary to the instructions of the court, because there was no evidence as to the damage done to the land as distinguished from the proved damages done to the house. And it is said: "The evidence was all one way respecting damage to the land. It was positively shown that the land had not been injured at all." It is true defendant testified: "This caving did not hurt it at all; it did it good. Conboy ought to pay me something for it, because it forced upon Conboy to fix his house when it might tumble down. It is now well supported; infinitely better than it ever was." But the plaintiff Conboy testified that the house and lot cost him about $2,300, and another witness testified that the value of the property before the excavation was about $3,000, and at the time of the trial (September, 1889) about $1,200 or $1,300. It was also proved that the premises were in the same condition at the time of the trial as at the time of the slide, except that the house had been braced up; and the highest estimate of the damage done to the house was $350. Moreover, by consent of both parties, the jury, during the trial, visited and inspected the premises. The question as to what damage was done to the lot was a question of fact for the jury, and, looking at all the evidence, we cannot say that the verdict was contrary to the instructions of the court and not justified.

3. It is further claimed that defendant had a right to excavate his lot for the purpose of building on it, and he used ordinary care and skill in making his excavations, and took reasonable precautions to sustain plaintiffs' land, and hence was not responsible for any damage done thereto. This position is rested upon section 832 of the Civil Code, which reads: "Each coterminous owner is entitled to the lateral and subjacent support which his land receives from the adjoining land, subject to the right of the owner of the adjoining land to make proper and usual excavations on the same for purposes of construction, on using ordinary care and skill, and taking reasonable precautions to sustain the land of the other, and giving previous reasonable notice to the other of his intention to make such excavations." In Aston v. Nolan, 63 Cal. 269, the court, speaking of the law as it existed before the enactment of this section, said, quoting from Washburn on Real Property: "Every one has so far the right to have his own soil sustained by that of his neighbor that the latter may not dig so near to the land of the former as to cause the same to fall into the excavation by its own natural weight. He ought to guard against such a consequence by proper care, and the application of proper means of support. The right of lateral support in such case is an incident to the land itself. In the language of Rolle: 'It seems that a man who has land next adjoining to my land cannot dig his land so near to my land that thereby my land shall fall into the pit, and for this, if an action were brought it would lie.'" And, speaking of the notice provided for, it was said: "It is apparent that by giving the notice a person excavating cannot relieve himself of any portion of the prudent care with which he must have conducted the work in the absence of the statutory provision requiring notice. His excavation must be such as would not have caused the soil of the adjacent lot to tumble in had it remained in its natural state, not built upon. * * * The object of the notice is that the owner of the building may have his attention called to the work, and, if necessary, shore up his wall or strengthen his foundation."

And, again: "Since the enactment of the Code the rights and duties of adjoining proprietors, with reference to the matter in hand, are substantially the same as they were before, provided notice is given by the party intending to excavate." As to whether reasonable notice of his intention to excavate was given by defendant need not be considered, since it was stipulated that the slide which did the damage was in no way caused by the weight of the plaintiffs' house.

The only question, then, is: Did the defendant take "reasonable precautions to sustain the land" of plaintiffs. He testified, "I used every precaution to sustain plaintiffs' land," but the only precaution specified is that he stopped his excavations 4 feet from their line. In view of the fact that he was excavating to a depth of 40 feet below the surface, can it be said that this was a reasonable precaution? The answer must be in the negative. The work was completed early in March, and heavy rains at that season of the year might be expected. The bank was left with a steep slope, and the earth at the top was 12 or 14 feet deep. Under such circumstances, it would seem that any reasonable man would naturally anticipate just what occurred as the result of the excavation. In our opinion, the motion for a new trial was properly denied, and we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

DAVIS v. LEZINSKY. (No. 13,950.)

JUDGMENT—INCONSISTENT RECITALS—PRESUMPTION.

Where a judgment recites that the cause was tried on the papers and records on file, with statements made by the parties, and adds, "There being no evidence, the cause was thereupon submitted," etc., and judgment rendered for plaintiff, such apparent inconsistency does not rebut the presumption of the correctness of the judgment, it being as susceptible of a construction that will sustain the judgment as of a construction that will defeat it.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Joseph Davis against George Lezinsky. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Franklin P. Bull and Wm. A. Beatty, for appellant. M. J. McGrath, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action on a promissory note payable to A. Davis & Son or order, by whom it was alleged to have been assigned to the plaintiff. The note is set out in the complaint. The complaint not being verified, the unverified answer of the defendant denies generally each and every allegation of the complaint; and for a further answer alleges that A. Davis & Son "has never complied with the provisions of sections 2466 and 2468 of the Civil Code of this state," and "that Joseph Davis, the plaintiff abovenamed, is the sole member of the said firm of A. Davis & Son." The plaintiff had judgment, from which the defendant brings this appeal on the judgment roll, without a bill of exceptions. The judgment is preceded by the following recitals: "This cause came on regularly for trial this day before the court, sitting without a jury; M. J. McGrath appearing as counsel for the plaintiff, and the defendant appearing in person. The cause was tried upon the papers and records on file herein, together with the statements made by the respective parties. There being no evidence offered, the cause was thereupon submitted to the court for consideration and decision; and now, the court having fully considered the same, it is ordered that judgment be, and the same is hereby, entered herein in favor of the plaintiff, and against the defendant, for $500, and interest in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. Findings are hereby waived." It is contended by appellant that the recitals in the judgment show that it was a judgment on the pleadings merely, without any proof of the assignment or non-payment of the note. The recitals show that the cause was tried upon the papers and records on file, together with the statements made by the respective parties, the defendant appearing in person. If nothing more than this had been recited, there would be no doubt that the judgment is correct. It is true that the further recital, viz., "There being no evidence offered," taken in its technical sense, seems inconsistent with the recital preceding it; but the meaning intended may have been only that there was no sworn testimony, or that there was no other evidence than the statements of the parties and the papers on file, since it is possible that the court intended to distinguish the statements and admissions of the parties, not made under oath, from evidence. However this may be, the presumption is that the judgment is correct until proved otherwise, and the burden of overcoming this presumption is upon the appellant. He does not shift or discharge the burden by merely showing an apparent inconsistency in the recitals which may as well be reconciled in favor of the judgment as against it. In other words, if the recitals, read together, are as susceptible of a construction which will sustain the judgment as of a construction which will defeat it, the presumption in favor of the judgment requires that the former construction be adopted. The real point made by the appellant is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings of fact implied in the judgment, express findings having been waived. This question might have been raised and presented on its true merits, by motion for new trial or bill of exceptions containing a statement of the evidence or want of evidence. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

DORLAND v. SMITH. (No. 14,067.)

STREET ASSESSMENT LIEN—FORECLOSURE—SETTING ASIDE SALE.

1. An order made in 1887, that execution issue on a decree foreclosing a street assessment lien entered in 1881, was unauthorized, being more than five years after the decree, and a sale under such execution is void.

2. Where a decree foreclosing a street assessment lien was entered, and the premises afterwards sold before execution issued, the vendor could not afterwards waive the right of his vendee to object to a sale of the property under a void execution.

3. Where the attorney for plaintiff in a suit to foreclose a street assessment lien purchased the property at the sale on execution, and had notice of a motion to set aside the order for execution and the sale thereon, and appeared at the hearing, he cannot complain on appeal that plaintiff was not served with notice of the motion on the ground that his relation of attorney was severed by the sale of the property to himself and the payment of the purchase money to plaintiff, and that notice to him was not notice to plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department

1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. McM. SHAFER, Judge.

Action by Alice Dorland against Joseph Smith to foreclose a street assessment lien. After decree defendant sold the premises to Romain C. De Boom, who, after a sale of the premises to J. M. Wood on execution of the decree, moved to set aside the execution sale. The motion was granted, and J. M. Wood appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. Gordon & Young, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This action was commenced May 13, 1879, in the late district court of the twenty-third judicial district for the city and county of San Francisco, to enforce the lien of a street assessment on a lot on Mission street, then the property of the defendant. A decree enforcing the lien by sale of the lot was entered January 11, 1881. On July 11, 1883, and before the issuing of an execution upon this decree, the defendant conveyed the lot to Romain C. De Boom. On February 28, 1887, the superior court, on motion of plaintiff's attorney, without notice to De Boom or defendant, made an order directing that execution issue on the decree. An execution (order of sale) was accordingly issued on March 1, 1887, and on March 26, 1887, the sheriff sold the lot at public auction to plaintiff's attorney, J. M. Wood, for the sum of $834.43, which was applied to the satisfaction of the assessment and costs. On April 25, 1890, pursuant to previous notice served on J. M. Wood, Esq., De Boom moved the court to vacate and set aside the order of February 28, 1887, directing that execution issue; and also to set aside the sheriff's sale of the lot to J. M. Wood, on the grounds that the order was unauthorized and illegal, for the reason that more than five years had elapsed between the date of the entry of the judgment and the date of the order; and that the execution and the sheriff's sale under it were unauthorized and void for the same reason. This motion was granted. The order of February 28, 1887, was vacated, and the sheriff's sale to J. M. Wood was set aside. From this order J. M. Wood alone brings this appeal upon the judgment roll, including a bill of exceptions. The motion was heard upon the judgment roll, the order of sale and sheriff's return thereon, the papers on file in the case, and the affidavits of De Boom and J. M. Wood. The order of February 28, 1887, does not appear in the record, and there is nothing tending to show the ground upon which it was made, except the affidavits of the parties, which state that it was made on the ground that plaintiff had been restrained from enforcing the decree from September 2, 1882, until January 6, 1886. But as to the fact of such restraint, the affidavits are contradictory; that of De Boom denying that plaintiff was restrained at all for any period of time, while that of appellant simply states that plaintiff was so restrained "by order of court," without specifying any particular order. The affidavit of De Boom states that for nine years last past he resided in Napa county, and had no notice of the order of February 28, 1887, nor of the sheriff's sale to J. M. Wood, until within the last three weeks, and this is not denied. The court had no power to make the order of February 28, 1887, directing the issuance of execution after the expiration of five years from the entry of the judgment, even though the plaintiff had been restrained by order of court from executing the judgment, as claimed by appellant. Therefore the order, the execution, and the sheriff's sale under the execution were void. Dorland v. Hanson, 81 Cal. 203, 22 Pac. Rep. 552; Buell v. Buell, (Cal.) 28 Pac. Rep. 443; Stout v. Macy, 22 Cal. 647; Bowers v. Crary, 30 Cal. 622. It follows that the court properly vacated the order of February 28, 1887, and set aside the unauthorized sale by the sheriff, upon motion of De Boom, the purchaser from the defendant of the property attempted to be sold. People v. Mullan, 65 Cal. 396, 4 Pac. Rep. 348.

It is contended for appellant, however, that, as it does not appear that defendant has complained of the order of February 28, 1887, it must be presumed that he waived the right to complain of it; and that De Boom is bound by defendant's waiver. In the first place, it appears by the uncontradicted affidavit of De Boom that defendant had no notice of the application for that order; and, in the second place, it is not perceived that defendant could have waived the right of his vendee to object to a sale of his property under a void execution. It is also claimed for appellant that the order appealed from is erroneous, because no notice of the application for it was served upon the plaintiff. A written notice of the application, addressed to plaintiff and her attorney in the action, (J. M. Wood,) was duly served upon the latter, who claims, however, that his relation of attorney for the plaintiff in the action was severed by the sale of the property to himself and the payment of the purchase money to the plaintiff, after which notice to him was not notice to the plaintiff. Perhaps this objection might have been taken by the plaintiff had she appealed from the order; but I think it is not available to the appellant, who had notice, and who appeared and resisted the motion. So far as the merits or demerits of the motion were concerned, the appellant was at liberty to oppose it on any ground which could have been urged by the plaintiff. The only ground upon which the motion rested was that the order directing execution to issue was made more than five years after the entry of the judgment. Appellant was at liberty to show, if he could, that such was not the fact. But he did not dispute it, and the record which he has brought here shows that it was indisputable. It therefore appears that he was not injured by want of notice to plaintiff of the motion to vacate the order of February 28, 1887. I think the order should be affirmed.

WE CONCUR: FITZGERALD, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

76 LAND & WATER CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF FRESNO COUNTY. (No. 14,569.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1892.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—DECREE—LACHES—CONTEMPT—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. A decree for specific performance of a land contract found that plaintiff was entitled to such performance by a payment on or before October 1, 1890, and that on such payment on or before that date defendant should execute to plaintiff a deed of the premises. Plaintiff tendered payment, January 3, 1891, when the decree was affirmed on appeal. Held, that under Civil Code, § 1492, which provides that, where delay in performance is capable of exact compensation, and time has not been expressly declared to be of the essence of the obligation, an offer of performance, with an offer of such compensation, may be made at any time after it is due, plaintiff's right to performance did not depend on payment by the day named.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. § 684, relating to the enforcement of judgment, where defendant refuses to make a deed as directed by a decree for specific performance of a land contract, he is guilty of contempt of court.

3. On review of contempt proceedings, it is presumed that the court, having jurisdiction, properly considered all matters offered in defense or extenuation, and its judgment is conclusive.

Certiorari to review the proceedings.

W. S. Goodfellow, for petitioner. Thompson & Thompson, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is a proceeding upon certiorari, for the purpose of reviewing the action of the superior court of the county of Fresno in adjudging the petitioner guilty of contempt. On February 21, 1890, that court, in an action therein pending for specific performance of an agreement to convey land, in which one Abbott was plaintiff, and the petitioner here the defendant, entered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, Abbott, the material part of which is as follows: "It is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiff herein, O. L. Abbott, have judgment as prayed for herein against the defendant, the 76 Land & Water Company, (a corporation,) that as to all that certain tract or parcel of land, situated in the said county of Fresno, * * * described as follows, to-wit: * * * The said defendant, the 76 Land & Water Company, (a corporation,) is the trustee of said plaintiff, O. L. Abbott, and, as such trustee, said defendant holds the legal title to said property in trust for plaintiff, the said legal title to be by defendant conveyed unto plaintiff by defendant on payment thereof as herein provided: that said plaintiff is the owner of the right to buy the said 320-acre parcel of land * * * of and from defendant for the sum of forty-eight hundred ($4,800) dollars, payable one-fourth in cash, and the remainder on or before the 1st day of October, A. D. 1890, with interest on the deferred payment, the remaining three-fourths ($3,600) at the rate of eight per cent. per annum, payable annually in advance, from October 1, A. D. 1887; * * * and upon said payment of one-fourth of the purchase price and interest on the balance thereof as above mentioned, * * * and upon full payment of the balance, the remaining three-fourths, to-wit, $1,600, and all accrued interest thereon, on or before the 1st day of October, A. D. 1890, defendant do make, execute, acknowledge, and deliver unto plaintiff a full and sufficient deed of grant and conveyance of all of said above-described 320-acre parcel of land." The petitioner took an appeal from said judgment to this court, but the execution thereof, except as to costs, was not stayed by any undertaking, and upon January 3, 1891, the judgment was affirmed. The amount named in the judgment, upon the payment of which the petitioner was thereby required to convey to plaintiff in that action the land described in the judgment, was not tendered to the petitioner until after January 3, 1891, and when so tendered the petitioner refused to accept the same or make the conveyance directed by the judgment. It was for the refusal to make such conveyance, after the service upon it on June 9, 1891, of a certified copy of the judgment above set out, and the tender of the money therein required to be paid it upon the execution of such conveyance, that the petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt of court.

1. It is claimed by the petitioner that the judgment in the action for specific performance only gave to the plaintiff therein a mere option to purchase and pay for the land mentioned on or before October 1, 1890, which was lost to him by his failure to tender the purchase price therein named until after that date, and that the court was for this reason without jurisdiction to punish it for its refusal to make a conveyance upon the tender of payment made after that date. But in placing this construction upon that judgment petitioner has entirely misconceived its scope and effect. On the contrary, it was a judicial determination of the existence and validity of the contract named in the complaint in that action, and is to be construed as being in substance and effect a judgment for the specific performance of that contract by the parties thereto, and could be enforced as such by proper proceedings upon the part of either the plaintiff or the defendant in the action. Clark v. Hall, 7 Paige, 382. The fact that the judgment fixes the date when, according to the contract to be enforced, the plaintiff was to make such payment, does not make his right to the enforcement of such judgment depend upon payment by the day named. In an action by a vendee to enforce specific performance of a contract to convey, the court may, if the vendor asks it, make a decree, as in the case of a strict foreclosure, that, if the vendee does not pay the purchase money within such time as may be limited by the court for that purpose, he shall be barred of his right to insist upon a specific performance afterwards. Clark v. Hall, supra; Connecticut v. Sheridan, Clarke Ch. 534. But, in the absence of an explicit declaration to that effect in the decree, it cannot be construed as giving to the defendant any such relief; and the equitable rule embodied in section 1492 of the Civil Code, that "where delay in performance is capable of exact and entire compensation, and time has not been expressly declared to be of the essence of the obligation, an offer of performance, accompanied with an offer of such compensation, may be made at any time after it is due," is as applicable to such a judgment as to the contract upon which it is based.

2. The affidavits upon which the petitioner was cited to appear before the superior court and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt were sufficient to give the court jurisdiction in that proceeding. There can be no doubt that the willful refusal of a party to comply with the decree of a court of competent jurisdiction, directing him to execute a conveyance, constitutes a contempt of such court, and may be punished as such. Rap. Contempt, § 35. And section 684 of the Code of Civil Procedure contemplates that the court may resort to proceedings in contempt for the purpose of enforcing obedience to a judgment which requires the execution of a conveyance by a party thereto.

3. It may be conceded that if the superior court had been satisfied that the defendant in its refusal to make the conveyance acted in good faith, under the belief that the judgment had expired by its own limitation, and under the advice of counsel, it would have been a wise exercise of its discretion to have made the execution of the judgment for contempt conditional upon the failure of the petitioner to execute such conveyance within a reasonable time thereafter, but there is a conclusive presumption that the court properly considered all matters offered by the petitioner in defense or extenuation, and, having jurisdiction in the proceeding, its judgment is conclusive, and must be affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

76 LAND & WATER CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF FRESNO COUNTY. (No. 14,570.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1892.)

In bank.

W. S. Goodfellow, for petitioner. Thompson & Thompson, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Application for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the superior court of the county of Fresno. It appears that the petitioner has been cited to appear before that court to show cause why he should not be punished as for a contempt, for its refusal to execute certain conveyances, as directed by the judgment of that court in certain actions severally commenced by J. B. Shipe and S. B. Abbott, and in each of which the petitioner was a defendant. The facts made to appear to the superior court, and upon which its said order to petitioner to show cause is based, are substantially the same as in the case of Water Co. v. Superior Court, (No. 14,569,) 28 Pac. Rep. 813, the opinion in which has been this day filed; and upon the authority of that case we hold that the superior court has jurisdiction of the said proceeding against petitioner, and the alternative writ of prohibition heretofore issued herein is discharged, and the application for a peremptory writ denied. So ordered.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; GAROUTTE, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.

HARRISON, J., being disqualified, did not participate in the foregoing decision.

MORTIMER v. MARDER et al. (No. 13,836.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 3, 1892.)

CONVERSION—VALUE OF GOODS—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY—PROOF OF FOREIGN LAWS—HARMLESS ERROR—CERTIFICATE OF PARTNERSHIP.

1. In an action for the conversion of goods the evidence showed that the goods were second-hand, and of no market value, and that they had been converted by defendants. Further evidence by plaintiff, not objected to by defendants, showed when and at what price the property had been purchased, how it had been used, its condition and depreciation, and both plaintiff and her husband testified that it was worth $2,000. Held, that such evidence was sufficient to sustain a verdict for that amount.

2. Where plaintiff and her husband, in an action for the conversion of goods, both testify that the goods were plaintiff's separate property, purchased with her money, it is sufficient evidence that the goods were her separate property.

3. Where it is contended that the law of a foreign state should govern in a certain case, but there is no evidence as to what that law is, it will be presumed it is the same as the law of the tribunal.

4. Where plaintiff in an action for the conversion of goods sought to recover for the time she had spent in pursuit thereof, and the jury returned a verdict which the court reduced to the actual value of the goods as testified to by plaintiff, there was no error prejudicial to defendant in admitting evidence of the value of plaintiff's time spent in such pursuit.

5. Civil Code, §§ 2469-2471, provide that on every change in the members of a partnership transacting business under a fictitious name or a designation which does not show the partners' names, a new certificate of partnership must be filed with the proper officer, certified copies of which are presumptive evidence of the facts therein stated. Held, that such certified copy was competent evidence to prove a partnership, there being nothing to show that any later certificate had been filed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth H. Mortimer against John Marder and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Campbell & Wright, for appellants. E. W. McGraw, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to recover of the defendants damages for their having caused the personal property of the plaintiff to be seized in attachment in an action in the state of Oregon, brought against the plaintiff's husband, J. D. Mortimer, by the defendants, and for their having caused the same to be sold under execution, bought in by a third party, and wholly lost to the plaintiff, and thereby converted wrongfully to the use of defendants. It is alleged that the value of the property thus converted was $2,000, and that the plaintiff spent three months of time and $500 in pursuit of the property. Judgment was prayed for $2,000 and interest from the date of the alleged conversion,—April 8, 1884,—and for the further sum of $1,000 and costs. The cause was tried before a jury, who rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $2,612.50, upon which judgment was duly given and made. A motion for a new trial being made, the trial court was of opinion that the verdict was excessive, and that the same should be reduced to the sum of $2,000, and accordingly directed that, unless the plaintiff remitted the excess, a new trial should be granted. The plaintiff entered an acceptance of the reduction thus ordered, and thereupon the motion for a new trial was denied. From the judgment above adverted to, and the order refusing a new trial, this appeal is taken.

One point which appears to be insisted on by the defendants for a reversal of the judgment and order is that there is no proper legal evidence to sustain the verdict. They seem to rest this assumption upon the idea that the evidence shows (1) that there was no value whatever of the converted property proven on the trial; (2) that the property was community property; (3) if not that, it was partnership property; (4) that the goods levied on were purchased with money which was community or partnership property. As to the evidence given in relation to the value of the property, it is to be said that it was shown that it had no market value; that it was second-hand property, and had been lost by the conversion of the defendants, which being so, and no objection being offered to the introduction of the further evidence which tended to show when the plaintiff purchased the property, what it then cost her in the market, how it had been used, and what its condition was, and what the depreciation was, if any,—both the plaintiff and her husband testifying that the property seized was worth at least $2,000, and that it was her separate property, purchased with her separate moneys,—it would seem that the evidence of value, unobjected to by the defendants, was a proper basis on which the jury might legitimately fix the value of the same in rendering their verdict. As remarked in Jones v. Morgan, 90 N. Y. 10, under a similar state of facts: "It was incumbent on the plaintiff to make the best proof she could. * * * There seems to have been no other feasible way to ascertain the value."

The plaintiff and her husband both testified, as heretofore stated, that the property seized was her separate property, purchased with her money. If the jury believed them, as was their right, we do not perceive that it can be said that it was community or partnership property, notwithstanding that ordinarily, where property is purchased at the time this was, and after the marriage of the parties, it would be presumed to belong to the community, and would require satisfactory proof to the contrary to rebut that presumption. Moore v. Jones, 63 Cal. 14, 15.

The contention is also made that, as the money originally was given the plaintiff in England, and then was invested in Nebraska, and from there taken to Oregon and invested in the property involved here, the law of California, where the action is brought, as to community property, should not prevail, but that of the common law, although there is no evidence in the case as to what the law of the foreign state is. This position, being in direct conflict with the decisions in this state, need not be further considered. Hickman v. Alpaugh, 21 Cal. 226; Hill v. Grigsby, 32 Cal. 60; Marsters v. Lash, 61 Cal. 624; Shumway v. Leakey, 67 Cal. 460, 8 Pac. Rep. 12.

It is said by the appellants that evidence was inadmissible to prove the value per week of the plaintiff's time while pursuing the property. But the court below reduced the verdict to the actual value of the property as testified to by the plaintiff, and there could be no prejudicial error, therefore, even if it be conceded, though not decided, that this evidence was inadmissible, and that the answer of the defendants did not admit the value of her time to have been more than she testified to.

A certified copy of a certificate of partnership of the defendants Marder, Luse & Co., filed in San Francisco, Cal., was introduced by the plaintiff, and objected to by the defendants. It tended, as we think, to show that two of the defendants here were members of the firm,—that is, John Marder and A. P. Luse,—and was competent evidence, there being nothing to show that any new certificate had been filed. Civil Code, §§ 2469-2471. We think also that the nonsuit was not improperly denied as to John Marder and A. P. Luse. We have examined with care and attention the other points made by the appellants as to the action of the court below in refusing to admit evidence proposed by the defendants, but do not perceive any prejudicial error, and we therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

WE CONCUR: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. McNULTY. (No. 20,659.)¹

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — EX POST FACTO LAWS — SENTENCE ON CONVICTION OF MURDER—STATUTE UNCONSTITUTIONAL IN PART—EFFECT.

1. Pen. Code, § 1217, provides that the warrant for the execution of a prisoner sentenced to death must appoint a day for the execution, "which must not be less than thirty or more than sixty days from the time of judgment." Section 1237 imposes on the sheriff the duty of executing criminals. Section 1229 directs that the execution must take place in the county where judgment is rendered. Laws 1891, p. 272, amended these sections by providing that the day of execution "must not be less than sixty or more than ninety days from the time of judgment," and that the warrant must also direct the sheriff to deliver the prisoner to the warden of one of the state-prisons, on which officer is imposed the duty of executing criminals, and directing that the execution take place in the prison to which the criminal is delivered. Held ex post facto as regards prisoners awaiting execution, because imposing greater punishments by the confinement in the state's prison than the acts repealed.

2. Where it is evident that the legislature in passing such statute intended it to apply the new punishment alike in all cases of murder, past as well as future, and would not have passed it except as an entirety, and that its partial enforcement would produce effects which the legislature would never have sanctioned, the whole act must be declared unconstitutional. HARRISON, DE HAVEN, and GAROUTTE, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. On rehearing. For former report, see 28 Pac. Rep. 597.

Wilson & Troutt, Carroll Cook, J. E. Foulds, and Wm. Hoff Cook, for appellant. W. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant was accused by information of the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed in March, 1888. In August, 1888, he was convicted of murder in the first degree, and, in accordance with the law as it then stood, was sentenced to be hanged by the sheriff in the county jail. On appeal to this court the judgment of the superior court was affirmed. 26 Pac. Rep. 597. But before a remittitur had issued our attention was called to certain amendments to the Penal Code, enacted by the last legislature, pending the appeal, changing the method and time for executing capital sentences, which, it is contended, are inapplicable to the case of this appellant, because they are, as to him, ex post facto, but which at the same time have the effect of repealing the old law, under which alone he could have been executed, the result being, as claimed, that in consequence of a blunder of the legislature he and all others in his situation must go free of all punishment. For the purpose of considering and determining this important question the judgment of affirmance was vacated and a reargument ordered. The case having been again argued and submitted, we are now to decide upon the effect of the legislation referred to.

The question involved is no less than this: Whether, since the date fixed for the taking effect of the amendatory statute,—May 30, 1891,—capital punishment can be inflicted in any case of murder, however atrocious, committed prior to that date; and whether, in a case like this, where a judgment of death, free from error, had been entered, but not executed, prior to said date, any punishment whatever can be inflicted. The gravity of this question will be better appreciated when it is understood that there are, according to the statement of the attorney general, no less than 18 convicted murderers whose fate depends upon its solution, and who, if it is determined in favor of the contention of the appellant, must be turned loose upon society, unless this court shall, as his counsel suggests, reverse the judgments, with or without reason, and remand the cases for new trials, in the hope that the juries before whom they may be again tried will, as in their discretion they might, impose the lighter penalty of imprisonment for life, in order to prevent the most deliberate murderers from going absolutely unpunished. We do not, however, feel at liberty to resort to such an evasion, or to convey such a suggestion to the superior court. We have already determined that the judgment in this case is free from error; that the appellant was duly and legally convicted and sentenced to die, according to the law of the land as it existed at the date of the judgment and at the date of the murder. Other cases must be decided according to the same rule and the same law. If in such cases we find, as we have found in this case, that the judgments are regular and valid, we must so declare; and if it is true, as contended, that the sentence in this case cannot be executed by reason of the repeal of the only law under which it could have been executed, and that the appellant must go free, so must all others in his situation. With a thorough appreciation, therefore, of the consequences to flow from our decision, we proceed to consider the case.

It is to be premised that from an early period in the history of California the crime of murder—the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought—has been divided into two degrees,—murder of the first and murder of the second degree. Without undertaking to state fully the distinction between the two crimes, it is sufficient for our purpose to say that the first degree includes those murders which are marked by deliberation or cruelty, or which are committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate certain enumerated felonies of the gravest character. It has been the unvarying expression of the legislative will, sustained by the sentiment of the people of California, that such murders deserve the penalty of death by hanging, unless (according to a comparatively recent enactment) the jury trying the case, in their discretion, expressly determined by their verdict that the defendant may be punished by imprisonment in the state-prison for life. Pen. Code, § 190; People v. Welch, 49 Cal. 174. In this law there has been no change since the commission of the homicide of which the appellant was convicted. It remains, with the modification referred to, as it has remained for almost half a century, the settled policy of the state. There has never been manifested any intention on the part of the legislature or desire upon the part of the people that the death penalty in aggravated cases of murder should be abolished. On the contrary, the very latest expression of the legislative will is in favor of its continued infliction, with what counsel for appellant contends are added penalties and greater severity, resulting from the different manner prescribed for carrying it into execution. The recent amendments to the Penal Code, the effects of which we are to consider, do not present the first instance of changes made by the legislature in the manner of conducting the execution of capital sentences. Formerly, and for a long time, executions were public; but afterwards the law was so amended as to require the execution to be conducted within the jail, and with comparative privacy. It has never been contended, so far as we are aware, that this amendment was void with respect to previous offenses on the ground of being ex post facto, although we think it would be shown by reasoning no less logical, and upon grounds no more fanciful, than are contained in the argument of counsel here, that execution within the walls of a jail before sunrise, (Holden v. Minnesota, 137 U. S. 491, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 143,) and in presence of the few persons designated by statute, or invited by the sheriff, would to many convicts be vastly more terrible than execution in public in the light of day, in the presence of all who choose to attend, including friends, relatives, and sympathizers. If this is so, or even if it may reasonably be supposed to be so, then, according to the argument, such an alteration of the law would be ex post facto, and void as to all previous offenses, though it was held otherwise in the case last referred to.

It must be admitted, however, that the supreme court of the United States found and declared a distinction, material in its view, between the statute of Minnesota—considered in the Holden Case—and the statute of Colorado, under which the Medley Case arose. Ex parte Medley, 134 U. S. 160, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 384. In that case Medley was convicted of murder, and sentenced to be hanged in the manner and at the time and place prescribed by a statute which did not go into effect, although passed, before he committed the murder. Pending the execution, and while in the custody of the warden of the penitentiary, he sued out a writ of habeas corpus in the supreme court of the United States, where it was held that the statute referred to prescribed a different and severer punishment than that provided in the statute existing at the date of the murder; that it was, therefore, as to him, an ex post facto law, such as the states are by the federal constitution forbidden to pass, (article 1, § 10,) and incapable of enforcement. It was also at the same time held that since, according to the decision of the Colorado courts, the amendatory act had gone into effect, and thereby necessarily repealed the former law regulating the execution of capital sentences, there remained no law under which the petitioner could be punished, and he was accordingly discharged. Evidently, if our amendatory statute makes, as is contended, substantially the same changes in our law as were effected by the statute of Colorado, the same results must follow; that is to say, the sheriff cannot execute the judgment against the appellant, for the law authorizing him to act has been repealed; and, if the judgment is modified so as to conform to the new regulation, the supreme court of the United States will, as soon as the appellant is committed to the custody of the warden of the penitentiary, discharge him upon habeas corpus. In other words, we have here a federal question; a question of the validity of a state law, depending upon its conformity to the behests of the constitution of the United States; a question upon which the decisions of the supreme court of the United States are of binding and conclusive authority. It becomes necessary, therefore, to carefully examine and compare the two laws,—that of Colorado and that of California,—in order to determine whether this case falls within the principle of the Colorado case, and is governed by it.

The Colorado statute, (Laws 1889, p. 118) is quoted at page 163, 134 U. S., and pages 384 and 385, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. According to the contention of the petitioner in that case, there were no less than 20 variances between the statute in force at the date of the murder and that under which he was sentenced, all of which he claimed to be changes to his prejudice and injury, and therefore ex post facto. The court, however, found it unnecessary to examine all these specifications, being satisfied that in two important particulars the law was infected with the vice imputed to it. According to the old law, every person convicted of murder in the first degree was to suffer death by hanging, at such time as the court should direct, not less than 15 nor more than 25 days after sentence, unless for good cause the governor should prolong the time. Pending the execution the prisoner was to be kept in the county jail, under the control of the sheriff of the county, who was the officer charged with the execution of the sentence. Solitary confinement was neither authorized by the former statute nor was its practice in use in regard to prisoners awaiting the punishment of death. By the new statute the judge passing sentence of death was required to issue a warrant directed to the warden of the penitentiary, appointing and designating therein a week of time within which such sentence must be executed, such week so appointed to be not less than two nor more than four weeks from date of sentence, commanding said warden to do execution of the sentence imposed upon some day within the week of time designated in the warrant. This warrant was to be delivered to the sheriff of the county, whose duty it was made to proceed to the penitentiary within 24 hours, and there deliver the prisoner and warrant to the warden, who thereupon was required to keep the convict in solitary confinement until the infliction of the death penalty; "and" (the statute proceeded) "no person shall be allowed access to said convict, except his attendants, counsel, physician, a spiritual adviser of his own selection, and members of his family, and then only in accordance with prison regulations." By section 3 of the act it was further provided that the warden should fix the particular day and hour of the week designated in the warrant for carrying out the sentence, and should invite to be present at the execution the sheriff of the county where the conviction was had, the chaplain and physician of the penitentiary, one practicing surgeon,—resident of the state,—the spiritual adviser of the convict, if any, and six reputable citizens of the state of full age. Besides these official witnesses no person was to be allowed at the execution, except the executioners necessary for the assistance of the sheriff; and all were forbidden, under heavy penalties, from divulging to any person, including the prisoner, the hour or day of his death. The court held that the provision for solitary confinement in the penitentiary between sentence and execution and the provision requiring the prisoner to be kept ignorant and in suspense as to the exact time within a whole week when he might be called upon to die were substantial additions to the punishment previously prescribed, and rendered the act invalid as an ex post facto law. As to other points upon which the court failed to express an opinion we can only conjecture what their decision would have been if they had deemed it necessary to discuss them.

For the purpose of comparing the law of this state existing at the time the appellant committed the murder of which he was convicted with the amendments made or attempted by the act of 1891, (Laws 1891, p. 272,) we shall quote sections 1217, 1227, and 1229 of the Penal Code, as they existed at the date of the crime, and in their amended form:

THE OLD LAW.

"Sec. 1217. When judgment of death is rendered, a warrant, signed by the judge and attested by the clerk under the seal of the court, must be drawn and delivered by the sheriff. It must state the conviction and judgment, and appoint a day on which the judgment is to be executed, which must not be less than thirty nor more than sixty days from the time of judgment."

"Sec. 1227. If for any reason a judgment of death has not been executed, and it remains in force, the court in which the conviction was had, on the application of the district attorney, must order the defendant to be brought before it, or, if he is at large, a warrant for his apprehension may be issued. Upon the defendant being brought before the court, it must inquire into the facts, and, if no legal reasons exist against the execution of the judgment, must make an order that the sheriff execute the judgment at a specified time. The sheriff must execute the judgment accordingly."

"Sec. 1229. A judgment of death must be executed within the walls or yard of a jail, or some convenient private place in the county. The sheriff of the county must be present at the execution, and must invite the presence of a physician, the district attorney of the county, and at least twelve reputable citizens, to be selected by him; and he shall, at the request of the defendant, permit such ministers of the gospel, not exceeding two, as the defendant may name, and any persons, relatives, or friends, not to exceed five, to be present at the execution, together with such peace officers as he may think expedient, to witness the execution. But no other persons than those mentioned in this section can be present at the execution, nor can any person under age be allowed to witness the same."

THE ACT OF 1891.

"Sec. 1227. If for any reason a judgment of death has not been executed, and it remains in force, the court in which the conviction is had, on the application of the district attorney of the county in which the conviction is had, must order the defendant to be brought before it, or, if he is at large, a warrant for apprehension may be issued. Upon the defendant being brought before the court, it must inquire into the facts, and, if no legal reasons exist against the execution of the judgment, must make an order that the warden of the state-prison to whom the sheriff is directed to deliver the defendant shall execute the judgment at a specified time. The warden must execute the judgment accordingly."

"Sec. 1229. A judgment of death must be executed within the walls of one of the state-prisons designated by the court by which judgment is rendered. The warden of the state-prison where the execution is to take place must be present at the execution, and must invite the presence of a physician, the attorney general of the state, and at least twelve reputable citizens, to be selected by him; and he shall, at the request of the defendant, permit such ministers of the gospel, not exceeding two, as the defendant may name, and any persons, relatives, or friends, not to exceed five, to be present at the execution, together with such peace officers as he may think expedient, to witness the execution. But no other persons than those mentioned in this section can be present at the execution, nor can any person under age be allowed to witness the same."

A comparison of these sections will demonstrate all the substantial changes—if there are any such—which the legislature has attempted to make in the old law. It will readily be seen that our statute differs materially from that of the state of Colorado. The day and hour of the execution are not to be kept secret from the prisoner under the new provisions any further than under the old; and the same persons, including those whom he is allowed to designate, are to be present at the execution. Neither is there any express provision for keeping him in solitary confinement during the time which is to elapse between the date of his delivery at the prison and the time of execution; and, if the opinion of the supreme court of the United States in Medley's Case had rested solely upon their construction of the meaning of the term "solitary confinement," we should have experienced no difficulty in distinguishing that case from the case before us. But in truth the context of the Colorado statute shows that the words "solitary confinement" were not used therein in their strict sense. The language of the act is as follows: "Who shall keep such convict in solitary confinement until infliction of the death penalty; and no person shall be allowed access to said convict, except his attendants, counsel, physician, a spiritual adviser of his own selection, and members of his family, and then only in accordance with the prison regulations." It is scarcely necessary to say that a prisoner who may be visited in prison by his counsel, physician, spiritual adviser, and the members of his family, subject only to prison regulations, (all prisons, including county jails, being governed by some reasonable regulations,) is not kept in solitary confinement in the strict or usual sense of that term. And this consideration was no doubt pressed upon the attention of the court, for in their opinion, delivered by Mr. Justice MILLER, they say: "The qualifying phrase in this statute is but a small mitigation of this solitary confinement, for it expressly declares that no one shall be allowed access to the convict except certain persons, and these are not admissible unless their access to the prisoner is in accordance with prison regulations, prescribed by the board of commissioners of the penitentiary under section 2553 of the General Statutes of Colorado, in force since 1877. This section declares that 'the board of commissioners of the penitentiary shall make such rules and regulations for the government, discipline, and police of the penitentiary, and for the punishment of prisoners confined, not inconsistent with law, as they deem expedient.' What these may be at any particular time is unknown. How far they may permit access of counsel, physicians, the spiritual adviser, and the members of his family, is a question in their discretion, which they exercise by general rules, which may be altered at any time so as to exclude all these persons, and thus the prisoner be left to the worst form of solitary confinement. Even the statutory amelioration is a very limited one. By the words 'his attendants,' in the statute, is evidently meant the officers of the prison and subordinates, who must necessarily furnish him with his food and his clothing, and make inspection every day that he still exists.

They may be forbidden by prison regulations, however, from holding any conversation with him. The attendance of the counsel can only be casual, and a very few interviews,—one or two, perhaps, are all that he would have before his death; and that of the physician not at all, unless he was so sick as to require it; and the spiritual adviser of his own selection, and the members of his family, are all dependent for their opportunities of seeing the prisoner upon the regulations of the prison. The solitary confinement, then, which is meant by the statute, remains of the essential character of that mode of prison life as it originally was prescribed and carried out, to mark them as examples of the just punishment of the worst crimes of the human race." These extracts from the opinion of the court show that less importance was attached by the court to the punishment implied in the words "solitary confinement" than to the necessary or usual results of removing a prisoner from the county jail to the state-prison, viz., that he can there be visited by counsel and members of his family less frequently, and only at greater inconvenience, and subject to prison regulations. If we are correct in this construction of the opinion, it follows that this case falls within the principle decided, for in this state, as in any other state, it must inevitably happen that in most instances the counsel and family of a prisoner will have less convenient access to him in the state-prison than when confined in the county jail.

Besides this point of resemblance between the changes made in the Colorado law and that attempted in our own, there is another. By the old law, in Colorado, the convict was to be executed not less than 15 nor more than 25 days after sentence. By the amended law he was to be executed not less than 14 nor more than 28 days after sentence. In other words, his days of grace might be abridged one day, or his days of dread and apprehension might be prolonged for three days. No doubt these were among the 20 particulars in which the amendatory act was claimed to be in violation of the constitution of the United States; but the court did not express an opinion on this point, and we have no means of knowing how it would have been decided if the case had turned upon it.

By reference to section 1217 of the Penal Code above quoted, and the proposed amendment, it will be seen that the effect of the amendment, if valid, would be to change the period within which the execution must take place from not less than 30 nor more than 60 days to not less than 60 nor more than 90 days after judgment, the result of which is that under the amendment a convict might be kept alive and in dread and apprehension of a painful and ignominious death for 30 days longer than he could have been so kept under the old law. This change, also, it is strenuously argued, and apparently not without authority to sustain the contention, makes the law ex post facto. For, in the first place, it is said that, although by a vast majority of persons condemned to die on the scaffold any postponement of the date of execution would be eagerly welcomed as a boon, there may be some men to whom it would be an aggravation of their suffering. And, in the next place, it is contended that, even if this were not so, the principle that courts and legislatures may be allowed to change the punishment of crimes ex post facto in such manner as in their opinion renders the penalty lighter cannot be admitted without destroying the value of the constitutional guaranty, because there could be no certainty that the legislative or judicial discretion would always be wisely and mercifully exercised; and neither the legislator nor the judge is to be allowed to measure the feelings of the culprit by his own. In short, the cases have gone to the extent of holding that a law which changes the punishment of past offenses in any manner whatever except by remitting a separable portion of the penalty previously prescribed, i. e., by reducing the amount of the fine, the number of stripes, the term of imprisonment, etc., is necessarily void as to all such offenses. It is unnecessary, however, to cite or to criticise the cases in which this matter has been considered by courts whose decisions do not bind us as authority, when we have a decision of the supreme court of the United States which is clearly in point.

We have seen that under the amendments of 1891 a person convicted of murder in the first degree and sentenced to death must within 10 days thereafter be delivered to the warden of the state-prison, and be confined by him for from 50 to 80 days in said prison. If it is in the power of the legislature to add to the penalty of death by hanging a previous imprisonment in the penitentiary for 80 days, the term might, under the same power, be extended to years. And even with respect to a short detention in the state-prison this is what is said in the Medley Case by the supreme court of the United States, (134 U. S. 168, 169, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 386, 387:) "Instead of confinement in the ordinary county prison of the place where he and his friends reside, where they may, under the control of the sheriff, see him and visit him, where the sheriff and his attendants must see him, where his religious adviser and his legal counsel may often visit him, without any hindrance of law on the subject, the convict is transferred to a place where imprisonment always implies disgrace, and which, as this court has judicially decided in Ex parte Wilson, 114 U. S. 417, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 935; Mackin v. U. S., 117 U. S. 348, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 777; Parkinson v. U. S., 121 U. S. 231, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 896; and U. S. v. De Walt, 128 U. S. 393, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 111,—is itself an infamous punishment, and is there to be kept in 'solitary confinement,' the primary meaning of which phrase we have already explained."

Various other grounds are insisted upon by counsel as being each in itself sufficient to render the amendments of 1891 unconstitutional; as, that a convict confined in the state-prison awaiting execution would, under the general law, as construed in the Arras Case, 78 Cal. 304, 20 Pac. Rep. 683, be compelled to do hard labor during his confinement; and that he would, under the operation of sections 673, 674, of the Penal Code, become civilly dead, and be deprived of all civil rights, etc. We do not think there is anything in these points. There is nothing in the doctrine of the Arras Case to sustain the conclusion that a prisoner confined in the penitentiary while awaiting execution could be compelled to labor, and sections 673, 674, could not be held applicable to such a case. But upon the other grounds above mentioned, and in conformity to the decision in the Medley Case, to the authority of which we are compelled to yield obedience, we feel constrained to hold that neither this appellant nor any other person in his situation can be punished under the amendments of 1891, because as to him and all such persons such amendments are ex post facto and void.

This conclusion, however, does not dispose of the case, for the appellant was not sentenced to be executed in the manner prescribed by the amendments of 1891, but in the manner provided by the law in force at the date of the murder,—that is to say, by the sheriff in the county jail; and the question is whether that sentence can be enforced. Clearly it cannot be enforced if the old law authorizing the sheriff to execute capital sentences has been repealed. Such was the conclusion reached in the Medley Case, and it is sustained by a long and unbroken line of decisions in the English and American courts as to the effect of the repeal of penal statutes. The exact question to be determined, therefore, is whether the old law has been repealed, and this depends upon the further question whether the amendments of 1891 are in force for any purpose, or to any extent; for, if they are not absolutely void as to all offenses, future as well as past, they took effect on the sixtieth day after the act was approved; and the moment they took effect the old law, at least in so far as it differed from the new, ceased to exist, for the mode of amending laws prescribed by our constitution was followed in this case by re-enacting the various sections of the Penal Code as amended, and under all the decisions of this court the moment such an amendment takes effect so much of the old law as is not re-enacted is repealed. There is, therefore, we repeat, no escape from the conclusion that, if the amendments of 1891 took effect on the 30th of May, 1891, for any purpose or to any extent, the old law at the same time ceased to exist. Upon this point the contention of the appellant is that, as to all offenses subsequently committed, the act is valid and free from objection, and that as to them it must be held to be in force, with the consequence necessarily involved that the old law stands repealed. The attorney general, on the contrary, contends that since, by the terms of the amendments, they include past as well as future offenses, and since it is for many reasons apparent that the legislature intended to apply the same punishment to past as to future offenses, and since, in short, the amendatory act cannot have the effect which the legislature intended it to have, but only a partial effect, followed by a consequence so plainly at variance with the legislative will that it cannot be supposed that the law in its existing form would have been passed if such consequence had been foreseen, the attempted amendments should be declared absolutely and wholly void, and the old law in force. There can be no doubt that it was the intention of the legislature to apply the new method of execution in all cases of murder, past as well as future. The terms of the act sufficiently indicate this intention, and there is nothing outside of its terms to suggest anything different; for it cannot be supposed that a legislature which makes no change in the definition of murder or its degrees, which preserves the penalty of death by hanging for murder of the first degree, merely designating a different officer, time, and place for executing the sentence, could possibly have intended to grant a complete amnesty to all persons standing convicted of murder in the first degree and awaiting execution. Still less can it be supposed that there was an intention to set apart the period of 60 days between the passing and the taking effect of the law during which murders might be perpetrated by means of torture, poison, lying in wait, or any other cruel and deliberate means, or in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate arson, rape, robbery, or burglary, with absolute certainty that the perpetrator could not be punished in the manner, and the only manner, which the people of California and their representatives have ever deemed proper and adequate to such offenses. There is nothing fanciful about this statement. We know that it was a legal impossibility under the law as it stood between March and May, 1891, to complete the process against a murderer within 60 days if he availed himself of his legal rights, and we know by reference to the Cases of Medley and Savage, 134 U. S. 160-177, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 384, 389, that in the state of Colorado two men at least, and we know not how many others, availed themselves of the opportunity presented by the interval between the passage and taking effect of the Colorado act to commit cruel and deliberate murders, which, as the law was subsequently construed, they must be presumed to have known could not be punished with death, nor punished at all, unless a jury, by paltering with their oaths, should find them guilty of a crime of lower grade than that which they had committed.

Proceeding, then, upon the assumption that it was the intention of the legislature to make the amendments of 1891 applicable to past as well as future offenses, and that they must have known that there were or might be past as well as future offenses to which they would apply, we come next to consider whether the law must be held valid as to one class of cases, though necessarily invalid as to the other. This is not a federal question, and, so far as it may have been involved in the conclusion reached in the Medley Case, we are not controlled by that decision. It clearly appears, however, that the question was not there considered, the only question argued being the construction of the Colorado act, whether ex post facto or not. 134 U. S. 162-169, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 384-387. The supreme court of Colorado had already decided that the new act was in force, and necessarily that the old act was repealed, and upon this purely state question the supreme court of the United States merely adopted the conclusion of the state court. We are therefore free to consider it, uncontrolled by any superior authority. The general doctrine upon this subject is clearly and briefly stated at pages 213 and 214 of the sixth edition of Cooley's Constitutional Limitations as follows: "A legislative act may be entirely valid as to some classes of cases, and clearly void as to others. A general law for the punishment of offenses, which endeavors to reach, by its retroactive operation, acts before committed, as well as to prescribe a rule of conduct for the citizen in the future, would be void so far as it was retrospective; but such invalidity would not affect the operation of the law in regard to the cases which were within the legislative control. A law might be void as violating the obligation of existing contracts, but valid as to all contracts which should be entered into subsequent to its passage, and which, therefore, would have no legal force except such as the law itself would allow. In any such case the unconstitutional law must operate so far as it can, and it will not be held invalid on the objection of a party whose interests are not affected by it in a manner which the constitution forbids. If there are any exceptions to this rule, they must be of cases only where it is evident, from a contemplation of the statute and of the purpose to be accomplished by it, that it would not have been passed at all, except as an entirety, and that the general purpose of the legislature will be defeated if it should be held valid as to some cases and void as to others." It will be seen from the latter part of the above quotation that the learned author admits, or rather asserts by implication, that there may be cases in which a law which, as to part of its intended purpose, can have a constitutional operation, will nevertheless be held wholly void, when it is evident that it would not have been passed except as an entirety, and would, by being given a partial operation, defeat the general purpose of the legislature. It will also be observed that the proposition is stated in immediate connection with, and as an exception to, the doctrine as to the construction of statutes which, if allowed a retrospective operation, would impair the obligation of contracts, or would be ex post facto laws. The evident caution with which this rational exception to the general rule is announced by Judge Cooley is perhaps due to the fact that few, if any, adjudicated cases can be found in which it has been asserted or applied; but it is clear that he perceived the necessity that might arise for its application. And besides, the exception, as stated, is in substance precisely the same, and rests upon the same principle of statutory construction, as that applied in case of an act some sections or clauses of which are unconstitutional, while others are free from that objection. The rule in such cases is that if, when the unconstitutional clauses or sections are stricken out, that part of the act which remains is complete in itself, and capable of being executed in accordance with the apparent legislative intent, wholly independent of that which was rejected, it must be sustained. Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) p. 211. But if the different parts of the act are so mutually connected with and dependent upon each other, as conditions, considerations, or compensations for each other, as to warrant the belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and, if all could not be carried into effect, the legislature would not pass the residue independently, then, if some parts are unconstitutional, all the provisions which are thus dependent, conditional, and connected must fall with them. Id. pp. 211, 212. These propositions are sustained by abundant authority cited in the notes under Judge Cooley's text. And there is no reason apparent why the admitted doctrine respecting statutes invalid as to connected conditional and dependent clauses and sections should not equally apply to a statute invalid as to connected, conditional, and dependent purposes and objects. The controlling consideration in both cases must be the same, viz., that the courts will not enforce a statute which cannot operate as it was intended by the legislature to operate, when it is apparent that its partial enforcement will produce effects which the legislature would never have sanctioned. That this is a sound, wholesome, and even necessary principle of construction, we cannot doubt. And we are equally satisfied that it is, as intimated by Judge Cooley, applicable to a statute prescribing or altering the penalties for criminal offenses.

Firmly as we are impressed with the soundness of these views, we are not deterred from applying them to the case before us by the fact that we have not found any decisions of other courts to the same effect, nor by the fact that we are cited to a number of cases in which an opposite conclusion seems to have been reached. It is to be observed, however, with respect to the cases referred to, that most of them differ very materially from this case. In many of the instances in which new enactments have been held to repeal by implication former laws, under which alone past offenses could be punished, the changes in the law with respect to the definition or classification of offenses, or by way of mitigating the penalties of the offense, were so marked and radical as to furnish substantial grounds for holding that the legislature had intended to declare that the former law was not fit to be enforced. A notable instance of this sort is found in the celebrated Hartung Case, (Hartung v. People, 22 N. Y. 95, 26 N. Y. 167.) Mrs. Hartung poisoned her husband at a time when the punishment prescribed by law for murder was death by hanging, to be inflicted within a short time after sentence. Subsequently the law was so altered as to prescribe as the penalty for the same offense imprisonment in the penitentiary at hard labor for one year, after which the convict was to be hanged only in case the governor should in his discretion issue his warrant directing the execution of the death sentence. The result of the various proceedings in the case and of the two appeals was that Mrs. Hartung was discharged upon the ground that as to her offense the new law was ex post facto, and the old law repealed without any saving clause as to past offenses. But besides the various special reasons impelling the court to that conclusion, which have no application to this case, there was this additional and sufficient reason why the court could not hold the new law wholly inoperative: Not only was the old law so changed by the amendatory act as practically to substitute life imprisonment for death by hanging as the penalty for murder, but the death penalty was absolutely abolished in some cases, where before it had been provided. Under such circumstances, the court might well say that the enactment of the new statute was equivalent to a legislative declaration that the old law was not fit to exist. And this, it seems, is the principle upon which repeals by implication, in case of the revision of the penal statutes, rests. By the revision the legislature is supposed to have declared that the former law is not fit to exist. Flaherty v. Thomas, 12 Allen, 435. The principle is intelligible enough and reasonable enough when applied to a revision which changes the classification or definition of offenses, or which sensibly mitigates the penalties formerly imposed upon the same offenses. But where, as in the case before us, the definition of the offense is in no wise changed; where the punishment, instead of being mitigated, is, according to the argument, enlarged; and where the manifest and only object of the legislature was to change the place, the time, and the officer for carrying out the sentence of death,—it seems little short of absurd to hold that this amounts to a legislative declaration that the former law is not fit to exist. We think, on the contrary, that there is here no such declaration, and that we may safely hold, as we do hold, that, since the act of 1891 cannot operate as it was intended to operate, and since the partial operation it might have would defeat the evident intention of the legislature, and produce consequences which, if foreseen, would have prevented the passage of the amendments, the whole act is unconstitutional and void; that it never took effect, and the old law remains in force. This conclusion is to some extent opposed to that reached by this court in People v. Tisdale, 57 Cal. 104; but the ground of our decision herein was not discussed or at all considered in that case, and, since no vested rights are dependent upon the former decision, it cannot be regarded a binding precedent. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: McFARLAND, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.

HARRISON, J., (dissenting.) I regret that I am unable to concur in the foregoing opinion and judgment. I concur in that portion thereof which holds that the effect of the amendments of 1891 is to make such a change in the punishment prescribed for murders committed prior to their enactment as to bring them within the definition of an ex post facto law, and, therefore, that the punishment therein prescribed cannot be inflicted upon the defendant. I do not, however, concur in the conclusion deduced therefrom that we must, for this reason, conclude that the legislature did not intend that such result should follow, or that, if it had known that such would have been the result, it would not have enacted the amendments. Neither do I concur in the construction given to the amendments that the punishment for offenses committed while the former law was in force is so connected with that prescribed for future offenses that we must hold that the legislature did not intend that offenses thereafter committed should be punished in the mode prescribed by the amendments, unless prior offenses could be also punished in the same manner. The rule which generally obtains in the construction of statutes is that when a statute is re-enacted with certain additions, then for the first time made a part of the law, the provisions of the new act which are reproduced from the old and re-enacted are deemed to be mere continuations of the former law, rather than a repeal and a re-enactment thereof, and that the portions of the former statute which are omitted from the new are repealed, and are from that time to be regarded as never having been a part of the law, while the new portions are to be regarded as then for the first time presenting the rule of conduct, and are limited in their operation and effect to acts thereafter to be done. It was held in Billings v. Harvey, 6 Cal. 381, that section 24, art. 4, of the constitution of this state, providing that "no law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title, but in such case the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length," prescribed a different rule of construction, and that by virtue of this constitutional provision "the re-enactment creates anew the rule of action, and, even if there was not the slightest difference in the phraseology of the two, the latter alone can be referred to as the law, and the former stands to all intents as if absolutely and expressly repealed." This rule of construction was afterwards reaffirmed by the court in Billings v. Hall, 7 Cal. 3; Morton v. Folger, 15 Cal. 284; Clarke v. Huber, 25 Cal. 594; Bensley v. Ellis, 39 Cal. 313; People v. Tisdale, 57 Cal. 104. A similar ruling was made in Texas, (State v. Andrews, 20 Tex. 230,) and in Alabama, (Wilkinson v. Ketter, 59 Ala. 306.)

Section 325 of the Political Code provides: "Where a section or part of a section is amended it is not to be considered as having been repealed and re-enacted in the amended form, but the portions which are not altered are to be considered as having been the law from the time when they were enacted, and the new provisions are to be considered as having been enacted at the time of the amendment." If the rule of construction applied in the foregoing cases is derived from the constitution, as was held in Billings v. Harvey, it would seem that the legislature could not by statute change this rule. In Railroad Co. v. Shackelford, 63 Cal. 268, the decision appears to have been made in accordance with the rule laid down in this section of the Political Code, although it is not referred to in the opinion, nor is there any reference to the above decisions, with which it is apparently in conflict. It is, however, unnecessary for the purposes of this case to determine whether the rule laid down in Billings v. Harvey or that prescribed by the Political Code is to prevail, inasmuch as the portions of the statute which are retained in the amended sections do not call for so much consideration as does the effect of those portions then first enacted, compared with the portions of the sections omitted from the re-enactment. Under well-established rules of construction the portions of the original sections which are omitted from the amendments are deemed to have been thereby repealed, and the portions then for the first time enacted are held to constitute the rule of action in reference to the subject-matter therein expressed. All laws are prospective in their operation unless they contain express provision for making them retroactive; and laws prescribing punishment for crimes are essentially limited to future violations of the law creating the offense. Section 3 of the Penal Code declares that "no part of this Code is retroactive, unless expressly so declared."

The proposition contended for by the appellant is that by these amendments the punishment imposed for the offense has been changed to his disadvantage, as well as increased, and that, as the legislature provided no saving clause in the statute for offenses committed prior to its passage, as was done in the statute under consideration in People v. Gill, 7 Cal. 356, and as was provided in section 6 of the Penal Code at the time of the enactment of that Code, there can be no punishment inflicted upon him for his offense, either under the old statute, for the reason that the punishment thereby prescribed has been repealed, or under the new, as that prescribes a punishment different from and greater than was provided when the offense was committed, and, being ex post facto, is therefore unconstitutional and void. The effect of the repeal of a criminal law is to prevent any further action thereunder. By its removal from the statute-book the court is divested of all authority to try the accused, or, if tried, to pronounce judgment against him. It is immaterial at what stage of the proceeding the repeal takes place. If before trial, the defendant cannot be tried; if after conviction, and before judgment, he cannot be sentenced; if after judgment, and before sentence, he cannot be punished. Unless the proceedings have passed into final judgment, and beyond the necessity of any further action by the court, a repeal of the statute which makes the act an offense, or which defines the punishment for the offense, deprives the court of all further jurisdiction. Whenever the court is called upon to take any step or do any act which directly or in its consequences will have the effect to punish the defendant for any act done by him, it must find its authority therefor in a statute then existing and in force; and if, subsequent to the commission of the offense, the punishment prescribed therefor has been changed, without any saving clause for previous offenses, the court is divested of all authority to impose such punishment, and must punish the offender in conformity with the amended statute, unless restricted therefrom by constitutional provisions. "The repeal of a statute puts an end to all prosecutions under the statute repealed, and to all proceedings growing out of it, pending at the time of the repeal. There can be no legal conviction unless the act is contrary to law at the time it is committed, nor can there be a judgment unless the law is in force at the time of the indictment and of the judgment." Sedg. St. & Const. Law, p. 130. Mr. Bishop says: "No proceedings can be carried on under a law which, being repealed, is not existing to give authority to the court; consequently, if the common or statutory law which authorized a prosecution and conviction for a specific offense is repealed, or expired before final judgment, the court can go no further with the case. Even if a verdict has been rendered against the prisoner, sentence cannot be pronounced, and he must be discharged." Bish. St. Crimes, § 177. "When an act of parliament is repealed it must be considered, except as to transactions past and closed, as if it had never existed." Dwar. St. 160. The repeal of a penal statute takes away all right of action for the recovery of the penalty therefor. Norris v. Crocker, 13 How. 429; Breitung v. Lindauer, 37 Mich. 230. "The repeal obliterates the statute as if it had never been passed, and obliterates the penalties as if they had never existed." Rood v. Railroad Co., 43 Wis. 153. "The repeal of the law imposing the penalty is of itself a remission." Per TANEY, C. J., State v. Railroad Co., 3 How. 552. In Yeaton v. U. S., 5 Cranch, 281, Chief Justice MARSHALL said: "After the expiration or repeal of a law no penalty can be enforced or punishment inflicted for violations of the law committed while it was in force, unless some special provision be made for that purpose by statute."

In 1860 the legislature of New York passed an act changing the punishment for murder, and repealing the prior law for the punishment of that offense, by virtue of which it was held by the court of appeals of that state that the legislature had so interfered with the laws for the punishment of the crime of murder that a particular class of offenders, embracing the prisoner, could not be punished at all. The effect of this was that all murders which had been committed prior to the passage of that act, and for which the trial, conviction, and sentence had not taken place, escaped all punishment. Hartung v. People, 22 N. Y. 95, 26 N. Y.

167. In State v. Daley, 29 Conn. 272, the defendant was convicted in July, 1860, of manslaughter committed in May of that year. By an act passed by the legislature, which took effect after the commission of the offense, and prior to the trial and conviction of the defendant, a change was made in the punishment of manslaughter from imprisonment in the state-prison for a term not less than 2 nor more than 10 years, to imprisonment in the state-prison or county jail for a term not exceeding 10 years. The court held that, as the statute was prospective only, without any saving clause, the defendant could not be punished, for the reason that the effect of the repeal without any saving clause was to leave no sanction or punishment for that crime applicable to previous offenders. "The effect of such repeal was, for the most obvious reason, that the law as to any proceedings under it which were not past and closed must be considered as if it had never existed, and therefore furnishes no authority after its repeal for the commencement of any proceedings, or for the further prosecution of any which had been before commenced. Hence it has been often decided that, if a provision of either the statutory or common law, which authorizes a prosecution and conviction for a specific offense, is repealed before final judgment, the court can proceed no further with the case, and that sentence cannot be pronounced, even although a verdict has been rendered against the prisoner, and he must therefore be discharged." In State v. Campbell, 44 Wis. 529, the defendant was charged with the embezzlement of public funds committed in 1876. Before his trial under the charge the legislature revised the law of the state relative to embezzlement by an act which went into effect January 1, 1878. Upon a motion in arrest of judgment the court held that, inasmuch as the revising act contained no saving clause, authorizing a prosecution for offenses already committed, there is no law which would authorize or sustain a judgment on the verdict, saying: "It is true, by this construction all offenses committed by public officers under the Revised Statutes of 1853, which were not prosecuted to judgment prior to the new law taking effect, will go unpunished, but this consequence must rest upon the legislature, and not the courts. The legislature could easily have avoided such a result by enacting a proper saving clause in chapter 340. As the law now stands, we must hold that there is no statute under which it can be punished. We may deplore this, but it is beyond our power to help it without a violation of well-settled principles of law."

In U. S. v. Tynen, 11 Wall. 88, the defendant had been indicted for an offense committed against the naturalization laws, and while the matter was pending on appeal to the supreme court congress passed an act embracing the whole subject of frauds against the naturalization laws. The supreme court, in disposing of the question, held that, although there was no express repeal of the law under which the defendant was indicted, yet, as the provisions of the subsequent act were repugnant to those of the former, it operated as a repeal, saying: "There can be no legal conviction, nor any valid judgment pronounced upon conviction, unless the law creating the offense be at the time in existence. By the repeal the legislative will is expressed that no further proceedings be had under the act repealed." In Flaherty v. Thomas, 12 Allen, 428, the statute imposing the penalty for an offense was changed after the commission of the act to such an extent that it was held by the court to be a repeal of the former statute, and that the defendant could not be punished, saying: "All criminal statutes are limited in effect, and usually in terms, to future offenses. The establishment of a new rule of punishment is of itself a legislative declaration that the previous rule is not fit to exist, and therefore shall not be applied to any case unless the legislature, in order to prevent offenses already committed from going unpunished, provides that such offenses shall continue to be punished according to the previous laws. It is clearly settled by authority that, in the absence of any such provision, the old law cannot be resorted to after the new law has taken effect for the punishment of an offense committed before the passage of the latter, even if the defendant has been already convicted by the verdict of a jury." In People v. Tisdale, 57 Cal. 104, it was held that an amendment in 1880 to section 607 of the Penal Code, by which the punishment for an offense was changed from a "fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or imprisonment in the state-prison not exceeding two years," to a fine "not less than one hundred dollars nor more than one thousand dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding two years, or by both," operated as a repeal of the former statute, and that, as the defendant was not charged with a violation of the statute as it stood after the amendment, he could not be punished under an information filed for a violation of the law before it was repealed. See, also, Com. v. Kimball, 21 Pick. 373; Com. v. McDonough, 13 Allen, 581; Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 443; Garvey v. People, 6 Colo. 559; In re Petty, 22 Kan. 477; Lindzey v. State, 65 Miss. 544, 5 South. Rep. 99; Shepherd v. People, 25 N. Y. 406; Ratzky v. People, 29 N. Y. 124.

By omitting from the sections as amended the provisions authorizing the judgment to be executed by the sheriff, and within the county where the conviction was had, the legislature deprived the court of all power to authorize such execution by the sheriff, or within the county jail, and also took from the sheriff all capacity to execute the judgment. The amendments had the effect to obliterate from the statute all the provisions that were not re-enacted, as completely as if they had never formed a part thereof. The omitted portions became as if they had never existed, and the new portions are to be construed as if none had preceded them.

It is urged by the attorney general that, in case it shall be held that the sections as amended provide for a greater punishment than the original sections, such provision would be unconstitutional and void, and that, therefore, the amended sections are themselves unconstitutional and inoperative to effect a repeal of the former sections; and it is held in the prevailing opinion that, because it is unconstitutional to apply the punishment prescribed by the amendments to one convicted of an offense committed prior thereto, the amendments are thereby affected with such an unconstitutional element that it defeats their operation in reference to offenses subsequently committed. It is undoubtedly a correct proposition that the provisions of a statute will not be affected by a subsequent unconstitutional act of the legislature, and that a clause in such act, repealing all other acts which are inconsistent therewith, will not affect the prior statute. The unconstitutional act is to be regarded as wholly void and inoperative, even for the purpose of displacing or overruling that for which it is sought to be made a substitute. Ex parte Davis, 21 Fed. Rep. 396; Tims v. State, 26 Ala. 165; State v. Crozier, 12 Nev. 300; State v. Hallock, 14 Nev. 202; In re Petty, 22 Kan. 489; Campau v. Detroit, 14 Mich. 276. It is also a fundamental rule of construction that a statute is not to be declared unconstitutional unless it be clearly so, and also that, "if the statute is susceptible of two constructions, one of which is consistent and the other inconsistent with the restrictions of the constitution, it is the plain duty of the court to give it that construction which will make it harmonize with the constitution, and comport with the legitimate powers of the legislature." People v. Frisbie, 26 Cal. 139. The legislature is not presumed to have intended to pass an unconstitutional act, and, unless the act clearly falls within some express prohibition of the constitution, or is beyond the power of the legislature, it is the duty of the courts to uphold, rather than to set it aside. All laws are presumed to have been passed with deliberation, and with a knowledge on the part of the legislature of the existing laws, and any statute, purporting either expressly or impliedly to repeal an existing law, is deemed to have been passed with the intent on the part of the legislature to make such change.

There is nothing in the terms of the sections as amended in 1891 which is repugnant to any provision of the constitution, or beyond the powers of the legislature to adopt. It will not be disputed that it was entirely competent for the legislature, when originally defining crimes and their punishment, to provide that judgment of death should in all cases be carried into effect by the warden of a state-prison and within its walls. Its power in this respect was not exhausted by its first exercise. It has the same power to-day to prescribe a different punishment for any crime that it originally had to fix the punishment therefor. It was within the power of the legislature to abolish capital punishment. It could even grant an amnesty for all murderers by simply repealing the section providing for their punishment; and, however much we may conjecture that the legislature would not purposely free a criminal from punishment, or however much we may think that it did not in the present case intend to grant an amnesty for any offense, we can only determine its intent by what it has said. "The result may or may not be conformable to the actual intent of those who passed the latter statute. We can only ascertain the legal intent of the legislature by the language which they have used, applied, and expounded conformably to the settled and well-known rules of construction." Com. v. Kimball, 21 Pick. 376. "If the legislature by the act of 1860 carelessly or unintentionally repealed the law punishing the prisoner's crime, that is no reason why reasonable and well-settled principles of construction should be disregarded for the purpose of punishing it under that act." Shepherd v. People, 25 N. Y. 411. "It is not a sufficient answer to the difficulty to say that the members of the legislature did not probably intend to grant impunity to offenders in the situation of the prisoner. They did intend to abrogate as to her and as to all persons in the same situation the former punishment, and that design they effectually carried out. They intended also that such offenders should be punished in another way, but this they could not effect on account of the constitutional inhibition." Hartung v. People, 26 N. Y. 170. "The legislature might have inserted in the repealing act a saving clause, which would have prevented the defendant's escape, if they had seen fit to do so. If they omitted it through mistake, the court cannot correct the mistake. Nor have we a right to decide that the omission was by mistake." Com. v. McDonough, 13 Allen, 535. The legislature has done no act, nor has it given utterance to any expression, which authorizes the inference that it did not intend the amendments to be operative unless they applied to all offenders; and I know of no other mode of ascertaining the intention of the legislature in reference to what it has enacted than the language of its act. The rules for the construction of statutes are simple, and do not vary with the subjects to which the statutes are directed. While the statement of the attorney general respecting the number of persons charged with murder who will be affected by the statute would have been properly presented to the legislature when that body had the act under consideration, it can have no weight with this court in construing the effect of the statute. If we should assume that the legislature knew that those persons would be affected by its action, and passed the amendments with such knowledge, or that it enacted them in the belief that they would not affect such previous offenders, we must still concede that such legislation was within the powers of the legislature, and that we are not at liberty to set it aside because its effect is different from what we may infer that that body anticipated. If, on the other hand, we assume that the legislature enacted the amendments in the opinion or belief that there were no previous offenders to whom they could be made applicable, it merely results that the amendments were enacted without sufficient consideration or examination; and such has never been held a sufficient ground for disregarding the plain language of a statute. Whether we are to assume that the legislature acted advisedly or without consideration, I know of no rule of construction by which we are at liberty to investigate the extent of its knowledge, or the want of consideration it gave to its action, and therefore, in applying the well-settled rules of construction to the amendments under consideration, we are simply to determine whether the amendments themselves are by their terms inconsistent with the constitution. If an attempt is made to apply the law as found in these amendments to cases which are not within their terms, it results that in the instance in which such attempt is made there is but the not unusual case of an offense against society, for the punishment of which the law has not made adequate provision. It cannot be questioned that it was the intention of the legislature by the amendments under consideration to provide that all judgments of death should thereafter be executed within the walls of a state-prison. It has specifically declared this intent in express language, and, if there had been no murder committed in this state prior to the passage of the act of 1891, the intent of the legislature as to the place of punishment would have been undoubted. By thus amending these sections of the Penal Code, it has as effectually shown its intent to repeal the former provisions for the place in which the punishment of death should be executed, as if it had shown its intention by abrogating those provisions in express language.

It is conceded in the argument on behalf of the people that, if the amendatory statute had contained a saving clause for the punishment of crimes committed prior to its passage, there would have been no constitutional objection to its validity. The omission of such saving clause cannot, however, make invalid a law which would otherwise be valid. The constitutionality of its provisions is to be determined by their own harmony with the constitution, and not by the effect which additional provisions would have had upon the subject-matter to which the act is applied. The statute, as amended, is not in its terms unconstitutional. Its unconstitutionality does not spring from any provision which is contained therein, but arises only when it is sought to apply its provisions to cases which are not within its terms. This is not, however, a defect which is inherent in the statute, but is a want of power to apply the statute to cases for which it makes no provision, and results from the application of other principles of the constitution which are intended for the protection of individual rights, and which are equally sacred and potent as those which are made for maintaining government or for the punishment of crime. A law which it is within the power of the legislature to pass is constitutional, although it may be unconstitutional to apply it to acts or prosecutions had prior to its passage.

In the same clause of the constitution which prohibits the passage of ex post facto laws is the prohibition of laws impairing the obligation of contracts. The statute-books of the several states, as well as of this state, contain many laws of a general nature which violate this latter provision, and which have been held constitutional in their application to future transactions, although inoperative as to prior ones. Under the rule for amendment provided by the constitution, any section of the Codes is to be amended by its re-enactment as amended. In civil matters no saving clause is required. The former law is held to have entered into the contract to such an extent as to be beyond the power of the legislature to deprive the parties to the contract of the rights thereby acquired; but in matters of criminal legislation, unless the saving clause is contained in the amended section, the state, as represented by the legislature, is deemed to have remitted the penalty incurred in the commission of the offense. The amended section is not unconstitutional, but it is unconstitutional to apply it to transactions had prior to its passage. "A legislative act may be entirely valid as to some classes of cases, and clearly void as to others. A general law for the punishment of offenses, which should endeavor to reach, by its retroactive operation, acts before committed, as well as to prescribe a rule of conduct for the citizen in future, would be void, as far as it was retrospective, but such invalidity would not affect the operation of the law in regard to the cases which were within the legislative control." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 213; Jaehne v. New York, 128 U. S. 189, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 70; State v. Amery, 12 R. I. 64; U. S. v. Hall, 2 Wash. C. C. 373.

The principle contained in the prevailing opinion in this case leads necessarily to this result: either that any amendment to that portion of the Penal Code defining crimes and punishments which the legislature may enact without a saving clause for prior offenders is ipso facto unconstitutional, and without its power to enact, or that its validity is to depend upon the conjecture of the individuals who may be the members of this court respecting the intention of the individuals who may have been members of the legislature at the time the amendment was enacted. If the doctrine be correct that because a law which is prospective in its operation, and which in terms is consistent with the constitution, is unconstitutional as to future offenses because it cannot be applied to past offenses, it must follow that the court has imposed a restriction upon the legislature which is not found in the constitution. If, on the other hand, such law is to be declared unconstitutional whenever the members of this court shall be of the opinion that the legislature did not intend what it has expressly and unqualifiedly declared, the certainty of law is substituted by the conjecture or will of the court. Misera est servitus ubi jus est vagum aut incertum. In none of the instances wherein similar legislation has been construed by the courts of other states has it been even suggested that such legislation was unconstitutional for the reason that its effect could not have been anticipated by the legislature; and, although the decisions of those courts have no binding authority upon us, yet, in a matter which involves only the determination of the proper rules of construction in criminal law, the unanimity of decision in other states is an authority of the most persuasive character. And the rule of construction is the same whether the statute to be construed has reference to the punishment of the highest crime defined in the law or to the slightest misdemeanor. These rules are as uniform for all laws as is the constitutional prohibition against an ex post facto law.

The rule that a statute which is in part unconstitutional will be declared wholly so is applicable only when it can be seen from the act itself that the unconstitutional part is the "condition or consideration" upon which the other part was enacted, or that the two parts are so interdependent that one cannot exist without the other. If the different parts are separable, or if the subjects to which the act may have a constitutional application are separable from the others, it will not be declared unconstitutional. This rule was laid down with his usual clearness by Chief Justice SHAW in Warren v. Mayor, 2 Gray, 99, where he limits such result to a case where the parts of the statute "are so mutually connected with and dependent on each other as conditions and considerations or compensations for each other as to warrant a belief that the legislature intended them as a whole, and that, if all could not be carried into effect, the legislature would not pass the residue independently." In the case of Fisher v. McGirr, 1 Gray, 21, that able jurist had said "that, where a statute has been passed by the legislature under all the forms and sanctions requisite to the making of laws, some part of which is not within the competency of legislative power, or is repugnant to any provision of the constitution, such part thereof will be adjudged void and of no avail, whilst all other parts of the act not obnoxious to the same objection will be held valid, and have the force of law." There is nothing in the statute under consideration indicating that the punishment of previous offenders according to its terms was a condition or consideration for providing that subsequent offenders should be so punished, nor is the punishment of these classes in any respect so interdependent that the one cannot exist without the other. The statute presents the not infrequent case of a law applicable to certain acts, but inapplicable to others by reason of the paramount law. The intention of the legislature, as expressed in its language, is that it shall be applicable to all cases, but this intention cannot be carried out as to certain cases by reason of a constitutional inhibition.

In Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, a statute of the state of Texas provided for a tax upon every telegraphic message sent by any company doing business within the state. The court held that the act was unconstitutional, in so far as it was applicable to messages sent out of the state, but valid as to those sent within the state, applying the same principles which had previously been held by it in the case of State Freight Tax, 15 Wall. 232. See, also, Steam-Ship Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 339, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1118. In a similar case (Fargo v. Michigan, 121 U. S. 241, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 857) the court said: "The taxing law of the state was, therefore, valid as to the latter class of transportation, but with regard to the others it was invalid, because it was interstate commerce, and the state could lay no tax upon it."

In 1880 various acts were passed amending the sections of the Penal Code for the purpose of adapting them to the new constitution, many of which affected the punishment previously prescribed for offenses, but none of these acts contained any saving clause for prior offenses. In 1874 section 190 of the Penal Code was amended by giving to the jury the discretion to award punishment in the state-prison for life instead of death, as the penalty for murder in the first degree. Amend. Code, 1873-74, p. 457. In 1889 section 261 of the Penal Code, defining rape, was amended by making the age of consent 14 years, instead of 10. St. 1889, p. 223. In neither of these statutes was there any saving clause for prior offenses. Very many other sections of the Penal Code have been amended by the legislature without making provision for the effect of such amendments upon previous offenders. If I correctly apprehend the principles maintained in the prevailing opinion herein, any of these amendments to the Penal Code is unconstitutional if it can be shown that at the time of its enactment there were cases pending in court in which individuals charged with crime might have gone unpunished by reason of the statute in force when the crime was committed having been repealed by the amendment. The invalidity of the statute cannot depend upon the fact that the person then charged with the crime did not avail himself of such defense. The statute is to be tested by the conditions existing when it was passed; and, if it would at that time have been declared unconstitutional for that reason, it is equally so to-day, and its unconstitutionality can be invoked by any one against whom it is sought to be enforced. If the amendments of 1891 are unconstitutional for the reasons given in the prevailing opinion, they could not be enforced against one who committed murder after their enactment, even though those whose crimes were committed prior thereto did not assert such unconstitutionality. If at the time of the amendment of section 190 in 1874, there were persons charged with murder prior to that date, that act, as it now stands upon the statute-book, must be construed unconstitutional, for the reason that it provided such a possible change for the punishment of an offender as to be within the inhibition of an ex post facto law. I do not think that such a conclusion can be maintained, and for that reason I cannot concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of the court in the present case.

In reaching the conclusion that the amendments to the Penal Code in 1891 have so changed the punishment for the offense of which the defendant was convicted that it cannot be imposed upon him, and that there is no existing law for the punishment of his offense, I have not failed to consider that the crime committed by him must go unpunished, but, however much this result may be regretted, it is not for this court to prevent it. The criminal, as well as the upright, is entitled to be protected in the rights guaranteed to him by the constitution. That instrument has been framed as the basis and limit of all legislation, and the lowest, as well as the highest, is entitled to its protection. It is one of the functions of this tribunal to prevent hasty or ill-considered legislation from infringing upon the limitations therein prescribed; and, however great might be our desire, we cannot avoid the responsibility of declaring such legislation inoperative, even though the effect of our decision be that crimes will go unwhipped of justice, or criminals be restored to society. "It is better that any criminal shall go unpunished than that any provision of the constitution shall be disregarded, or that the foundations of the criminal law shall be unsettled." Lindzey v. State, supra. "Though it is desirable that all offenders against our penal laws should be punished, yet it is better that one should occasionally escape than that the fundamental principles of the criminal law should be violated." Com. v. McDonough, supra. In my opinion, the judgment of the court below should be affirmed; but inasmuch as, since it was pronounced, the legislature has so changed the law as to deprive the court of the power to enforce its judgment, that court should be directed, upon the filing of the remittitur therein, to enter an order discharging the defendant from custody.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. FERRIS et al.
(No. 14,082.)

DEDICATION OF HIGHWAY—NON-USER—RIGHTS OF GRANTEE—INJUNCTION.

1. Where one dedicated a strip of land in front of his premises to the public as a highway, and expressly excepted it as such in his deed of the land, the grantee cannot assume the ownership of the strip, though it was never actually used as a public highway.

2. Where a railroad company has built its road, in accordance with Civil Code, § 465, subd. 5, on such highway, it is entitled to an injunction to restrain the destruction of its track over such strip of land by such grantee.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. TOWNER, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against Henrietta Ferris and another to restrain defendants from removing plaintiff's track from a certain strip of land. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John D. Bicknell, for appellant. E. E. Keech, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought by the appellant, a railroad corporation, for the purpose of restraining the defendants here from continuing to tear up and remove its track from what was claimed by the plaintiff to be a public highway, and for such other and further relief as the facts of the case might warrant. The court below decided the case against the plaintiff, dissolved a preliminary injunction that had been granted, and gave judgment for the defendants for costs. From that and an order refusing a new trial the plaintiff has taken this appeal. From the evidence in the record it is clear that findings 1 and 3 are without legal support. It appears that Henrietta Ferris, one of the respondents here, bought, some years prior to this controversy, a piece of land from Mr. Irvine; that in the deed to that land there was specially excepted therefrom a strip of land in front thereof 60 feet wide, which had been offered for dedication as a public highway, and no title to that land ever vested in the said Ferris; that this strip of land so excepted was laid down upon a map properly filed for record in the proper office, as being reserved for a public road, and it does not appear that the person so offering it for dedication has ever in any way sought to revoke it. The idea of the lower court seems to have been that the public had never made use of the side of the road so offered for dedication next to the defendant's land, and therefore she had an appurtenant right of way over it. In this view of the matter we cannot concur. It seems that the persons who bought land from Mr. Irvine, including the defendant Mrs. Ferris, had conformed their fences and hedges to the line of the proposed highway as set out in the map recorded by Irvine describing the public roads he offered for dedication, among which was this one; that, according to the plan agreed upon for the location of this highway, it had a zanja or water ditch running through the middle of it lengthwise, and a double row of eucalyptus trees, one each side of the zanja; that the road as it now stands is so located, and has the zanja and rows of trees as intended. But because the travel along the public road has been, by the choice of the traveling public, almost exclusively, if not entirely, on the other side of the road, and on the 60-foot wide strip of it on the opposite side of the zanja from the defendants' land, the court seems to have concluded that the public never used the 60 feet of the located road as recognized by proprietors of adjoining lands in building their fences and hedges, and therefore as to it there was never any user. This we take to be a mistake. As well might it be said that, if the public travel had been down the center of a road offered for dedication as a public highway, there was never any user of that part which lay on each side of the track used, and between it and the fences of the adjoining proprietors; or where the travel might be diagonally across the located road, from one side to the other, and from one end to the other of it continuously, that the portion of the ground fenced out by adjoining proprietors over which there had been no travel had never been used. A similar view of an abandonment of a public road was urged in Watkins v. Lynch, 71 Cal. 26, 11 Pac. Rep. 808; but it will be seen from the language which we now quote no such want of user was considered any evidence of an abandonment of the public road: "Any ordinary observer traveling upon the public roads of the more thickly populated portions of this state will often perceive the land on one or both sides of a road-bed, that is fenced out, sowed in grain and pastured by the proprietors of adjoining land; and, while all the travel for many years has been confined to the center of the road-bed, yet we do not see that such acts would of themselves be held to show either an abandonment of the use of the road by the public, or its adverse possession by the person who has thus sowed, reaped, and pastured his stock thereon." So here there is no conflict in the evidence, properly considered, as to the offer of dedication and acceptance and user of this land as a public road. If this is a public road, then, according to the other findings and evidence, the railroad corporation had constructed its road as it had a right to do under section 465, subd. 5, Civil Code, and the defendants had no right to tear up its track. We think the judgment and order should be reversed, and so advise.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

SWAIN v. FOURTEENTH ST. R. CO. (No. 13,-792.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 3, 1892.)

STREET RAILWAYS—COLLISION—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY—DAMAGES.

1. In an action for personal injury sustained in a collision between plaintiff's wagon and defendant's street-car, it appeared that plaintiff was a police officer in charge of a patrol wagon carrying an injured man on a stretcher, and, while on defendant's track, his wagon was struck by the car coming from the opposite direction. Plaintiff's driver gave evidence, which was corroborated, that he saw the car, and tried to pull off of the track, doing so slowly, on account of the injured man; that, when about 60 feet from the car, he hallooed as loud as he could to stop the car; that an officer also hallooed several times to stop the car; that the car-driver was looking behind his car, and did not attempt to slacken the speed before the collision. Held, that defendant's motion for a nonsuit was properly denied, as driving a wagon on a street-car track is not negligence per se, and the evidence was sufficient to show the car-driver negligent in not looking ahead to observe whether the track was clear.

2. If by reason of inattention, carelessness, or incompetency the car-driver failed to avoid the collision, defendant was liable, if there was no contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff or his driver.

3. In such case the statement in an instruction that "street-cars are easily and readily stopped" could not have prejudiced defendant, since the fact is one of common knowledge, which the jury might consider without evidence of its existence.

4. In actions for personal injury, fixing the amount of damage is within the discretion of the jury, and a verdict approved by the trial court will not be disturbed on appeal on the ground of being excessive, except in a plain abuse of discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; ELLSWORTH, Judge.

Action for personal injury by one Swain against the Fourteenth Street Railroad Company. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fox, Kellogg & King, for appellant. James A. Johnson and A. A. Moore, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Action for damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff through the negligence of defendant in running its street-car against a wagon in which the plaintiff was riding, and thereby violently throwing him to the ground. The plaintiff recovered judgment for the sum of $7,500 damages, besides costs; and from this judgment, and an order denying its motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

1. The evidence upon the part of the plaintiff tended to show that between 7 and 8 o'clock in the evening of September 12th the plaintiff, who was a police officer of Oakland, went in charge of the police patrol wagon to a railroad station in that city for the purpose of conveying to the hospital a young man whose leg had been broken. The injured man was placed on a stretcher in the wagon, and the wagon was driven along the track of the defendant's street railroad, not far behind a street-car, and at about the same rate of speed. The car which the wagon was following turned off on a switch where the street-cars pass each other, and very soon thereafter a car coming from the opposite direction on the main track came in collision with the wagon, by reason of which plaintiff sustained the injuries complained of. As to what took place immediately after he saw the approaching car, and before the collision, the driver of the patrol wagon testified: "I started to pull my wagon out of the track. I had to do it slow, on account of the man, and I saw this fellow was coming up before I could get out; and I hollered and said, 'You stop your car until I can get out.' He paid no attention, and came on. It seemed as though he came faster. Then Officer Babb hollered. He took no notice of it at all. He was looking behind his car. When I first hollered to him, he was about sixty feet away. I hollered as loud as I could. Officer Babb sung out very loud,—as loud, I guess, as he could holler. I said: 'Stop that car. Stop that car.' When Babb hollered, he said: 'Stop the car. Stop the car.' The driver of the car was looking behind the car; turned away looking around the corner of the car, looking at the other car going on, I suppose. The other car had passed at that time." This testimony was corroborated by other witnesses, all tending to show that the driver of the wagon was endeavoring to avoid the collision in the manner stated by him, and that the driver of the car made no attempt to slacken its speed. The court did not, in view of this evidence, err in denying the motion of defendant for a nonsuit. It was not negligence per se for the driver of the patrol wagon to drive along and upon the track of the defendant's road. He had a right to do this, so long as he used ordinary care to avoid any collision with defendant's cars. Shea v. Railroad Co., 44 Cal. 414; Fleckenstein v. Railroad Co., 105 N. Y. 655, 11 N. E. Rep. 951; 1 Thomp. Neg. p. 396. And it was clearly a question for the jury whether the driver of the patrol wagon did use ordinary care in endeavoring to avoid the collision, or whether he ought not to have turned out of the track more quickly when he saw defendant's car approaching. This evidence was also sufficient to show that the driver of the car was negligent in omitting, without any apparent excuse, to look ahead, and observe whether the track was clear. It is the duty of such a driver, equally with the driver of any other vehicle, to observe what is in the road before him, so as to avoid inflicting injury upon others, if practicable.

2. The instructions of the court, taken as a whole, fully and fairly stated the law applicable to the case, and as to the respective rights of the parties to the use of that portion of the street in which defendant's track is laid, and as to the degree of care which each was required to exercise in order to avoid coming in collision with the other. In the introductory part of its instructions the court said: "You are the sole judges of the evidence given by all the witnesses here; and if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff has sustained damage, under the circumstances he represented to you by the evidence, and under the law as now being given to you by the court, your verdict must be for plaintiff." The appellant contends that this statement took away from the jury the right to pass upon the questions of negligence and contributory negligence, and made the right of plaintiff to a verdict depend alone upon the fact that he had been injured. This language of the court was not as carefully expressed as it should have been; but we do not think, in view of the full and complete instructions which followed, that it could have been understood by the jury otherwise than as declaring that they should give a verdict for the plaintiff if, upon the evidence and under the law then about to be given, they were convinced that he was entitled to it.

3. There was no error in the instruction numbered 6. In substance, it told the jury that if, by reason of inattention, carelessness, or incompetency, the car-driver failed to avoid the collision, the defendant was liable, if there was no con-tributary negligence on the part of the plaintiff or the driver of the wagon; and the statement in the preceding part of the instruction, that street-cars are easily and readily stopped, could not have prejudiced the appellant. The fact itself is one of common knowledge, and which the jury might properly consider without any other evidence of its existence. The instruction, as given, left the jury entirely free to draw from the fact alluded to such inferences as they thought proper, and contained no expression or intimation of the opinion of the court as to the weight which should be accorded to it in their deliberations.

4. The amount of the verdict in this case is large, but we cannot say that it is suggestive of either passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. In fixing damages in this class of cases, much is left to the discretion of the jury; and, when the verdict has been approved by the trial court, this court is not authorized to grant a new trial upon the ground of excessive damages, except in a case where it is plain that the verdict was not the result of the fair and honest judgment of the jury.

We find no error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. PARSONS v. EDWARDS.
(No. 14,046.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 2, 1892.)

OFFICE AND OFFICER—APPOINTMENT AND TENURE —HOLDING OVER.

1. Act March 28, 1878, provided for a board of five fire commissioners, three to be appointed by the board of supervisors, and two by the judges of certain courts therein named. The act further provided that the commissioners should hold office for four years, "and until their successors are appointed and qualified." In December, 1879, defendant was appointed a fire commissioner by one of the judges named in the act. The constitution which went into effect January 1, 1880, abolished the courts named in the act, but did not vest their power of appointing fire commissioners in any other person or tribunal. June 20, 1889, the governor, believing that defendant's term of office had expired, appointed the relator, who, having duly qualified, demanded of defendant his seat in the board, which was refused. Held, that there was no vacancy which called for an appointment by the governor, as such vacancy could be caused only by some event by which the duties of the office were no longer discharged at all. People v. Hammond, 6 Pac. Rep. 741, 66 Cal. 654, followed.

2. Const. art. 20, § 16, providing that the term of an officer or commissioner not therein provided for may be declared by law, but shall in no case exceed four years, merely limits an incumbent's term by election or appointment, but does not forbid a holding over until a successor has been chosen and qualified.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. McM. SHAFTER, Judge.

Proceeding by the people on the relation of Thomas J. Parsons against one Edwards. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Spencer & McEnerney, for appellant. George A. Johnson, (J. C. Bates, of counsel,) for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Quo warranto ex relatione T. J. Parsons to show by what warrant defendant exercises the office of fire commissioner. The facts—about which there is no dispute—are as follows: Prior to 1878 the board of fire commissioners of the city and county of San Francisco consisted of five persons, chosen by the qualified voters of said city and county at general elections. On March 28, 1878, an act was passed by the legislature, and approved by the governor, which provided for a board of fire commissioners consisting of five members, three of whom should be appointed by the board of supervisors, one by the judge of the municipal criminal court, and one by the judge of the county court. The terms of three of the five members of the board elected under the act of 1874 expired on the first Monday of December, 1879, and the terms of the other two members expired on the first Monday of December, 1881. The last-named act provided that the judge of the municipal court and the judge of the county court should each appoint one commissioner in place of one of the three commissioners elected under the act of 1874. On the first Monday in December, 1879, the defendant was appointed a member of the board by the judge of the county court, and on the same day Edward Flaherty was appointed a member of the board by the judge of the municipal court. On December 15, 1879, the board of supervisors appointed Edward B. Cotter, and on December 5, 1881, the board of supervisors appointed John Mason and F. C. Siebe members of the board of fire commissioners in place of the two remaining members of said board, who had been elected under the act of 1874, and whose terms expired on the first Monday in December, 1881. The act provides that the commissioners shall hold office "for the term of four years from and after the date of their appointment, and until their successors are appointed and qualified." The constitution which went into effect January 1, 1880, abolished the municipal criminal court and county court. On June 20, 1889, the governor, believing that the defendant's term of office had expired, and that there was a vacancy in said board, appointed the relator, Thomas J. Parsons, in the place and stead of said Edwards. After duly qualifying, the relator demanded of the defendant his seat in the board, but the defendant refused to surrender the same, or to recognize the validity of the relator's appointment. We are unable to tell from the respondent's brief whether he claims that the act of 1878 is still in force or not, but his action is based upon the assumption that it is still in force; if it is not, certainly he has no claim to the office,—the office fell with the act. Questions involving the same principles as those under discussion were determined in People v. Hammond, 66 Cal. 654, 6 Pac. Rep. 741. Under the act of April 1, 1878, the respondent in that case and two others were appointed by certain district court judges, named in the act, police commissioners for the city and county of San Francisco. By the constitution of 1879 the judges of the courts named were superseded, but the powers given to them by the act referred to were not vested in any other person or tribunal. It was claimed by the relator in that case, as it is by the relator here, that under section 8, art. 5, and section 16, art. 20, of the constitution, the office became vacant at the expiration of four years from the date of the defendant's appointment, and that the governor had the power to fill such vacancy. These contentions did not receive the sanction of the court; it was held that there was no vacancy which the governor was authorized to fill. Unless that case is to be overthrown, it is an authoritative adjudication against the claim of the relator herein, and entitles the defendant to hold the office until his successor has been appointed or elected and has qualified, or until the office has been abolished by the power which created it. It would be sufficient to rest the decision herein upon a reference to that and other cases involving similar questions, (see People v. Pond, 89 Cal. 141, 26 Pac. Rep. 648;) but we may add that the case at bar contains some elements which make the defendant's position stronger in this case than it was in the case referred to. The police commissioners referred to in People v. Hammond were all appointed by the judges superseded by the new constitution. In the case at bar a majority of the members of the board of fire commissioners are still appointed by the board of supervisors, and will continue to exercise the functions of the office unless the act be declared wholly void. The police commissioners had no fixed term of office; the term of the fire commissioners is fixed at four years. Where the term of office is fixed, determinate, a provision requiring the officer to continue "to discharge the duties of his office, although his term has expired, until his successor has qualified," (Pol. Code, § 879,) "adds an additional, contingent, and defeasible term to the original fixed term, and excludes the possibility of a vacancy, and consequently the power of appointment, except in case of death, resignation, ineligibility, or the like. * * * It is certain, therefore, that all offices to which the above constitutional provision applies are held by the same title, or by as high and lawful tenure, after the prescribed term, until the title of a duly elected and qualified successor at least, as before and during such term." State v. Harrison, 113 Ind. 434, 16 N. E. Rep. 384. Section 8, art. 5, of the constitution, provides that "when any office shall from any cause become vacant, and no mode is provided by the constitution and law for filling such vacancy, the governor shall have power to fill such vacancy," etc. The office must have become vacant before the executive function of appointment can be called into existence. The word "vacancy," as applied to an office, has no technical meaning. Section 8, art. 5, was copied from the old constitution, and the meaning of the term "vacancy" has been several times expounded by this court. People v. Tilton, 37 Cal. 614. In People v. Bissell, 49 Cal. 411, the court said: "So long as Bissell, therefore, continues to discharge the duties of the office pursuant to the requirements of section 879 of the Political Code, even though his term of office has expired, there is no vacancy in the office in the absolute sense, nor in any sense which would authorize the governor to fill it without the consent of the senate first had. Such a vacancy could only be caused by the resignation or death of the incumbent, or some other event by which the duties of the office were no longer discharged at all, in which case, and in order to prevent a failure of the public service, the governor might appoint during the recess of the senate." See, also, People v. Whitman, 10 Cal. 38; People v. Stratton, 28 Cal. 388; People v. Tyrrell, 87 Cal. 479, 25 Pac. Rep. 684; State v. Johns, 3 Or. 537; Rightmire v. Camden, 50 N. J. Law, 48, 13 Atl. Rep. 30; Stilsing v. Davis, 45 N. J. Law, 390. It has been held that an officer will hold over until his successor is qualified, although the constitution says he is ineligible for a second term. His holding over is simply a prolongation of the old term. Carr v. Wilson, 9 S. E. Rep. 31. It is in no sense a new term. During the time he holds over, his salary cannot be increased, and he and his sureties are liable on his official bond for all his acts until his successor is elected or appointed and qualified. State v. Smith, 87 Mo. 160. Of course, the language of the statute or constitution may show an intention to fix and limit precisely the tenure of an officer, so that at a particular time his authority will cease, although an absolute vacancy and absence of authority result therefrom, as in the case of Gosman v. State, 106 Ind. 203, 6 N. E. Rep. 349, where it is held that a constitutional provision that "no person shall be eligible to the office of clerk more than eight years in any period of twelve years" imposed an absolute disability upon Gosman to continue in the office of clerk for a longer period than eight consecutive years. Unless such intention appears, however, the officer is entitled to exercise the functions of his office until another person is qualified to assume them. Bunker v. Gouldsboro, 81 Me. 194, 16 Atl. Rep. 543.

It is claimed that section 16 of article 20 of the constitution makes it unlawful to occupy an office, created by the legislature, for a longer period than four years. That section provides that, "when the term of any officer or commissioner is not provided for in this constitution, the term of such officer or commissioner may be declared by law; * * * but in no case shall such term exceed four years." This question, also, was passed upon in People v. Hammond, and requires no further notice. See, also, State v. Harrison, supra, where the purpose and effect of a similar provision is discussed. This section is a re-enactment of section 7, art. 11, of the old constitution, which was held not to forbid a holding over until a successor has been chosen and has qualified, but merely to limit the incumbent's term by election or appointment. People v. Stratton, and People v. Tilton, supra. As the section is substantially the same as it was in the former constitution, it must be construed in the same way. Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 189, 7 Pac. Rep. 456, 635, and 8 Pac. Rep. 709. The judgment is reversed, with directions to the court below to enter judgment on the findings in favor of appellant.

WHALEN et ux. v. ARCATA & M. R. R. Co.
(No. 13,774.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 16, 1892.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES—DEFECTIVE CROSSING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. A railroad crossed a highway at an oblique angle, on a level, and the crossing was filled in with planks, the rails projecting about an inch and a half above the planking. Plaintiffs, traveling along the highway in a cart, at five or six miles an hour, drove across without slackening their speed, and were upset by the wheel catching where a plank had been removed by the railroad company. Held, in an action against the company for the injuries sustained, that the question of contributory negligence was for the jury.

2. In such action it was for the jury to say whether plaintiffs were negligent if they crossed the track at a different angle from that at which it was usually crossed, and whether their doing so proximately contributed to the accident.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Action by William Whalen and wife against the Arcata & Mad River Railroad Company for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. M. Buck and C. M. Wheeler, for appellant. Frank McGowan, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. Appeal from judgment, and order refusing defendant a new trial. The plaintiffs are husband and wife, and bring this suit to recover damages for personal injuries received by the wife. They aver that defendant's road crosses the highway, and that defendant so negligently and carelessly kept and maintained the crossing that it was allowed to become grossly out of repair, and in an unsafe condition in this: "That said defendant allowed a space in said crossing, unnecessarily large, to be and remain between one rail of said road and said crossing at the point on said crossing on said road where vehicles were and are usually driven." That while plaintiffs were crossing with a cart, without fault on their part, but by reason of the unsafe condition of the crossing, "one of the wheels of said cart was caught in said large space between said crossing and said rail herein described, and the said cart was then and there overturned, and the plaintiffs violently thrown to the ground, whereby," etc. The court, in effect, charged the jury that the plaintiffs, in order to recover, must prove the allegations precisely as made; that it would not be sufficient to show that the crossing was defective in some other respect; as, that it crossed the highway at an angle, or that the rails were too high. The appellant claims that the evidence shows that the accident was not caused by the alleged defect. But we do not so understand the evidence. It seems to us that the very testimony so confidently referred to as sustaining the position of counsel, tends directly and plainly to show that the accident was caused in the precise manner alleged; and so it must have appeared to the jury which rendered the verdict, after an instruction so distinct and positive; and to the learned judge, who, of his own motion, gave the instruction, and refused a new trial. The natural effect of use would have been to deepen the impression near the rail, and, perhaps, to accumulate earth immediately against it, and it is easy to see how the removal of this earth, shortly before the accident, might, in the absence of the necessary plank, increase the liability to an accident precisely as charged in the complaint, and, as we think, some of the testimony tended to prove. That there was other testimony inconsistent with this can make no difference here. We find no evidence which tends to prove any other defect than that charge.

The only question, therefore, is whether plaintiffs were guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to the accident. That they were is claimed on two grounds: Plaintiffs were driving with reckless speed, and turned while on the track, instead of going directly across. Plaintiffs' evidence was to the effect that they were driving a steady horse, at the rate of five or six miles per hour, and did not slacken speed at the crossing. The crossing was quite oblique, was on a level with the highway, and the rails projected above the planking about one inch or an inch and one-half. The crossing was filled in with planks, except that defendant had removed one plank along the north rail, and had neglected to restore it. It was not shown that plaintiffs knew of the defect. We cannot say, as matter of law, that under such circumstances the failure to slacken speed at the crossing was negligence. Had the crossing been in good order, we do not know that such speed would have been dangerous. So far as affects the liability of defendant, the plaintiffs had a right to assume that it had performed its duty, and had maintained the crossing in good condition. Although the evidence may not be conflicting, the question of negligence is peculiarly one for the jury. Fernandez v. Railroad Co., 52 Cal. 48. Courts will not interfere with a verdict where the conclusion can fairly and reasonably be drawn from the evidence.

The evidence is not very clear that there was any turning on the crossing, or that plaintiffs crossed at a different angle from what travelers generally did. Minor was driving across at the same time, going in the same direction. He says that, having a fractious horse, he turned to the left as much as possible, to give them the road. He was asked: "Question. Did they keep on the traveled part of the road, or did they keep to the right? Answer. Well, I should think it was near the center of the road. It seemed so to me, because I had to push the wheel away with my hand to keep it from striking my buggy after they capsized." * * * Q. When they drove across, did they not turn to get in ahead of you on the left there? A. Well, I think there was an effort to pull around me. They passed me right on the railroad track." And again: "Q. Did they turn to the left, to get in ahead of you, about the time the cart pitched? A. No, sir; I think they kept the middle of the road. I gave the road to them. They passed me, you understand, right on the track. Of course, they would naturally pull around a little as they passed. They upset to the east side. That is where they were thrown." Again, examined by defendant's counsel: "Q. And of course they approached the road at a different angle from this main traveled track? A. Well, I should naturally suppose so. * * * Q. Did the horse swing in towards you? A. Yes, sir. Q. That is, it swung into the left? A. The moment they capsized, the horse swung almost immediately against me." The parties were going north. The acute angle of the crossing on the north side was on the right, and plaintiffs fell out on the right side, while the buggy and horse swung to the left. James Chaffey was the only other witness, besides plaintiffs and Minor, who testified for defendant as to this matter: "Question. When they came to the crossing, how did they manage? Answer. I wasn't looking. I was walking along. I didn't see what passed, but the cart-wheels caught in the rails, and tipped over." Afterwards he said, "They were going to pass Minor, and when they geed off was when they caught in the rail." We think the jury would be justified in thinking that this was not what the witness saw, but his conclusion. He was not asked if he could see whether the wheel caught in the rail or not. He said: "I just saw it slide. It slid along a little. I was about fifty yards away. I had passed the track, going to Arcata, and had to look around to see it." But here, too, even admitting that appellant is correct as to its construction of the evidence, it was still properly left to the jury to say whether it was culpable negligence for plaintiffs to cross at the angle they did, and whether it contributed proximately to the injury. Had the crossing been in repair, it is possible that it would not have increased the danger. We certainly cannot say, from the evidence, that, had such been the case, a person of ordinary prudence would not have crossed as plaintiffs did. It was therefore a proper matter to be left to the jury under the instructions of the court. We think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

ulate their compensation; and by section 9 that such compensation should not be increased during their terms of office. St. 1883, p. 299, as amended by St. 1885, p. 178, fixed the salary of the county clerk of M. county, and made it full compensation for all services, including his deputy. Held that, where his term of office began January 7th, an order of the county board on the 10th, allowing him a deputy at a salary of $50 per month, to be paid by the county, was an increase of his compensation, within the meaning of the constitution.

2. By Laws 1887, p. 207, the statute relating to county officers was amended by providing that when, in the opinion of the board of supervisors, the salary of such officers in certain classes of counties was insufficient to pay a reasonable compensation, the board should allow such officer a deputy at a certain salary, to be paid for by the county. Held, that the provision was in violation of Const. art. 1, § 11, which required all laws of a general nature to have a uniform operation. Following Miller v. Kister, 8 Pac. Rep. 813, 68 Cal. 142.

3. The fact that the law under which the supervisors acted was in force prior to the election of the county clerk is immaterial, as it was the order and not the act of the legislature which increased the compensation.

Smith & Pomeroy, for appellant. Hepburn Wilkins, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This was an application for a writ of mandate to compel the defendant to pay a warrant for services rendered by plaintiff as deputy county clerk of Marin county. The trial court ordered the writ to issue, and this is an appeal from the judgment and order denying a new trial. The facts of the case are: One Bonneau was, at the commencement of this proceeding, and had been for more than four years next preceding thereto, the county clerk of Marin county. Said Bonneau was last elected in 1888, his term of office beginning January 7, 1889. Upon January 10, 1889, he filed an affidavit with the supervisors of said county by which he showed that a deputy was required by him in the proper discharge of his duties as such county clerk, and said board at that time made an order allowing him a deputy at a salary of $50 per month, to take effect from January 7, 1889. The order of the board of supervisors was made by authority of a provision of section 211 of the county government act as amended, found at page 207 of the Statutes of 1887, which reads: "Provided, further, that whenever, in the opinion of the board of supervisors, the salary of any county officer in the third, fourth, fifth, twelfth, twentieth [and several others] classes as fixed and provided in this act is insufficient to pay a reasonable compensation for the services required to be performed, then said board shall allow such officer a deputy, or such number of deputies as in their judgment may be required to do the business of such office, in connection with the principal, at a salary not to exceed one hundred dollars per month, to be paid at the times and in the manners said principal is paid: provided, that an affidavit shall be filed by such officer with the said board showing that such deputy or deputies are required by him in the proper discharge of his duties as such officer."

It is insisted by appellant that the order of the board of supervisors made January 10, 1889, allowing the county clerk a deputy at a salary of $50 per month to be paid by the county, was an increase of the compensation of such county clerk after his election and during his term of office, and that such order for those reasons was void and of no effect, being in violation of the provisions of section 9, art. 11, of the constitution of this state, wherein it is provided that "the compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office." The order of the board under consideration was made after the election and during the term of office of said Bonneau, and the question presented is, did the order allowing the clerk a deputy, and ordering that his salary be paid from the county treasury, increase the compensation of the county clerk? If it did increase his compensation, it is violative of the provision of the constitution just quoted, and must give way for that reason. That part of the order wherein it is recited that "the clerk is allowed a deputy" of itself is practically of no effect and force, because the clerk by virtue of his office has the power to appoint one or more deputies to perform or assist him in the performance of the duties of such office, entirely regardless of the wishes or demands of the board of supervisors, and this order of the board, construed in connection with the statute, is substantially as follows: "In the opinion of the board of supervisors of Marin county, the salary of the county clerk of said county, as now provided by law, is insufficient to pay a reasonable compensation for the services required to be performed by him, and, it further appearing by the affidavit of the said clerk that a deputy is necessary to a proper performance of the duties of his office, it is ordered that such deputy be paid fifty dollars per month from the county treasury." The duties resting upon Bonneau when he qualified as county clerk and entered upon his office were plain and unmistakable, for they are enumerated in detail by the statute, and upon every principle he was bound to discharge those duties. The law would not even allow him to take a single step in the performance of them until he agreed under the solemnity of his oath that he would "perform all the duties of his office to the best of his ability." If his duties as county clerk during the life of his term of office become so burdensome and assume such proportions that he has not the ability, either mental or physical, to perform them, he is not thereby released from the obligations he assumed at the inception of his term of office. His services are purely ministerial, and if, through simple desire or actual necessity, assistance is wanted, the law allows him to call to his aid as many deputies as he may see fit to appoint. If unwilling to adopt this course, and unable to perform the duties of the office personally, he can resign; but as long as he remains in office he is bound to perform the duties of the office under his official oath, or remain and render himself amenable to charges and removal for neglect of official duty. In Evans v. City of Trenton, 24 N. J. Law, 766, it is said: "It is a well-settled rule that a person accepting a public office with a fixed salary is bound to perform the duties of the office for the salary. He cannot legally claim additional compensation for the discharge of these duties, even though the salary may be a very inadequate remuneration for the services; nor does it alter the case that by subsequent statutes or ordinances his duties are increased, and not his salary. His undertaking is to perform the duties of his office, whatever they may be, from time to time during his continuance in office, for the compensation stipulated, whether these duties are diminished or increased; and whenever he considers the compensation inadequate he is at liberty to resign." The constitution provides that the legislature shall, by general and uniform laws, provide for the election or appointment of county officers, and that it shall regulate the compensation of all such officers in proportion to duties. Article 11, § 5. In pursuance of this provision the legislature, by an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of county and township governments," found at page 299, St. Cal. 1883, proceeded to carry into effect this provision of the constitution, and as amended by St. 1885, p. 178, fixed the salary of county clerks of counties of the twentieth class (of which Marin county was one) at two thousand and five hundred dollars per annum, which was to be for the "services required of them by law or by virtue of their office;" and section 211 of the same act (St. 1887, p. 207) further provided: "The salaries and fees provided in this act shall be in full compensation for all services of every kind and description rendered by the officers therein named, either as officers or ex officio officers, their deputies or assistants, unless in this act otherwise provided, and all deputies employed shall be paid by their principals out of the salaries hereinbefore provided, unless in this act otherwise provided." It will thus be seen from the foregoing principles and provisions of the statute and constitution cited that a public officer accepts an office upon the condition that he will perform all the duties of the office, and while he remains in such office the public have the right to demand that he perform such duties. In accordance with the mandate of the constitution, the legislature fixed the salary of the county clerk of Marin county in proportion to the duties of the office, not in proportion to the duties of the office the county clerk could personally perform, for the statute itself expressly provided that it should be in full compensation for the performance of all the duties of the office; although such would be the necessary construction of the provision of the constitution, regardless of the statute.

The fact that the law under which the board of supervisors acted in making the order was in force prior to the election of the county clerk is immaterial to the question involved, for it is not the act of the legislature that increases the compensation, but the order of the board of supervisors, passed long after the act took effect, long after the election of the county clerk, and during his term of office. The provision of the statute is entirely ineffectual, save simply as a delegation of power to the board of supervisors to order these things to be done. The legislature had no power upon the 10th day of January, 1889, to increase the compensation of the county clerk of Marin county; and, not having the power itself so to do, much less could it authorize such board to do so. This provision of section 211 of the county government act applies to 20 classes of counties, and the county clerks in some of those classes of counties have salaries ranging from $10,000 to $13,000 per annum. Every reason that can be urged and every principle of law that can be invoked to sustain the validity of this order can be urged and invoked with the same force to sustain an order made by the various boards of supervisors of these counties, allowing their county clerks all the deputies necessary for the proper administration of their offices, the counties paying therefor, and thus leaving their entire salaries remaining as compensation for their personal services. If such is the law, all the deputies of all the county officers of 20 classes of counties, under the general election of 1888, by order of the various boards of supervisors, could have been paid out of the county treasury of the respective counties. The doctrine can only be sustained upon the theory that the word "compensation," as used in the constitution, refers simply to the personal services of the public officer, and not as compensation for the performance of all the duties of the office. The fact is directly to the contrary, and is so recognized by the legislature throughout these various provisions of the county government act. The board can only allow such deputy upon the request of the principal, and only when the principal insists that his services are necessary in the performance of the duties of the office. If not paid by order of the board from the county treasury, the principal, being bound to perform all the duties of his office, and a deputy being necessary, would be bound to employ the deputy and pay him from his own salary. The county, by order of the board, pays $600 per annum as part compensation for the performance of the duties of the clerk's office. From a pecuniary standpoint such course is a very substantial benefit to the county clerk. The deputy is under his control, is empowered by law to act in the place and stead of his principal in all matters, the principal is liable for his salary, and a payment by the county of such deputy's salary is for all practical purposes a payment to the principal, and in this case necessarily results in an increase of the principal's compensation to the extent of $600 per annum. It is perfectly immaterial to the clerk whether his salary is increased to $3,100 per annum, and from that sum he pays his deputy $600 per annum, or that it remains at $2,500 and the county pays the deputy the $600. The clerk reaps the full benefit of the $600 in both cases. To be sure, this reasoning concedes that the clerk must have the deputy, but such must be the fact, for the clerk is bound to perform all the duties of his office, and a deputy is a necessity to the performance of those duties, for, by his affidavit, he himself has so declared. To construe the provision of the constitution so that a county clerk's salary could not be increased during his term of office, but that an act of the legislature would be valid which provided that all of his deputies, men whom he was bound to employ and bound to pay, in the absence of such an act, should be paid by the county, independent of and in addition to the clerk's salary, would be to allow that to be done indirectly which could not be done directly, and would be establishing a medium for the practice of the very abuses which the constitutional provision was inserted to destroy. The provision of the statute appears to be a crude and ill-conceived effort to evade a very plain and very wholesome provision of the constitution of this state.

Let us take a broader view of this provision of the county government act, which authorizes the boards of supervisors of 20 classes of counties to pay the salaries of the deputies of all the county officers of the counties of those classes under certain conditions and contingencies, and estimate its true worth by another test. Article I, § 11, of the constitution, requires that "all laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation." The county government act is essentially a law of a "general nature." It must be so to have any validity whatever, and, with the provision under discussion before our eyes, can it be said the county government act has a uniform operation? In Ex parte Smith, Justice SANDERSON said, referring to the meaning of the constitution in the use of the words "uniform operation:" "Its meaning, as repeatedly declared by the highest judicial tribunal in the state, is not that general laws must act alike upon all subjects of legislation or upon all citizens or persons, but that they shall operate uniformly, or in the same manner, upon all persons who stand in the same category; that is to say, upon all persons who stand in the same relation to the law, in respect to the privileges and immunities conferred by it or the acts which it prohibits." 38 Cal. 702.

We must view this question in the light of the fact that the county government act was intended to establish a uniform system of county governments, and that the classification of counties and regulation of the compensation of county officers, in proportion to duties, were important elements in the formation of that act, and were material portions to which the principle of uniformity was to be applied. When amended in 1887 by the provision delegating these powers to the boards of supervisors in 20 classes of counties, that provision simply became a part of the whole,—a strand of the rope which formed the county government act. That provision certainly gained no additional strength or weight, simply by being a more recent creation of the legislature than the act of which it became a part, and its validity must be weighed and tested as if it were a provision placed in the act of 1883. Now, does it disturb the uniformity of the operation of that act? We find the act first classified the counties of the state according to population, for the sole and express purpose of regulating the compensation of county officers according to their duties. It then regulated the compensation of county officers according to their duties, but it did not stop there. It provided, further, that in 20 classes of counties, naming them, the supervisors of those counties might relieve the county officers of some of their official burdens, by ordering that their deputies be paid from the county treasury. By this provision the legislature destroyed the uniformity of the operation of the act. In 28 classes of counties the compensation of county officers is fixed at an amount certain and definite,—an amount that cannot be changed, save by an act of the legislature; but in the remaining 20 classes of counties the compensation for the performance of the duties by the various officers may fluctuate every month in the year, at the mere whim of the boards of supervisors. The county government act, upon the same matters and under the same state of circumstances, should operate equally upon all classes of counties; but the legislature has said that in 20 classes of counties only, whenever the salary of county officers is insufficient to pay a reasonable compensation for the services required to be performed, the board of supervisors may allow them deputies at the county's expense. Now, if the salaries should prove insufficient to pay a reasonable compensation to the county officers for the duties to be performed in the remaining 28 classes of counties of the state, why should they not be allowed the same relief? In 28 classes of counties the legislature fixed the salaries of county officers at a definite sum, in proportion to the duties of the office. In 20 classes of counties the minimum sum only is fixed, and the boards of supervisors have the power to fix the compensation for the performance of the duties of the various officers at any sum which the board may think is a proper proportion, as compared with the duties of the office. This certainly is a very unjust discrimination against 28 classes of counties, and, not acting alike upon all classes of counties, necessarily destroys the uniformity of the operation of the act.

Respondent's counsel insist that an amendment to the act of 1883 relating to the compensation of county officers of one class of counties is a law of a general nature in itself, and that consequently this provision of section 211, applying to 20 classes of counties, is no less a general law; and, purporting to deal with 20 classes of counties only, and having a uniform operation as to those classes, the provision complies with the test in both respects, and is therefore within the constitution. This contention is true to a limited extent, and was so held by this court in Cody v. Murphey, 89 Cal. 522, 26 Pac. Rep. 1081, wherein it was decided that legislation pertaining to the compensation of officers of one class of counties was a law of a general nature, and in that case uniform in its operation, it being directly in line with all other provisions of the county government act, pertaining to the same subject-matter. But there is a broad distinction between that provision of the act and the one under consideration in this case. If the legislature, as has been attempted here, can delegate the power to the supervisors to regulate the salaries of county officers of 20 classes of counties, it could provide a separate and distinct means for the regulation of the salaries of the county officers of each separate and distinct class of counties; and thus the uniformity of the operation of the county government act, upon the question of the regulation of salaries of county officers, would consist solely in the fact that the operation of the act was uniformly different in each class of counties. It would seem that the case of Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 142, 8 Pac. Rep. 813, is conclusive against respondent upon this question. In that case the section under consideration was section 4 of the act of 1885, amending the county government act as to salaries, (St. 1885, p. 195,) which section provided that in three classes of counties the salaries fixed in said amendment (all reductions, which were within the power of the legislature to make) should take effect on the first day of the following month, while the amendment provided that in all other classes the salaries should not take effect during the terms of the then officers. Held, (1) that the same was special legislation; and (2) that the operation of the law is exceptional and eccentric, and causative of discrimination between the officers upon whom it is to operate,—“the few are excluded from the privileges given to the many;” and the section was held to be void. We think this provision destroys the uniformity of the operation of the county government act in respect to the matters upon which it attempts to speak, and is a violation of a plain requirement of the constitution, which should be scrupulously guarded and upheld. Let the judgment be reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the proceedings.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; HARRISON, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I concur in the judgment of reversal. If the amendment to the county government act under which the respondent claims applied equally to all the counties of the state; if, in other words, it was general, and not special and local in its operation,—I think it is susceptible of the construction which would not bring it in conflict with section 9 of article 11 of the constitution forbidding the increase of a compensation of a county officer during his term. What I think the legislature really meant by the provision in question was to empower the boards of supervisors in those classes of counties to which it applies to allow deputies or additional deputies in county offices, and to pay their salaries whenever, from some unusual increase of population or other cause, the business of such offices was so increased as to require for the discharge of its duties a deputy or deputies in addition to the number employed at the date of the act fixing the salary of the office. I do not think it was the intention of the legislature to authorize the boards of supervisors in their discretion to relieve county officers of the payment of the deputies employed at the time their compensation was established by the county government act. To give the law in question such a construction would render it invalid as an attempt to delegate to the supervisors of the respective counties a power and a duty conferred and imposed by the constitution in express and mandatory terms upon the legislature itself. Article 11, § 5. Such a construction is, of course, to be avoided if possible. Giving to this law, then, the construction above indicated, it would not have the effect, if properly administered, of increasing the compensation of any county officer during his term, and the only constitutional objection to which it is exposed, in my opinion, is this: That it is special and local in a case where a general law could be made applicable, and perhaps in some of the specially enumerated cases in which special and local legislation is prohibited, (article 4, § 25,) or that it is an amendment to a general law which destroys the uniformity of its operation. To all these objections the respondent's answer is that the law is neither special nor local, because it applies to classes of counties created in pursuance of authority expressly conferred by the constitution itself, viz., the authority to classify counties by population for the purpose of regulating the compensation of county officers according to their duties. Article 11, § 5. But while this would be a sufficient answer to such objections in case of a law regulating the compensation of county officers, it is no answer to the same objections to a law passed for a wholly different purpose. In other words, a classification of counties made for a special purpose authorized by the constitution cannot be made the basis of discriminating legislation of any and every kind. Classification which is proper and rational and necessary for one purpose may be utterly arbitrary and unnecessary for another purpose, and is necessarily so with reference to a law with relation to which every county in the state stands upon the same plane. Such is the character of the law in question. If it is right that the supervisors should have the power to make allowance for the unexpected increase of business in the county offices, by authorizing the payment out of the county treasury of the salaries of such additional deputies as may be needed, then it is right that the supervisors of every county should have the same power. This law, however, selects certain classes of counties apparently at random, some large, some small, some of intermediate size, omitting others of every grade of population above, below, and intermediate, and confers upon the classes so arbitrarily selected a power and a privilege in the transaction of the county business which is denied to others standing in precisely the same relation to the subject of this enactment. This case is much stronger than that presented in Miller v. Kister, 68 Cal. 142, 8 Pac. Rep. 813, in which a similar law was held unconstitutional upon the ground that it was special legislation. But even if this law could be held a general law, in accordance with the contention of the respondent, I think his case is not within it. One deputy-clerk was employed in 1885, at the date when the salary of the office was fixed, and it must be presumed that the salary was fixed with reference to that fact. There has never been any increase in the number of deputies required, and the respondent is the only deputy that was employed by the clerk during the time for which a salary is claimed. As there was no increase in the number of deputies, the case did not arise in which, according to my construction of the law, the supervisors were empowered to make the allowance of a deputy's salary. Upon these grounds I concur in the judgment.

MADDOX v. WYMAN et al. (No. 13,269.)

CHattel Mortgages—Default—Foreclosure.

1. A note providing for the payment of $2,400, the sum of $500 to be paid on the 15th of February, and $50 on the 15th of each month thereafter, was secured by a mortgage containing a provision that if the mortgagor should fail to make any payment the mortgagee should take possession of the property and sell the same, and from the proceeds pay the whole amount specified in the note. Held, that on the mortgagor's failure to pay a monthly installment the mortgagee could foreclose for the full amount of the unpaid installments, and was not limited to selling so much as was necessary to pay the past-due installments, under Code Civil Proc. § 728, declaring that if the debt for which a mortgage is held is not all due the sale must cease as soon as sufficient of the property has been sold to pay the amount due.

2. In such case a demand for payment of an installment was not necessary to put the mortgagor in default.

3. In a suit to foreclose the mortgage an issue as to the value of the property was immaterial.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by one Maddox against one Wyman and others to foreclose a chattel mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Matt I. Sullivan, for appellants. Whittemore & Sears, (Arthur Rogers, of counsel,) for respondent. Chas. F. Hanlon, for interveners.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an action to foreclose a chattel mortgage on the furniture of a lodging-house to secure the payment of a promissory note, of which the following is a copy: "San Francisco, Jan. 1, 1887. For value, I promise to pay to the order of Mrs. M. H. McDonald twenty-four hundred dollars, in payments as follows: Five hundred dollars on the fifteenth day of February, 1887, and fifty dollars on the fifteenth day of March, 1887, and a like amount of fifty dollars on the fifteenth day of each and every month thereafter, till the full amount is paid, with interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum. J. B. WYMAN." The mortgage bears even date with the note, and contains the following provision: "It is also agreed that, if the mortgagor shall fail to make any payment as in the said promissory note provided, then the mortgagee may take possession of said property, using all necessary force so to do, and may immediately proceed to sell the same in the manner provided by law, and from the proceeds pay the whole amount in said note specified." The note and mortgage were assigned to the plaintiff. The defendant paid all the installments on the note up to and including that which became due on August 15, 1887, but failed to pay those which became due in September and October. This action was commenced November 11, 1887, to foreclose the mortgage for the full amount of the unpaid balance of the note, on the theory that the commencement of the action then was authorized by the provision of the mortgage above quoted, although by the terms of the note only the September and October installments were then due and unpaid. A judgment of foreclosure was rendered for a balance of $1,600, principal, with interest and costs. The defendants appeal from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

1. It is contended by appellants that only two installments ($100) were due at the time the suit was commenced, and that according to section 728 of the Code of Civil Procedure¹ only so much of the mortgaged property should have been ordered sold as was necessary to pay the September and October installments. But, reading and construing the note and mortgage together, I think the plaintiff was entitled to foreclose for the full amount of the unpaid installments. Brickell v. Batchelder, 62 Cal. 624; Leonard v. Tyler, 60 Cal. 299; Beal v. Stevens, 72 Cal. 454, 14 Pac. Rep. 186.

2. It was not necessary, as contended by counsel for appellant, that, in order to put defendants in default as to the payment of any installment, a demand should have been made for such payment before the commencement of the action.

3. The issue as to the value of the mortgaged property is immaterial, and therefore it is of no consequence whether the finding upon that issue is justified by the evidence or not. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re KENNEDY'S ESTATE. (No. 14,853.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 20, 1892.)

JUDGMENT AGAINST EXECUTORS—FILING TRANSCRIPT.

Code Civil Proc. § 1504, provides that, where a judgment is rendered against an executor or administrator upon any claim for money against the estate of his decedent, a certified transcript of the original docket of the judgment must be filed among the papers of the estate in court. Held that, where such a judgment has been rendered, and the transcript filed, as required by the statute, it is not necessary, on the subsequent affirmation of the judgment on appeal, that a transcript of the judgment subsequent to the coming down of the remittitur should be filed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Thomas E. Curran, as the administrator of Thomas Cushing, obtained a judgment against the estate of Philip Kennedy for the recovery of a sum of money. A certified transcript of the original docket of the judgment was filed among the papers of the estate in court. The judgment was subsequently affirmed on appeal. From an order directing the payment of the judgment the executor and executrix of the estate of Kennedy appeal, on the ground that a certified transcript of the original docket of the judgment on the remittitur from the supreme court should have been filed among the papers of the estate. Code Civil Proc. § 1504, provides that, where a judgment is rendered against the estate of a decedent for the payment of money, a certified transcript of the original docket of the judgment must be filed among the papers of the estate in court. The order was affirmed.

Charles F. Hanlon, for appellants. James Gartlan, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This appeal is without merit. The judgment against the executors, which was rendered in the superior court, February 11, 1889, "established the claim in the same manner as if it had been allowed by the executors and the judge." Code Civil Proc. § 1504. The subsequent affirmation of that judgment in this court did not create a new or different judgment, or impose upon the plaintiff therein the necessity of "filing among the papers of the estate in court" a certified copy of the transcript of the docket of the judgment on the remittitur from this court. The order is affirmed.

ARCHER v. SALINAS CITY. (No. 13,040.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 21, 1892.)

DEDICATION—WHAT CONSTITUTES—ACCEPTANCE—ADVERSE POSSESSION—PURCHASE BY MORTGAGEE—TITLE ACQUIRED.

1. Where a land-owner files a map of a number of blocks owned by him, on which one block

¹ Code Civil Proc. § 728, relating to mortgage foreclosures, declares: "If the debt for which the mortgage * * * is held is not all due, so soon as sufficient of the property has been sold to pay the amount due, with costs, the sale must cease; and afterwards, as often as more becomes due, * * * the court, may on motion, order more to be sold. * * *" is marked "Central Park," circulates copies of the map, and states in an advertisement, and announces through an auctioneer, while selling the adjacent blocks, that such a block is reserved for a park, he dedicates the block to the public.

2. Under such circumstances, actual acceptance is not requisite to complete the dedication, since acceptance will be presumed from the benefit arising from the dedication. People v. Reed, 22 Pac. Rep. 474, 81 Cal. 70, distinguished.

3. Failure of the public to use the dedicated land for the purpose intended does not impair the dedication, nor authorize the prior owner to resume possession.

4. One who dedicates land to the public cannot subsequently acquire it by adverse possession.

5. A mortgagee, who, after dedication of the land to the public by the mortgagor, accepts from the latter a conveyance thereof in payment of the debt secured by the mortgage, acquires only the mortgagor's title.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Action to quiet title by E. Archer against Salinas City. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. P. Geil and H. V. Morehouse, for appellant. W. M. R. Parker and E. V. Sargent, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action to quiet title to a block of land in Salinas City. Judgment was rendered for the defendant upon the ground that the land in question had been dedicated for use as a public park. From this judgment, and an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

The land in question is a portion of a larger tract of about 200 acres within the limits of Salinas City, of which the plaintiff was the owner on January 15, 1874, when he conveyed the same in fee to W. H. Stone for the sum of $25,000, and received from him $5,000 in money, and a mortgage on the same property to secure the remaining $20,000. This mortgage was renewed in 1878, and on December 24, 1880, Stone reconveyed a portion of the tract, including the block in question, in satisfaction of the mortgage debt, and other obligations of his to the plaintiff. In July, 1874, Stone caused the tract to be surveyed and subdivided into blocks, with streets connecting with other streets that had been laid out in Salinas City, marking the blocks with stakes set in the ground; and on the 12th of March, 1875, filed in the recorder's office of Monterey county a map of the tract, showing these streets and blocks, and the subdivisions of the blocks. Upon this map the block in question is laid down as bounded by Park street, Homestead avenue, Central avenue, and Villa street, and is itself marked "Central Park." Prior to the filing of the map, Stone had advertised in several newspapers that a sale of the tract would be held March 15, 1875, and had made and circulated copies of the map, and on the day of the sale he had an enlarged copy of the map upon the ground, and sold at public auction a very large number of the lots according to the map. In the advertisement of the sale it was stated that "in the center of this plat is located and held in reservation a block 580 feet square for a city park." At the sale it was represented that the square had been laid out for a city park, and the auctioneer made frequent references to this park as an inducement to pay advanced prices for lots in its vicinity, and the lots around it were sold at much higher prices than those remote from it. Stone was present at the sale, and made no objection to any of these representations. Nearly all of the lots upon the streets bounding the park and fronting thereon were sold at the sale, and during several years after the auction other lots were sold with reference to the map; and, after the conveyance to the plaintiff, deeds were executed by him with reference to the map as late as 1887. Previous to the auction sale, Stone had caused the land within this block to be laid out and planted with trees, and for several years thereafter he kept it fenced and had the trees cared for, and about 1884 the plaintiff cut some of the trees down, and hauled away the wood, under the claim that he was the owner of the land. It does not appear that the city ever made any improvements upon the park or took any steps with reference to it until some time in 1887, when it took possession of the block, and very soon thereafter the plaintiff commenced this action.

Upon the foregoing facts we are of the opinion that Stone dedicated the land in controversy for use as a public park, and that the finding of the court that the land was so dedicated is fully sustained by the evidence. When the owner of property which is within the limits of an incorporated city or town makes and records a map of such property, by which he subdivides the same into blocks and lots bounded by streets which are continuations of other streets already laid out by the city or town, and sells and conveys the lots abutting upon those streets, he thereby dedicates to the public the streets so laid out by him as prolongations of other streets, as well as the other streets which are laid out upon such map intersecting and connecting the same; and if, upon such map or plan, he has designated a space or block as a public park, such space or block is as fully dedicated to public use as are the streets delineated thereon. The purchasers of such lots have not merely an easement in the streets upon which the lots abut, but all of the streets are set apart for the purpose of enabling such purchasers to have reciprocal intercourse with the public outside of the subdivided tract, and are thus themselves dedicated to the entire public for all purposes to which streets can properly be applied. The same principles which are applicable to the dedication of public streets apply to the dedication of a public park or square. All dedications for public use are to be considered with reference to the purpose for which the dedication is made, or the use to which the property dedicated may be applied, and that purpose may be ascertained by the designation which the owner has affixed to the land upon the map, whether it be a street, a school lot, or a public park. The setting apart of a public park upon such map is for the convenience and enjoyment of the inhabitants of the place, and, as it enhances the value of the private property fronting thereon, so the owner who has dedicated it is presumed to have received, in the increased prices for which that property was sold, the compensation for its surrender to the public as a public park. The word "park," written upon a block of land designated upon a map, is as significant of a dedication, and of the use to which the land is dedicated, as is the word "street," written upon such map. The word carries with itself the idea of an open or inclosed tract of land for the comfort and enjoyment of the inhabitants of the city or town in which it is located, and is so defined by lexicographers. In England the word, when applied to an inclosed tract of land in the country, has a different signification, and signifies that the lands inclosed are the private grounds of the proprietor. In this country, too, a man may inclose his own land and style it a "park," or give that name to his place, without giving to the public any right to its use, for in such a case there would be no semblance of dedication; but the meaning of a word is to be determined by the circumstances connected with its use. In London, as well as in any city in this country, the term "park" signifies an open space intended for the recreation and enjoyment of the public, and this signification is the same whether the word be used alone, or with some qualifying term, as "Hyde Park," or "Regent's Park," or, as in the present case, "Central Park." Upon this point the authorities are uniform. Watertown v. Cowen, 4 Paige, 513; Price v. Plainfield, 40 N. J. Law, 608; Carter v. Portland, 4 Or. 339; Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 431; Rowan's Ex'rs v. Portland, 8 B. Mon. 246; San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 13 Pac. Rep. 405; Dill Mun. Corp. §§ 640, 644. Dedication is an ultimate fact dependent upon the establishment of other facts, and is to be found from the evidence presented to the court. Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 648. It results from the acts of the owner of the land, coupled with the intent with which he does those acts. It may be express and completed by a single act, as when the land is dedicated by deed; or it may be implied from a series of acts, as when the owner subdivides a tract of land into blocks and streets, and causes a map of such subdivision to be recorded, and sells the several subdivisions which front upon those streets. Whenever the dedication is complete, the property thereby becomes public property, and the owner loses all control over it, or right to its use. Even though the acceptance presumed from an express dedication may not impose upon the public all the obligations that an express acceptance would impose, yet the owner is as much concluded by his dedication in the one case as in the other. If the dedication is complete by his act, whether express or implied, it is thereafter irrevocable by him, and the effect of such dedication cannot be qualified by any act or declaration thereafter made on his part. The property dedicated has become public property, impressed with the use for which it was dedicated, and neither can the public divert it from that use nor can it be lost by adverse possession. Nor is the effect of such dedication impaired by any delay in the use of the land for which it was set apart. Such failure to make use of the land does not authorize the owner to resume possession. The public can thereafter appropriate the land to the use for which it was dedicated, whenever convenience or necessity may suggest.

A distinction is to be observed between actual dedication and an offer to dedicate. In the latter case there must be an acceptance on behalf of the public before the dedication is complete, and the owner may at any time before such acceptance revoke the offer, while in the former case the acceptance will be presumed from the benefit arising from the dedication. The acceptance of an offer to dedicate may, moreover, be formal, as by resolution on the part of the city, or it may be implied, as by user or adaptation for use, as in the improvement of the streets. Merely recording a map of the subdivided tract, or simply designating the streets and blocks by stakes or monuments upon the ground, would constitute no more than an offer to dedicate. Whether the owner, by making sales according to such map or designation, has made the offer with reference to other streets than those by which the lots sold are bounded, is a fact that the court must determine from the circumstances of each case, such as the number of sales, their proximity to the street claimed to have been dedicated, the use to which the land has been put, and the means by which, or the extent to which, the streets have been brought into connection with other streets or highways. The owner, after selling some of the lots according to such map, might, either with the consent of the purchasers, or if he should himself repurchase all of the lots so sold, withdraw such offer at any time before the public had acquired any interest in the streets, either from formal acceptance or by actual user. Rowan's Ex'rs v. Portland, 8 B. Mon. 236. In San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 13 Pac. Rep. 405, it was held that the sale of the blocks opposite the space designated on the map as "Court Square," with other lots and blocks upon the map, effected such a dedication of that space that it could not afterwards be revoked by the owner. The principles relative to dedication and an offer to dedicate which are laid down in that case are in accord with the law upon that subject, as well as with previous decisions in this state, and should have controlling effect in the present case. The failure to observe this distinction between a dedication and an offer to dedicate explains the apparent discrepancy in the language used in various opinions, where it is said that a dedication is not complete until the city has given its acceptance. In this state, however, it has been the uniform rule, whenever the question has been presented for decision, that, whenever an actual dedication has been made, no acceptance is required, but will be presumed, even though there may not from such dedication be imposed upon the public an obligation to make expenditures upon the streets. Harding v. Jasper, 14

Cal. 642; Stone v. Brooks, 35 Cal. 497. In Hayward v. Manzer, 70 Cal. 476, 13 Pac. Rep. 141, Castro, the owner of the land, made and recorded a map of the town of San Lorenzo in 1856, on which the street in question was delineated, and made some sales of land according to that map. The street, however, was not opened to the public, or even used as a public road. Within less than a year after making the map he conveyed a portion of the tract so laid out, including the place marked for this street, and it was thereafter held in possession under said conveyance. The town was not incorporated until 1876, and after such incorporation its authorities accepted this alleged dedication. The court held that these acts of Castro were only an offer to dedicate, which was revoked by his conveyance of the tract before the actual acceptance. In Phillips v. Day, 82 Cal. 24, 22 Pac. Rep. 976, the owner had made a map of the tract, marked streets and subdivisions upon the ground, and made sales of a few of the lots according to such map and subdivisions. The land was not, however, within the limits of any city or town, and the streets were not traveled, but were kept from use by the public by fences inclosing the entire tract. The lots conveyed by the owner were afterwards repurchased by him, and a sale made of the entire tract, including the streets, before any map was recorded. The court held that these circumstances amounted to only an offer to dedicate the streets, and that the sale of the entire tract operated as a revocation of such offer. In City of Eureka v. Croghan, 81 Cal. 524, 22 Pac. Rep. 693, the owner of the land made a conveyance in 1870, describing the tract conveyed with reference to certain streets as they would exist if projected through the tract, and about four months afterwards sold the portion covered by these streets. It was held that the first conveyance was no more than an offer to dedicate, which was revoked by the second conveyance; distinguishing the case from those in which the owner has himself platted the land into blocks and streets, and sold the lots with reference to such streets. In City of Eureka v. Armstrong, 83 Cal. 623, 22 Pac. Rep. 928 and 23 Pac. Rep. 1085, the dedication was held complete, for the reason that the offer had been formally accepted before any attempt at revocation was made. There is nothing decided in People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 70, 22 Pac. Rep. 474, inconsistent with the foregoing principles, although there are certain expressions in the opinion in that case that may seem at variance therewith, but they were obiter dicta, or side remarks and unauthoritative views of the justice who wrote the opinion. That the court did not intend to lay down any different rule from that which is given in Stone v. Brooks, supra, or to qualify or limit the authority of that case, is evident from the fact that that case and others are cited on page 78, 81 Cal., and page 476, 22 Pac. Rep., as authority for the proposition that "where the owner surveys and plats his property, and makes sales of lots with reference to such plat, the streets designated thereon are irrevocably dedicated to the public as streets." In fact, the question itself was not presented for decision, inasmuch as the facts in People v. Reed showed that there had never been more than an offer to dedicate. The map of the property was never recorded; the part of the alleged street in controversy was never opened as a street, but had for many years been fenced and occupied by substantial and permanent buildings; no sales of lots thereon were ever made; and it did not appear that any of the individuals who purchased property on other parts of the alleged street had ever seen the map of the property; and no action was taken by the city for more than 20 years after the map was made, and the property inclosed and permanently improved. Page 76, 81 Cal., and page 475, 22 Pac. Rep. When the plaintiff took the conveyance from Stone, in December, 1880, in satisfaction of Stone's indebtedness to him, the title thereby acquired was subject to the dedication in his hands as much as it would have been in the hands of any other grantee of Stone, and subject to this incumbrance as much as to any other incumbrance which Stone might have placed upon the land while he was the proprietor. While Stone might not have made any dedication of the tract that would impair the security of the mortgage that he had previously made thereon, or that would have prevented a purchaser under a foreclosure sale under such mortgage from acquiring a title free of such incumbrance, yet the acceptance by the mortgagee of a deed in satisfaction of the debt gave to him only such title as Stone had at the time when the deed was executed. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

(No. 14,061.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 20, 1892.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—NOTICE TO SURETY OF DEFAULT—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS.

1. Where an agent in California of an insurance company in New York, under a contract requiring him to remit payments within 50 days from the end of the month in which they are payable, fails, through tardiness and neglect, but with no wrongful intent, to remit the premiums until from 60 to 120 days after the end of such month, and this action is acquiesced in by the company as a substantial compliance with the contract, failure of the company to give notice of such delay to the surety on the agent's bond, indemnifying the company against losses caused by the agent's fraud or dishonesty, is not a breach of a condition of the bond that the company shall report to the surety "any act of omission or commission on the part of the" agent "that might involve a loss for which the" surety "is responsible hereunder."

2. Where the contract between the company and agent required the latter to remit the premiums of each month on or before the 20th of the second month afterwards, a certificate by the company to the agent's surety, made one day after the premiums were due and unpaid, stating that the agent was not in arrears, was not fraudulent.

3. Certificates furnished by the company to the surety, averring that the agent had never been in arrears or default, were not fraudulent, though the payment of premiums was sometimes delayed for two or three months, where such payment was accepted by the company as a substantial compliance with the contract.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; F. E. SPENCER, Judge.

Action on a bond by the Pacific Fire Insurance Company of New York against the Pacific Surety Company of California. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William H. Jordan, for appellants.
Bishop & Watt, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiff is a fire insurance company, having its office in the city of New York. Defendant is a corporation organized for the purpose of issuing indemnifying bonds to employers, guaranteeing the honesty of employees occupying positions of trust. Smith & Moody were the general agents for plaintiff in the state of California, with an office in the city of San Francisco. Upon October 21, 1885, defendant issued its bond to plaintiff guaranteeing the payment of all losses suffered by plaintiff through the fraud and dishonesty of its agents Smith & Moody, and this bond was renewed for the year ending October 31, 1887. In March, 1887, Smith & Moody failed in business, and at that time were indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $2,819.25, moneys collected by them as agents of plaintiff, which amount they converted to their own use, and this action is brought to recover from the agents and their surety, the appellant herein, the amount of such defalcation. Judgment went for the plaintiff in the lower court, and this is an appeal by the defendant surety company from the judgment and order denying a new trial. The trial court substantially found, among other matters, that the contract of employment entered into between plaintiff and its agents provided that accounts should be rendered by said agents to the plaintiff, in New York, by the 15th day of each month, of the business done during the preceding month, and the premiums paid over to the company (plaintiff) by the 20th day of the second month thereafter. That this provision of the contract was ambiguous, but that both parties understood it to mean that the moneys collected for the business of any given month should be paid to plaintiff on or before the 20th day of the second month thereafter. That the agents made their reports as required by the contract, and, until the time of their defalcation, remitted the sums shown by their statements to be due, from 60 to 120 days after the end of the month during which said business was so transacted. That the delays in remitting the money resulted in part from the tardiness of sub-agents to properly collect and remit to them, and in part from their own negligence, but without any wrongful or fraudulent intent on their part; and that said delays were acquiesced in without objection on the part of plaintiff, and treated by both plaintiff and the said agents as a substantial compliance with their agreement in relation to such remittances. That on October 9, 1885, Smith & Moody made written applications to the defendant for a bond of indemnity to the plaintiff against acts of fraud or dishonesty upon their part. That in said applications they answered "No" to the following question: "Have you ever been in arrears or default in your present or previous employment?" That attached to these applications was an employer's certificate, signed by the secretary of plaintiff in its behalf, which stated: "I have read the foregoing declarations and answers made by Charles E. Moody, [A. D. Smith,] and believe them to be true. He has been in the employ of the company during one year, and to the best of my knowledge has always performed his duties in a faithful and satisfactory manner. His accounts were last examined on the 21st day of October, 1885, and found to be correct in every respect. He is not, to my knowledge, at present in arrears or default." It appears that the indemnifying bond issued in October, 1885, was in part based upon this employer's certificate, and the extension of the bond for the second year was based in part upon an employer's second certificate, containing substantially the matters set out in the one of the preceding year. It was provided in the bond that plaintiff should notify the surety company in writing, properly addressed, "of any act of omission or commission on the part of the employees which might involve a loss for which the company is responsible hereunder, as soon as practicable after the occurrence of such act shall have come to the knowledge of the employer."

It is conceded that plaintiff's agents defaulted in a large sum of money during the life of the bond given by appellant; but, to defeat a recovery, appellant insists that the evidence establishes the fact that the bond was obtained by reason of false and fraudulent representations made by the plaintiff, and also that after its delivery plaintiff's agents were guilty of making many defaults in the settlement of their accounts, to the knowledge of plaintiff, and plaintiff failed and neglected to notify appellant of such facts, as required by the provision of the bond hereinbefore set out. There are preliminary objections made by respondent pertaining to the construction to be placed upon the bond, the order of renewal, employer's certificates, etc., that we will not pause to notice, but will examine the merits of the appeal upon the broad ground as above set forth by appellant.

Was the failure of plaintiff to give notice that Smith & Moody were not making their remittances at the time demanded by the contract a substantial violation of that condition of the bond wherein plaintiff agreed to notify appellant "of any act of omission or commission on the part of the employees that might involve a loss for which the company is responsible hereunder?" While the plaintiff had notice that its agents were not forwarding collections at the times required by the provisions of its contract, yet the trial court found: "Said delays resulted in part from the tardiness of sub-agents to properly collect and remit to said general agents, and in part from the negligence of said general agents, but without any wrongful or fraudulent intent on their part; and that said delays were acquiesced in without objection on the part of plaintiff's officers, and treated by both plaintiff and said agents as a substantial compliance with their agreement in relation to such remittances." In the face of the facts set out in this finding, it cannot be said that plaintiff was guilty of a violation of the covenant of the bond. Plaintiff considered the acts of its agents a substantial compliance with the terms of the contract; and, under the evidence, it would seem that, as a careful, prudent business corporation, it was justified in so doing. The explanations and reasons for the delay were entirely consistent with honesty and fair dealing. As a fact, the court found that such delays were occasioned by no wrongful or fraudulent intent of the agents. Under these conditions there was no act of "omission or commission" upon the part of the agents requiring notice to appellant. This identical provision of a similar bond was construed in the case of Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. American Surety Co., 34 Fed. Rep. 298; and the court there said: "It cannot be supposed that this provision calls upon the employer to notify the defendant of every act of laches or delay or inefficiency on the part of the agent which ultimately may create a loss to the employer. It means that the defendant shall be notified of acts which may create a loss for which it is responsible; that is, a loss arising from fraud or dishonesty. It is not necessary to undertake to define affirmatively what kind or class of acts must be communicated, and whether or not the obligation compels the employer to notify the defendant of that kind of conduct of the employe outside of his business which experience has shown may probably result in dishonesty. It is sufficient to say that mere laches or inefficiency of the employe in the business which is consistent with integrity was not required to be communicated." Measured by the rule laid down in the foregoing authority, it is entirely apparent that in this case, as the facts existed, plaintiff was not called upon, under the covenant of the bond, to give any notice to appellant. It is the business of the surety to see that his principal keeps within the guaranty of the bond, and not that of the employer. The employer is not called upon to be watchful and diligent, in order that the surety may suffer no loss. There is no question but that a correct principle of law is declared in Roberts v. Donovan, 70 Cal. 110, 11 Pac. Rep. 599, and other cases cited by appellant, viz., that "if the master discover that a servant has been guilty of dishonesty in the course of the service, and, instead of dismissing, continues him in his service without the knowledge of the guarantor, express or implied, he cannot afterwards have recourse to the guarantor to make good any loss which may arise from the dishonesty of the servant during the subsequent service;" but the principle is not applicable here, for there is no question of dishonesty involved in these delays of the agents to make the remittances, and the court so found. In the case of Insurance Co. v. Simmons, 131 Mass. 85, the plaintiff did not notify the sureties of his agent's default until after his death, and the defendants contended that they were discharged from their liability as sureties by these facts. After a review of the authorities bearing upon the question, there being no fraud or dishonesty shown, but simply a default or arrearage in the payment of the monthly collections of money, the court said: "We are of opinion that there is no rule of law which makes it a duty which the creditor, under the circumstances of this case, owes to the surety, to dismiss its agent, or to notify the surety of his default." See, also, McKecknie v. Ward, 58 N. Y. 541.

There is no evidence whatever in the record to support the allegation of the answer that the statements of the plaintiff contained in the certificates were made in pursuance of a conspiracy with its agents to defraud appellant. Let us consider these statements made by plaintiff in the renewal certificate, and also those found in the original certificate, such certificate being made a part of the said renewal, and forming, as it is claimed by appellant, a part consideration for the issuance of this bond, and see if they are so far from the truth as to justify a reversal of the judgment. Upon this subject the court found "that the plaintiff during said time [time of agency] believed said agents to be honest, and made the several statements and certificates hereinbefore referred to in good faith, believing them to be true, and without any intent to mislead or deceive the defendant company." Upon October 21, 1885, the secretary of the plaintiff, in its behalf, in the certificate to appellant said: "He [referring to the agent separately] is not, to my knowledge, at present in arrears or default." While the terms of the contract were ambiguous with reference to the time when payments should be made, yet the court found that they were payable on or before the 20th day of the month; and it appears that upon the 21st of October, when the statement was made, an amount of money was due and payable to plaintiff by its agents upon October 20th. Plaintiff resided in New York, and the agents resided in San Francisco; and, considered alone, taking into consideration the uncertainties of prompt communication for such a distance, to impute anything but fairness and honesty to the plaintiff in making the statement that upon October 21st the agents were not in default or arrears would not be justified by the facts. Appellant attacks the statement found in the certificate that these agents had always performed their duties in a faithful and satisfactory manner. Upon this matter the court found that "the dealings by and between said Smith and Moody, as such agents, and the plaintiff, from the commencement of the employment to within a short time before the withdrawal from such employment, were fair and honest, and in accordance with the usual course of business conducted by insurance agents in general." This finding, and other findings of the court already quoted, have ample support in the evidence, and dispose of appellant's contention in this regard.

With reference to the quotations from the certificates of plaintiff already noticed, and others of which appellant complains as being false and misleading, we find no just cause for complaint. It appears that Smith & Moody, during the period of their agency, had failed to make their remittances at the time demanded by the terms of the contract, but had made them within a reasonable and satisfactory time thereafter, and were conducting the business in the ordinary and regular way. It further appears that their delay in forwarding remittances was not attributable to dishonesty or lack of integrity, but was due to the wide field covered by the agency, and their inability to make collections. The plaintiff had knowledge of these facts, and recognized and treated its agents' acts, with the agents' knowledge, as a substantial compliance with the terms of the contract. Plaintiff certainly had the right to, and did practically, waive that provision of the contract, and extend the time in which its agents were entitled to forward these remittances. Under such circumstances, can it be said that the agents were in default or arrearage at any time, unless by failure to remit upon demand of plaintiff? It could only be a default under a provision of the contract, a provision which was waived, and such a technical, unsubstantial default that it could never have served any purpose in the final determination by appellant of the issuance or non-issuance of the bond of guaranty. The default or arrearage referred to in these certificates would seem to be such defaults and arrearages as would, to some extent at least, indicate dishonesty or want of integrity upon the part of the agents, and not such as were wholly innocent in themselves, and which might result to the most careful and honest of men. We have examined the errors of law relied upon by appellant, and do not consider them well taken. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

WE CONCUR: PATERSON, J.; HARRISON, J.

93 Cal. 59

HARRIS v. ZANONE. (No. 13,075.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 22, 1892.)

SLANDER—PLEADING—MALICE—EVIDENCE—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS—DAMAGES.

1. In an action for slander, an allegation in the complaint that defendant, at a certain time and place, in the presence and hearing of divers persons, "spoke the following words of and concerning plaintiff: 'She is a damned thief,'"—though there is no averment that the words were understood by those who heard them to refer to plaintiff, is sufficient under Code Civil Proc. § 460, providing that, in an action for libel or slander, it is not necessary to state in the complaint any extrinsic facts for the purpose of showing the application to plaintiff of the defamatory matter, but it is sufficient to state generally that the same was spoken or published concerning plaintiff. PATERSON, J., dissenting. De Witt v. Wright, 57 Cal. 576, disapproved.

2. Where a complaint for slander charges only a single utterance of the defamatory matter, and there is proof of that and other utterances, it is not error for the court to refuse to compel plaintiff to elect which of the utterances was the original, and which the repetitions, since plaintiff can only recover for the single utterance alleged and proved, evidence of the others being competent only to show malice.

3. In a complaint for slander in uttering words slanderous in themselves, an allegation that they were false implies malice, and plaintiff need not expressly allege malice, or prove it in the first instance.

4. In such case, where defendant in his answer alleges that the words were spoken in a privileged communication, he thereby tenders the issue of malice, and plaintiff is entitled to introduce any competent evidence of express malice as fully as if it had been alleged in her complaint.

5. In an action for slander, in uttering defamatory words concerning plaintiff, evidence of other utterances of words of similar import is admissible to show malice.

6. Though a complaint for slander may allege that the defamatory words were spoken in the presence and hearing of "divers persons," it is not necessary to show that they were uttered in the presence of more than one third person, the allegation being but a formal averment of a publication.

7. In an action for slander defendant pleaded that he uttered the defamatory words in a privileged communication to a third person, but there was evidence that he had repeated the words to others on different occasions, and there was other evidence tending to show that the words were false, and that defendant had expressed a determination to injure plaintiff's reputation. Held, that the jury were warranted in finding that defendant was actuated by express malice, and therefore was not entitled to the immunity of a privileged communication, under Civil Code, §§ 47, 48, declaring a communication "without malice," under certain circumstances, to be privileged, and that, under such circumstances, malice is not to be inferred from the communication, but must be established by extrinsic proof.

8. In an action for slander, evidence of threats by defendant to ruin plaintiff's reputation is admissible to show malice.

9. In an action for slander in saying that plaintiff was a thief, testimony that a third person represented to defendant that he had lost money from his pocket while plaintiff was employed in the house where he stayed is properly excluded as hearsay.

10. In an action for slander, evidence that plaintiff besought certain persons to endeavor to secure certain testimony in her behalf, which testimony is irrelevant, is properly excluded.

11. Nor is such evidence admissible because of its tendency to show the animus of plaintiff in bringing the suit, as it could have no weight in determining her right of recovery.

12. In an action for slander in charging plaintiff with being a thief, where express malice is shown, punitive damages may be awarded under Civil Code, § 8294, and a verdict will not be disturbed unless the amount of damages awarded is so great as to shock the moral sense, and raise the presumption that the jury were actuated by passion or prejudice.

13. In an action for slander an instruction asked by defendant respecting privileged communications, which omits the qualification that such a communication must be made without malice, is properly refused, since, under Civil Code, § 47, a communication made with malice is not privileged.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; J. J. DE HAVEN, Judge.

Action for slander. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest Sevier, E. W. Wilson, and Wilson & Wilson, for appellant. S. M. Buck and N. L. Smith, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action for slander. It is alleged in the complaint "that, on or about the 15th day of April, 1887, at the city of Eureka, in the county of Humboldt, and state of California, the defendant, in the presence and hearing of divers good and worthy persons, spoke the following words of and concerning the plaintiff: 'She is a damned thief.'" The appellant contends that this allegation is insufficient, and that the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained for the reason that it is not alleged that the words charged to have been spoken were understood by those who heard them to refer to the plaintiff. Under the common law a declaration for slander had become so artificial and prolix, by reason of the technical objections to its form, that the courts were wont to sustain, in respect to the distinctions to be observed between the averment, the inducement, the colloquium, and the innuendo, and the requirements of strictly confining to each and elaborately presenting therein the matter that belonged to that head, that the action, instead of being the mode by which a plaintiff could obtain satisfaction for an injury he had sustained, was often made the means by which justice was herself smothered in her own robes. The case of Miller v. Maxwell, 16 Wend. 9, is an illustration of this, and is said to have been a potent factor in bringing about the radical change in the rules of pleading which were effected in the state of New York in 1848. When this reform in pleading was made, and all forms of action were merged in a complaint, in which the facts constituting the plaintiff's cause of action were to be stated in ordinary and concise language, so deeply had the form of pleading in actions of slander become rooted into the system that it was deemed necessary to make a special provision against the necessity of continuing that form. Accordingly it is provided in section 460, Code Civil Proc.: "In an action for libel or slander it is not necessary to state in the complaint any extrinsic facts for the purpose of showing the application to the plaintiff of the defamatory matter out of which the cause of action arose; but it is sufficient to state generally that the same was published or spoken concerning the plaintiff; and, if such allegation be controverted, the plaintiff must establish, on the trial, that it was so published or spoken." By this provision the inducement and colloquium are dispensed with, and, if the words charged are libelous in themselves, the plaintiff is only required to allege that the libelous words were spoken "of and concerning the plaintiff." This is an issuable fact, as was the colloquium under the former system, and, if denied, must be established at the trial. If the words used are not libelous in themselves, or if they have some occult meaning or local signification, and require proof to determine their meaning, or to show that they are libelous, or if they are words in a foreign language, it is necessary to make such allegation of their meaning as will show them to be actionable, and by averment "to ascertain that to the court which is generally or doubtfully expressed." Van Vechten v. Hopkins, 5 Johns. 220. "The statute dispenses with them [that is, the colloquium and innuendo] only so far as they show that the defamatory words applied to the plaintiff, and goes no further. The averments necessary in common-law pleading to show the meaning of the words must still be made." Bliss, Code Pl. § 305. See, also, Fry v. Bennett, 5 Sandf. 54; Petsch v. Printing Co., 40 Minn. 291, 41 N. W. Rep. 1034; McLaughlin v. Russell, 17 Ohio, 479; Wesley v. Bennett, 5 Abb. Pr. 498; Pike v. Van Wormer, 5 How. Pr. 171; Cook v. Rief, 52 N. Y. Super. Ct. 302. In such a case it is necessary to aver that the persons who heard the words understood that such meaning was intended. This, however, is only for the purpose of showing that to the minds of the hearers the words were libelous, and therefore injurious to the plaintiff. Whether those who heard the words understood that they had reference to the plaintiff is one of the "extrinsic facts" by which the application of the defamatory matter to the plaintiff, if controverted, must be established on the trial, but need not be alleged. Their application to the plaintiff is to be established by proof, and the understanding by the hearers that they were applicable to the plaintiff is included in the averment that they were spoken "concerning the plaintiff." The averment of the libelous character of the words places them in the same category as does the allegation of speaking libelous words in the English language. If the words charged to have been spoken are in the vernacular, and are libelous in themselves, then there need be no allegation that the hearers understood them to have reference to the plaintiff. In Russell v. Kelly, 44 Cal. 641, the rule was established in this state that it might be shown at the trial, by the testimony of witnesses, that they understood from the language of the libel that the plaintiff was the person intended thereby. "Where the language published is the vernacular of the place of publication, it requires no proof that those who heard or read it understood it. * * * Where the matter published is in a language which he who hears or reads it understands, it will be assumed he understood it in the sense which properly belongs to it." Townsh. Sland. & L. § 97.

In the present case the words used are libelous in themselves, and, being in the English language, are presumed to have been understood by the hearers to be libelous; and the allegation that they were spoken "of and concerning the plaintiff" imports that the hearers so understood them. It would violate all rules of construction of language to hold that when the defendant said concerning the plaintiff, "She is a thief," those who heard him did not understand that he said that the plaintiff is a thief. In De Witt v. Wright, 57 Cal. 576, the court held, in an action for a libel, that the allegations in the complaint, similar to those in the present case, were insufficient in not averring that those who read the libel understood that the plaintiff was intended thereby; saying: "To enable the plaintiff to maintain an action on it, it is essential, not only that it should have been written concerning the plaintiff, but also that it was so understood by at least some one third person;" and that section 460, Code Civil Proc., "does not do away with the necessity of the averment that the person or persons who read the writing, or heard the words, knew the plaintiff was meant." This construction of section 460 is at variance with the terms of the section itself, and is not supported by authority, and cannot, we think, be sustained upon principle. Upon a careful and extended examination of the authorities, we have not been able to find any other case in which it has been held that when the words charged to have been spoken are libelous in themselves, and were uttered in the vernacular of those to whom they were addressed, it is necessary to make any averment other than that they were spoken "of and concerning the plaintiff;" or to allege that they were understood by the hearers to apply to the plaintiff. None of the text-writers lays down such a rule, and the precedents of declarations found in Chitty do not contain such an allegation. The cases cited in De Witt v. Wright, in support of the proposition, were cases in which the words charged to have been uttered were not libelous in themselves, and the decisions thereon were only to the extent that it must be averred that the hearers understood the libelous sense in which the words were used, and that by those words a libelous charge was made; and not that the plaintiff was the person to whom they were applicable. The court, in that case, applied the rule which requires such averment when the words used are ambiguous, or innocent in themselves; but this rule, as we have seen, is inapplicable to a case in which there is no ambiguity or uncertainty in the words used. In the editions of Chitty published since the enactment in England of the Common-Law Procedure Act, corresponding to our Code of Civil Procedure, the precedent for a declaration in slander is given as follows: "For that the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published of the plaintiff the words following, that is to say, 'He is a thief.'" 2 Chit. Pl. (16th Ed.) p. 547. In Robinson v. Keyser, 22 N. H. 323, the declaration alleged that the defendant "did speak and publish of and concerning the plaintiff the false, scandalous, and malicious words following, to-wit: 'He [meaning the said Robinson] is a thief and a liar, and I [meaning the defendant] can prove it.'" Upon demurrer to the sufficiency of this declaration, the court said: "Where the words, according to their usual acceptation, plainly import of themselves the charge of a crime, no colloquium or innuendo is necessary. It is sufficient if they are alleged to have been spoken of the plaintiff." In Ryckman v. Delavan, 25 Wend. 194, the court said: "In verbal slander the whole conversation is seldom set out, for, if that was required, it would generally be impossible to prove the whole conversation as laid in the declaration. It is, therefore, allowable in such cases to set out the actionable words, and merely to show that they were intended to be applied to the plaintiff, and must have been so understood by those who heard them, by averring that they were spoken in a conversation of and concerning him; and the declaration in such case will be good if the actionable words could have been applied personally to the plaintiff, leaving him to establish by proof upon the trial that the defendant did, in fact, apply them to him personally, and not merely to him and others as a class; and that those who heard the words understood them to be thus individually and personally applied."

The court did not err in refusing to compel the plaintiff, at the close of the testimony, to elect which of the publications was the original, and which the repetitions. The complaint charged a single publication, and of this the plaintiff made proof. It was for the damage sustained by this publication alone that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. For the purpose of showing malice in its publication it was competent for the plaintiff to offer proof that the defendant had on other occasions uttered the same or similar words, but for the damage sustained by the utterance of the words on those occasions the plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this action; consequently she could not be compelled to elect either of those publications as the basis of her recovery herein.

It was not necessary for the plaintiff to allege in her complaint, or to establish by proof in the first instance, that the defamatory words were spoken with malice. Her allegation that "the said words were false" implied malice on the part of the defendant. For the purpose of rebutting this presumption the defendant had pleaded that the words were spoken in a privileged communication, and, if so, it then became necessary for the plaintiff to prove express malice. The issue of malice was, therefore, tendered by the answer of the defendant, and the facts therein set forth were by the statute "deemed controverted," as fully as though spread upon the record. Upon this issue the plaintiff was at liberty to introduce any competent evidence of express malice, as fully as though it had been alleged in her original complaint, and denied in the answer of the defendant; and other utterances of words of similar import would be competent evidence for that purpose. Association v. McDermott, 44 N. J. Law, 430; Chamberlin v. Vance, 51 Cal. 84; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 418; Townsh. Sland. & L. § 392.

It was not necessary for the plaintiff to show that the words were uttered in the presence of more than one third person. The allegation that the defendant had spoken the words "in the presence and hearing of divers good and worthy persons" was but the formal averment of a publication, and proof of the publication in the presence of one person satisfied the averment without a literal proof as alleged.

Whether the utterance of the words by the defendant to the witness Lohide was a privileged communication depended upon the circumstances under which they were uttered, and by which such claim would be qualified. The court could not determine, as a matter of law, that this was a privileged communication, unless the facts under which it was made were conceded; and, in the absence of such concession, it was necessary that the jury should determine those facts. Klinck v. Golby, 46 N. Y. 431. The court, however, fully instructed the jury upon the evidence introduced for the purpose of showing that the communication was privileged, and the facts necessary to establish such a relation between the witness and the defendant as would render it a privileged communication; and that, if they found such facts from the evidence, the communication would be privileged, and was to be disregarded, unless there was other evidence of malice than would be implied from the falsity of this communication. A privileged communication is defined in section 47 of the Civil Code to be one made "(3) in a communication, without malice, to a person interested therein, by one who is also interested, or by one who stands in such a relation to the person interested as to afford a reasonable ground for supposing the motive for the communication innocent, or who is requested by the person interested to give the information;" and in such a case, by section 48, "malice is not to be inferred from the communication or publication," but must be established by extrinsic proof. Evidence was offered, in behalf of the plaintiff, that the defendant had repeated the defamatory words to others upon different occasions, and there was other evidence before the jury tending to establish the falsity of the charge, and also that the defendant had expressed a purpose to injure her reputation. If the jury believed this evidence, they were authorized to find therefrom that the defendant was actuated by express malice in the utterance of the words to Lohide, and therefore was not entitled to the immunity of a privileged communication.

The evidence of the plaintiff respecting the threats of the defendant to ruin her reputation was admissible for the purpose of establishing malice. When this testimony was offered, the counsel for the defendant admitted the relevancy of a portion of it, but declined to point out the portion to which he objected as irrelevant, notwithstanding the offer of the court to rule thereon, and reject such as was inadmissible. The court, therefore, did not err in admitting the evidence offered. Board v. Keenan, 55 Cal. 642.

The offer on the part of the defendant to show by the testimony of Mrs. Zanone that one Antone Chisa had represented to the defendant that he had lost $10 from his vest pocket while the plaintiff was in the employ of the defendant was clearly inadmissible. It was but hearsay, and without any offer to show that Chisa had in fact lost any money.

The court also properly rejected the testimony offered to show that the plaintiff had besought Hildreth and Owens to endeavor to secure testimony in her behalf. The testimony offered to be shown had no relevancy to any issue before the jury, and its tendency to establish the animus of the plaintiff in bringing the suit, as claimed by counsel, would have no weight in determining her right of recovery. The relation of the witness Wallace to the defendant was not such as to preclude him from testifying to the conversation between them. It was not "any information acquired in attending the patient which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient." Code Civil Proc. § 1881, (4.)

The record does not disclose anything from which it can be said that the damages awarded by the jury appear to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice. It is very difficult to determine the proper amount of damages in an action of this character, and the law has wisely left it to the just discretion of the jury, and has also given to them the right, upon proof that the defendant was guilty of malice, to give damages for the sake of example, and by way of punishing the defendant. Civil Code, § 3294. There can be no measure of compensation for the wrong done to a plaintiff by charging her with a crime, except the judgment of an impartial jury. Under the evidence before it the jury must have found that the defendant was guilty of malice in the utterance of the words charged, and it cannot be said that the amount awarded is so great as to "shock the moral sense." In Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 386, where there was no proof of express malice, and, as was held by the court, not a case of punitive damages, it was said, upon the claim that the damages awarded were excessive: "The court will not interfere in such cases unless the amount awarded is so grossly excessive as to shock the moral sense, and raise a reasonable presumption that the jury was under the influence of passion or prejudice. In this case, while the sum awarded appears to be much larger than the facts demanded, the amount cannot be said to be so grossly excessive as to be reasonably imputed only to passion or prejudice in the jury. In such cases there is no accurate standard by which to compute the injury, and the jury must necessarily be left to the exercise of a wide discretion, to be restricted by the court only when the sum awarded is so large that the verdict shocks the moral sense, and raises the presumption that it must have proceeded from passion or prejudice."

The court did not err in refusing to give to the jury the instruction asked by the defendant respecting privileged communications. The jury were fully instructed upon that subject in other portions of the charge, and the instruction asked was faulty in omitting the qualification that the communication was not privileged unless it was made without malice. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; DE HAVEN, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur in the judgment, and in all that is said in the opinion of Mr. Justice HARRISON, except that relating to De Witt v. Wright, 57 Cal. 576. In that case the question as to the proper construction of section 460, Code Civil Proc., was determined after full argument and careful consideration, and I think it should be adhered to, whether it agrees with our views of the section or not. It is a matter of very little importance which of the two constructions is placed upon the statute, but it is desirable, for the information and guidance of the pleader, that a construction once made should be adhered to. The complaint, according to the rule laid down in De Witt v. Wright, is insufficient; but the defendant waived the objection and cured the defect by alleging in his answer that he, in speaking to Lohaide for the purpose of informing him as to the true character of the plaintiff, said: "I believe she [meaning the plaintiff] is a thief." The answer leaves no doubt that whatever was said referred to plaintiff, and that Lohaide so understood it.

WRIGHT V. LIESENFELD. (No. 12,773.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 25, 1892.)

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—LIABILITY OF INDORSER —WAIVER OF NOTICE—EVIDENCE.

Evidence that it was understood between the indorser and the indorsee of a note that if the latter could not collect it from the maker he would come back on the indorser, and that he took the note because he had better opportunities than the indorser to see the maker, does not tend to show that the indorser waived notice of the maker's refusal to pay.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. F. SULLIVAN, Judge.

Action by Will Wright against P. Liesenfeld as indorser on a note. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jarboe, Harrison & Goodfellow, for appellant. Estee & Boalt and Estee, Wilson & McCutcheon, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Defendant appeals from an order denying him a new trial. Defendant is sued as the indorser of two promissory notes, made payable to himself, by one Hixon, and by him transferred, after maturity, to plaintiff. The complaint avers a demand upon Hixon, and due notice to defendant. A demand was proven, but no notice of the refusal to pay was given for several months after the refusal. No excuse for failure to notify the indorser is alleged or proven, but it is claimed that demand and notice were waived at the time of the transfer. Prior to the transfer, defendant had left the notes with his banker for collection, and had indorsed them for that purpose. Plaintiff had become the owner of the billiard tables, and agreed to return them to defendant for the notes, provided defendant would indorse them. The notes were procured from the bank and delivered to plaintiff, as they were. Plaintiff testified: "I asked him for the notes, duly indorsed, and they were produced. I told him then, if I should fail to collect the money from the other party, I would come back on him. * * * I stated at the time to Mr. Liesenfeld, if I could not make the money out of the other party, that I would come back to him,—come on him for it, because I did not want to give up my billiard tables on such an uncertainty, and his remark was that that was all right; that I could get the money out of the other man, because he belonged to the northern country where I was traveling,—that was up in Washington Territory, Oregon, and British Columbia,—and that I would have opportunities of seeing him, and could keep track of him. I said I would try, and I did try to get it. He said that he couldn't keep track of a man up in that territory so well as I could, and upon the strength of that, of course, I turned over my billiard tables, because I knew I was safe either way." The defendant denied having indorsed the notes to plaintiff, but claimed that the contract was that plaintiff should take the notes for the tables, without recourse upon the defendant. The evidence upon this issue was conflicting, and we cannot therefore disturb the finding. We do not find, however, in the record a scintilla of evidence tending to show that at the time of the transfer of the notes, or afterwards, demand or notice was waived. The gist of it is quoted above, and the effect is only to show that plaintiff intended to hold defendant as indorser. There is nothing which tends to prove that it was agreed, or that Liesenfeld could have understood, that he waived notice. That plaintiff would come back upon him, or look to him in case the maker did not pay, was but his right as indorsee. Liesenfeld could not have understood from this that he waived his rights as indorser. It is admitted that notice was necessary to charge the indorser, unless it was waived. As there is no evidence of such waiver, we think the finding to that effect cannot stand. We think the order should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

Weconcur: FITZGERALD, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is reversed, and a new trial granted. It is further ordered that this judgment be entered as of September 1, 1891. By direction of the chief justice, Mr. Justice SHARPSTEIN was assigned to department 1, to participate in the decision of this case, in place of Mr. Justice HARRISON, who is disqualified.

SEEGELKEN V. COREY. (No. 13,923.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 25, 1892.)

ACTION TO REFORM DEED—PLEADING.

In a complaint seeking to reform a deed so as to make it include certain land, an allegation that it was the mutual understanding and intention of the parties that the land in controversy should be described in and conveyed by the deed is a sufficient averment of an agreement to convey the land, and that the failure to describe in the deed was due to mutual mistake.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Ejectment by Henry Seegelken against Noah Corey. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. M. R. Parker and Wm. H. Webb, for appellant. Alexander & Dougherty, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The action is ejectment to recover "lot 4 of section 30, in township 15 south, of range 3 east, M. D. M.," situated in the county of Monterey, the complaint being in the usual form, but not verified. The answer "denies generally and specifically each and every allegation in the said complaint." The defendant also filed a cross-complaint in which he alleged, substantially, the following facts: That on June 17, 1885, Frederick Egan executed to defendant a quitclaim deed for land therein described, as follows: "All that part of lot 5, in section 30, of township 15 south, of range 3 east, M. D. M., according to the public land surveys of the United States, which lies to the south and west of a certain ledge of rocks on the easterly side of and running along a ravine which crosses said lot 5 in a direction south-easterly and north-westerly." This deed was acknowledged and recorded on the day of its execution. It is then alleged "that the description therein [in the deed] given of the premises intended to be conveyed was erroneous, in this: that a portion of the land intended to have been conveyed by said Egan in said deed lay in lot 4 of the same section, but at the time said deed was made, viz., June 17, 1885, defendant, Corey, was informed and believed, and so it was mutually understood between the said parties thereto, that the land intended to be conveyed all lay in lot 5 of said section 30, as set forth in said deed; and under such belief said Corey accepted said deed, and immediately went into the possession of the land intended to be conveyed, and has since said June 17, 1885, possessed, owned, and occupied the same, all of which plaintiff herein well knew. That in order to make said deed pass the premises intended to have been conveyed by said Egan, and understood to have been conveyed by said defendant herein, Corey, and to make it conform to the actual intention of the parties, it is necessary that the said description should be amended so as to read as follows: All of lot five (5) of section thirty, (30,) in township fifteen (15) south, range three (3) east, M. D. M.; and all that part of lot four (4) of said section 30 which lies to the south and west of a precipitous ledge of rocks, which said precipitous ledge crosses said lot 4 in a direction north-westerly and south-easterly, and lies immediately along the north-easterly side of a gulch or ravine, which said gulch or ravine crosses said lot 4 in a direction south-easterly from where said gulch or ravine intersects the Toro ranch line on the westerly boundary of said lot 4, near where the north and south meridian line on the westerly boundary of said lot 4 intersects the said Toro ranch line. Said gulch or ravine, after crossing said lot 4 in a south-easterly direction from above-mentioned point, intersects the corner common to lots 3, 4, 5, and the north-east $\frac{1}{4}$ of the south-west $\frac{1}{4}$ of said section 30, and said precipitous ledge intersects the easterly boundary line of said lot 4, 300 feet, more or less, north of said common corner. That on the 19th day of November, 1888, said Egan executed a deed of sale to Henry Seegelken, the plaintiff herein, for lots 3 and 4 of section 30, (above described,) by virtue of which deed said Seegelken claims an interest in a portion of the land deeded to defendant by said Egan. That said Henry Seegelken well knew at the time when said deed was made and delivered to him by said Egan that said defendant, Corey, was in possession of and claimed all the land in said lot 4, lying south and west of said precipitous ledge hereinbefore described, by virtue of his (Corey's) said deed of June 17, 1885. That defendant herein did not know of said or any error in the description of the deed to him of June 17, 1885, until said Seegelken claimed an interest in said land by virtue of his said deed from said Egan." It is then alleged that, upon discovering the error, defendant demanded of plaintiff a deed of the land claimed by defendant as above described, and that plaintiff refused, etc. The prayer is that defendant have judgment against the plaintiff, reforming defendant's deed from Egan, and adjudging the defendant to be the owner of the land according to the amended description, and for such other and further relief as shall be just and equitable.

At the instance of plaintiff, a jury was called, to which special issues, tendered by the cross-complaint, were submitted. Upon each of these special issues the jury found for the defendant. The court adopted the verdict, and added findings of its own,—all in favor of the defendant,—whereupon it was adjudged and decreed that defendant is the owner of all that part of lot 4, lying south of ledge of rocks extending across the same as per defendant's proposed amendment of the description in his deed from Egan, and that plaintiff convey all his right and title to such part of lot 4 to the defendant within 10 days. The cross-complaint was demurred to generally, and also on special grounds not urged here.

While the cross-complaint is not to be commended as a precedent, I think it sufficient to stand the test of a general demurrer. All the facts necessary to entitle the defendant to the relief sought, not directly stated, are necessarily inferable from those stated. It is contended, however, that no agreement to convey any part of lot 4 nor any mutual mistake is alleged. It is alleged, substantially, that it was the mutual understanding and intention of the parties that the land in controversy should be described in and conveyed by the deed set out in the cross-complaint. This seems to be a sufficient averment of an agreement to convey; and, if the parties mutually intended to describe the land in that deed, how could it have happened, otherwise than by mutual mistake, that they did not describe it?

The mutual intention to describe it negatives the idea that the omission may have resulted from fraud. The findings are full and explicit upon all the issues, and support the judgment. There is some conflict in the evidence, but it seems to preponderate considerably in favor of the findings. The findings show that the defendant is the equitable owner of the land, and that plaintiff took the legal title from Egan with notice of defendant's rights; and there is no allegation nor proof that there was any consideration for the deed from Egan to plaintiff, nor that plaintiff ever made any improvement upon the land. The court did not err in overruling plaintiff's objection to the testimony of R. Corey as to the declaration and acts of Egan in relation to the land in controversy before he conveyed to plaintiff. Code Civil Proc. § 1849. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

REED et al. v. RING et al. (No. 14,187.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 26, 1892.)

APPOINTMENT OF GUARDIAN—STARE DECISIS—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. Though, on the death of the owner of a Mexican grant in 1844, his property vested at once in his heirs, and there could be no administration on his estate after the acquisition of California and the organization of the state government, the appointment of a guardian for the minor children of such a decedent, which was authorized by Act April 19, 1850, was not void because the same order also appointed the guardian administrator of the decedent's estate, or because it was entitled "In the matter of the estate of" such decedent, and directed that letters of guardianship of the "heirs" be granted, without naming them, it appearing that the children were known.

2. The fact that, after a decision of the supreme court reversing and remanding a cause, the action is dismissed in the lower court, and no judgment is entered which could be pleaded in bar, or given in evidence, does not prevent such decision from being the law of the case, to be followed in a subsequent action between the same parties for the same relief.

3. In August, 1850, letters of administration on the estate of one R., who had died owning a Mexican grant, and of guardianship of his children, was granted to one G. In September following the court authorized G., as administrator and guardian, to sell the land, which he did. Subsequently, in a suit by the widow of R., and the children by their guardians, to set aside the sale, a judgment was rendered setting it aside as to part of the land and confirming it as to the balance. A patent from the government was, in 1885, issued to the children of R. for the whole tract. In 1890—more than 20 years after reaching their majority—they brought ejectment for that portion which had been sold in 1850, and confirmed in the purchaser. Held that, even if the sale was void, the action was barred by the guardians' act of 1850, section 84, which is substantially re-enacted in Code Civil Proc. § 1806, providing that no action for the recovery of any estate sold by a guardian can be maintained by the ward, unless it is commenced within three years next after the termination of the guardianship; or, when a legal disability to sue exists by reason of minority at the time when the cause of action accrues, within three years next after the removal thereof.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. MAHON, Judge.

Action by John P. Reed and others against George E. Ring and others to recover land. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. & Geo. Leviston, for appellants. Hepburn Walkins, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. In 1834, John Reed obtained a Mexican grant of a tract of land known as the "Rancho Corte Madera del Presidio," and situate in what is now Marin county, in this state. In 1844 he died intestate, leaving a widow and four minor children, one of whom died in 1853. In 1852 the widow and children presented their petition to the board of land commissioners created by the act of congress, approved March 3, 1851, for the confirmation to them of the said grant, and such proceedings were afterwards had that the same was duly confirmed, and a patent therefor issued to the surviving children on the 25th of February, 1855. On the 14th of August, 1850, letters of administration on the estate of Reed and of guardianship of his children were granted to John S. Gibbs by the probate court of Marin county. On the 16th of September, 1850, the same court, on petition of Gibbs, made an order authorizing him, as administrator of the estate and guardian of the minor children of Reed, to sell the said rancho with other property, after giving notice of the sale by posting and publication, for a sum not less than $30,000; and in pursuance of this order he sold the property to Benjamin R. Buckelew for the sum of $35,000. The sale was then reported to the court, and by it confirmed, and Gibbs was ordered to execute to the purchaser conveyances of the property sold, which he did. Subsequently Mrs. Reed, who had married again, and was then known as Ylaria Garcia, her husband, Bernardino Garcia, and the four Reed children, by their guardians, commenced an action in the district court of the seventh judicial district in and for Marin county against Buckelew and Gibbs to set aside the said sale, and such proceedings were had therein that on the 29th of September, 1851, judgment was rendered rescinding and setting aside the sale as to all of the rancho except 320 acres thereof, and, as to the last-named tract, confirming it. The language of the judgment, so far as it confirms the sale, is as follows: "Out of the rescinding of the said sale and conveyance of the said estate of the said John Reed, deceased, are to be wholly excepted and reserved three hundred and twenty acres of land, situate on that part of said estate known as 'California City,' [giving description by metes and bounds,] as to which said parcel of three hundred and twenty acres of land the said sale and conveyance so made by the said John S. Gibbs, as such guardian and administrator, is hereby confirmed, and shall forever stand good and valid, both against the said Juan Reed, Marie Reed, Eularia Reed, and Ricardo Reed, and the said Ylaria Garcia and Bernardino Garcia, and against them, and each and every of them, their heirs and assigns, and all persons claiming under them or any of them, the title of the said last-mentioned parcel of three hundred and twenty acres of land is confirmed to the said Benjamin R. Buckelew, his heirs and assigns, in fee-simple forever." This judgment was never appealed from, modified, or set aside.

In October, 1859, Edwin Gardner acquired all the right, title, and interest of Buckelew in and to the said 320 acres, confirmed to him as aforesaid, under a sheriff's deed of the property; and shortly after receiving the deed he entered into possession of the premises, inclosed them with a substantial fence, and continued to occupy them, under claim of title, and adversely to all other persons, until the 6th of December, 1879, when he conveyed the same to the defendant George E. Ring. In February, 1867, the children of Reed commenced an action of ejectment against Gardner and his tenants to recover possession of the said 320 acres of land. The case was tried in the district court in November of the same year, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiffs. From that judgment and an order denying them a new trial the defendants appealed to the supreme court, where, in November, 1870, the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. The opinion of the court was delivered by RHODES, C. J., and concurred in by Justices WALLACE, TEMPLE, and CROCKETT. The case is not reported, and we therefore quote the opinion in full, so far as it relates to the points made here. It is as follows: "It is also urged that the court did not acquire jurisdiction of the infant plaintiffs in that action, [Garcia vs. Buckelew.] Infants sue by their guardians, who are appointed for that purpose by the court or the proper judge, and, when the action is brought by a guardian appointed in that manner, the court acquires jurisdiction of the infant plaintiffs. The infant plaintiffs in that case were represented by four guardians. The plaintiff introduced in evidence an order of the district judge appointing two of the persons named as guardians; and, if the other two persons acted in that capacity without having been duly appointed, it was erroneous, but that fact would not make the proceedings in the action void. It is further contended that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of that suit; or, to state the position of counsel in his own language, 'that the district court had no jurisdiction in any possible case to convey the property of these children to Buckelew or to confirm it to him, or to make any change whatever in the title of the property.' The principal purpose of the suit was to have the sale of the Reed rancho, [which included the lands in controversy in this action,] which had been made by the administrator of Reed's estate, set aside. The plaintiffs alleged the sale was illegal and void, and the defendant Buckelew alleged that the sale was valid, and that the deed executed in pursuance thereof vested in him the title to the lands.

The court decreed that the sale and the deed as to all the lands, except the lands involved in this action, be rescinded and set aside; and as to the last-mentioned lands it was decreed that the sale and conveyance be confirmed, and remain valid as against the plaintiffs in this action. The question as to whether the court had jurisdiction to convey the property of the infant plaintiffs, or to make any change in the title thereto, does not arise; nor does the question arise as to whether the court had jurisdiction to confirm the sale or conveyance to Buckelew; that is to say, to confirm by direct action, as in case of a sale or conveyance made under the order of the court. The decree, although it is prefaced with the recital that 'it would be best and for the ultimate interest and satisfaction of all the parties to this suit' that the sale of the estate of Reed, (deceased,) except the premises in controversy in this suit, made under the order of the probate court by the administrator of the estate, and the guardian of the infant heirs of Reed, should be rescinded, yet it is a direct adjudication that the sale and conveyance of the premises in controversy was valid, and that as to the remainder of the estate of Reed it was invalid. However unsatisfactory and unstable to us the reasons and grounds might appear upon which the court acted in decreeing that the sale and conveyance of the rancho was valid as to one parcel and invalid as to another parcel of the general tract, they are beyond our reach in a collateral attack upon the decree. A judgment or decree, as we held in Joyce v. McAvoy, 31 Cal. 273, binds an infant equally with an adult, and it is not subject to an attack in any other mode in the one case than in the other. If the sale by the administrator did not divest the infants of their estate,—and the authorities cited by their counsel are ample to show that it did not have that effect,—then the decree was clearly erroneous, and for that reason might have been reversed on appeal; but it was not, for that cause, void. The entry in the judgment book that 'by the consent of parties the following decree was ordered by the court to be filed' did not have the effect to overcome the recital in the decree that it was rendered 'after hearing the proofs and allegations of the respective parties.' But, if it were entered by the consent of the parties, and without proof, there are no cases brought to our attention which hold that it was thereby rendered void. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial." The remittitur, with a copy of the opinion of the supreme court, was filed in the trial court on the 10th of May, 1871, and thereafter, when the case was again called for trial, the action was dismissed by the plaintiffs without prejudice.

When defendant Ring purchased the 320 acres from Gardner in December, 1879, he paid for the property its full value, and supposed he obtained a good title to it. He at once took possession of the tract, and, by himself and tenants, continued in such possession, claiming title, and paying all taxes assessed against it, up to the time of the trial of this action. This action was commenced in February, 1890, to recover possession of the same 320 acres, and the plaintiffs alleged that they had title thereto under the patent issued to the Reed heirs in February, 1885. The defendants denied the plaintiffs' ownership of the demanded premises, and pleaded in bar of the action the statutes of limitation, and they also pleaded in defense of the action all the proceedings hereinbefore set forth. The case was tried by the court without a jury, and the findings and judgment were in favor of the defendants. From that judgment and an order denying them a new trial, the plaintiffs appeal. Counsel on both sides have filed elaborate briefs, and have ably and learnedly discussed all the questions of law and fact supposed to arise in the case. We do not, however, deem it necessary to follow their arguments, and review at length all the points presented.

1. While it is true that on the death of Reed his property vested at once in his heirs, and there could be no administration on his estate after the acquisition of California and the organization of our state government, still the probate court had jurisdiction to appoint a guardian of his minor children. This was authorized by an act of the legislature, passed April 19, 1850, entitled "An act to provide for the appointment and prescribe the duties of guardians." St. 1850, p. 268. And, though the order appointing Gibbs was dual, we do not think it void for that reason as to the guardianship. Nor do we think it void because it was entitled "In the matter of the estate of John Reed, deceased," and directed that letters of guardianship of the heirs be granted, without naming them. The statute authorized the appointment of guardians, and provided that "before appointing any person guardian of a minor the judge shall require of such person a bond," etc., but it did not require the actual issuance of letters. The order was preceded by a recital "that, whereas, John S. Gibbs had conformed to all the requirements of the law in his application, * * * proof of the same being before the court;" and it was followed by another order made on the same day in which Gibbs was spoken of as the "guardian of his [Reed's] minor children." From all this we think it appears that Gibbs was appointed and became the guardian of the four children, notwithstanding they were not individually named. They were known, and that was certain which could be made certain.

2. It is urged by counsel for appellants that the judgment in the case of Garcia et al. vs. Buckelew et al., confirming the sale, did not become a valid judgment, so as to operate as an estoppel, because it was never entered; that it was void, because not based on any issue in the case; that it was also void as to the infant plaintiffs, because the suit was not commenced by their guardian or next friend, appointed for that purpose; and, further, that it was void because it was given by consent. But the judgment was entered in a book entitled "Minute and Judgment Book," and it was proved that for the period beginning with and including the year 1850 down to July, 1857, all the judgments of the court were entered in that book, and that no other judgment book was to be found among the archives of the court. And as to the issues in the case the complaint alleged that the sale and all the proceedings leading up to it were illegal and void, and the defendant Buckelew alleged that the sale and proceedings were valid, and that the deed executed in pursuance thereof vested in him the title to the lands. So, as to the guardian, the record shows that two guardians ad litem of the infant plaintiffs were appointed by the court in December, 1850, and the same persons were named in the complaint as the guardians by whom the infants sued. And as to the last objection the minutes state that: "In the above case, the complaint and answer being read, by consent of parties the following decree was ordered by the court to be filed;" but the decree recites that "on reading the complaint and answer on file in this cause, and after hearing the proofs and allegations of the respective parties, and due deliberation being had thereupon, and it appearing to the court now here," etc. It will be observed that these matters were considered by the supreme court in Reed v. Gardner, and decided contrary to the theory of appellants. In that case the subject-matter involved, and the parties or their predecessors in interest, were the same as in this. The decision, therefore, after the lapse of 20 years, and after rights may have been acquired on the faith of it, we think, should be treated and followed as "the law of the case." It is suggested by counsel for appellants that that decision should not be considered the law of the case, for the reason, among others, that after the going down of the remittitur the action was dismissed, and no judgment was entered which could be pleaded in bar or given in evidence. A similar question was spoken of by Mr. Justice FIELD in his concurring opinion in the case of Knight v. Association, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 258, lately decided by the supreme court of the United States. Referring to the case of Tripp v. Spring, 5 Sawy. 209, 212, where, at the close of the trial, an oral opinion was rendered and subsequently written out, the case in the mean time, however, having been dismissed, the learned justice said: "The opinion of the court, pronounced at the close of the trial, and subsequently written out, was, notwithstanding the dismissal, as much authority on the questions of law presented as though a formal judgment had been entered, although the judgment ordered, because not entered on account of the dismissal, could not be pleaded in bar of a future action."

3. But, whatever view may be taken of the questions so far considered, we think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed, on the ground that the cause of action was barred. Section 1806 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "No action for the recovery of any estate sold by a guardian can be maintained by the ward, or by any person claiming under him, unless it is commenced within three years next after the termination of the guardianship; or, when a legal disability to sue exists, by reason of minority or otherwise, at the time when the cause of action accrues, within three years next after the removal thereof." This section is a substantial reenactment of section 34 of the guardians' act of 1850. Here, as we have seen, Gibbs was appointed guardian of the Reed children, and as such sold the property in question; and more than 20 years were allowed to pass after they and each of them became of age, and after the termination of his guardianship, and more than 3 years after the issuance of the patent, before this action was commenced. Conceding, therefore, that the sale was void, still that fact did not save the case from the bar of the statute. Harlan v. Peck, 33 Cal. 515. We advise that the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

WELLER v. DICKINSON et al. (No. 13,697.)
(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1892.)

ACTION ON JUDGMENT—PLEADING.

1. In an action on a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, the judgment is sufficiently pleaded by an allegation that it was recovered, without setting forth jurisdictional facts; the presumption being that the court acted within the authority conferred upon it by law.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 456, providing that a judgment of a court may be pleaded by stating that such judgment "was duly given or made," refers to judgments of courts of special jurisdiction only.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. P. HOGE, Judge.

Action by Miranda Weller against Harvey Dickinson and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. H. Lowenthal, for appellants. D. Wm. Douthitt, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. The complaint substantially states that "section 23 of ordinance No. 1587, as amended by order No. 1923 of the city and county of San Francisco, provides: 'No person shall, within the limits of the city and county of San Francisco, explode any blast, or use powder or other explosive material for the purpose of blasting, unless he shall have first filed in the office of the clerk of the board of supervisors a good and sufficient bond, with two sureties, in the sum of twenty thousand dollars, that he will pay all damages occasioned thereby, and that said sureties are jointly and severally bound to pay any judgment which may be awarded in any of the courts of the city and county against said city and county, or against the person exploding such blasts, by reason of any damage resulting therefrom,' etc. In pursuance of such ordinance, one Tibbals filed his bond, with the defendants as sureties thereon. Upon May 18, 1889, plaintiff recovered a judgment in department No. 4 of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for the sum of $331.33 against Lizzie Tibbals, as executrix of the last will and testament of said Tibbals, deceased, on account of damages sustained to plaintiff's property by the blasting of said Tibbals. That said judgment is unsatisfied, and said estate is insolvent." It will be seen that this is an action against the sureties upon the bond given by Tibbals to the city and county, to recover the amount of the judgment rendered in the action against Lizzie Tibbals, as executrix, and is based upon that provision of the bond wherein defendants bound themselves to pay all judgments against the said Tibbals for damages caused as already stated. A special demurrer was interposed to the complaint, which was overruled. Defendants failed to answer, and judgment was entered as prayed for. This is an appeal from the judgment, and the only question involved is as to the sufficiency of the complaint.

The basis of plaintiff's cause of action was the fact that she had obtained a judgment against Lizzie Tibbals, as executrix of the estate of J. S. Tibbals, deceased. Does she sufficiently plead that judgment? We think the allegation sufficient, and that section 456 of the Code of Civil Procedure, providing that a judgment of a court may be pleaded by stating that such judgment "was duly given or made," has no reference to the judgments of courts of general jurisdiction. Section 59 of the former practice act, pertaining to the same subject-matter, was limited in terms to the judgments of courts of special jurisdiction. In transposing the provision to the Code the limitation is omitted, presumably because entirely unnecessary. The object of the section was not to place limitations and restrictions upon the manner of pleading judgments, but the intent of the legislative mind in formulating the provision was to simplify the manner of pleading judgments, by eliminating the necessity of setting out the jurisdictional facts upon which the judgments were based,—a task which in many cases demanded great care and labor. The words of the section itself directly indicate that such was the object and intent of the legislature; for the section says: "In pleading a judgment, it is not necessary to state the facts conferring jurisdiction," etc.; the section thus referring very clearly to that character of judgments which, prior to the enactment of the provision, required to be pleaded by setting out the jurisdictional facts. The object of the law being to simplify the pleading of a judgment by dispensing with the necessity of a showing of the jurisdictional facts, and the law, prior to the enactment of the section, not requiring the pleading of a judgment of a court of general jurisdiction to include the jurisdictional facts, the necessity of the provision as to such judgments was not present, and it is apparent that the section has no reference to the judgments of courts of general jurisdiction. Mr. Freeman, in his work on Judgments, (section 452,) says: "From the well-known rule that courts of superior or general jurisdiction are presumed to act by right, and within the authority conferred upon them by law, it follows that their judgments and decrees are, in all cases, of at least prima facie validity. In asserting such a judgment or decree as a cause of action or as a ground of defense, the plaintiff need state no jurisdictional facts;" and in referring to certain cases he says: "But, in so far as these cases indicate that it is essential to aver anything whatever to show the jurisdiction of courts of record, they are not sustained by the authorities." We see no defects in the complaint. Let the judgment be affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PHELAN. (No. 20,861.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 27, 1892.)

BURGLARY—EVIDENCE OF INTOXICATION—INSTRUCTIONS.

On a prosecution for burglary, an instruction that evidence of drunkenness can only be considered for the purpose of determining the degree of the crime is error, since under Pen. Code, § 459, burglary is the entering a building with intent to commit grand or petit larceny, or any felony, and since section 22 declares that, "whenever the actual existence of any purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any particular species or degree of crime, the jury may take into consideration the fact that the accused was intoxicated at the time, in determining the purpose, motive, or intent with which he committed the act."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. C. B. HEBBARD, Judge.

Information against one Phelan for burglary. From a judgment of conviction, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Smith, Murasky, and Louis E. Phillips, for appellant. Wm. S. Barnes and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Appellant and two other persons were accused by information of feloniously and burglariously entering a building with the felonious intent of committing larceny therein. The defendants pleaded not guilty, and two of them demanded separate trials; and appellant was tried separately, and the jury found him guilty of burglary in the first degree. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, and from the judgment, he appeals to this court.

The main contention of appellant here is that the court erred in giving the following instruction to the jury: "As to intoxication, I charge you that voluntary intoxication or drunkenness is no excuse for the commission of a crime. Intoxication is only permitted to be given in evidence for the purpose of throwing light upon the intent, motive, or purpose which the person may have had in doing the act complained of. Evidence of drunkenness can only be considered by the jury for the purpose of determining the degree of the crime, and for this purpose it must be received with great caution." The portion which we have italicized is repugnant to what precedes it, and likewise repugnant to section 22 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows: "No act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his having been in such condition; but, whenever the actual existence of any purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any particular species or degree of crime, the jury may take into consideration the fact that the accused was intoxicated at the time, in determining the purpose, motive, or intent with which he committed the act." Entering a building with intent to commit grand or petit larceny, or any felony, constitutes burglary. Pen. Code, § 459. The intent with which a building is entered is a necessary element to constitute a particular species of crime, viz., the crime of burglary. Therefore the jury might have taken into consideration the fact—if such were the fact—that the accused was intoxicated at the time he entered the building, in determining the purpose, motive, or intent with which he committed the act. The jury, however, were instructed that the evidence of drunkenness in this case could only be considered by the jury for the purpose of determining the degree of the crime, about which there was no question; all the evidence, without conflict, being that the building was entered in the night-time. We are not at liberty to speculate as to what the verdict might have been if a proper, instead of an erroneous, instruction had been given. As given, the instruction withdrew from the consideration of the jury evidence which the Code says a jury may consider in determining the intent with which an act is committed. The evidence in this case tends to prove that appellant, before and at the time he entered the building, was intoxicated. Whether he was intoxicated to such a degree as to render him incapable of forming or entertaining an intent to commit grand or petit larceny, or any felony, in the building, was exclusively for the determination of the jury. The instruction that the jury could not consider that evidence for any other purpose than that of determining the degree of the crime is clearly erroneous, and for that error the judgment appealed from must be reversed. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

BURNETT v. LYFORD et al. (No. 14,229.)

(Supreme Court of California. Jan. 28, 1892.)

MORTGAGE—ASSIGNMENT—FORECLOSURE—PURCHASE BY MORTGAGOR'S ADMINISTRATOR.

1. In a suit to foreclose a mortgage given to a corporation, and by it assigned to plaintiff by indorsement, where the indorsement has been introduced in evidence without objection, the signature and corporate seal of the corporation must be assumed to be genuine, and to have been affixed by proper authority, and cannot be objected to as insufficient by defendant for the first time on appeal.

2. In a suit to foreclose a mortgage against the mortgagor's administrator and a third person claiming an interest in the mortgaged property, brought by an assignee of the mortgage, the introduction in evidence of the assignment to plaintiff prima facie shows title in him, and the right to sue, and if such third person would question such right he should do so by his answer.

3. A husband and his wife executed mortgages on the latter's separate estate. The wife died before the husband, and L. was appointed administrator of both estates. The mortgages were assigned by the mortgagee to plaintiff, who brought a suit to foreclose against L. and one J., who claimed an interest in the property as purchaser at a sale under execution against the husband of the share inherited by him from his wife. At the trial J. showed that the assignment from the mortgagee to plaintiff was made at the instance of L., who furnished the money therefor, and claimed that, under Code Civil Proc. § 1617, forbidding an administrator to purchase a claim against the estate he represents, the effect of the transaction was to satisfy the mortgage. Held, that the defense, even if good, was not available to J., in the absence of an allegation in reference thereto in his answer.

4. Code Civil Proc. § 1617, forbidding an administrator to "purchase" a claim against the estate he represents, does not prevent him, for the purpose of protecting the estate against a sacrifice under the foreclosure of a mortgage, from advancing his own funds, and taking an assignment of the mortgage either to himself or a third person.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. MAHON, Judge.

Action by George G. Burnett against one Lyford and Egbert Judson, to foreclose mortgages. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Judson appeals. Affirmed.

E. W. McKinstrey and E. F. Swortfiguer, for appellant. D. I. Mahoney, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action for the foreclosure of three mortgages executed to the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society by Thomas B. Deffebach and his wife, Inez Reed Deffebach. The property mortgaged was the separate estate of the wife, and the moneys obtained by the mortgages were advanced by her to discharge the personal obligations of her husband. Inez died intestate, September 15, 1883, and Thomas died intestate, June 21, 1884. The defendant Lyford is the administrator of the estate of each of the said decedents, and the defendant Judson is alleged to have some interest in the mortgaged property, subject to the lien of the mortgages. The record does not disclose the extent or character of this interest, but in their brief his counsel state that it is an undivided one-third of the mortgaged lands, acquired by him through an execution sale upon a judgment against Thomas. Judson v. Lyford, 84 Cal. 505, 24 Pac. Rep. 286. This interest was derived by Thomas upon the death of his wife, as the heir to one-third of her estate. After the death of the mortgagors the Hibernia Bank made due presentation and proof of its claims upon the mortgages against their respective estates, which were allowed and filed, and thereafter the same were assigned to the plaintiff herein. An answer was filed by the defendant Lyford, as administrator of Inez, setting up that the property mortgaged was her separate estate; that the debts secured by the mortgages were the separate obligations of Thomas; that, as between them, she was only a surety for Thomas; and that upon her death one-third of her estate descended to Thomas, and the other two-thirds to her children. No answer was filed by Lyford, as administrator of the estate of Thomas. Judson, in his answer, did not set forth the character of his interest in the lands, or allege any affirmative matter, but merely denied the assignment to the plaintiff of the notes and mortgages sued on, and denied that they were unpaid. Judgment having been rendered in favor of the plaintiff, Judson moved for a new trial, which was denied. From this order he has appealed, but no appeal has been taken from the judgment itself. The plaintiff offered in evidence the several notes and mortgages sued on, upon each of which was the following indorsement: "For value received, the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society hereby sells, assigns, transfers, and sets over to George G. Burnett all its right, title, and interest in and to the within note. HIBERNIA SAVINGS & LOAN SOCIETY, by MILES D. SWEENEY, President. [Corporate seal;]" and the said notes and mortgages, with the said indorsements, were admitted in evidence without objection. These indorsements were sufficient to vest in the plaintiff the title to the notes, and to enable him to bring the action in his own name. The assignment of the notes carried with them the mortgages, even if there had been no assignment of the security. Civil Code, § 2936. If the appellant had intended to question the sufficiency or genuineness of the indorsements, he should have done so at the time they were offered in evidence. Poorman v. Mills, 35 Cal. 121; Bullard v. Stone, 67 Cal. 482, 8 Pac. Rep. 17. The signature attached thereto, in the absence of any objection, must be assumed to be genuine. The failure to make an objection to the signature when the indorsement was offered in evidence was an admission of its genuineness, and equivalent to proof thereof; and, as the seal affixed thereto purported to be the corporate seal of the bank, it must also, in the absence of objection, be assumed to be genuine, as well as to have been affixed by proper authority. It was, therefore, evidence of the corporate act which it purported to authenticate. Ang. & A. Corp. § 224; Railroad Co. v. Morganstern, 103 Ill. 149; Trustees v. McKechnie, 90 N. Y. 629; Morris v. Keil, 20 Minn. 531, (Gil. 474;) Hutchins v. Byrnes, 9 Gray, 367; McCracken v. San Francisco, 16 Cal. 639. The burden of proving the contrary was upon the appellant, and it is not competent for him, after having allowed the evidence to be introduced without objection, and without attempting to impeach its genuineness or sufficiency, to make upon appeal an objection which was not presented at the trial, and which might have been obviated if objection had then been made. Chouquette v. Barada, 28 Mo. 497; Poorman v. Mills, supra; Bullard v. Stone, supra. The subsequent admission in evidence of what purported to be a formal assignment to the plaintiff of the notes and mortgages, even if erroneous, was a harmless error, as the assignment had already been sufficiently shown. The motion for a nonsuit was properly denied. The admission of the notes with their indorsements was evidence before the court of the plaintiff's title thereto, and right to maintain the action, and his production of the notes at the trial was evidence that they had not been paid.

At the trial it was shown by the appellant that the assignment from the bank to the plaintiff was made at the instance of the defendant Lyford, and that he (Lyford) furnished the money which was paid therefor to the bank. Upon these facts it is urged by the appellant that Lyford is the real party in interest, and that, inasmuch as by section 1617, Code Civil Proc., an administrator is forbidden to purchase a claim against the estate he represents, the legal effect of the transaction was to operate as a payment of the notes, and consequent release of the mortgage liens. Whether the plaintiff is the real party in interest, or whether the defendant Lyford is the beneficial owner of the notes and mortgages, is immaterial to the appellant, and is not available to him as a defense herein. No allegation in reference thereto was made by him, and, if he has any defense against Lyford which he would not have against the plaintiff, or if the assignment to Lyford would have given to the appellant greater rights than did the assignment to the plaintiff, it was incumbent upon him to make such allegation in his answer. Poorman v. Mills, 36 Cal. 121. The assignment of the notes to the plaintiff prima facie vested him with the title thereto, and the right to bring the action; and, if the appellant would question this right, it constituted matter of defense, which he should have alleged.

We do not think that the provisions of section 1617, Code Civil Proc., have any application to the facts of the present case, or can be invoked by the appellant to defeat the action for the foreclosure of the mortgages. If an administrator, with the desire of protecting the estate which he represents against a sacrifice of its property under the foreclosure of a mortgage, should, in case there were no funds of the estate in his hands, advance his own funds with which to relieve the property from such sacrifice, and take a transfer of the debt to himself, a probate court would be justified in allowing him, upon the settlement of his accounts, the amount so paid for the benefit of the estate; and the transaction would not be vitiated if, at his request, the transfer should be made to another instead of to himself. It might, for many reasons, be for the benefit of the estate, either for the purpose of maintaining some claim in its behalf, arising out of such debt, or for preserving some right in reference to the property affected by the debt, that the debt should not be extinguished. Such transaction of the administrator could always be questioned by the heir, or others who might have an interest in the estate, but not by a stranger. In the present case, inasmuch as the integrity of Lyford in procuring the assignment to Burnett is not questioned by Judson, either by allegation or by evidence, and as the court below sustained the transaction, we must hold that, if his acts could, under any state of facts, be sustained as valid, they must be referred to such facts, rather than be held invalid from the mere circumstance that he furnished the money with which the transfer was made to Burnett. His acts, in the absence of any evidence impeaching their character, must be held legal, rather than illegal. As the representative of the two estates, Lyford was justified in taking such steps for their protection from the enforcement of the mortgages against the property as would preserve the rights and obligations of the respective estates towards each other, and as would also compel Judson to discharge that portion of the incumbrance which, in equity, devolved upon him to discharge, by virtue of his having succeeded to the interest of Thomas. The advancement by Lyford of the money, and the procuring of the assignment to be made to Burnett for the purpose of enabling him to effect this result, was within the line of his authority as administrator of the two estates, and must be construed as within the exercise of his duties as such administrator, rather than as a "purchase" of the claim within the meaning of section 1617, Code Civil Proc. The case of Jones v. Hanna, 81 Cal. 507, 22 Pac. Rep. 883, invoked in support of the contention of appellant, is inapplicable. In that case the plaintiffs purchased the property of the estate of Hanna, under an express agreement with the administratrix that the purchase should be for her individual benefit, and the transaction was held to be invalid, for the reason that it was indirectly a purchase by the administratrix of the property of the estate she represented, and, therefore, in violation of the express terms of section 1576, Code Civil Proc. The order is affirmed.

SMITH v. SCHIELE. (No. 13,621.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 2, 1892.)

REAL-ESTATE AGENTS—COMMISSIONS—GOOD TITLE
—RATIFICATION.

1. Defendant contracted in writing with certain brokers, "solely, to sell" his land on a certain commission. They found a purchaser who contracted to purchase, but by reason of defects in the title refused to accept the land. In an action for such commissions, defendant claimed that the words "solely, to sell," made the right to commission contingent on the consummation of the sale. Held, that those words merely intended to give the brokers an exclusive agency for the sale of the land.

2. Where the contract of purchase provided for good title or no sale, the fact that there was an unpaid mortgage on the land, and also an action pending for the recovery of an interest in the land, justified the purchaser in refusing to accept title.

3. The tender of a deed with covenant of warranty did not release defendant from his obligation to convey a good title.

4. Though the brokers exceeded their authority in contracting that the title should prove good or that there should be no sale, yet defendant waived this objection by accepting the purchaser, and ratifying the conditions on which the sale was made.

5. Where such ratification, so far as it affeeted the brokers, did not relate to an interest in the land, it was not necessary that it should be in writing.

6. The fact that defendant, at the time the contract of brokerage was made, had only an option on the property, was immaterial, where the brokers had no knowledge as to the condition of the title.

Action by C. C. Smith, Jr., administrator of the estate of B. Newman, against Charles M. Schiele, to recover brokers' commissions for negotiating a sale of lands. Judgment for plaintiff. New trial denied. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. C. Kennedy, for appellant. A. S. Kittredge, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. Action to recover brokers' commissions for negotiating a sale of defendant's land. Phelps & Smith were the brokers, and plaintiff, who succeeded to their claim, had judgment. Defendant appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. The questions presented by this appeal for decision arise out of the following state of facts: On February 14, 1887, defendant executed to Phelps & Smith the following contract of employment: "San Jose, February 14, 1887. I, the undersigned, do hereby authorize Phelps & Smith, solely, to sell the following real estate as herein described: 244 acres of land bounded north by Mabery road, east by Pyle road, south by land of Johnson and Hannay and Julian street road, west by the Coyote creek,—for the sum of $200 per acre, or as much less as I may take at any time of sale thereof; also agree to pay Phelps & Smith two per cent. commissions, commission on the full amount said property is sold for. This contract shall be in force for two months, and after that date until the said property is sold, unless withdrawn by me in writing. CHAS. M. SCHIELE." Phelps & Smith, who knew nothing at the time about the condition of the title of said property, accepted the employment to sell on the terms stated in the contract, and on March 10, 1887, found a purchaser for said property in one Cadwallader, on the terms expressed in the following receipt: "Received, San Jose, March 10, 1887, from N. Cadwallader, the sum of five thousand ($5,000) dollars in gold coin, being as a deposit and part payment on account of bargain and sale made to him this day to a certain lot, tract, or parcel of land lying, situate, and being in the county of Santa Clara, state of California, (describing the property,) containing about 244 acres of land, said Chas. M. Schiele having sold to said N. Cadwallader, this day, for the sum of two hundred dollars per acre, in gold coin, the balance to be paid sixty days from date, or this deposit to be forfeited, without recourse. Title to prove good or no sale, and this deposit to be returned. PHELPS & SMITH, for C. M. SCHIELE, Real-Estate Agents." They then introduced Cadwallader to defendant as the purchaser of said property, and, after informing him of the terms of the sale, delivered to him a copy of the foregoing receipt, which was agreed to and ratified by the defendant, and Cadwallader accepted by him as the purchaser thereof on said terms. The deposit of $5,000 was not in gold coin, as stated in the receipt, but was, by agreement of all parties, a bank check for that amount drawn by Cadwallader in favor of said brokers, and deposited with the cashier of the bank, with directions in writing not to deliver it up without the consent of all parties. An abstract of title was thereupon furnished by the defendant to Cadwallader for examination, and by him placed in the hands of a competent attorney for that purpose. At this time defendant had only a contract of sale of said property from one Metzger, the owner, who executed to him a grant deed thereof on March 15, 1887, and at the same time defendant executed to Metzger a mortgage thereon to secure the payment of his note to Metzger for $30,000, balance of purchase money therefor. On March 31, 1887, and before Cadwallader's attorney had completed his examination of the title of said property, one Bernhardt commenced an action against the defendant in the superior court of Santa Clara county, and on the same day filed lis pendens in the recorder's office of that county, claiming that he was a joint purchaser with defendant of said property, and was the owner of one undivided half thereof, and praying that defendant be declared a trustee for him of said undivided one-half, and compelling defendant to make a deed to him for the same. On July 15, 1887, the defendant had judgment against Bernhardt for costs, and on August 16, 1887, the judgment was satisfied. The time fixed by the terms of the contract for the consummation of the sale was not extended, and on May 9, 1887, the last day within which Cadwallader was to make payment of the balance of the purchase money, the defendant tendered to him a grant deed in due form containing a covenant of warranty, and demanded the payment of said purchase money. No satisfaction of the Metzger mortgage was ever tendered, nor was said mortgagee present to satisfy the same. Cadwallader declined to accept the deed, and pay the balance of the purchase money, solely on the ground that the title of said property was not good, and that it had been so reported to him by his attorney. Cadwallader was ready, willing, and able to pay the whole of said purchase money and consummate the sale, and would have done so had the title proved good. The check was, by mutual consent of all parties, returned to Cadwallader in August, 1887.

It is contended by appellant that the contract of employment was "solely to sell," and that the payment of the brokers' commissions was contingent upon the consummation of sale. Such is not our construction of the contract. The words "solely, to sell," as therein used, were simply intended to confer upon the brokers the exclusive right to sell the property; that is, constituting them the sole agents for that purpose. Nor was the payment of commissions contingent upon the consummation of sale; for all that the brokers were required to do by the terms of their employment, to entitle them to their commissions, was to produce a bona fide purchaser for the property on the vendor's terms, and such is the well-settled meaning, in this state, of a broker's authority to sell. Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 244; Rutenberg v. Main, 47 Cal. 219; Dolan v. Scanlan, 57 Cal. 266; Phelps v. Prusch, 83 Cal. 628, 23 Pac. Rep. 111. If such a purchaser was produced, the brokers were entitled to their commissions, without reference to the consummation of the sale, unless the failure to consummate it, the title proving good, is chargeable to the purchaser. Middleton v. Findla, 25 Cal. 81; Blood v. Shannon, 29 Cal. 395; Phelan v. Gardner, 43 Cal. 311; Neilson v. Lee, 60 Cal. 555; Phelps v. Prusch, supra. If, on the other hand, the failure is caused by a defective title, the vendor alone is at fault, and the brokers are entitled to recover. Middleton v. Findla, supra; Gonzales v. Broad, 57 Cal. 225; Phelps v. Prusch, supra. It appears that Cadwallader was a ready, willing, and able purchaser, but that he declined to complete the purchase of the property because of a defective title, caused by the Bernhardt suit, and the incumbrance of the Metzger mortgage.

The defendant was bound by the terms of his contract to convey a good title, and, as it is evident from these causes that the title was not good, it devolved on him to make it so by curing the defect and removing the incumbrance within the time limited by the terms of the contract. This he failed to do, and, as the time was not extended, Cadwallader was discharged from his obligation to purchase, and was entitled to the return of his deposit.

It is true that on the last day of the period of time fixed by the terms of the contract, and within which Cadwallader was to make payment of the balance of the purchase money, Schiele tendered to him a grant deed, in due form, containing a covenant of warranty, and demanded payment, but there was no offer to remove the mortgage incumbrance, and, if there had been, neither Metzger nor any one representing him was present to receive the money, and satisfy the mortgage. Furthermore, the suit commenced by Bernhardt against the defendant for an undivided interest in the property was still pending and undetermined. The covenant of warranty contained in the deed tendered could not release the defendant of his obligation to convey a good title, for it was, at most, but a mere personal obligation, which Cadwallader was in no way obligated to accept.

But it is insisted that the brokers exceeded their authority in making the contract with Cadwallader by providing therein "title to prove good or no sale." Conceding, for the purpose of this case only, that a good title is not implied by law in an executory contract for the sale of land, and further that the brokers were not authorized to guaranty or insure title, still it appears that they informed the defendant of the terms of the sale, and delivered to him a copy of the receipt or contract containing the same, which he agreed to and ratified, and upon Cadwallader being introduced to him by the brokers, he accepted him as the purchaser of the property on said terms.

The ratification referred to was not in writing, nor was it necessary as between the defendant and the brokers that it should be, for the reason that in so far as it affected the brokers it related to no interest in the land, but only to defendant's obligation to pay them their commissions, when earned, in accordance with the terms contained in the contract of employment.

It is further contended that at the time defendant made the contract of employment with the brokers, he only had an option on the property, of which all parties were aware. This claim is disposed of by the finding of the court, and there is evidence to support it, that the brokers knew nothing about the condition of the title to the property. Counsel for appellant insists, with much earnestness, that Cadwallader was not a ready or willing purchaser, for the reason that the evidence shows that he had intimate personal and business relations with Bernhardt, and instigated Bernhardt to bring the suit referred to against the defendant, for the purpose of enabling Cadwallader to withdraw from what proved to be an unprofitable bargain. The only evidence on this point is that given by Cadwallader on his cross-examination, which is as follows: "Bernhardt and I were well acquainted; we were intimate at that time, and in several speculations together were very friendly. At that time I had purchased with him a tract of land. We paid $500 deposit; $15,000 to be paid in the fall. I told him he ought to bring his suit against Schiele for damages, and not for specific performance. We had several talks about his suit against Schiele. We were very friendly. Bernhardt told me he was going to bring suit against Schiele, and I requested him to bring it in such a way as not to interfere with my contract with Schiele. After the suit was brought, he told me his lawyers said that was the only way it could be brought." It may be true, as argued by counsel for appellant, "that it is not difficult to find a pretended purchaser, who does not and cannot make the purchase, if by so doing a broker can earn his commissions;" but the seller can always protect himself against such dishonest practices by stipulating in the contract of employment that no commissions are to be paid the broker unless the sale is consummated. The production of a bona fide purchaser on terms satisfactory to the defendant was all that the brokers were required to do by the terms of their employment. This they did, and as the failure to consummate the sale is shown to have been caused solely by a defective title, for which the defendant alone is responsible, it follows that the brokers are entitled to recover their commissions. The judgment and order should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur. VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

EDE v. KNIGHT. (No. 13,714.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 2, 1892.)

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—CONTRACTS—EXTENSION OF TIME—RECORDING—ASSESSMENT—PAYMENT—ESTOPPEL.

1. A valid contract made in 1879 for street improvement, under St. 1871-72, p. 809, which provided for extensions of time, could not be affected by Const. art. 11, § 19, which took effect in 1880, and provided that no contract for such improvement should be made, the cost of which was chargeable on private property, unless an assessment therefor be first levied, collected, and paid into the city treasury, though such extensions were made after the constitution took effect.

2. St. 1871-72, p. 809, § 7, provided that it should be the duty of the superintendent of streets, on the passage of a resolution extending the time of the contract, to record the same in the office of the city recorder; and, in issuing a certificate of such extension to be recorded, to specify therein the number of such resolution. Held, that an error in such certificate of extension as to the number of the resolution was immaterial.

3. The recording of such resolution being a ministerial act on the part of the superintendent, his failure to record it during the life of the contract would not prejudice the contractor. McVerry v. Boyd, 26 Pac. Rep. 885, 89 Cal. 304, followed.

4. The certificate of the city and county surveyor and deputy-superintendent, and the assessment, diagram, and warrant signed by such superintendent, and countersigned by the auditor, were prima facie evidence that the contract had been duly and fully performed.

5. The assessment for grading gave the number of the lot, the number of front feet, the amount assessed, and referred to the diagram thereto attached. The diagram showed the exterior lines of the property as described in the complaint, and the number of the lot given in the assessment. Held, in an action to foreclose the assessment lien, that the description of the lot was sufficient.

6. Where all the work called for in the contract was duly and fully performed, the fact that no diagram was made showing the amount due for work on the street crossing, and that no assessment was made on the lot therefor, did not prejudice defendant.

7. The verified return of the contractor that he went on the lot, and publicly demanded payment of the sum assessed thereon, being prima facie evidence of that fact, and not disputed, showed a proper demand.

8. The fact that the contractor afterwards, on the same lot, demanded, without authority, the sum due for grading the crossing, would not affect the validity of the prior demand for the amount assessed on the lot.

9. Though the diagram described two lots, one of which was smaller, and lying within the boundary of the other, yet, where the whole of the land designated in the diagram as "Lot 1" was liable for the amount assessed for work exclusive of such crossing, a demand was good, made by the contractor while standing on any part of the premises so designated as "Lot 1."

10. Where no issue was made as to the validity of the contract, and defendant treated it as valid, and introduced it in evidence, he could not thereafter claim that it and the assessment were invalid.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WILLIAM T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by William Ede against Thomas

Knight to foreclose a street-assessment lien. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

May 26, 1879, the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco adopted and passed a resolution to, and thereafter did, order certain street work to be done, and entered into a written contract with A. E. Buckman to do such work. Buckman performed the work, and assigned his claim therefor to plaintiff. After the work was done, an assessment was levied to cover the expense thereof.

J. C. Bates, for appellant. E. F. Preston, (Philip G. Galpin, of counsel,) for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to foreclose a street-assessment lien. The court found that the work was not completed within the time specified in the contract; that the time within which the work was to be completed was not extended; that no assessment was made to cover the sum due for the work named in the complaint, nor was any diagram ever made showing the particular lot or portion of lot with the number of feet frontage assessed for the work; that the lot described in the complaint was never assessed for the work; and that no public demand was made as required by law, nor was any return made upon the warrant by the contractor stating the nature of his demand. None of these findings is supported by the evidence.

The contract was entered into on November 28, 1879. The act under which the contract was made (St. 1871-72, p. 809) provided for extensions of time. These provisions entered into and became a part of the contract, and were not affected by the provisions of the new constitution. Section 19¹ of article 11 of the constitution applies only to contracts made after the constitution took effect. Ede v. Cogswell, 79 Cal. 278, 21 Pac. Rep. 767. A valid contract cannot be abrogated by the adoption of a new constitution, any more than it can be by the enactment of a law by the legislature. McCracken v. Hayward, 2 How. 613; Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 436; 3 Pars. Cont. § 555. McDonald v. Patterson, 54 Cal. 247, is not in point. That case holds simply that the superintendent of streets cannot be required to enter into a contract (under the act of April 1, 1872) which was awarded after January 1, 1880.

It is claimed by respondent that the attempt to extend the time was ineffectual because the resolution was not recorded, and because the certificate of extension did not state the number of the resolution. Section 7 of the act provides that it shall be the duty of the superintendent of streets, on the passage of such a resolution, "to cause the same to be recorded in the office of the city recorder; * * * and, in issuing a certificate of an extension of time to be recorded, to specify in the same the number of the resolution of the board of supervisors." On February 24, 1880, the board, by resolution No. 14,519, granted the contractor 60 days' additional time, but in his certificate of extension the superintendent of streets states that the extension is granted in accordance with resolution No. 14,518, passed February 24, 1880. This variance as to the number of the resolution has been held to be immaterial. McVerry v. Hitchcock, (Cal., No. 7,981, Nov. 24, 1884,) 4 Pac. Rep. 1144.

The objection that one of the resolutions extending the time was not recorded during the life of the contract was considered in McVerry v. Boyd, 89 Cal. 304, 26 Pac. Rep. 885, where we held that the important and material thing was the fact that an extension of time had been granted by the board; and that the granting of the certificate and recordation of the resolution by the superintendent were mere ministerial acts, a failure to perform which could not operate to the prejudice of the contractor. This construction of section 7 is supported by Himmelman v. Reay, 38 Cal. 165, and by other provisions of the act itself. Section 12 provides that, "after jurisdiction to order any work has been obtained, no irregularity in any of the subsequent proceedings shall render any assessment illegal;" and section 28 provides that "this act shall be liberally construed to carry out the intentions and purposes of this act." The failure of the superintendent to record the resolution, or to state the true number thereof in his certificate, was not jurisdictional. The equality and uniformity of the assessment was in no way affected by it, nor did it operate in any way to the prejudice of the lot-owner. Provisions of a statute like those under consideration are designed for the information of the various officers of the county, and are intended to promote system and dispatch in the prosecution of the proceedings. They are not of the essence of the thing required to be done, and are therefore merely directory. They are matters over which the parties affected by the proceedings have no control, and a failure to perform them should not operate to the prejudice of any one except the officer himself. This is true especially where the statute fixes no time in which the acts are required to be done. People v. Canal Co., 48 Cal. 146; Brady v. Bartlett, 56 Cal. 357; People v. Cole, 70 Cal. 60, 11 Pac. Rep. 481; In re Broadway, 63 Barb. 579; In re Upson, 89 N. Y. 73; Torrey v. Millbury, 21 Pick. 67. Beveridge v. Livingstone, 54 Cal. 56, and other cases cited by respondent, are not in point. There is no doubt that no extension of time can be granted after the time given the contractor has expired; or that an assessment is void unless the work has been performed within the time required; or that, where the statute expressly says certain things must be done before any lien attaches to the property, it is necessary to show performance of the acts required. These propositions are supported by the cases referred to, but they have little or no bearing upon the question just considered.

The certificate of the city and county surveyor and deputy-superintendent of streets, and the assessment, diagram, and warrant signed by the street superintendent, and countersigned by the auditor, are prima facie evidence of the fact that the contract has been duly and fully performed. Chambers v. Satterlee, 40 Cal. 519; Brady v. Bartlett, supra; Jennings v. Le Breton, 80 Cal. 12, 21 Pac. Rep. 1127.

The property described in the complaint was properly assessed for the amount due for work done on Seventh street. The assessment may give the number of the lot, and refer to the diagram for a further description. If the two documents, taken together, show a clear description of the property, the assessment will be held sufficient, so far as the designation of the property is concerned. Hewes v. Reis, 40 Cal. 261. The assessment for grading Seventh street gives the number of the lot, the number of front feet, the amount assessed, and it refers to the diagram attached for a further description of the lot. The diagram shows the exterior lines of the property as described in the complaint, and the number of the lot given in the assessment. Nothing more could reasonably be required.

It is claimed by respondent that there should have been but one assessment for the entire work called for in the contract, each lot being assessed for its proportionate share of the expense of the whole work. This is what was attempted; but to distribute the burdens it was necessary to have two diagrams, the lot charged with the expense of work on the crossing being a part of the lot charged with the work on Seventh street. Only one diagram, however, was made,—a diagram of the lot described in the complaint, and charged with the expense of the work done on Seventh street. No diagram showing the lot assessed for the amount due for work on the crossing was made; but we are unable to see how defendant is injured or prejudiced by the failure to make such a diagram. The contractor is the only person aggrieved thereby. He could have appealed, and had the assessment corrected, or a new one made. By his failure to do so a part of the defendant's land had been relieved of the burden which otherwise would have been put upon it in consequence of the improvements of the crossing. Defendant ought not to be heard to say that this has operated to his prejudice, when it appears that all the work called for in the contract has been duly and fully performed.

The evidence shows that a proper demand was made. The verified return of the contractor states that he went upon each of the lots exhibited on the diagram, and publicly demanded on each lot payment of the sum assessed to each; "that is to say, he so demanded at said time, on each of said lots of land above enumerated, separately, the payment of the sum or sums of money as assessed thereon, respectively, by said assessment, and, where more than one sum was assessed by said assessment on any one of said lots, he demanded payment of such several sums separately; so that each separate item assessed in such assessment was separately demanded by deponent upon the identical lot on which it was by said assessment imposed." This return is prima facie evidence of the facts stated, (Deady v. Townsend, 57 Cal. 299,) and was not disputed. It is true, there is but one lot designated on the diagram, i. e., lot 1; and it is clear, therefore, that only one legal demand could be made. Lot 1 was assessed for the work on Seventh street, between King and Berry streets, and is liable for the amount assessed upon it.

If the contractor demanded the sum of $3,486.96 on lot 1, as the return shows he did, the fact that he afterwards, on the same lot, demanded, without authority, the sum of $89.78,—the cost of grading the crossing,—would not affect the validity of the demand for the $3,486.96, for which lot 1 was properly assessed.

Respondent says in his brief that "the diagram attached fails to show upon which lot 1 Buckman went when he made either demand. Dyer v. Harrison, 63 Cal. 449. He may have demanded the $3,486.96 on that part of lot 1 upon which it was not a lien, to-wit, upon a lot 1 outside of the 240 feet frontage upon which the $3,486.96 was a lien." The fault or weakness of this argument rests in the assumption that there are two lots described in the diagram, one of which is smaller, and lying within the boundary of the other. This is not the fact,—there is but one; but, if it were, the whole of the land designated in the diagram as "Lot 1" is liable for the amount assessed for work on Seventh street, exclusive of the work done on the crossing; and therefore, if the contractor at the time he made the demand stood upon any part of the premises lying within the exterior boundaries of the lot designated in the diagram, the demand was good. Dyer v. Harrison, cited by respondent, has no bearing upon this point. In Parker v. Reay, 76 Cal. 105, 18 Pac. Rep. 124, we held that where the assessments—one valid, the other void—were severed, and separate demands were made, the contractor was entitled to recover the amount of the valid assessment. See, also, Boyle v. Tibbey, 82 Cal. 11, 22 Pac. Rep. 1128.

It is claimed by respondent that the contract and assessment are invalid because no petition for grading was filed, as required by section 4 of the act, and because no notice of the award was given. This objection seems to have been raised here for the first time. No issue was made in the court below as to the validity of the contract; on the contrary, it was treated by the defendant in his answer as valid, and was introduced in evidence by him in connection with the extensions of time. Under these circumstances the objection comes too late.

The appellant's contentions with respect to the constitutionality and effect of the acts of 1872 and 1878 were considered and determined in Ede v. Cogswell, supra, and Jennings v. Le Roy, 63 Cal. 398. We are asked to reverse the judgment, with directions to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff. This cannot be done on the findings in the record. Dyer v. Brogan, 57 Cal. 235. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

GILLESPIE v. WRIGHT. (No. 13,895.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 2, 1892.)

PRESENTING CLAIMS AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE —LIMITATION—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING.

1. After a claim against an estate had been presented and rejected by the executrix, plaintiff's attorney, deeming the claim not sufficiently formal, again presented it to the executrix's attorney, who simply took the claim and said it would be again rejected, and it was so rejected by the executrix. There was nothing said at the second presentation by defendant's attorney as to the informality of the first presentation, or that it would be considered as not having been before rejected. Held, that the statute (Code Civil Proc. § 1498) limiting the time of action on rejected claims, began to run from the first rejection.

2. Where an amended complaint was presented with proposed findings and plaintiff's brief without any formal motion, and it was conditioned to be allowed to be filed if the court should think the complaint needed amendment, there was no prejudicial error in the failure of the court to have the amended complaint filed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; E. M. GIBSON, Judge.

Action by E. A. Gillespie against Maria Louisa Wright, executrix, on a note. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

Scrivner & Boone and Geo. W. Schell, for appellant. Welles Whitmore, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought on a note which had been presented to the executrix above mentioned for allowance, and been rejected by her. The appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendant, and from an order refusing a new trial. The points made are numerous, but we think that, upon the decision of those hereafter mentioned, this case is determinable in favor of the respondent. The claim was twice presented, and twice indorsed "rejected" by the executrix. But it is claimed by appellant that there was no actual rejection on the first presentation, and therefore that the bar of the statute under section 1498, Code Civil Proc., does not attach. The finding of the trial court is opposed to this view, and, as we think, is supported by sufficient evidence. It appears that on the first presentation the claim was actually rejected and so indorsed, and that the plaintiff's attorney, deeming that it, as presented, was not perhaps sufficiently formal, again at a later day presented it to the attorney of the defendant for action by the executrix. The plaintiff's attorney was not then, nor was he ever, told by the defendant's attorney that the claim was informal, or that it would be considered as not having been before rejected, and formally presented for the first time. The attorney for the executrix said the claim would be again rejected, but that he would present it to her again for action. While this shows a disposition to accommodate the presenter of the claim, and give him the benefit of his own legal view of the matter, it did not amount to a formal or apparent consent that the former rejection should be held as naught, and that the time might be extended for bringing the action on the rejected claim as first indorsed. To determine the present contention in favor of the appellant, upon the point under discussion, would be to say "that when a creditor has presented his claim, and it has been rejected, he may again present his claim for the same demand, and thus avoid the bar, or prolong the time within which he may commence suit." TEMPLE, J., in concurring opinion in Steward v. Hinkel, 72 Cal. 191, 13 Pac. Rep. 494. It was no fault of the defendant executrix or her attorney that the claim was not presented in a form, in the first place, which, upon after-consideration by the plaintiff's attorney, was not thought sufficient by the presenter thereof. As first presented it was actually rejected; and there was no formal or apparent consent given that this rejection should be considered as not having been made by proper indorsement. We do not think that the conduct of the defendant or her attorney should be considered, under the facts here developed, as giving the plaintiff the right to suppose that the former rejection had been set aside. It still existed, and the effort to clinch the matter by another presentation was not suggested by them, nor was it apparently agreed in any way that the second should take the place of the first presentation. The responsibility in the premises rested solely with the plaintiff and his legal representative. They were at liberty to proceed upon the first rejection, of which there was no intimation that it would be held by the respondent as of no avail, or that the claim was informal in the statement thereof. There had been no refusal to inform the plaintiff of the rejection of the claim by the executrix or her attorney, and from the beginning to the end the plaintiff had no reason to believe but what it would be refused, as it was, and the indorsement made thereon in the first instance. The conduct of the attorney for the defendant was fair and open; he was apparently willing to accommodate the plaintiff by letting the executrix repeat her first rejection, but he did nothing, as we view the matter, to mislead the plaintiff's attorney into the belief that his second presentation would be treated as the only presentation made. Neither do we see any prejudicial error on the part of the court below in not causing the amended complaint to be filed. It was offered, after the case was tried, and presented with the proposed findings and plaintiff's brief without any formal motion, and conditioned to be allowed to be filed if the court should think that the complaint needed amendment. We do not think that upon this kind of practice the trial court should be held to have failed in its legal duty. We perceive no prejudicial error in the record, and advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

ATTACHMENT—DISSOLUTION.

In an action for the price of goods purchased from Chicago firms, defendant moved to dissolve an attachment on the ground that the money due on the contract of sale was not made payable in the state, as required by the statute to authorize an attachment. Defendant made affidavit that he personally purchased the goods at Chicago; that they were to be paid for there; that upon one of the invoices was printed the words, "All bills payable in Chicago. Remit in par funds. No allowance can be made for exchange or express charges;" and that on the other invoice were printed the words, "Payable, with exchange, on Chicago or New York." An affidavit on behalf of plaintiff stated that the goods were to be paid for at and upon their arrival in San Francisco, and another affidavit stated that defendant represented to the selling corporation that defendant would pay for the goods in San Francisco; but neither of the affidavits for plaintiff stated that affiants were connected with the sales department of the selling corporation, or that they had any personal knowledge of the transaction, nor did they attempt to explain the statements on the invoices. Held, that an order refusing the motion to dissolve should be reversed.

Action by W. N. Tuller against Charles S. Arnold and others. Defendants appeal from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment. Reversed.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from an order refusing to dissolve an attachment. Plaintiff is assignee of claims due two Chicago firms, from whom defendants had purchased goods. The motion was based upon affidavits made by each defendant to the effect that the goods were purchased in Chicago, and were to be paid for at Chicago, 30 days after the date of the invoices. The affidavit of defendant Louis E. Arnold states that neither of said firms, assignors of plaintiff, have agencies or branch houses at San Francisco; that he personally purchased the goods at Chicago, and ordered them shipped to San Francisco; that they were to be paid for at Chicago, 30 days after the date of invoice, and the bills were not to be payable at San Francisco. That upon the invoice of E. W. Blatchford & Co., one of the assignors, was printed the words, "All bills payable in Chicago. Remit in par funds. No allowance can be made for exchange or express charges;" and on the other invoice, from the L. Wolff Manufacturing Co., the words, "Payable, with exchange, on Chicago or New York." The invoices themselves were read at the hearing, and corroborated the affidavit in this respect. Opposed to these was the affidavit upon which the writ was issued, which conformed to the statute; and the affidavit of N. H. Blatchford of E. W. Blatchford & Co., and John Clifford of the L. Wolff Manufacturing Company, which is a corporation. Blatchford's affidavit states that the goods were to be paid for at and upon their arrival in San Francisco, "though we understood that said payment would be made within thirty days from the date of sale, that being a reasonable time within which said goods should arrive." The affidavit does not state that he was the salesman who sold the goods, or that he had personal knowledge of the transaction, nor does he give any explanation of the words on the invoice, which were in direct conflict with his affidavit. Clifford states that he is secretary of the corporation; that "L. E. Arnold acted for defendants in making said purchase, and represented to said corporation that said defendants were perfectly solvent, and that they would pay for said goods in San Francisco, in ten days from date of invoice, receiving two per cent. discount for such payment, or within thirty days," etc. This affiant does not state that he had personal knowledge of the transaction, or that he was connected with the sales department of the corporation, nor does he attempt an explanation of the inconsistent statement on the invoice. That these statements are inconsistent hardly admits of doubt. To require defendants to pay the difference in exchange is to compel them to deliver the money at Chicago, and is to prohibit them from making a tender at San Francisco. The contract, having been made in Illinois, was presumptively to be performed there, and an attachment could not be taken out here, even although it is true, in a general sense, that the money was payable wherever the defendants could be found. To authorize the issuance of an attachment, the money must have been made payable in this state by the contract itself. Dulton v. Shelton, 3 Cal. 207; Eck v. Hoffman, 55 Cal. 501. Here the preponderance is decidedly in favor of the proposition that the contract was that the money should be paid at Chicago and not at San Francisco. The rule that this court will not pass upon the evidence, when conflicting, does not apply where the evidence is all documentary. It is true this court will not interfere with the discretion of the trial court, except where it can plainly see that there has been an abuse of such discretion; but where, in a matter in reference to which this court has equal advantages with the lower court, it is beyond doubt that error has been committed to the prejudice of the appellant, it is the duty of the court to correct the error. Such error must be held to be an abuse of discretion. Every reversal goes upon this theory, and it should make no difference whether the mistake be as to a conclusion from the evidence, or in construing the law, provided it be made equally clear that error has occurred. I think the order should be reversed.

I concur. VANCLIEF, C.

Action by F. A. Ebel and J. H. Stehr against L. C. Chandler. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

FITZGERALD, C. This action was brought to recover the sum of $2,914, for money alleged to have been laid out and expended by plaintiffs for and on behalf of defendant at the defendant's special instance and request, and which he promised to repay to plaintiffs. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, which was properly overruled, and thereupon defendant answered by a general denial. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendant appeals from the judgment, and the order denying his motion for a new trial. The facts are substantially as follows: On December 29, 1884, plaintiffs purchased of defendant certain land, and received from him a grant deed therefor. The land was at the time incumbered by a mortgage executed by the defendant to one Margaret Poorman, which he agreed with plaintiffs to pay and discharge. This he failed to do, and the mortgage, which embraced other lands belonging to the defendant in the city and county of Sacramento, was subsequently foreclosed in an action brought by the mortgagee against the defendant, and upon the decree of foreclosure therein rendered an order of sale was duly issued, and the land advertised to be sold on the 26th day of November, 1887. The sale was afterwards postponed to December 10, 1887, by direction of the mortgagee's attorney, at the request of the defendant, and upon his agreeing, in writing, to the effect that, if the sale was postponed, "he would endeavor to raise the money and pay off the judgment." The defendant having failed to comply with his agreement, the land was sold on said last-mentioned date by the sheriff, under said order of sale, to one Edward McGary, a brother-in-law of Poorman. Plaintiffs, at different times subsequent to the day of sale, called on the defendant, and urged him to pay the money and redeem the property, which he agreed to do; and, on the day before the time for redemption expired, they called to see him, and told him that as he had not paid the money and redeemed the property, as he had agreed with them to do, they would have to protect themselves by raising the money and redeeming the property, to which he responded, "All right." The land, which was unimproved at the time of the purchase, was thereafter greatly enhanced in value by plaintiffs setting it out in orchard and vineyard and fencing it, and by the erection of a house and other improvements thereon. It was then understood and agreed between plaintiffs and McGary (who appears to have been merely the

VENDOR AND VENDEE—RIGHTS OF VENDEE.

Defendant conveyed to plaintiffs certain land, and agreed to pay a mortgage thereon, but failed to do so, and the land was sold under foreclosure. Subsequently, defendant agreed to representative of and acting in the interest of the mortgagee) and their attorneys, upon whose advice it appears they acted, that plaintiffs would be best protected by the sheriff executing a deed to McGary, and for McGary to make a deed to them. Defendant, when informed by plaintiffs' attorney of the foregoing agreement, responded: "It will be all right. They shall not lose anything. I will make it good." Afterwards, in pursuance of said agreement, the sheriff executed a deed of said land to McGary; and thereafter McGary, upon the payment to him by plaintiffs of the sum of $2,914, executed a deed thereof to plaintiffs.

The contention that "plaintiffs paid their money to McGary for his use, and, as McGary had no claim on the defendant, it relieved the defendant from no liability, and could not be said to be money paid to his use," is not well founded, for the reason that the land was sold under the decree of foreclosure to pay the defendant's debt, and the payment of the money by plaintiffs to McGary under the agreement referred to was, in effect, a redemption of the property, and was a payment to that extent of said judgment or decree against the defendant; and as it was paid at the defendant's special instance and request, for his use and benefit, upon an express promise by him to repay it to plaintiffs, they are entitled to recover of defendant the money so laid out and expended. Nor is there any foundation for the claim made by appellant that defendant's liability to plaintiffs arose under the covenant of quiet enjoyment implied in his deed, and that his liability was only the purchase price received by him, which was $777. Upon the facts stated, there is nothing to justify the claim that this action was brought to recover damages for breach of the covenant implied in the deed, in which case the measure of damages would be the purchase price paid for the property, but was brought, as we have before stated, for the recovery of money laid out and expended by plaintiffs for the use and benefit of the defendant, at his special instance and request, which he promised to repay to plaintiffs. The purchase price paid by plaintiffs for the land is not sought to be recovered in this action. The judgment and order should be affirmed, and we so advise.

Action by Benjamin Lovejoy against L. C. Chandler to recover a certain sum of money and damages. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Catlin & Blanchard, for appellant. Johnson, Johnson & Johnson and F. D. Ryan, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. This case and the case of Ebel v. Chandler, 28 Pac. Rep. 934, (No. 14,381,) just decided, were tried together in the court below, and the testimony, decision, and transcript, except the amount of the judgment and the plea in abatement set up in the answer, of the pendency of another cause of action between the same parties, and for the same cause, and the testimony on such plea, are in all respects the same. It appears that plaintiff, prior to the commencement of this action, brought an action against the defendant to recover the sum of $3,498 for damages for breach of the express covenant contained in the deed, "to warrant and defend the title to the same against all claims of Samuel and Margaret Poorman." This action was brought to recover the sum of $3,498 and the interest thereon, amounting to $265.26, for money laid out and expended for and on behalf of the defendant by the plaintiff at the defendant's special instance and request, and which defendant promised to repay to plaintiff. The finding of the court "that there was not, at the time of the commencement of this action, another action pending or undetermined in this court between the same parties for the same cause of action as stated in the plaintiff's complaint herein," is sustained by the evidence. We recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

MEADS et al. v. LASAR et al. (No. 14,226.)

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 11, 1891.)

REPLEVIN—AMENDMENT OF JUDGMENT—CERTIFICATE OF PARTNERSHIP—NAMES OF MEMBERS.

1. In an action to recover possession of personal property the verdict for plaintiffs was "for the return to them of the property described in the complaint, or its value, to-wit, $1,000, and costs;" but the judgment entered thereon was simply that "plaintiffs recover from defendants $1,000, together with their costs." Held, that though the judgment was not in the alternative form, as required by Code Civil Proc. § 667, it could be amended so as to correspond to the verdict.

2. A certificate of partnership which states the names of the members with the initials by which they are generally known, is within Civil Code, § 2466, requiring a certificate of partnership to state "the names in full of the members of such partnership."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Monterey county; JOHN K. ALEXANDER, Judge.

Action by Meads, Seaman & Co. against M. Lasar and J. E. Graves to recover the possession of personal property. From a judgment that "plaintiffs recover from defendants $1,000, together with their costs," defendants appeal. Amended.

S. F. Geil, H. V. Morehouse, and J. M. Wilcoxon, for appellants. N. A. Dorn, W. M. R. Parker, and G. W. Webster, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. Action of claim and delivery of certain personal property in the possession of the defendant Graves, as sheriff of Monterey county, under an attachment issued in an action by the defendant Lasar against certain vendors of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs were creditors of the firm of S. Houghton & Sons to the amount of several thousand dollars, and on May 21, 1888, bought from them certain personal property, consisting of hogs, horses, and other cattle, including that described in the complaint, taking from them a bill of sale therefor, and crediting the agreed price upon their account against them. At the time of the purchase the property was delivered to the plaintiffs, and placed by them in the possession of one Worley as their agent, and was kept by him in the same pasture in which it had been previously kept by the Houghtons until taken by the sheriff as hereinafter stated. In July of that year the defendant Lasar sued out a writ of attachment in an action brought by him against the Houghtons, under which the sheriff took possession of the property described in the complaint; and in December following Lasar commenced another action against the same defendants, in which he sued out another attachment, under which the sheriff held the property at the time the present action was commenced. After the commencement of the present action judgment was rendered in favor of Lasar in his action against the Houghtons, and an execution thereon issued to the sheriff, by virtue of which the property was sold. The cause was tried before a jury, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff "for the return to them of the property described in the complaint, or its value, to-wit, the sum of $1,000, and costs." From the judgment entered thereon, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendants have appealed.

1. The judgment as entered is not in conformity with the statute. Section 667, Code Civil Proc., provides that, in an action to recover the possession of personal property, judgment is to be "for the possession, or the value thereof in case a delivery thereof cannot be had." There is nothing in the present record which shows that a delivery cannot be had, and the verdict of the jury would imply that the property is susceptible of delivery by the defendants. The plaintiffs are not entitled to recover from the defendants the value of the property unless they are unable to deliver it. The defendants are entitled to satisfy the plaintiff's claim by a delivery of the property sued for, and can be compelled to pay its value only in case such delivery cannot be had. Etchepare v. Aguirre, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 668. The defendants may have purchased the property at the execution sale for the express purpose of returning it to the plaintiffs, if they should be defeated in the present action. This error, however, can be corrected by an amendment of the judgment so that it may correspond with the verdict.

2. Whether the sale of the property by the Houghtons to the plaintiffs was "accompanied by an immediate delivery," which was "followed by an actual and continued change of possession," was a question of fact to be determined by the jury from the evidence before it. Godchaux v. Mulford, 26 Cal. 316; Claudius v. Aguirre, 89 Cal. 501, 26 Pac. Rep. 1077. There was evidence introduced at the trial which tended to show such delivery and change of possession, and the jury were properly instructed by the court in referring thereto. We cannot say that their verdict is not sustained by the evidence.

3. The objection to the admission in evidence of the certificate of partnership offered on behalf of the plaintiffs cannot be sustained. The requirement in section 2466 of the Civil Code that partnerships transacting business "under a fictitious name, or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners in such business," must file and publish a certificate "stating the names in full of all the members of such partnership," shows that the object of the section is that public notice shall be given and a public record made of the individual members of such partnerships, with such definiteness and particularity that those dealing with them may at all times know who are the individuals with whom they are dealing, or to whom they are giving credit or becoming bound. The members of such partnership may be as fully identified and designated for this purpose by a certificate which states their names with the initials by which they are generally known as they would be if their names were written therein at length. The certificate in the present case is as follows: "We, the undersigned, L. H. Meads and J. D. Seaman, residents of San Miguel, San Luis Obispo county, California, and E. S. Doud, resident of Oakland, California, do hereby certify that we are a co-partnership transacting business in San Luis Obispo county, California, under the name and style of Meads, Seaman & Co." (Signed by the partners in the same manner.) It is not shown or contended that the individual members of the partnership were not fully designated by their names as thus stated in the certificate, nor was there any evidence that their names are other than as stated therein. See Nelson v. Doble, 13 Cal. 74. The provision which requires a publication of the certificate "once a week for four successive weeks" is satisfied by one publication in each of four successive weeks. Any act that depends upon such publication can be performed at any time after the expiration of four weeks from the first of such publications. In the present case the record shows that the certificate was published "for four successive weeks, commencing on the 26th day of August, 1887, and ending on the 16th day of September, 1887, and on the following dates: August 26, September 2, September 9, and September 16, 1887." The action was not commenced until several months thereafter.

4. Appellants urge in their brief that the verdict is erroneous in finding for the plaintiffs for a return to them of the property described in the complaint, for the reason that it was shown at the trial that the sheriff did not take all of such property. As they did not, however, in their statement of the case, specify this as one of the particulars in which the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, we cannot consider it, the only specification being: "The evidence was insufficient to justify the jury in finding for the plaintiffs the amount found by their verdict;" but there is sufficient evidence to justify this part of the finding. It may be that if such specification had been made, the plaintiffs would have caused certain evidence to be inserted in the statement in support of the verdict. Winterburn v. Chambers, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 658.

5. The statement contains certain specifications of errors of law in excluding answers to questions asked by the defendants, but the appellants have not shown in their brief wherein such answers would be material to any issue before the jury, and from an examination of the record we are unable to perceive their materiality. It was not error for the court to allow oral testimony for the purpose of showing who constituted the members of S. Houghton & Sons, or for the purpose of showing who were the owners of the property prior to its sale to the plaintiffs. The order denying a new trial is affirmed, but the court below is directed to correct the judgment as entered by making it conform to the verdict, and as so corrected it will stand affirmed.

BALL v. RAWLES. (No. 13,924.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 4, 1892.)

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—PROBABLE CAUSE—INSTRUCTIONS—PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS.

1. In an action for malicious prosecution the question of probable cause is for the court.

2. While probable cause is a question of law, to be determined upon the facts found by the jury, yet the jury may be instructed to render their verdict for or against the defendant, as they shall find the facts designated by the court as sufficient to constitute probable cause.

3. The court left to the jury the question of probable cause, and afterwards, at plaintiff's request, specially instructed them that if they should find that, when defendant swore out the complaint, he did not, from his knowledge on the subject as a prudent man, believe the plaintiff guilty of any crime, then, as a matter of law, there was no probable cause, and also that, if they should find certain facts enumerated, such facts would not constitute probable cause. Held, where there were other facts in the case than those referred to in the special instructions, of which evidence regarding probable cause was given to the jury, the error of leaving the question of probable cause to the jury was not cured by the special instructions.

4. An instruction that, if the facts were such as to create a reasonable belief in the mind of an impartial man that a crime had been committed by the person charged, it would justify an arrest on a criminal charge, though in fact no crime was committed, is erroneous in omitting to include the element that defendant believed the crime had been committed by the plaintiff.

5. If defendant, before instituting the prosecution, fully stated the facts to a justice of the peace, who advised him that he had reasonable cause to prosecute, and he acted on such advice in good faith, he is not liable.

6. Under Civil Code, § 47, subd. 2, providing that publications made in judicial proceedings are privileged, the complainant in an action in a court which has jurisdiction of the offense charged, if he makes a false accusation, is not liable in a civil action, but may be indicted for perjury.

Action by E. B. Ball against Thomas E. Rawles; the first count being for malicious prosecution, and the second for libel. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. T. Rogers, for appellant. T. L. Carothers, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. Action against the defendant for a malicious prosecution in causing the arrest of the plaintiff upon a criminal charge. At the request of the defendant the court instructed the jury: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant had probable cause to believe that the plaintiff was guilty of the offense charged against him, then it is not material whether the defendant was actuated by proper motives or improper motives in instituting the criminal proceedings against the plaintiff. To authorize a recovery in this class of cases it must appear that the defendant was actuated by malice, but the jury must further believe from the testimony that the defendant had no probable cause or no reasonable ground to believe that the plaintiff was guilty of the offense charged against him; and the court further instructs the jury that 'probable cause' means reasonable ground of suspicion supported by circumstances in themselves sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonably cautious man in the belief that the person accused is guilty of the offense charged." "I instruct you that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, you must find from the evidence that the prosecution complained of was commenced by the defendant through malice, and also that it was without probable cause; and if the plaintiff has failed to show by a preponderance of evidence either of these propositions the jury should find for the defendant."

In giving these instructions the court committed error, for which a new trial should have been granted. The error was not obviated by the fact that the court, at the request of the plaintiff, instructed the jury that if they should find from the evidence "that the defendant, in swearing out the warrant and causing the arrest of the plaintiff, did not believe that plaintiff was guilty of any crime, and that he did not have sufficient knowledge, as a cautious and prudent man, acting conscientiously and impartially, to believe the plaintiff guilty of any crime, then, as a matter of law, there was no probable cause for the arrest and prosecution of plaintiff," and also that if they should find from the evidence a certain state of facts, which were enumerated, those facts would not constitute a probable cause. These were not the only facts of which evidence regarding probable cause had been given to the jury; and the above instructions, given at the request of the defendant, left to the jury the function of determining this question. The court should have told the jury either that the evidence which was introduced was or was not sufficient to establish a probable cause, or that, as from the evidence they should find the facts which in the opinion of the court would or would not be sufficient to show a probable cause, their verdict should be for or against the defendant. In order to maintain an action for malicious prosecution the plaintiff must establish malice on the part of the defendant, and also a want of probable cause. Malice is always a question of fact, for the jury; but whether the defendant had or had not probable cause for instituting the prosecution is always a matter of law, to be determined by the court. If the facts upon which the defendant acted are undisputed the court, according as it shall be of the opinion that they constituted probable cause or not, either will order a nonsuit (or direct a verdict for the defendant) or it will submit the other issues to the jury; but, whether admitted or disputed, the question is still one of law, to be determined by the court from the facts established in the case. If the facts are controverted they must be passed upon by the jury before the court can determine the issue of probable cause, but the question of probable cause can never be left to the determination of the jury. "What facts and circumstances amount to probable cause is a pure question of law. Whether they exist or not in any particular case is a pure question of fact. The former is exclusively for the court, the latter for the jury." Stone v. Crocker, 24 Pick. 84. "When there is no dispute about the facts, the question of the want of probable cause is for the determination of the court. Where the facts are controverted or doubtful, whether they are proved or not belongs to the jury to decide. Or, in other words, whether the circumstances alleged are true is a question of fact; but, if true, whether they amount to probable cause is for the court." Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 387. Probable cause is in the nature of a judgment to be rendered by the court upon a special verdict of the jury, and is not to be rendered until after the jury has given its verdict upon the facts by which it is to be determined. It is not, however, necessary that the facts be found by the jury in the form of a special verdict. The court may instruct them to render their verdict for or against the defendant according as they shall find the facts designated to it which the court may deem sufficient to constitute probable cause. But it is necessary for the court in each instance to determine whether the facts that they may find from the evidence will or will not establish that issue. Neither is it competent for the court to give to the jury a definition of "probable cause," and instruct them to find for or against the defendant according as they may determine that the facts are within or without that definition. Such an instruction is only to leave to them, in another form, the function of determining whether there was probable cause. The court cannot divest itself of its duty to determine this question, however complicated or numerous may be the facts. It must instruct the jury upon this subject in the concrete, and not in the abstract, and must not leave to that body the office of determining the question; but must itself determine it, and direct the jury to find its verdict in accordance with such determination. The court should group in its instructions the facts which the evidence tends to prove, and then instruct the jury that, if they find such facts to be established, there was or was not probable cause, as the case may be, and that their verdict must be accordingly.

Actions for malicious prosecution have never been favored in law, although they have always been readily upheld when the proper elements thereof have been presented. They are sustained, however, only when it is shown that the prosecution was in fact actuated by malice, and that the party instigating it had no reasonable ground for causing the prosecution. It is for the best interests of society that those who offend against the laws shall be promptly punished, and that any citizen who has good reason to believe that the law has been violated shall have the right to cause the arrest of the offender. For the purpose of protecting him in so doing, it is the established rule that if he have reasonable grounds for his belief, and act thereon in good faith, in causing the arrest, he shall not be subjected to damages merely because the accused is not convicted. This rule is founded upon grounds of public policy, in order to encourage the exposure of crime; and when the acts of the citizen in making such exposure are challenged, as not being within the reason of the rule, the court, as in every other case involving considerations of public policy, must itself determine the question as a matter of law, and not leave it to the arbitrament of a jury. And, as a violation of law is never to be presumed from an act which is innocent in itself, and in accordance with public policy, even though injury result therefrom, it is incumbent on him who would impeach the good faith of such act to make proof of his charge before the other is called upon to defend his conduct.

Originally an action of this character was an action on the case, in the nature of a writ of conspiracy, in which the plaintiff in the declaration charged the defendant with having falsely and maliciously caused his arrest. The defendant in his plea set forth the grounds of his suspicion under which he caused the arrest, the sufficiency of which was determined by the court upon a demurrer to the plea. Chambers v. Taylor, Cro. Eliz. 900; Cox v. Wirrall, Cro. Jac. 193; Com. Dig. "Pleader, 2 K;" Weal v. Wells, 3 Bulst. 284. In process of time a change was effected in the manner of pleading the cause of action, by which the plaintiff anticipated this plea by averring in the declaration a want of probable cause, (Savil v. Roberts, 1 Salk. 13, 1 Ld. Raym. 374,) and the facts were presented under the general issue; "yet the rule of law that the question belongs to the judge only, and not to the jury, is not, by such alteration in the pleading, in any way impaired," (Panton v. Williams, 2 Q. B. 193.) In the argument of Kelly for plaintiff in error in this case will be found an interesting account of the history and development of the rule by which this question is held to be always a matter of law, and never to be determined by the jury. Johnstone v. Sutton 1 Term R. 518, is also a leading case on this subject, having been determined in the court of exchequer chamber, and afterwards affirmed in the house of lords. 1 Brown, Parl. Cas. The change in pleading by transferring to the declaration the averment of a want of probable cause, although it imposed upon the plaintiff the necessity of making proof of this negative averment as a part of his cause of action, did not, however, change the issue from one of law to one of fact; for, unless such want of probable cause was proved by him, it became the duty of the court to determine, as matter of law, that he had no cause of action against the defendant; and since such probable cause is a legal conclusion to be drawn from the facts, and its absence is an essential element to the plaintiff's right of action, it is at all times to be determined by the court whether the facts proved constituted such probable cause, just as under the original system the court determined upon the demurrer to the facts set up in the defendant's plea whether there were sufficient grounds for his suspicion.

In Panton v. Williams, supra, the question depended upon the consideration of a combination of circumstances and facts, together with inferences to be drawn from them, and Lord DENMAN left it to be determined by the jury, to which direction counsel for the defendant excepted, and insisted "that his lordship was bound to state to the jury what facts, if proved, would amount to probable cause, leaving to them only the question whether they believed the evidence adduced in order to prove such facts;" and the court in exchequer chamber sustained the exception, saying, (page 192:). "Upon this bill of exceptions we take the broad question between the parties to be this: Whether, in a case in which the question of reasonable or probable cause depends, not upon a few simple facts, but upon facts which are numerous and complicated, and upon inferences to be drawn therefrom, it is the duty of the judge to inform the jury that if they find the facts proved and the inferences to be warranted by such facts, the same do or do not amount to reasonable or probable cause, so as thereby to leave the question of fact to the jury, and the abstract question of law to the judge; and we are all of opinion that it is the duty of the judge to do so,"—and, after stating that such had always been held to be the rule of law in ordinary cases, said further: "And, such being the rule of law where the facts are few and the case simple, we cannot hold it to be otherwise where the facts are more numerous and complicated. It is undoubtedly attended with greater difficulty in the latter case to bring before the jury all the combinations of which numerous facts are susceptible, and to place in a distinct point of view the application of the rule of law according as all or some only of the facts, and inferences from facts, are made out to their satisfaction; but it is equally certain that the task is not impracticable, and it rarely happens but that there are some leading facts in each case which present a broad distinction to their view without having recourse to the less important circumstances that have been brought before them."

In Bulkeley v. Keteltas, supra, the court held that it was error to leave to the jury to determine whether the circumstances proved in evidence did or did not establish a want of probable cause. When this cause was again tried in the superior court the judge instructed the jury that, if they should find that the defendants had reasonable grounds for believing that the plaintiff swore as had been charged, (the plaintiff having been arrested upon a charge of perjury,) that would establish a want of probable cause; but the court at general term (Bulkeley v. Smith, 2 Duer, 261) held this instruction erroneous, saying that, "from the terms in which it was expressed, it necessarily involved the submission to the jury of the question of probable cause, and was not limited to the facts upon which the question depended. The judge instructed the jury that they were to consider and determine whether the facts and circumstances known to the defendants were reasonable grounds for their believing that the charge which they made against the plaintiff was true; and we are unable to make a distinction between the existence or non-existence of reasonable grounds of belief and the existence or want of a probable cause. There is a difference in the form of expression, but none in the meaning, since the existence of reasonable grounds for believing a charge to be true is in reality nothing more than a legal definition of a probable cause for making it. In deciding that there were no reasonable grounds of belief a jury of necessity decides that there was a want of probable cause. The charge of the judge, therefore, amounted to no more than the definition which the law gives of 'probable cause,' and permitted the jury, in the exercise of their own judgment, to apply the definition to the facts of the case; that is, permitted them to determine whether the facts which they might consider to be proved did or did not amount to a want of probable cause."

In Grant v. Moore, 29 Cal. 644, the court, (page 649,) upon the ground that the facts were controverted, conflicting evidence to be weighed, and credibility of witnesses to be passed upon, left to the jury to decide whether or not there was probable cause for the prosecution of the suit; and the supreme court, in holding that this action was erroneous, said, (page 653:). "The law makes it the duty of the judge who tries an action for malicious prosecution to instruct the jury that, as they may find and determine certain questions of fact properly submitted to them to be true or untrue, so must be their verdict for the plaintiff or the defendant; not that they should determine the question of the want of probable cause, or the contrary. It may sometimes be difficult to state to the jury what the testimony is, and what facts, if found to be true, establish the plaintiff's allegation of want of probable cause; but, difficult as it may be, this duty is cast on the judge in this kind of actions, because he is presumed to know much better than the jury can what facts show the existence of probable cause, or the want of it."

In Bulkeley v. Smith, supra, the court said: "If the facts upon which the question of probable cause depends are rendered doubtful by the evidence, the court must instruct the jury that, if the facts shall be found by them in a certain manner, they do or do not amount, as the case may be, to a want of probable cause, and consequently will or will not entitle the plaintiff to the verdict which he seeks. If, instead of such a direction, he leaves it to the jury to determine, not only whether the facts alleged by the plaintiff are true, but whether, if true, they prove a want of probable cause, he abjures his own functions, and commits a fatal error."

In Harkrader v. Moore, 44 Cal. 152, the court said: "When the facts in reference to the alleged probable cause are admitted or established beyond controversy, then the determination of their legal effect is absolute, and the jury are to be told that there was or was not probable cause, as the case may be. When, however, the facts are controverted and the evidence is conflicting, then the determination of their legal effect by the court is necessarily hypothetical, and the jury are to be told that, if they find the facts in a designated way, then that such facts, when so found, do or do not amount to probable cause; but in neither case are the jury to determine whether or not the established facts do or do not amount to probable cause." See, also, Eastin v. Bank, 66 Cal. 125, 4 Pac. Rep. 1106; Fulton v. Onesti, 66 Cal. 575, 6 Pac. Rep. 491; Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 217; 1 Saund. 230, note 4.

2. The court also, at the request of the defendant, gave the jury the following instruction: "I instruct you that, to justify an arrest on a criminal charge, it is not required that a crime shall in fact have been committed. If the facts which come to a person's knowledge are such as to create a belief that a crime has been committed by the person charged, in the mind of an impartial, reasonable man, this would be sufficient to constitute probable cause for making an arrest, although no crime had in fact been committed." Inasmuch as the question of probable cause is always to be determined by the court from the facts in each particular case, it would seem unnecessary to give to the jury any definition of the term, or any instruction upon abstract propositions relating to this subject. These abstract rules will guide the court in determining the question, but are apt to lead the jury away from their function of passing upon the effect of the evidence in support of the probative facts which the court may direct them to find in order to determine in which way their general verdict shall be rendered. As a principle of law this instruction was erroneous in omitting to include therein the further element that the defendant did in fact believe that a crime had been committed by the plaintiff. The circumstances in themselves might be such as ordinarily to create such belief in the mind of a person; yet the defendant might not have that belief, for the reason that he had knowledge of other facts or circumstances which would destroy such belief. While it is not necessary to show that the crime has in fact been committed, it is necessary to show, not only that the defendant had reasonable ground to believe, but that he did in fact believe, that the crime had been committed, and that the plaintiff had committed the crime. Although the question of probable cause, as we have seen above, is a question of law, yet the belief of the defendant in a state of facts is itself a fact which it is proper to submit to the jury for its consideration; and whenever the good faith of the defendant, or his knowledge or belief in an existing state of facts, is an element in determining whether there was probable cause, the court should submit that question to the jury, as well as the other facts which in its opinion bear upon that issue. "The prevailing law of reasonable and probable cause is that the jury are to ascertain certain facts, and the judge is to decide whether those facts amount to such cause; but among the facts to be ascertained is the knowledge of the defendant of the existence of those which tend to show reasonable and probable cause, because without knowing them he could not act upon them, and also the defendant's belief that the facts amounted to the offense which he charged, because otherwise he will have made them the pretext for prosecution without even entertaining the opinion that he had a right to prosecute. In other words, the reasonable and probable cause must appear, not only to be deducible in point of law from the facts, but to have existed in the defendant's mind at the time of his proceeding." Turner v. Ambler, 10 Q. B. 260. See, also, Harkrader v. Moore, supra; Bacon v. Towne, 4 Cush. 239; Woodworth v. Mills, 61 Wis. 61, 20 N. W. Rep. 728; Fagnan v. Knox, 66 N. Y. 525; Delegal v. Highley, 3 Bing. N. C. 950; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 455; Starkie, Sland. & L. *p. 472.

3. It was not error for the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff could not maintain the action if the defendant, before instituting the prosecution, fully and fairly stated the facts and circumstances to the justice of the peace, and was advised by him that they constituted reasonable cause for the arrest of the plaintiff, and he honestly and in good faith acted under such advice. Whatever may be the rule in other states, it was held in this state in Hahn v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 284, that the advice of a justice of the peace, upon the facts stated to him by the complainant, that a crime had been committed, and upon which he issued a warrant of arrest, is sufficient to exonerate the complainant from liability for the arrest. Similar rulings have also been made in Sisk v. Hurst, 1 W. Va. 53; Teal v. Fissel, 28 Fed. Rep. 351; Newman v. Davis, 58 Iowa, 447, 10 N. W. Rep. 852; and in England in the cases cited in Hahn v. Schmidt.

4. The court properly excluded from evidence the lease from the defendant to Hunt. It was not relevant to any issue before the jury, and could not be considered by them for the purpose of determining the motive of the defendant in causing the arrest of the plaintiff. For the same reason the court properly excluded the offer on the part of the plaintiff to show that the defendant was anxious to have the lease annulled. The reason which the plaintiff urges as grounds for its admission, viz., that the defendant was anxious to have the lease forfeited, and instituted this action for the purpose of ascertaining whether there were any grounds upon which such forfeiture could be shown, is only a conjecture, and in no wise connected with the arrest, and could not be considered by the jury.

5. The demurrer to the second count in the complaint was properly sustained. There can be no action for injury to character when the publication by which the injury is claimed to have been sustained is privileged. Section 47 of the Civil Code declares that "a privileged publication is one made * * * (2) in any legislative or judicial proceeding, or in any other official proceeding authorized by law." The effect of this provision is to make a complaint in a court of justice which has jurisdiction of the offense charged an absolute privilege, for which the complainant is not liable in a civil action. Hollis v. Meux, 69 Cal. 625, 11 Pac. Rep. 248. If the complainant in such proceeding makes a false accusation, the remedy therefor is to procure his indictment for perjury, but he cannot be made liable for damages in a civil action. The publication charged in this count of the complaint was a criminal complaint made by the defendant before a justice of the peace, and presented in the justice's court of Anderson township, county of Mendocino. If the matters set forth in that complaint constituted a crime, the justice's court had jurisdiction to entertain the complaint. (Code Civil Proc. § 115;) and it is only upon the theory that such facts did constitute a crime that the complaint can be held to be an injury to the plaintiff's character. The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

LOWENBERG v. LEVINE. (No. 13,529.)

INSOLVENCY—EFFECT OF DISCHARGE—FOREIGN CONTRACT.

Plaintiff obtained a judgment against defendant in Montana on a contract made and to be performed there. Subsequently both parties removed to California, where defendant was discharged under the insolvent act, (section 53,) providing that a discharge thereunder shall release the debtor from all debts and liabilities; but plaintiff in no wise participated in such insolvency proceedings. Held, under Const. U. S. art. 1, § 10, providing that no state can pass a law violating the obligation of a contract, that the discharge of defendant did not relieve him from payment of plaintiff's judgment.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER H. LEVY, Judge.

Action by Lowenberg against Levine. Judgment for plaintiff. Affirmed.

Henry I. Kowalsky and Reinstein & Eisner, for appellant. Geo. A. Rankin, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Action upon a money judgment recovered by plaintiff against defendant in a court of general jurisdiction in the territory of Montana, while plaintiff and defendant were residents of that territory, and upon a contract made and to be performed there. Subsequently to the rendition of this judgment the defendant filed in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco his petition in insolvency; and such proceedings were thereafter had in the matter that upon August 14, 1888, the court duly made and entered its decree discharging defendant from all his debts and liabilities. At the date of this decree, and during the entire time of the pendency of these insolvency proceedings, both plaintiff and defendant were residents of this state. In his answer the defendant pleads this decree in insolvency as a bar to this action. The case was submitted to the court below upon an agreed statement of facts showing the matters hereinbefore stated, and in addition thereto the following facts: "That in the schedule of indebtedness of defendant, Levine, filed with said petition in insolvency, was set forth, as required by law, a statement of the judgment rendered against him and in favor of the plaintiff, Lowenberg, by the district court of the third judicial district of the territory of Montana in and for Lewis and Clarke county as set forth in plaintiff's complaint. That said plaintiff, Lowenberg, never filed a verified or other statement of his claim and demand in said proceedings in involuntary insolvency, or in any other manner whatever participated in any of the proceedings connected therewith; but such failure to participate therein was due to no neglect, default, or omission on the part of the defendant, Levine." The court below gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

The only question presented in the record before us is whether, in view of the facts as above stated, the decree discharging defendant from his debts and liabilities is a bar to his action. It is claimed by the appellant that as the parties hereto were resident citizens of this state at the time when the insolvency proceedings were begun, and until their completion, the decree therein discharging him from all his debts is conclusive upon the plaintiff, and is a bar to this action, and that the binding force of such decree is in no wise affected by the fact that the judgment sued upon was recovered in the territory of Montana, and is based upon a contract made and to be performed there. In support of this proposition counsel for appellant rely upon Felch v. Bugbee, 48 Me. 9; Hawley v. Hunt, 27 Iowa, 303; Bedell v. Scruton, 54 Vt. 493; Marsh v. Putnam, 3 Gray, 551. These cases, however, with the exception of Marsh v. Putnam, are not in point, as in each of them, with the one exception stated, the only matter before the court for decision was as to the effect of a discharge in insolvency upon debts held by non-residents of the state in which the discharge was granted, the creditor not having proved his claim in the insolvency proceedings, nor otherwise participating therein; and it was with reference to this question that it was said in those cases that the binding effect of the discharge in insolvency then before the court depended upon the citizenship of the parties, and not upon the place of the contract. Thus, in the case of Bedell v. Scruton, supra, it is said: "The debt attends the person of the creditor, and unless he is within the jurisdiction of the court, no discharge granted by it can affect his rights. It is a question of citizenship, and state courts and state laws are powerless to affect the rights of non-resident creditors by any jurisdiction they may have or exercise over the person of the debtor, or by any proceedings in rem affecting the debt itself." So, also, in Hawley v. Hunt, supra, the only matter before the court was whether a discharge in insolvency made by the courts of one state would affect non-residents not parties to it; and, in holding that it would not, DILLON, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "I have said that the settled law now is that a non-resident and non-assenting creditor is not bound by the debtor's discharge under state insolvent laws, no matter where the debt originated or is made payable. In other words, the citizenship of the parties governs, and not the place where the contract was made or is to be performed." There can be no doubt of the correctness of this proposition, when considered in connection with the question which the court had before it. Indeed, it is only the statement of a very familiar principle, which is not at all peculiar to decrees in insolvency proceedings, that no court can render a valid personal judgment against a defendant, or one affecting property which attends or follows his person, without first obtaining jurisdiction of his person. But the rule itself has no application whatever to the facts of this case, as the question here is not whether the superior court, when it made the decree upon which appellant relies, had jurisdiction over the person of respondent, but whether the court was authorized to discharge, by its decree in insolvency, the obligation of the contract made in another state or territory.

Section 53 of the insolvent act of this state declares: "A discharge duly granted under this act shall * * * release the debtor from all claims, debts, liabilities, and demands set forth in his schedule, or which were or might have been proved against his estate in insolvency." This language is broad enough to include the debt sued upon in this action; but, if the state is without authority to pass an insolvent law affecting the obligations of contracts made without the state, then the general terms of the statute must be restricted, and the act construed as not intended to affect or apply to them. Danforth v. Robinson, 80 Me. 466.¹ So that after all the real question for decision in this case is as to the power of the state to enact a law having the effect to discharge the obligation of contracts made elsewhere, when the creditor in no wise participates in the proceedings in which the discharge is entered, although he may have been a resident of this state at the time of the insolvency proceedings. This precise question came before the supreme court of New York in the case of Witt v. Follett, 2 Wend. 457, and was there determined in the negative; and such seems to be the settled doctrine of the supreme court of the United States. In the case of Cook v. Moffat, 5 How. 308, that court, while conceding the authority of a state to pass an insolvent law in the absence of a law of congress establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy, nevertheless held that in view of section 10 of article 1 of the constitution of the United States, which denies to a state the power to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts, the insolvent law of a state "could have no effect on contracts made before their enactment, or beyond their territory." And in the later case of Baldwin v. Hale, 1 Wall. 223, that court, after reviewing the previous cases decided by it as to the effect of state insolvent laws, takes occasion to again state upon what contracts such laws cannot operate, and in so doing uses this language: "Undoubtedly a state may pass a bankrupt or insolvent law under the conditions before mentioned, and such a law is operative and binding upon the citizens of the state; but we repeat what the court said in Cook v. Moffat, 5 How. 308, that such laws 'can have no effect on contracts made before their enactment, or beyond their territory.'"

The rule upon this subject, and the reason upon which it is founded, is thus stated in section 1390 of Story on the Constitution, as the result of all the cases: "The question is now understood to be finally at rest. The state insolvent laws, discharging the obligation of future contracts, are to be deemed constitutional. Still, a very important point remains to be examined; and that is, to what contracts such laws can rightfully apply. The result of the various decisions on this subject is (1) that they apply to all contracts made within the state between citizens of the state; (2) that they do not apply to contracts made within the state between a citizen of a state and a citizen of another state; (3) that they do not apply to contracts not made within the state. In all these cases it is considered that the state does not possess a jurisdiction, co-extensive with the contract, over the parties, and therefore that the constitution of the United States protects them from prospective as well as retrospective legislation. Still, however, if a creditor voluntarily makes himself a party to the proceedings under an insolvent law of a state which discharges the contract, and accepts a dividend declared under such law, he will be bound by his own act, and be deemed to have abandoned this extra-territorial immunity." In the case of Marsh v. Putnam, 3 Gray, 551, cited and relied upon by appellant, a contrary rule was declared. But this case stands alone, and, in our opinion, should not be followed.

The plaintiff not having in any manner participated in the insolvency proceedings had in this state, and relied upon as a bar, and the judgment sued upon having been recovered in Montana upon a contract made there, it results from the foregoing views that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action. Judgment affirmed.

FAY v. PACIFIC IMP. CO. (No. 13,350.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 4, 1892.)

INNKEEPER'S LIABILITY—LOSS BY FIRE—GUESTS—BOARDERS.

1. Under Civil Code, § 1859, making an innkeeper liable for the loss of personal property placed by his guests under his care, "unless occasioned by an irresistible superhuman cause," a loss occurring by a fire which originated in the battery room of an hotel cannot be considered occasioned by an "irresistible superhuman cause."

2. One who keeps a house for the entertainment of all who choose to visit it, and extends a general invitation to the public to become guests, is an innkeeper, and liable as such, though the house is situated on inclosed grounds.

3. A guest at a public inn may retain personal custody of necessary wearing apparel; and jewelry worn daily by her need not be deposited with the innkeeper, when not in use, to make him liable for its loss by fire.

4. Where one went to a public inn, and was assigned a room, the fact that she inquired as to the price of room and board is not sufficient to show that she was received as a boarder, and not as a guest.

FANNING v. LEVISTON et al. (No. 14,066.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 4, 1892.)

STREET ASSESSMENTS—VALIDITY—RECOMMENDATION OF SUPERINTENDENT—EVIDENCE—APPEAL—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

1. In an action on an assessment for street work done under Act April 1, 1872, the warrant, assessment, and diagram which section 12 provides shall be prima facie evidence of the regularity of the assessment, and of the "prior proceedings and acts" of the superintendent of public streets, are prima facie evidence that the work was done on the recommendation of the superintendent.

2. A person who fails to appeal to the board of supervisors from a street assessment under Act April 1, 1872, waives an objection that the street was not graded according to the official grade.

3. A person who fails to appeal to the board of supervisors from a street assessment under Act April 1, 1872, waives an objection that the assessment included a charge for work not authorized.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Fanning against Leviston and others to recover an assessment for street work. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. Leviston, for appellants. J. M. Wood, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action on an assessment for street work in the city and county of San Francisco, done under the act of April 1, 1872. Appellant relies for a reversal upon three grounds: (1) That there was no recommendation by the street superintendent, and therefore no jurisdiction in the board of supervisors to order the work done; (2) that the contractor did not grade the street to the official grade; (3) that the assessment and demand included a charge for work not authorized to be done.

It cannot be said there was no evidence that the work had been recommended by the superintendent of streets. Section 12 of the act provides that the warrant, assessment, and diagram shall be held prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment, and of the prior proceedings and acts of the superintendent, and of the regularity of all the acts and proceedings of the board of supervisors upon which the warrant, assessment, and diagram are based. In Jennings v. Le Roy, 63 Cal. 401, it was held that this provision was not confined in its operation to the proceedings mentioned in section 12, but was applicable, in actions of this kind, to establish prima facie the facts that the resolution ordering the work had been published after its introduction and before final action thereon; that notice of the nature and character of the work to be done, with specifications, was posted in the office of the superintendent of streets; and that notice of the award was published. We see no reason why it should not be considered as of the same effect with respect to any other proceeding upon which the assessment, warrant, and diagram are based. If the provision of the section referred to above is not confined in its operation to appeals to the board of supervisors, but is to be observed as a rule of evidence in actions on the assessment, we think it is clearly applicable to establish prima facie any fact relating to the acts of the board of supervisors and superintendent of streets, whether the same be jurisdictional or not. The language of the provision is broad enough to cover everything: "Shall be prima facie evidence of the regularity and correctness of the assessment, and of the prior proceedings and acts of the said superintendent of public streets, highways, and squares, and of the regularity of all the acts and proceedings of the board of supervisors upon which said warrant, assessment, and diagram are based." In the case at bar one of the acts upon which the warrant, assessment, and diagram were based was the recommendation of the superintendent of streets. The court below found that Vallejo street had been graded for a distance of two blocks on each side of the block between Montgomery and Kearny,—the block on which the work was done,—and that on October 9, 1876, the superintendent of public streets had recommended to the board of supervisors that the work of grading said block should be done. Conceding that the evidence is conflicting, the finding cannot be disturbed.

The objection that the street was not properly graded is one which should have been taken on an appeal to the board of supervisors. Emery v. Bradford, 29 Cal. 85; Shepard v. McNeil, 38 Cal. 75; Chambers v. Satterlee, 40 Cal. 497; Boyle v. Hitchcock, 66 Cal. 129, 4 Pac. Rep. 1143. And the same may be said of the contention that the assessment and demand included a charge for work not authorized to be done under the contract. Himmelmänn v. Hoadley, 44 Cal. 279; Boyle v. Hitchcock, supra.

We are unable to see that the court erred in its ruling upon the motion to tax the costs. Some of the items referred to matters of which the court had actual knowledge; and, as the affidavits were conflicting, its ruling should not be disturbed. The act of February 9, 1866, (St. 1866, p. 66,) allowing the prevailing party 5 per cent. on the amount recovered, is still in force, (Whitaker v. Haynes, 49 Cal. 596,) and, we think, is applicable to cases of this kind. The judgment and the orders appealed from are affirmed.

SMITH v. WORN. (No. 13,653.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 4, 1892.)

RIGHT OF WAY—ACCEPTANCE—PLEADING.

1. Under a deed expressly granting a right of way, and designating the exact piece of land over which the easement is to extend, no act is required of the grantee to show an acceptance by him.

2. Where a complaint in an action to restrain the obstruction of a right of way alleged that plaintiff was the owner of an open and unobstructed way, 66 feet wide, for all kinds of vehicles and at all times, and the allegation, though a mere conclusion of law, is denied, and the issue is treated by all parties as one of fact, a finding in favor of plaintiff, which is supported by the evidence, will not be disturbed.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. MAHON, Judge.

Action by Smith against Worn to restrain defendant from obstructing an easement claimed by plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Thompson, for appellant. Hepburn Wilkins, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. On September 14, 1871, David Porter conveyed to Sidney V. Smith, the father of plaintiff, a tract of land described in the first paragraph of the complaint. The deed contained this clause: "Also the right of way, to the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, at all times hereafter, over, upon, and through a road 66 feet wide, which shall be laid out by said party of the first part over the lands owned by him, and shall run westward from the Ross Landing road, and immediately south of, but adjacent to, the tract of land so sold and conveyed to said James Ross, and the land first hereinabove described; such road to be opened and laid out from said Ross Landing road, until it strikes the foot of the low spur mentioned in the first course of the description of the tract of land first hereinabove described." Porter, in 1872, conveyed the remainder of his ranch to one Walker by deed, which contained a stipulation to the effect that the land therein described was conveyed subject to the right of way over it created by the deed from Porter to Smith; and in 1874 Walker conveyed the same land to Annie S. E. Worn by deed, which contained a similar clause. In 1881 said Annie laid out the property into blocks and lots for the purposes of an auction sale, and filed a map thereof in the recorder's office, showing an avenue called "Linda Vista Avenue," 66 feet wide, on the line of the right of way named in the deed from Porter to Smith; and thereafter she conveyed the tract to appellant by a deed which included the strip in question. Smith, Sr., conveyed to plaintiff on January 13, 1880, referring in the deed to the road 66 feet wide described in the deed from Porter. All of the deeds referred to were recorded, respectively, soon after they were executed. At the time Smith received his deed from Porter there was a fence inclosing Porter's land along the Ross Landing road. The road referred to in the deed had not been laid out. There was a fence on the north side of the strip along the Tunstead tract. The fence which constituted the western boundary of the Ross Landing road ran across the end of the strip of land referred to. There was nothing on the surface of the land indicating in any way the existence of any road over it. The strip of land was a part of a large field, and it remained in this condition until the year 1874, when the track of the North Pacific Coast Railroad was laid across it at the eastern end, extending westward about 40 feet in breadth. The old fence on the western side of the Ross Landing road formed the eastern boundary of the railroad track, and a new fence was erected across the piece of land on the inside, which formed the western boundary of the railroad track. There were, therefore, two fences and a railroad across the strip of land over which the right of way is claimed. Nothing was done by either of the Smiths to indicate an intention to lay out the road until a short time before this action was commenced,—June, 1888. The lands have been used by the defendant and her tenants in the same manner as the rest of the land within the inclosure. Before the commencement of this action the railroad company, at the request of plaintiff, removed the fences inclosing their track where they crossed the 66-foot strip. The defendant rebuilt the inside fence, and announced her intention of keeping it up. Plaintiff removed the obstruction, and commenced this suit to enjoin the defendant from any further interruption of his right, and to restrain her from "putting up, constructing, or maintaining any gate, fence, or obstruction of any kind on any part of said way."

It is claimed by appellant that there was no grant of an easement to Smith by Porter, that there could be no easement until the road was laid out, and that the right to enforce the opening of the road has been lost by adverse occupation. But neither the evidence nor the authorities cited by her support her contention. The deed to Smith conveys a right of way in express terms. It defines with precision the exact piece of land over which the easement is to extend, namely, a strip 66 feet wide, running in front of Ross' land from the county road to a fixed point. Nothing whatever was required to be done to fix the right of way or its location. Nothing remained for either party to do in the premises. The lines of the road were determined, and the land to be burdened with the easement was clearly indicated. No act was required on the part of Smith to indicate an acceptance by him as the owner of the dominate tenement. The acceptance of the deed was an acceptance of all it conveyed. The right conveyed was not merely personal to Smith, but was an easement which he could convey. Randall v. Chase, 133 Mass. 210; Lide v. Hadley, 76 Amer. Dec. 338. There is no evidence whatever of any adverse claim on the part of Porter or his grantees. Plaintiff's title to the right of way has always been recognized. The only matter about which there seems to have been any dispute at all up to the time plaintiff removed the fence was the plaintiff's right to the use of the strip of land without any gate at either end; defendant being willing that he should use the land, provided gates were maintained. An easement acquired by deed is not lost by mere non-user. "It must be accompanied with the express or the implied intention of abandonment; and the owner of the servient estate, acting upon the intention of abandonment and the actual non-user, must have incurred expenses upon his own estate. The three elements—non-user, intention to abandon, and damage to the owner of the servient estate—must concur in order to extinguish the easement." Tied. Real Prop. § 605. "Nothing short of a use by the owner of the premises over which it was granted, which is adverse to the enjoyment of such easement by the owner thereof, for the space of time long enough to create a prescriptive right, will destroy the right granted." Washb. Easem. (2d Ed.) 640-642; Civil Code, § 811, subd. 4, (Commissioners' Ann. Ed.,) note. The defendant and her grantors, by word and by deed, have always recognized the existence and continuance of the plaintiff's right of way. The easterly fence remained the same as it was when the land was conveyed by Porter, and the owners of the servient tenement used the land just as it had always been used. Of course, the act of the railroad company in building its fence across the strip of land, even if considered a hostile act, cannot operate to the advantage of the defendant. One cannot be deprived of an incorporeal hereditament by the act of strangers to the title. Jewett v. Jewett, 16 Barb. 159. Where non-user is evidence of an abandonment of a right, the question is one of intention, depending upon the circumstances, and this is a question of fact, to be determined by the court or the jury. The appellant brings this case before us upon a finding which is against him as to that fact, and this finding is supported by the evidence. The acts of the owner of the dominant tenement in case of non-user, or to prevent him from claiming an easement acquired by grant, must be of a character so decisive and conclusive as to indicate a clear intent to abandon the easement. Hayford v. Spokesfield, 100 Mass. 494; Smyles v. Hastings, 22 N. Y. 224. Where the acts of the grantee have led other persons to treat the servient estate as free of the servitude, he will not be permitted to resume the easement, because he cannot do so without doing injustice to those who have acted upon the appearances of abandonment. In the case at bar, however, no one has been misled to his prejudice by the acts of the plaintiff.

It is claimed by appellant that the relief granted by the decree is too broad; that the decree substantially grants an open, public thoroughfare, whereas the covenant in the deed is for a mere private right of way. One of the questions in issue, however, was whether the plaintiff was entitled to the use of the road without any gate or any other obstruction thereon. It is alleged in the complaint that the plaintiff is the owner of an open and unobstructed way, 66 feet wide, "for the plaintiff, himself and his servants, agents and visitors, on foot and on horseback, with carriages and wagons and every kind of vehicles, to go, return, pass, and repass, every year and at all times of the year, and at his and their free will and pleasure, without passing through any gate on said road 66 feet wide, and without any obstruction thereon." This alleged right of the plaintiff was denied by the defendant. Although the allegation was a mere conclusion of law, it was denied, and the issue was treated by all parties as one of fact. The prayer of the complaint asked for the relief granted. The defendant had full notice of the claim made. The finding of the court is not attacked in the specifications of the insufficiency of the evidence, and for that reason alone is conclusive. We prefer, however, to put our decision upon the merits of the question. Appellant asks us to hold, as matter of law, that it appears upon the face of the grant that the grantee is not entitled to a way without gates or bars. If the question were one of law, based exclusively upon the language of the grant, we should be inclined to construe the grant to be one of an open road, 66 feet wide, unobstructed by gates or bars. The right of way granted is through a road 66 feet wide, and this road is "to be laid out by the party of the first part over the lands owned by him." The word "road," as used in our laws, is uniformly applied to open and unobstructed roads, unless qualified by some other word like the adjective "private;" and such is the common as well as legal acceptance of the word. Respublica v. Arnold, 3 Yeates, 421, 422; Kister v. Reeser, 98 Pa. St. 4. It is a term of greater significance than the term "way." Mining Co. v.

Kennedy, 3 Nev. 394; Sherman v. Buick, 32 Cal. 241. But the question has been uniformly regarded by the courts as one of fact, for the jury. The extent of the right and duty of the respective owners towards each other is to be determined by the language of the grant, and all the circumstances existing at the time the grant was made. "Nothing passes as incident to such a grant but that which is necessary for its reasonable and proper enjoyment." 3 Kent, Comm. 419, 420. "What is necessary for such reasonable and proper enjoyment of the way granted, and the limitations thereby imposed on the use of the land by the proprietor, depends upon the terms of the grant, and the purposes for which it was made, the nature and situation of the property subject to the easement, and the manner in which it has been used and occupied." Baker v. Frick, 45 Md. 340; Bean v. Coleman, 44 N. H. 541; Maxwell v. McAtee, 9 B. Mon. 20; Bakeman v. Talbot, 31 N. Y. 368; Garland v. Furber, 47 N. H. 302; Houppes v. Alderson, 22 Iowa, 162.

The court heard the evidence of the parties, and considered all the circumstances under which the grant was made, the nature and situation of the property, and the terms of the grant, and found in favor of the plaintiff. The finding is supported by evidence, and cannot be disturbed. The points made by appellant as to the remedy, we think, are not well taken.

Judgment and order affirmed.

PEOPLE V. WINTERS. (No. 20,791.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 5, 1892.)

BURGLARY—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. On a trial for burglary, a witness testified that about midnight he heard a noise in the kitchen, and found defendant and a companion searching the drawers in the pantry, and witness asked what they wanted; that they said they wanted something to eat; that witness gave them some food; they bade witness good-night, and said that they were not burglars, but had been on a spree. Defendant stated that, seeing the door open, he entered the house to get a drink and something to eat. Held, that the evidence justified a conviction.

2. On a trial for burglary, the error of the court in charging that, "in every crime or public offense, there must exist a union or joint operation of act or intent or criminal negligence," is cured by a subsequent charge that the jury must believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant entered the house with intent to commit larceny.

3. The court charged the jury that, "if there be any reasonable hypothesis, not a mere possible one,—any reasonable hypothesis upon which the conduct of the defendant [in entering the house] can be explained consistently with his innocence,—then the testimony is such as ought to leave a reasonable doubt upon your minds." Held, that the jury could not have understood the court to mean that it devolved on defendant to explain his conduct.

4. Where the definition of a "reasonable doubt," as given in the charge of the court, has been repeatedly approved, if a defendant wants a more satisfactory one he should ask for it.

Commissioners' decision. In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; JOHN ELLSWORTH, Judge.

Prosecution of Harry Winters for burglary. Verdict and judgment of conviction. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nagle & Nagle, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

FITZGERALD, C. The defendant was accused, by information, of the crime of burglary, charged to have been committed by the entry of the defendant into the house of one John Gunn, with intent to commit larceny. He was convicted of burglary in the first degree, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state-prison for the term of six years. From the judgment of conviction and the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial this appeal is taken. The evidence upon which the verdict was founded is substantially as follows: Vincent Brewer, a witness for the prosecution, testified that on the 4th day of July, 1890, he was in the employ of John Gunn, the owner and occupant of the house in question, as driver of a dairy wagon; that he had been in town that day, and returned to Gunn's house, where he lived, shortly before 12 o'clock that night; that he entered the house by the back door leading into the kitchen, which he shut and latched on entering, and after extinguishing the gas-light therein he went to his room adjoining the kitchen and lighted the gas; that he was in the act of turning off the gas before retiring, when he heard the outside kitchen door by which he entered opened; that he at first paid but little attention to it, thinking that it was opened by some one connected with the house, so he put out the gas and got into bed; but hearing nothing further he became suspicious, and got up and partly opened the door between his room and the kitchen, and saw the defendant in the act of opening the door of a small closet, which, after looking into and picking up one or two things, he, the defendant, passed to a small slide door between the kitchen and dining-room; that after lifting the slide, and looking into the dining-room, he went to a table, from which he picked up a parcel; that the defendant then opened the pantry door, and, while he was in the act of searching a drawer thereof, witness "yelled out to him, and asked him what he was doing;" that defendant "turned, shook his hand, and hissed at him, 'Don't make any noise.'" At this time the companion of the defendant appeared, and they started towards witness, who asked them what they wanted. Aftersome hesitation, one of them answered that they wanted something to eat, and were looking for it. Witness, being frightened, started to the closet to get something for them to eat, but on turning saw that they were whispering to each other. Notwithstanding this he got some food, and set it out for them. One partook of a small piece of bread, and the other drank a little tea. They then shook hands with witness, and on bidding him good night said that they were not burglars, but had been on a spree. The defendant stated that he was an attorney residing on Montgomery street, in San Francisco, and that his name was Mullen. The other man stated that he resided on Washington street, in Oakland, and gave his name and the number of his residence, which witness failed to remember. Witness further testified that they did not drink any water from the faucet in the kitchen after they entered, and that it could not have been drawn by them without his hearing it. To the witness Rogers defendant admitted that he went into the house of Gunn on the night in question to get a drink of water, and to the witness Conrad he also admitted that he and his companion were looking for flowers that night, and that they went into Gunn's garden to get them; that they afterwards went to the back of the house to get a drink of water, and while there saw that the inside door was open, and, being hungry, they went in to get something to eat; that he was in the act of taking down a tin box with cake in it when the witness Brewer came in and asked what they wanted; they answered "something to eat," and he gave it to them; that the man who was with him was named Williams, but that he could not tell where he could be found. The defendant in his testimony admitted that he was in Gunn's house with his partner on the night in question, but stated that they went in through an open door to get a drink of water, and that they lighted the gas after they got in, and that they did not enter the house with the intention of stealing anything therein.

It is claimed that the court erred in charging the jury that "in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act or intent or criminal negligence." While it must be conceded that the use of the word "or" instead of "and" before the word "intent" was erroneous, still we do not see how it could possibly have resulted injuriously to the defendant, for the reason that the court, in further charging the jury upon the same subject, told them, in the language of the statute, that "every person who enters any house with intent to commit * * * larceny * * * is guilty of burglary;" and again, in substance, that, before they could convict the defendant of the crime charged, they must believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that he entered the house with intent to commit larceny. We do not think the jury could have been misled by the error complained of, to the prejudice of the defendant.

It is further claimed that the court erred in charging the jury that "if there be any reasonable hypothesis, not a mere possible one,—any reasonable hypothesis upon which the conduct of the defendant [in entering the house] can be explained consistently with his innocence,—then the testimony is such as ought to leave a reasonable doubt upon your minds." This charge is objected to on the ground that "the court here assumes the guilt of the defendant, and imposes on him the burden of proof to show that his conduct was reasonable and proper, and that he did not commit the crime he is charged with, instead of being upon the prosecution to show that all his acts and conduct have been inconsistent with his innocence." It must be presumed that the jury was composed of men of ordinary intelligence, and were capable of understanding the English language, and, being such, we do not think they could have understood the court to mean that it devolved on the defendant to explain his conduct; but that if the jury, after a full consideration of all the facts of the case, could reasonably explain or account for such conduct on any reasonable hypothesis consistent with his innocence, they should acquit him. People v. Hardisson, 61 Cal. 379.

It is further contended that the court erred in that part of its charge defining a "reasonable doubt." The charge of the court on this subject conforms substantially to the definition of a "reasonable doubt" given by Chief Justice SHAW in the Webster Case, 5 Cush. 296, and which has been repeatedly approved by this court; but "if the defendant wanted a more satisfactory definition of the term 'reasonable doubt,' he should have asked for it." People v. Ah Loy, 57 Cal. 566.

The contention that the verdict was not justified by the evidence, because it did not tend to show that the defendant entered the house with intent to commit larceny, is untenable. The question of intent was one of fact, to be determined by the jury, and the intent with which the defendant entered the house was properly inferred by them from the facts disclosed by the evidence.

It is lastly insisted that the court erred in overruling the defendant's objection to questions propounded by the prosecuting attorney to the defendant on cross-examination. Conceding that he was cross-examined as to matters about which he was not examined in chief, and that the court erred in making the rulings complained of, the rulings were upon immaterial matters, which could not by any conceivable possibility have operated to the prejudice of the defendant, but, on the contrary, we are rather inclined to the opinion that the tendency was in the opposite direction. Our conclusion is that the judgment and order should be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

STEWART v. SUTHERLAND. (No. 13,931.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 5, 1892.)

CONTINUANCE—PUBLIC LANDS—LAND-OFFICE—CONCLUSIVENESS OF DECISIONS—MISTAKE IN DEED.

1. In an action to quiet title to land, defendant moved for a continuance until he could obtain certified copies of papers in a certain United States land-office, stating that the register was dead and the office vacant; that he needed the papers as evidence, and that he could not get them till a new register qualified; but no affidavit in support of the motion was presented, nor was there a statement as to what papers defendant wished to obtain, or what he expected to prove by them, or when the register died, or that defendant could not have obtained them before trial. Held, that the motion was properly denied.

2. Where it appears in an action to quiet title to land that certain soldiers' additional homestead rights to the land were assigned to plaintiffs, but there was nothing to show that the assignments were not made after the entries of the homesteads in the local land-office, and it further appears that the rights of the parties were contested before the commissioner of the general land-office and the secretary of the interior, the entries must be deemed authorized, and the assignments valid.

3. Where the grantor in one of two deeds was described as "of the county of Dunn, state of Wisconsin," and the grantees as "of the county of Alameda, said state," and in the other deed the grantor was described as "of the county of Green, state of Illinois," and the grantees as "of the county of Alameda, said state," and the lands are in Alameda county, Cal., and there is no such county in either of the other states, the mistake cannot affect the rights of one claiming under such deeds.

4. The decisions of the land department of the general government, as to the rights of parties to pre-emption of homestead claims, must be treated as final.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

Action by William Stewart against James Sutherland. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. H. Hurlburt and Manuel Eyre, for appellant. A. A. Moore, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to quiet the plaintiff's title to a quarter section of land in Alameda county, the complaint being in the usual form. By his answer the defendant denies that the plaintiff is the owner or entitled to the possession of the land described, or any part thereof, and admits that he (defendant) claims an estate or interest therein. He then, "as new matter constituting a defense in equity" to the action, alleges that whatever right or title the plaintiff has to the land was obtained under and by mesne conveyances from J. F. Wachter and J. W. Campbell, to whom United States patents for the land, one for the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ and the other for the S. $\frac{1}{2}$, were issued in 1888; that the said patents were for additional soldiers' homesteads, and, for reasons stated, were issued in violation of the laws of the United States, and particularly of section 2306 of the Revised Statutes, and therefore did not pass any title to the patentees. He further alleges that in 1874 he was, and ever since has been, qualified to pre-empt land under the laws of the United States, and that in that year he settled upon the said quarter section with intent to pre-empt the same; that the township in which the quarter section is situated was surveyed in 1878, and the plat of the survey filed in the United States land-office on the 8th of July, in that year; that on the 7th of October, 1878, while he was residing in a house built by him on the premises, he filed with the register of the proper land-office his declaration of intention to claim the said quarter section under the pre-emption laws of the United States, and the same was numbered as one of the pre-emption claims on file, and was entered and noted upon the proper tract-book of the office; that on the 1st of October, 1884, having given due notice of his intention to do so, he appeared with his witnesses and attorney before the register and receiver of the land-office, and submitted to them competent proofs to establish his pre-emption claim to the land, but in violation of his just claim thereto, and by misinterpreting the additional homestead laws, the said officers denied his just and equitable claim of title, and awarded to him only 40 acres of the quarter section, and wrongfully awarded the balance thereof to the homestead claimants; that he duly appealed from that part of the decision which was against him to the commissioner of the general land-office, and the commissioner, in September, 1886, by the misconstruction and misinterpretation of the additional homestead laws, wrongfully, and in violation of his claim, awarded the land to the homestead claimants, and denied his better right and claim thereto; that from the decision of the commissioner he duly appealed to the secretary of the interior, and the secretary, in August, 1888, by misconstruction and misinterpretation of the additional homestead laws, awarded the quarter section to the homestead claimants; that Wachter and Campbell never settled upon, improved, or occupied any part of the said land; never lived in the state of California; never filed any additional homestead claim in person for any part of the said quarter section, and never personally prosecuted, in any way or manner, any claim to said land, but that prior to July, 1878, they sold, assigned, and transferred whatever additional homestead rights they may have had, and all the proceedings in the land-office and department of the interior to establish and locate their homesteads were conducted and prosecuted by their assignees; that the plaintiff, Stewart, had at all times, since the year 1874, full knowledge of defendant's claim to the said quarter section, and that, but for the wrongful presentation and assertion of the said homestead claims in the names of Wachter and Campbell, defendant could and would have obtained a United States patent for the said quarter section upon his full compliance with the pre-emption laws, which he has always been, and is, ready and willing to comply with. Wherefore he prays that it be adjudged that the plaintiff has no title, legal or equitable, in or to the said land, or any part thereof, etc. When the case was called for trial, defendant moved for a continuance until he could obtain certified copies of papers in the United States land-office in San Francisco, stating that the register was dead and the office vacant, and that such documentary evidence was necessary to prove the allegations of his answer, and that it could not be obtained until a new register had qualified. The motion was denied. The plaintiff then introduced in evidence a United States patent for the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the quarter section in controversy, issued under the homestead laws to J. F. Wachter, and dated December 22, 1888, and a similar patent for the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the same quarter section, issued to J. W. Campbell. The defendant objected to both patents as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial evidence, and his objections were overruled. Plaintiff next introduced in evidence powers of attorney made by Wachter and Campbell, authorizing and empowering F. A. Hyde to sell and convey any lands obtained by them as additional homesteads, and giving the same description of the parcels to be sold as are found in the patents afterwards issued, and to take possession of the lands, and to receive for his own use the proceeds of the sales. Both powers were declared to be irrevocable, and one of them also authorized the attorney, in the name of the principal, to locate and enter in the land-office at San Francisco his additional homestead on the land described. One power was dated August 24, 1877, and the other February 6, 1878. Defendant objected to the powers being received in evidence, upon the ground that they were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and also upon the ground that the lands claimed as additional homesteads could not be located by or under powers of attorney, and the objections were overruled. Plaintiff next offered in evidence deeds made by Wachter and Campbell, by Hyde, their attorney in fact, conveying to William Stewart the tracts of land described in their respective patents. Defendant objected to the deeds being received upon the grounds that they were irrelevant and immaterial, as the patents upon which they were based were invalid, and the objections were overruled. Plaintiff then introduced some oral testimony, which it is not necessary to notice, and rested his case. Thereupon defendant again moved for a continuance for 10 days to enable him to procure certified copies of certain papers from the land-office in San Francisco, stating that they could not be obtained until a new register had qualified, and that they were necessary to show that the patents which had been put in evidence had been issued contrary to law, and that the action of the commissioner of the land-office and the secretary of the interior was contrary to law and void. The court denied the motion, and thereupon the case was submitted without any evidence on the part of the defendant. The court then made its findings, and entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff as prayed for. From that judgment the defendant has appealed, and has brought the case here on a bill of exceptions. The defendant duly excepted to all the rulings above mentioned, and now assigns them as error.

1. It is urged that the court should have granted the continuance asked for, and that the refusal of the court to do so was erroneous and prejudicial to the appellant. But no affidavit in support of the motion was presented, and there was no statement or showing as to what papers defendant wished to obtain copies of, or what light, if any, they would throw upon the case, or when the register died, or that defendant could not have obtained the copies before the trial commenced, if he had desired to do so. Under these circumstances, we see no error in the rulings.

2. It is urged that soldiers' additional homestead rights are not assignable, and that the powers of attorney offered in evidence show that Wachter and Campbell thereby assigned their rights to Hyde before the issuance of the patents, and, this being so, the officers of the land department had no power to issue the patents. In support of the position that additional homestead rights are not assignable, counsel cite a very elaborate and able opinion of the secretary of the interior, rendered March 25, 1890, in which he so holds. It is unnecessary to consider the question whether such a right can be assigned before proper entry of the land is made, but we entertain no doubt that after the entry is made, and before the patent is issued, the soldier may sell his land, and pass a good title thereto. This seems to be admitted by the secretary, and was so held in Knight v. Leary, 54 Wis. 459, 11 N. W. Rep. 600; Rose v. Lumber Co., 73 Cal. 385, 15 Pac. Rep. 19; and Grant v. Oliver, 91 Cal. 158, 27 Pac. Rep. 596, 861. Here there is nothing to show that the assignments or sales were not made after the entries of the homesteads in the local land-office; and as the rights of the parties, as appears from the answer, were contested before the commissioner of the general land-office and the secretary of the interior, we must assume that the entries were authorized and proper, and the sales valid.

3. The plaintiff testified that he had lived on land adjoining that in controversy since 1859, and it is claimed that he is not, therefore, the William Stewart named as grantee in the deeds from Wachter and Campbell, and hence did not connect himself with the source of title. This point is rested upon the deeds, in one of which the grantor is named as "of the county of Dunn, state of Wisconsin," and the grantees as "of the county of Alameda, said state;" and in the other the grantor is named as "of the county of Green, state of Illinois," and the grantee as "of the county of Alameda, said state." We see nothing in this to aid the appellant. The plaintiff had possession of the deeds, and introduced them in evidence. The lands were in Alameda county, Cal., and the plaintiff resided in that county. It does not appear that there is any county of that name in either the state of Wisconsin or Illinois, and evidently there was a slight mistake in naming the grantee as of "said state." This mistake cannot, however, affect his rights.

4. Appellant further claims that he was in possession of the land, and had filed his declaration of intention to pre-empt the same, and hence that no lawful entry of the homestead claims could be made upon it; citing Atherton v. Fowler, 96 U. S. 513, and Hosmer v. Wallace, 97 U. S. 575. The cases cited only hold that pre-emption rights cannot be initiated by invasion of the possession of another. Now, whether appellant had possession of the land, and a pre-emption right to it, as he alleges, was a matter which must have been considered and determined against him by the land department of the government, where he so persistently contested the homestead rights. In our opinion, the decisions there rendered must be treated as final upon this point. We advise, therefore, that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

ROBINSON V. CRESCENT CITY MILL & TRANSP. CO., (WENGER, Intervener. No. 13,649.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 9, 1892.)

INTERVENTION OF PARTIES—GRANT OF RIGHT OF WAY—TRESPASS—FINDINGS.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 387, provides that "any person may, before the trial, intervene in an action or proceeding, who has an interest in the matter in litigation, in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both." Held, in an action for trespass on land, that a person could intervene where he claimed a grant of a right of way through the land, and alleged that the acts complained of were performed by defendant while employed by him to construct such way.

2. In an action for trespass on land, a written instrument was introduced, by which plaintiff sold intervener certain standing timber, to be removed within four years. Plaintiff then granted a right of way, for logging purposes, through a creek and over the premises then owned by plaintiff, for a term of 10 years. Finally the instrument provided that the party of the first part (plaintiff) "does hereby grant unto the said party of the second part the right of way, for logging purposes, over and through that certain tract of swamp and overflowed land" described in plaintiff's complaint. Held, that the last grant was not limited in time.

3. Where a person has a right of way for logging purposes, and defendant hauls logs over it for him, the fact that other persons have an interest in the logs does not make defendant a trespasser.

4. A judgment that "plaintiff has no right whatever in or to the possession of the strip of land" is inconsistent with the finding that plaintiff is the owner of the land, subject only to a right of way granted to intervener.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Del Norte county; JAMES E. MURPHY, Judge.

Action by William Robinson against the Crescent City Mill & Transportation Company for trespass to land. Jacob Wenger, intervener. Judgment for defendant and intervener. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Order affirmed and judgment modified.

Lucas & Miller, for appellant. L. F. Cooper, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover damages in the sum of $200 for trespasses alleged to have been committed by the defendant corporation in entering upon the plaintiff's land, and cutting ditches and trenches thereon, and constructing and using a road-way across the same. The defendant answered by a general denial. Jacob Wenger was permitted to intervene, and in his complaint he set up a written instrument executed in August, 1877, by the plaintiff, as party of the first part, and by himself, as party of the second part, which stated that the party of the first part "does hereby grant unto the said party of the second part the right of way, for logging purposes, over and through that certain tract of swamp and overflowed land [described in plaintiff's complaint;] and the said party of the first part does hereby further agree not to grant unto any other person a privilege, for logging purposes, over and across said premises last mentioned." He then goes on to allege that for 20 years he had been the owner of certain redwood, spruce, and fir timber situated east of and near the premises described in the complaint; that he had sold the said timber to the defendant corporation, and that he was to furnish a route of transportation for the logs to the waters of Lake Earl, on which defendant's mill was situated; that a strip of 75 feet in width was as small a width for his right of way for logging purposes as would give him the proper enjoyment and use of such right of way across the premises described; that, under and by virtue of the grant from plaintiff, he entered into possession of a strip 75 feet in width, running through the said premises from the east to the west side thereof, and employed the defendant to build for him over the strip a logging road; that the road had been built and was then used by him as a logging road to transport his logs from the lands where they were cut to Lake Earl, whence they were transported to defendant's mill; that the plaintiff's possession had not been disturbed in any other way than by the building of the said road by intervener, and that by the building of the road no wrongs or injuries whatever had been inflicted on the plaintiff: that plaintiff had denied, and did then deny, that intervener had a right of way over the premises described, and had refused, on demand, to designate and select a right of way, and that intervener had selected, designated, and used the said right of way with due regard to the interests of both parties; that plaintiff claimed that he was entitled to the possession of the said strip of land adversely to the intervener, but that he was not entitled to such possession, and his said claim was without any right whatever. Wherefore, intervener prayed that it be adjudged and determined by the court that his possession of the said strip of land was good and valid as against the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff be forever enjoined from disturbing such possession. The plaintiff moved to strike out, and also demurred to, the complaint in intervention, upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to entitle Wenger to intervene in the action, and did not show that he had any interest in the matter in litigation, or in the success of either of the parties thereto. The court denied the motion and overruled the demurrer, and thereupon the plaintiff answered to the complaint, denying most of its averments. After trial the court found against the plaintiff upon all the issues raised by the pleadings, and rendered judgment as prayed for by both defendant and intervener. From that judgment, and an order denying him a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

1. It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to strike out, and in overruling the demurrer to, the complaint in intervention. The Code provides: "Any person may, before the trial, intervene in an action or proceeding, who has an interest in the matter in litigation, in the success of either of the parties, or an interest against both." Section 387, Code Civil Proc. This section, it will be observed, does not limit the right to intervene to any particular kind or class of actions or proceedings, but is general. Here, Wenger's complaint shows that he was the real party in interest, and the one by whose order and in whose employment the acts were done of which the plaintiff complains. He was therefore clearly interested in the matter in litigation, and in the success of the defendant; and this being so the rulings were proper.

2. It is also claimed that Wenger's right of way was granted by the plaintiff for a limited time, which had expired before the alleged wrongful entry upon his land was made. This claim is rested upon the written instrument set up in the complaint in intervention. By that instrument the plaintiff sold to Wenger all the timber suitable for the manufacture of lumber standing on the lands then owned by him, provided the logs should be cut and removed within four years from date. He then granted a right of way through "Russell Creek" and over the premises then owned by him, for logging purposes, for the term of 10 years. Following this is an agreement by Wenger that he will not, while engaged in logging on the premises, graze any live-stock thereon; and then comes the grant of right of way relied upon here, and hereinbefore quoted. In all this we see nothing to indicate, and there was no attempt to prove, that the last grant was intended to have any connection with the timber sold, or with the first grant. On the contrary, it was proved that, at the time the instrument was executed, Wenger held and assigned to the plaintiff a swamp-land certificate of purchase for the land described in the complaint; and, referring to this land, Wenger testified that he and the plaintiff went together to one Peveler, who drew the instrument, and told him what they had agreed upon, and then says: "I told Mr. Peveler that I was to have the right of way over and through this land; that I had the land back of it, and before I signed the paper I wanted to know that I had an outlet. I told Mr. Peveler that I wanted a right of way over and across that piece of land before I signed the contract."

3. It is further claimed that, if Wenger had a still existing right of way, it was a personal right, a right in gross, which could not be assigned or transferred, and therefore he could not use it, or authorize the defendant to use it, for the purpose of transporting logs in which other parties were interested with him. The case cited in support of this claim (Wagner v. Hanna, 38 Cal. 111) is not in point. That action was brought to recover damages for the obstruction of an alleged right of way across the defendant's land, and the only question was whether the plaintiff had such a right of way or not. Here, as we have seen, Wenger had a right of way for logging purposes, and the defendant was hauling logs over it for him. It is true that other parties owned an interest in the logs which had been hauled up to the time of the trial, but we do not see how that fact can be said to have made his action wrongful, and his employee a trespasser; and, if it could, no damages are alleged or shown to have resulted from this use of the road.

4. The judgment given in favor of the intervener is expressed in broader terms than is justified by the findings of fact. The provision therein that "the plaintiff has no right whatever in or to the possession of the strip of land," and that the intervener is entitled to such possession, and that the plaintiff be perpetually enjoined from disturbing him in such possession, is inconsistent with the finding that the plaintiff is the owner of the land, subject to the right of way granted by him to the intervener. The rights of the intervener are limited to a right of way for logging purposes, and he is entitled to be undisturbed by the plaintiff in the enjoyment of such right of way; but, when he is not making use of the strip for such purposes, he has no right to its possession, or to have the plaintiff deprived thereof. The order denying a new trial is affirmed, but the court below is directed to modify its judgment in accordance with this opinion; and as so modified the judgment will stand affirmed.

BOURN v. HART et al., State Board of Examiners. (No. 14,545.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 9, 1892.)

LEGISLATIVE POWERS—GIFT OF PUBLIC MONEY.

A legislative appropriation made to an individual in payment of a claim for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by him while in its service, and for which the state is not responsible, either on general principles of law or by reason of any statute, is a "gift," within the meaning of Const. art. 4, § 81, which provides that the legislature shall have no power to make any gift of any public money. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

In bank.

Petition by A. J. Bourn for mandamus to compel one Hart and others, as members of the state board of examiners, to allow his claim against the state. Demurrer to the petition sustained, and judgment for defendants.

Robt. T. Devlin and Jud. C. Brusie, for petitioner. Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an original proceeding, wherein the petitioner asks this court to issue a writ of mandamus directed to the defendants, as members of the state board of examiners, commanding them to allow his claim against the state for the sum of $10,000, in accordance with the provisions of an act of the legislature, the first section of which, and the only one necessary to a proper understanding of this case, is as follows: "Section 1. The sum of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the general fund of the state treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the claim of A. J. Bourn, a guard at the state-prison at San Quentin, in this state, for personal injuries, namely, the loss of his right arm while in the discharge of his duties, under the orders of his superior officers, and while in the service of the state of California." The petition sets forth the circumstances under which petitioner lost his arm, but which need not be referred to here; as we have held in the case of Stevenson v. Colgan, (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 1089, that the constitutionality of a statute must be determined by the court from what appears on its face, when considered with reference to matters judicially noticed by the court. The defendants have demurred to the petition upon the general ground that the act under which petitioner claims is unconstitutional, under sections 31 and 32 of article 4 of the constitution. In the case of Stevenson v. Colgan, supra, we decided that it was the purpose of these sections of the constitution to prohibit the legislature from making direct "appropriations to individuals from general considerations of charity or gratitude, or because of some moral obligation resting upon the people of the state, and such as a just and generous man might be willing to recognize in his dealings with others less fortunate than himself." That such is the intention of the constitution we have no doubt, and it is equally clear to us that the act in question falls within the class of legislation thus prohibited. The petitioner was an officer or employe of the state. It is recited in the act that he met with the accident "while in the discharge of his duties under the orders of his superior officer," and, for the purpose of this decision, it may be conceded, as claimed by him, that the loss of his arm is to be attributed to the negligence of his superior officer. But whether it be attributed to negligence or misfeasance of such officer, or any other cause which can be suggested by the language of the act, the unconstitutionality of the statute is apparent. In entering the service of the state the petitioner assumed all the risks attending such employment, whether arising from its ordinary perils, or resulting from the negligence or misfeasance of other servants of the state, and the appropriation made by this act is a mere gratuity, as the state was under no legal liability to compensate him for any loss which he may have sustained while thus in the discharge of his duties. That a state is not liable for the negligence or misfeasance of its agents, except when such liability is voluntarily assumed by its legislature, is said by DANFORTH, J., in Lewis v. State, 96 N. Y. 74, to be so "well settled upon grounds of public policy, and the doctrine is so uniformly asserted by writers of approved authority and the courts, that fresh decisions would be superfluous." And the supreme court of the United States, in Gibbons v. U. S., 8 Wall 269, in an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice MILLER, say: "No government has ever held itself liable to individuals for the misfeasance, laches, or unauthorized power of its officers and agents." In the case of Clodfelter v. State, 86 N. C. 51, the plaintiff presented a claim against the state for damages on account of the loss of his eyes, alleged to have been caused by the misconduct and negligence of officers and agents of the state, under whose authority and control he was placed. By the constitution of that state the court was empowered with authority "to hear claims against the state." But the court held that this provision only authorized it to hear such claims "as are legal, and could be enforced if the state, like one of its citizens, was amenable to process;" and added: "The only question then presented is whether the state, in administering the functions of government through its appointed agents and officers, is legally liable to a claim in compensatory damages for an injury resulting from their misconduct or negligence. That the doctrine of respondet superior, applicable to the relations of principal and agent created between other persons, does not prevail against the sovereign in the necessary employment of public agents, is too well settled, upon authority and practice, to admit of controversy." The exemption of the state from paying damages for accidents of this nature does not depend upon its immunity from being sued without its consent, but rests upon grounds of public policy which deny its liability for such damages. It is argued, however, that the state has in this instance assumed and acknowledged its liability by the act under consideration. But this is precisely what the legislature is forbidden to do. A legislative appropriation made to an individual in payment of a claim for damages on account of personal injuries sustained by him while in its service, and for which the state is not responsible, either upon general principles of law or by reason of some previous statute creating such liability, is a gift, within the meaning of the constitution. The appropriation made to petitioner was a mere gratuitous assumption of an obligation from which the state was and is exempt, and is within the mischief which the framers of the constitution intended to remedy by the sections before referred to. If the state desires to make itself liable for such damages as may be sustained by those in its service, it must do so by a general law, which shall embrace all cases which may come within its provisions. The demurrer to the petition is sustained, and judgment ordered for the defendants.

WE CONCUR: SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.; MCFARLAND, J.; HARRISON, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. In my opinion, the word "gift" was not used in section 31, art. 4, of the constitution, in a sense broad enough to include compensation to a servant of the state for loss of life or limb in the discharge of his duties; nor do I think such compensation is to be regarded as extra compensation for services, within the prohibition of the succeeding section of the same article.

COHN v. BROWNSTONE. (No. 14,389.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 10, 1892.)

CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF PARTY—AFFIDAVIT.

In an action for work and labor, defendant's attorney asked for a continuance, and made affidavit that defendant had been compelled to leave the county on account of an attempt to kill him. Affiant stated that defendant would testify in his own behalf that he never employed plaintiff, and that plaintiff never worked for him, whereas in his answer defendant did not deny that plaintiff worked for him at his request. Affiant alleged that, as soon as he heard of defendant's whereabouts, he telegraphed to him, and defendant replied that it was impossible for him to come; but the affidavit did not state when affiant first learned where defendant was, nor when he telegraphed, nor that any steps had been taken to procure a deposition. It was not shown that defendant remained away because of fear, nor why the law could not protect him. Held, that a continuance was properly refused.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WILLIAM W. CROSS, Judge.

Action by D. S. Cohn against D. Brownstone for work and labor. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Affirmed.

Justin Jacobs, for appellant. N. O. Bradley, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action for work and labor, in which defendant denies his indebtedness to plaintiff, without denying the services alleged, and pleads a counterclaim. Judgment for plaintiff in the sum of $900, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

Did the court err in denying defendant's motion for a postponement of the trial? is the only question presented for decision. On the 6th day of January, 1890, the cause was set for trial on the 23d day of the same month, of which counsel for defendant had due notice. Accordingly the cause was called for trial on January 23, 1890, whereupon counsel for defendant moved for a postponement of the trial upon the following affidavit: "Justin Jacobs, being duly sworn, says: He is one of the attorneys for the defendant above named. That defendant cannot at this time safely proceed to trial for want of material testimony, which he expects to be able to produce if this case can be postponed for a reasonable time. That said testimony is the testimony of defendant himself, who, as affiant is informed and believes, will testify that he never employed plaintiff at all, and that plaintiff never worked for defendant. That defendant is and for some months has been absent from this county, and cannot at present, with safety to himself, return. That, as affiant is informed and believes, defendant was compelled to leave said county to save his life. That just prior to his leaving said county, as affiant is informed and believes, one Lucy A. Follett, of said county, attempted to kill said defendant by firing a pistol at his head; and she has since, as affiant is informed and believes, threatened to kill defendant, should he return to this county, and is continually watching for him for that purpose. That defendant, as affiant is informed and believes, is at Eureka, Humboldt county, in this state; but his attorneys have not known of his whereabouts long enough to procure his deposition to be used at this trial. That, as soon as affiant learned the whereabouts of defendant, he telegraphed him the day set for trial, and telling him to be here. That affiant received a telegram in response saying that it was impossible for him to be here. That, if a reasonable postponement can be had, defendant's deposition can be procured. That, as affiant is informed and believes, the facts he expects to prove by defendant cannot be proved by any other person. That this proposed continuance is not asked for delay, merely, but that justice may be done in the premises. That defendant has fully and fairly stated the facts constituting his defense to affiant, as affiant is informed and believes, and is advised by affiant that he has, in affiant's opinion, a good and valid defense to said action, on the merits thereof. JUSTIN JACOBS."

That there was no abuse of discretion in denying the motion seems too plain to require argument.

1. The proposed testimony of the witness is irrelevant to any issue, since the answer of the defendant does not deny that plaintiff worked for defendant at the latter's request.

2. The affidavit does not state, even on information or belief, that defendant remains absent from the county because he fears, or has reason to fear, that he will be killed or injured if he should return.

3. The affidavit does not state when affiant first learned the "whereabouts" of the defendant, nor when he telegraphed defendant, nor when defendant answered his telegram, nor that any steps have been taken to procure the deposition of the defendant.

4. The law, if executed, would have protected the defendant from the assaults of the woman named, and no reason is shown why the law would not have been executed at his instance.

I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order are affirmed.

CROOKER v. BENTON. (No. 14,270.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 10, 1892.)

WATER-RIGHTS—WHEN APPURTENANT TO LAND.

Civil Code, § 662, provides that "a thing is deemed to be incidental or appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit, as in the case of a way or water-course, or of a passage for light, air, or heat from or across the land of another." Held that, where a land-owner appropriated water, and brought it on his land, and the land could not be advantageously used without the water, the fact that the license to convey the water over the premises of another was revocable did not prevent the water-right from passing as appurtenant to the land.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county; C. P. BRAYNARD, Judge.

Action by George A. Crooker against Thomas H. Benton to determine the right to one-third of the water flowing in a certain ditch. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial. Affirmed.

L. V. Hitchcock, for appellant. Chipman & Garter, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is defendant's appeal from the judgment and an order refusing a new trial. The action is to determine the right to one-third of the water flowing in a certain ditch. The plaintiff claims the water as appurtenant to a certain tract of land purchased by him from one D. G. Miller. The defendant claims to have purchased from Miller his interest in the ditch, after Miller had conveyed the land to plaintiff. If the water-right was appurtenant to the land, plaintiff must prevail; otherwise the defendant.

It appears that in 1883 W. T. Hurtt, L. A. Crooker, and said D. G. Miller were each in possession of a quarter section of land in section 28, etc. An old flume ran through this section, formerly used to float lumber. Water continued to run there, and the owners of the flume, having no use for it, suffered it to be taken out by settlers for domestic and irrigation purposes, and it was so taken by Hurtt, L. A. Crooker, and Miller. The flume decaying, Hurtt, L. A. Crooker, and Miller agreed to appropriate a portion of the water of Digger creek, which had supplied the flume, and accordingly posted, at the point of intended diversion on Digger creek, a notice, as required by the Code, which was signed by each of the persons named, and contained certain declarations as to the rights and duties of the parties: (1) They should own equally; (2) each do one-third of the work, and furnish one-third of the money for construction; and, (3) failing to do this, their interest in the ditch should be held for payment; (4) each could take his share of water out at any place to suit his convenience; (5) each was compelled to cut ditches to carry his portion of water back to Digger creek; and (6) to pay an equal proportion to keep the ditch in repair. In the spring of 1884 the water was taken out and conducted by ditch and flume to a point 80 rods north-east of the south-east corner of the section. Hurtt then constructed a ditch, taking his share of the water upon his land, where, having used it, or what he wished, it ran upon the land of L. A. Crooker, and from thence, sometimes, upon the land of Miller, and was used by him for purposes of irrigation. Where the ditch constructed by the parties terminated, the old flume still remained, and the water flowed thence to a point near L. A. Crooker's land, whence some of it was taken and used by him, and the excess, not used by him, passed to Miller's land. The portion not taken by Hurtt or L. A.

Crooker during 1884 passed to a point near Miller's land, and thence onto it; but in 1885 L. A. Crooker removed the old flume, and the water was dumped near Crooker's north line, and was sometimes used by Crooker, and sometimes, when not so used, ran down to Miller's land, where it was collected together with the water received through Crooker's ditch, and used by Miller. Subsequently, and a short time before Miller sold to plaintiff, in pursuance of an agreement with L. A. Crooker, he (Miller) received his share of the water through Crooker's ditch, above described, which was extended to his land. Miller had applied to Hurtt for permission to carry his portion of the water through Hurtt's land, but permission was refused; but, even getting it through the Crooker ditch, it all passed through a portion of Hurtt's land. Miller sold and conveyed the land with the appurtenances to plaintiff, May 3, 1886, and his interest in the ditch to defendant, March 14, 1887, plaintiff's deed being then on record. The water was necessary to the proper use of Miller's land. It is evident that the appropriation was made and the ditch constructed to bring the water there for that purpose, and for no other; and, further, that through these means the water had been so brought and actually used upon the land for some years, and was being so used at the time of the conveyance to plaintiff.

Appellant concedes that, had the ditch been continued by the parties to Miller's land, the water would have been appurtenant to it, but, inasmuch as this ditch is more than a half mile away, and Miller has received his share of the water through Hurtt's land without any right at all, and through Crooker's by a license which may be retracted at any time, the water was not used on this land by right, and therefore did not and could not be appurtenant to it, under section 662 of the Civil Code, which reads: "A thing is deemed to be incidental or appurtenant to land when it is by right used with the land for its benefit; as in the case of a way, or water-course, or of a passage for light, air, or heat from or across the land of another." But that which is claimed as an appurtenant here is not the easement of a right of way over the lands of Hurtt and Crooker, but the water-right, which undoubtedly did belong to Miller, and was used by right as an incident to his land. At the time of his conveyance he got the water through Crooker's ditch, by his (Crooker's) consent. Hurtt had, presumptively, at least, licensed this use of his land for Crooker's ditch. If so, he could not object that it was made to carry additional water, unless this increased the burden to his land; that is, made the ditch in some respect more injurious to his estate. It does not appear that it did so. He was then using the water by right within the claim of appellant. But, in my opinion, the vendor cannot raise the question as against his vendee. The water belonged to Miller by appropriation. It was acquired for use upon this land, and the land could not be so advantageously used without it. It had been, and at the time of the sale was, being so used by the vendor. It had become an adjunct to this land, and the vendor cannot raise the question that he had not an indefeasible title to the right of way. Appellant states a case which he thinks will test this question in the strongest manner possible: A. owns a house, and on another tract of land a spring, from which he conducts water to his house over the lands of B., which separates his house from the tract of land on which the spring is. There is no other way in which the water could be brought. The right through B.'s land is by a revocable license. Is the right to take water from the spring appurtenant to the house, so that it would pass by deed conveying the house and appurtenances? My answer is: Yes; undoubtedly; and, so long as he is permitted to take the water through B.'s land, A. cannot object. He could not sell water flowing from the spring to C., so as to enable C. to plead the infirmity of the vendee's title to the right of way. But, if A.'s vendee could not get a right from B., and therefore could not use the water at his house, as his right to it was only as an appurtenant, he would then lose his right. We have only to change the illustration by supposing the water conducted in iron pipes, and that A. attempted to remove the pipe from B.'s land, to have the exact case of Philbrick v. Ewing, 97 Mass. 133. There the court said: "He had no more right to cut off a piece of the pipe because it ran into another's land than he would have had to cut off a piece of a spout which projected over the adjoining premises. If the owner of that land objected to its continuance, the plaintiff would be obliged to draw her pipe in; but until objection was made, or if she could obtain a license for it to continue, she could let it remain as her predecessor had done." It seems to me that the water-right itself is in the same position, as between the vendor and vendee, as the pipe was in the case of Philbrick v. Ewing. Some third person may possibly interfere with plaintiff's use of the water-right, which had become appurtenant to his farm; but, because they could do so, the vendor could not deny that it passed as an appurtenant. Nor can I think appellant has rightly construed the section of the Civil Code. If the phrase "by right" has reference to the owner's title to the incident, it seems to me it effects no purpose. Of course, a thing could not constitute a part of his estate if he did not own it. An appurtenance is something belonging to another thing, more important or worthy. However inapt the language, I think this the idea intended to be conveyed by the words, "by right used with the land." It had become an adjunct to the land. Construed otherwise, I see no reason why, within this definition, a plow used upon the land, or a mule team, might not be appurtenant. Farmers v. Water Co., 56 Cal. 11, and Fitzell v. Leaky, 72 Cal. 477, 14 Pac. Rep. 198, are authorities upon some of the questions which might be raised in this case. In each of those cases the right to water acquired by contract, and depending for its continuance upon contract obligations of third persons, was held to have passed as appurtenant to land. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

GRIESS v. STATE INV. & INS. CO. et al.
(No. 13,864.){Supreme Court of California. Feb. 17, 1892.)

APPEAL—FINAL ORDERS.

1. An order denying a motion to dismiss a motion for new trial is not a final order, and is not appealable.

2. An order denying a motion to correct the minutes of the court does not come within Code Civil Proc. § 963, which provides that an appeal may be taken from any special order made after final judgment.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; E. R. GARBER, Judge.

Suit by Griess against the State Investment & Insurance Company and A. Meyer to recover on a policy of fire insurance. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant insurance company moved for a new trial. Defendant Meyer moved to dismiss the motion for new trial, and moved also to have the court correct its minutes. From an order denying his motions he appeals. Appeal dismissed.

F. A. Meyer and W. B. Haskell, for appellant. O'Brien, Morrison & Daingerfield and Fisher Ames, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The State Investment & Insurance Company executed to plaintiff, Griess, a policy insuring him against loss from fire of property therein described in the sum of $2,500, of which amount $1,500 was to be paid to defendant Meyer. The loss occurred, and plaintiff brought suit upon the policy to recover the amount thereby agreed to be paid; and, as defendant Meyer would not join as a plaintiff, he was made a defendant, so that his interest therein might be determined. Both defendants answered, the insurance company denying its liability, and the defendant Meyer setting forth his interest in the policy, with a demand for a judgment against his co-defendant for the amount alleged to be due him. The case was tried by a jury, and upon the trial it was orally agreed by all of the parties that the interest of Meyer in the policy sued upon was $1,202.75, and that the jury should find a verdict for the plaintiff or the defendant without any reference to defendant Meyer. This agreement was taken down by the reporter, but was not entered upon the minutes of the court. The case was submitted to the jury, the court saying to them: "So far as the defendant Meyer is concerned, it is stipulated by counsel that he is out of the case, and also so far as your deliberations are concerned." The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $2,252.50, and judgment was thereupon entered in favor of the plaintiff for that sum, and against the defendant insurance company, but no mention is made in the judgment of the rights of the defendant Meyer, or of any interest which he may have in the amount recovered by plaintiff. The defendant insurance company moved for a new trial, but did not serve a copy of its proposed statement upon its co-defendant, Meyer, and Meyer thereupon moved the court to amend its minutes by entering therein the oral agreement above referred to, and also to dismiss the defendant's motion for a new trial, because no statement on motion for new trial had been served upon him. Both motions were denied, and from the order denying them the defendant Meyer appeals.

1. The order from which this appeal is taken is not, as to either of its branches, an appealable one. The refusal to dismiss a motion for a new trial does not finally dispose of the motion itself; and, until some order is made by the trial court which has the effect to either grant or deny the motion for a new trial, neither party can be said to be aggrieved, and there is nothing to appeal from. The adverse party has the right to resist such a motion by a counter-motion to dismiss, and, if overruled, he may preserve his exception in the bill of exceptions, which becomes part of the record upon appeal from the final order of the court, and of which he may avail himself upon such appeal; but the refusal of the court to dismiss the motion for a new trial is not itself the subject of a distinct appeal, nor can the exception to such a ruling be considered unless it is made part of the record upon appeal from an order which grants, or one which in effect operates as, a denial of the motion for a new trial. In this view of the case, it is unnecessary to determine at this time whether the appellant was entitled to be served by his co-defendant with the proposed statement on motion for a new trial.

2. That part of the order denying the motion to amend the minutes of the court is also clearly not appealable. It was not a special order, made after final judgment, within the meaning of subdivision 2 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure.¹ It in no manner affected the judgment or bore any relation to it, either by way of enforcing it or staying its operation, nor did it concern any pending motion in the case itself. It was only the determination of the court that its minutes did not require correction, and the action of a court of record in such a matter is not subject to review by the ordinary process of appeal. The oral statement or admission made by the attorneys upon the trial and to the court was evidently made for the purpose of obviating the necessity of introducing evidence to prove the fact admitted, and it was competent for the court to act upon such admission in giving its judgment, although the admission was not entered upon its minutes. The parties acted upon it in refraining to offer such proof, as did also the court in withdrawing such matter from the consideration of the jury. If the court did not give effect to this admission in the judgment rendered by it, the error cannot be corrected by merely causing the admission to be now spread upon the minutes of the court; nor would such entry in any way affect the pending motion for a new trial. The same matter, and with the same effect, can be shown in the statement or other

HOOWE v. KRELING et al. (No. 13,634.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 1, 1892.)

CONVERSION—COMPLAINT.

A complaint alleged that on a certain day plaintiff was the owner of a saloon, and was at that time in debt; that defendant induced him to execute a bill of sale of the property, on the representations that defendant would sell it for a sum largely in excess of plaintiff's indebtedness, and that out of the proceeds defendant would pay plaintiff's debts, and turn over the balance; that defendant caused the name of another person and the consideration of $750 to be inserted in the bill of sale, without the knowledge of plaintiff; that when plaintiff signed the bill of sale he was financially embarrassed, sick, and in such mental state as to be unable to attend to business; that he executed the instrument without reading it, relying on defendant's statements; that plaintiff never received the $750; that defendant converted the property to his own use, and refused, and still refuses, to account or pay plaintiff therefor; that, at the time of the transfer, the saloon, merchandise, fixtures, etc., were worth about $1,500. Held, that the trial court properly treated the action as one of conversion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Timothy Hoowe against John Kreling and John F. Kolbe. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. H. Lowenthal, for appellants. F. J. Castelhun, W. T. Barton, and Joseph D. Redding, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. The complaint in this action, in substance, alleges that on the 5th day of May, 1887, plaintiff was the owner and in possession of a saloon and its contents, situated in the city of San Francisco. That on said date he was indebted to various persons, amounting in the aggregate to about $1,029.40. That on that date he was induced to execute a bill of sale of said property upon representations made to him by the defendant Kreling that, if he (plaintiff) would transfer to Kreling said property, he could and would effect a sale of the same for a sum largely in excess of plaintiff's indebtedness, and that out of the proceeds of such sale Kreling would pay said indebtedness, and turn over the balance to plaintiff. That plaintiff, relying wholly upon these representations, executed the bill of sale, and transferred the property in question with the understanding and acting under the belief that he had executed the sale and transferred the property to Kreling. That Kreling caused the name of defendant Kolbe and the consideration of $750 to be inserted in the bill of sale without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff. That when he executed said instrument he was embarrassed financially, sick, and in such a condition mentally as to be unable to attend to business, and that at the time of its execution he relied wholly upon said representations, without reading it or having any knowledge of its contents. That he never intended to and did not transfer the property to Kolbe, but to Kreling, who received it from plaintiff, and thereafter continued to claim and exercise acts of ownership over the same. That Kolbe never owned or claimed any interest therein, but "was simply the creature and tool of the said Kreling, for the sole purpose of enabling the said Kreling to obtain the said property for his sole use and benefit, to the loss and damage of plaintiff." That the consideration expressed in the bill of sale was not received by plaintiff. That Kreling has converted said property to his own use, "and refused, and still refuses, to account or make any payment to plaintiff therefor." "That at the time of said transfer the said saloon contained merchandise, fixtures, and furniture of the value of about $1,500." There was a demurrer interposed to the amended complaint, which, upon the grounds therein stated, was properly overruled.

It is admitted by defendant Kreling, in his answer, that plaintiff was the owner of the property, and that he executed the bill of sale at the time mentioned in the complaint, but he specifically denies each and every other material allegation thereof. The case was tried by the court, without a jury, and judgment given in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $300, from which judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals. It is claimed by appellant that this is an action to enforce a trust against personal property, and for an accounting; and, further, that the relief granted by the judgment herein was not prayed for, and is inconsistent with the issues raised by the pleadings. The court below, upon the facts stated, very properly, as we think, treated the action as one for a conversion, and the judgment, which was given for a sum several hundred dollars less than the value of the property was shown to be, was clearly within the issues. The evidence shows, and the court so finds, that Kreling was one of the various unnamed persons to whom the plaintiff was indebted as alleged at the time of the transfer of the property, and that the value thereof, together with the money received by Kreling from the business after the transfer was made, exceeded plaintiff's indebtedness to Kreling in the sum of $300. The difference between the sum awarded by the judgment and the value of the property, as shown at the time of the conversion, is thus accounted for, and shows the result to be more favorable to the defendant than he was entitled to. The findings, which are objected to on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to justify them, are in line with and follow the allegations of the pleadings, and, as they are sustained by the evidence, they will not, under the well-established rule of this court, be disturbed. The remaining errors complained of are not necessary to be considered, as they are either unimportant or untenable. We recommend that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

DONOHUE et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT et al.
(No. 14,646.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 4, 1892.)

MANDAMUS TO JUDGE—REMEDY BY APPEAL.

Mandamus will not lie to compel a judge of a superior court to award a jury trial in an action to quiet title, since whether a jury should be granted is a question of law which the superior court has jurisdiction to determine; and, if error is committed, petitioners have a sufficient remedy by appeal.

In bank. Petition for a writ of mandamus by Patrick Donohue and Mary Donohue against the superior court of San Francisco county and Hon. John Hunt, judge. Dismissed.

Mich. Mullany, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. Petitioners aver that they are defendants in an action pending in the court of respondents in which one Hinkel is plaintiff; that said action is an action to quiet title to certain described lands; that petitioners have answered in said action, setting up certain defenses; that petitioners have demanded a jury trial of said action; that their demand has been refused, and that the respondents are about to try said action without a jury; wherefore petitioners pray for a writ of mandate commanding respondents to comply with petitioners' demand for a jury, and "not to undertake to try or to set said action for trial without a jury." Whether or not the petitioners should have a jury trial of said action is a question of law which the superior court has jurisdiction to hear and determine; and, if any error has been, or shall be, committed in determining that question, the petitioners have a sufficient remedy in the ordinary course of law by appeal. The prayer of petitioners is denied, and the proceeding dismissed.

GRIMMER v. CARLTON. (No. 13,550.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 4, 1892.)

CANCELING DEED—ADMISSIONS IN PLEADINGS—CONTRACTS—CONSIDERATION.

1. In an action to cancel a deed on the ground of fraud and misrepresentation, and on the further ground that the true consideration was not set out in the deed and was insufficient to support it, the court found in favor of defendant as to the issue of fraud and misrepresentation, but found, for plaintiff, that the consideration was based on a verbal agreement of defendant to support her mother (the plaintiff) during her natural life, and that such consideration, not being enforceable, was no consideration. Held, that there was no conflict in the findings, and no error in canceling the deed.

2. Where an answer sets up an agreement entered into to maintain and support plaintiff, and the cross-complaint denies such agreement, but avers that plaintiff was supported by defendant, such averment is not an admission that the support was in pursuance of the agreement, the existence of which is denied.

3. Where a proper performance of a verbal contract by a daughter for the support and maintenance of an aged mother during her life involves the personal service of the daughter, the contract is not enforceable.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; F. E. SPENCER, Judge.

Action by E. M. Grimmer against M. L. Carlton. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. L. Barnes and W. H. Layson, for appellant. Wm. B. Hardy, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to cancel a deed made by Mrs. Grimmer, the plaintiff, to her daughter, Mrs. Carlton. The case comes here upon the judgment roll alone. From the pleadings it appears that the main issues are two: First. Whether or not the deed had been obtained by the fraud and misrepresentations of the defendant. Second. Whether or not the true consideration for the making and delivery thereof was expressed in the deed; and, if not so expressed, if it, as set out in the pleadings, was an enforceable contract, and sufficient to support the deed. The court found in favor of the defendant as to the issue of fraud and misrepresentations, but found, for the plaintiff, that the true consideration was not stated in the deed; that it was a consideration based upon a verbal agreement that the defendant, in consideration of the making and delivery of the deed, would support and maintain her mother (the plaintiff) for the balance of her natural life; and, in effect, that such a proposed consideration, not being enforceable, was no consideration at all.—and adjudged, therefore, that the deed should be canceled, and the defendant enjoined from selling the property described in the deed, which it is alleged she intended to do. From that judgment this appeal is taken.

Taken all together, we see no conflict in the findings, and no error in that respect. Nor do we perceive that the court erred in giving judgment upon the findings for the plaintiff. The proposed consideration, as the true and only consideration, if any existed, mentioned therein, is found to be no consideration, in the sense, as we understand the findings, that the agreement upon which it was based was not an enforceable contract, and therefore the deed should be canceled. The findings also negative, by finding what the true consideration was, the existence of any other to support the deed.

But it claimed that, by the admissions of the answer to the cross-complaint, it is shown that the contract to maintain and support the plaintiff was partially performed. We do not think this position correct. The answer to the cross-complaint specifically denies that there was any such agreement made as the latter pleading sets up; and if that is denied, the fact set out in it, that the plaintiff was supported by the defendant, if admitted by the pleadings, is not an admission that it was in pursuance of the agreement, the existence of which is denied.

Conceding, without deciding, that the agreement may not be within the statute of frauds, because it appears that the time for the performance of the defendant's contract to maintain and support depends upon the contingency of the death of the plaintiff, which might or might not happen within a year, under the rule laid down in Swift v. Swift, 46 Cal. 269, nevertheless we do not think the contract an enforceable one, because, from the very nature of it, a proper performance thereof involved the personal services of the defendant. The findings show that the plaintiff is a person 84 years of age, feeble in health, subject to the ailments and disorders incident to old age, and her memory seriously impaired. The proper maintenance and support of the mother by her daughter ought, necessarily, to involve the personal care and attention of the latter to such a sick, ailing, and feeble-minded parent. It would doubtless be also the most important and necessary part of the proposed maintenance and support of an almost helpless parent,—a female, too,—peculiarly to be attended to by a loving and devoted daughter; and it would be strange, indeed, if, in addition to a house and lot worth $6,000,—almost all the mother possessed in the way of property,—the filial affection of the child would not stimulate and cause her to consider such services as included in the contract, and so intended by the party to be charged, and that the same would be so understood by the party with whom it was made. The validity of the deed depends upon the power to enforce the specific performance of the defendant's mutual and dependent contract. As it could not be enforced, under the rule laid down in Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 409, and King v. Gildersleeve, 79 Cal. 509, 21 Pac. Rep. 961, we think the court below was warranted in giving its judgment on the findings made; and we advise that the judgment be affirmed,—there being no prejudicial error disclosed by the record.

WE CONCUR: VANLIEF, C.; FITZGERALD, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

BROWN v. ROUSE. (No. 13,827.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 4, 1892.)

ACTION ON A NOTE—PLEADING AND PROOF—CONSIDERATION.

In an action on a note for $1,200 the complaint alleged that it was executed by defendant through her attorney for money loaned, but the power of attorney attached to the complaint did not purport to confer authority to borrow money or execute the note. The complaint also alleged that on the day the note was dated plaintiff paid out, for and at the request of defendant, $580, and that said sum formed part of the consideration of the $1,200 note. There was no other consideration alleged. Held, that plaintiff could recover the $580, but that under the complaint he could not recover the balance of the $1,200 note, though it may have appeared from the evidence that the balance of the amount of the note was, on the day the note was dated, paid to defendant's attorney, and that the loan was afterwards ratified by defendant.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; F. E. SPENCER, Judge.

Action by one Brown against one Rouse. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

John H. Durst and W. A. Nygh, for appellant. W. C. Kennedy, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The complaint in this case is not to be commended as a model of pleading. It alleges that the appellant, though her attorney, executed to the plaintiff a promissory note for the sum of $1,200, and a mortgage to secure its payment, and that the power of attorney under which the same were executed, although properly acknowledged, in fact did not have a sufficient certificate of acknowledgment; and asked, as a part of the relief, that the certificate of acknowledgment be corrected according to the facts. The power of attorney was annexed to the complaint, but, as it did not purport to confer any authority, either to borrow money or to execute a note or mortgage, the sufficiency and correctness of the certificate became immaterial. For the same reason the plaintiff could have no relief upon either the note or mortgage. The plaintiff, however, alleged in his complaint that on the 18th day of November, 1887, (the day on which the note was dated,) he "did pay, for and at the request of the defendant, the sum of $580, in full release and discharge of a certain note and mortgage" that had been executed by the defendant, and "said sum of $580 forms a part of the consideration of the note and mortgage of $1,200" set forth in the complaint. There is no other consideration for the note sued on alleged, and, as the note was made without any authority from the appellant, it did not in itself import any consideration against the defendant, and the plaintiff was limited to a recovery upon the actual consideration which he had alleged, viz., the amount of money paid by him at the request of the appellant. The appeal is simply from the judgment, and we are not informed of the evidence introduced at the trial. The court, however, found that on the 18th day of November, 1887, the attorney of the appellant "borrowed from the plaintiff the sum of $1,198," and gave to the plaintiff therefor the note and mortgage set forth in the complaint; and thereafter the plaintiff, at the request of said attorney, paid the sum of $470 in satisfaction of a note and mortgage previously executed by the appellant, and that this sum of $470 was a part of the consideration for the note and mortgage set forth in the complaint. The court also found that the appellant subsequently received from her attorney "the residue of said $1,198 paid by plaintiff after deducting said $470," and ratified and confirmed the loan made by the plaintiff. We must assume that there was evidence before the court sufficient to sustain these findings, and, if the facts therein contained had been alleged in the complaint, the judgment should be affirmed. The finding that the appellant ratified the loan would be sufficient to sustain a judgment against her for the full amount of the loan, if such a cause of action had been alleged in the complaint. The only cause of action which the plaintiff has stated in his complaint is for the sum of $580, paid out by him at the request of the appellant, and he has not alleged that he loaned any sum of money to her. The fact that the court received evidence of another cause of action than that alleged in the complaint, even though it was for money loaned upon the same day as was the payment for the account of the appellant, did not justify the court in rendering judgment upon such cause of action. Finding 6, made by the court, is contradictory in itself. The court finds that the plaintiff did, at the request of the appellant's attorney, who was acting as her agent, pay the $470 in satisfaction of a note that had been executed by her; and it also finds that said payment was purely voluntary on the part of the plaintiff. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied. The judgment dismissing Durst from the action left the plaintiff and the appellant as the only parties who could be affected by any reversal thereof. The judgment is reversed, and a new trial ordered.

WETHERLY v. STRAUS. Feb. 6, 1892.)

BAILEMENT—FAILURE TO DELIVER—ACTION FOR—PLEADING AND PROOF—HUSBAND AND WIFE—GISTS BETWEEN.

1. In an action by a bailor against a bailee for failure to surrender on demand a certificate of deposit, after it had been attached by creditors of the bailor's husband, the bailee, under allegations that the money represented by the certificate belonged to bailor's husband, and was deposited by her as his agent, cannot maintain that the money was given to the bailor by her husband to defraud his creditors; since, under Civil Code, § 3442, providing that the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact, and not of law, fraud must be pleaded.

2. A voluntary gift by a husband to his wife of the proceeds of a sale of their homestead is not per se fraudulent, as against his creditors.

3. Where, under Civil Code, § 1822, providing that a depository must deliver the thing to the person for whose benefit it was deposited, on demand, unless he has been forbidden or prevented from doing so by the real owner, or by act of the law, a deposit is attached by creditors of the bailor's husband, the depository, claiming that the deposit was held by the bailor only as agent for her husband, can justify his retention of the deposit only by proof that it actually belonged to the husband.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN F. FINN, Judge.

Action by Wetherly against Straus for failure to deliver a certificate of deposit. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Estee, Wilson & McCutcheon, for appellant. J. T. Rogers, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff deposited with the defendant on the 3d of September, 1888, for safe-keeping, a certificate of deposit that had been issued to her own order. On the next day an action was commenced by one Haviland, representing certain assigned claims, (of which one was assigned by the defendant,) against the firm of Bannister & Wetherly, and under a writ of attachment issued in said action a garnishment was served upon the defendant against the certificate of deposit that had been left with him by the plaintiff. The defendant gave no notice to the plaintiff of these proceedings until after she had demanded the certificate, on the 14th of September, when he told her that it had been attached, and that he could not give it to her. Thereupon she brought this action for damages sustained by his conduct. The defendant in his answer alleged that the money represented by the certificate was the property of the plaintiff's husband, defendant in the above suit, and that the deposit was made and the certificate issued to her only as the agent and trustee of her husband, and that after it had been deposited with him the garnishment above named had been served upon him, and that he had ever since the 4th of September held the certificate under and pursuant to said writ of attachment and garnishment. At the trial the plaintiff testified that the money represented by the certificate was a portion of the proceeds derived from the sale of the homestead of herself and her husband at Winnemucca, which she had negotiated and conveyed upon the consideration that she was to have the money for which it was sold, with which to buy a less expensive home, and that after its sale her husband had given her the money, and that with it she had procured drafts upon San Francisco, for which the certificate of deposit was issued. The defendant offered evidence in support of the defense that the certificate had been attached as the property of the plaintiff's husband in the suit of Haviland against the firm of Bannister & Wetherly. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereon, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

The claim on the part of the appellant that the money represented by the certificate of deposit had been transferred to the plaintiff by her husband with intent to defraud his creditors, and, being for that reason fraudulent and void, was subject to attachment at the instance of his creditors, cannot, under the issues presented by his answer, be maintained. Such a claim concedes the validity and completeness of the transfer as between the parties, but seeks to set it aside in favor of creditors, upon the ground that it was made with a fraudulent intent; and inasmuch as such fraudulent intent is "one of fact, and not of law," (Civil Code, § 3442,) it is necessary for one who would avail himself of this fact to aver it in his pleading as one of the elements of his cause of action or defense. The appellant made no averment of this fact in his answer, but relied therein upon the ground that the money was at all times the property of the husband, and was never the separate property of the plaintiff, as she had alleged in her complaint, and that its deposit by her in the bank was, "as the agent" of her husband, and that the certificate of deposit was issued to her "as the agent and trustee" of her husband, and "not otherwise." Upon this issue there was evidence before the jury from which it could find that the money had been given to the plaintiff by her husband, and was her separate estate. If the appellant had intended to avoid such gift, he should have made proper averments therefor in his answer in order that the plaintiff might meet them at the trial. Fraud is never to be presumed, and whenever it constitutes an element of a cause of action or of a defense which is of an affirmative nature, and invoked as conferring a right against the plaintiff, it must be alleged. The necessity of such averment in the present case is apparent from the facts shown at the trial. The homestead from which the money was derived was not subject to the claim of any creditor of the plaintiff's husband, and a transfer of it by the husband to her could not, under any circumstances, be held, as a matter of fact, to be with the intent to defraud his creditors. His creditors could not, by any legal process, take the property covered by the homestead, and its voluntary transfer to the wife would not "obstruct the enforcement by legal process" of any right to take the property affected by the transfer, (Civil Code, § 3441;) neither would such transfer of its proceeds.

The defendant, having received the certificate as a mere depository for safe-keeping, was bound to deliver it to the plaintiff on demand, unless he had a lien upon it, or was forbidden or prevented from doing so by the real owner or by the act of the law, and had given the notice required by section 1825, Civil Code; Id. § 1822.¹ The only excuse given for not delivering it was the garnishment served upon him in the suit against her husband. It is not claimed that the appellant gave, or attempted to give, the plaintiff any notice of such garnishment until after she had made the demand, and her testimony that at the time of depositing the certificate with him she informed him of her place of residence was not disputed by him. A bailee can assert a jus tertii in an action by the bailor only when he defends on such title and by the authority of such third person. Palmtag v. Doutrick, 59 Cal. 168; Dodge v. Meyer, 61 Cal. 423. When the bailor has obtained the property by some fraud practiced upon the true owner, the bailee can, upon the authority of such true owner, or when he has been forbidden to make delivery of the property, defend upon such true owner's title; but he always assumes such defense at his peril, and takes upon himself the burden of showing the right to retain the property under such instructions. In the present case the appellant does not pretend that the husband has given him any authority to make the defense, but his claim to retain the certificate is based upon his other claim that the money, as well as the certificate, was never given to the plaintiff, but was held by her for her husband as his agent; and that a garnishment therefor against the husband has been served upon him; and the only ground upon which in his answer he justified his refusal to deliver it to the plaintiff is that ever since the 4th day of September, 1888, he has held, and does now hold, said certificate "under and pursuant to said writ of attachment, and the said notice and command of said sheriff as aforesaid." Such right to hold the certificate depends entirely upon his ability to prove that it belonged to her husband, but the evidence showing that the husband had given the money to the plaintiff destroyed the defendant's right to retain the certificate under this claim.

Various exceptions were taken at the trial to the rulings of the court and its instructions to the jury, but an examination of the record shows that the court instructed the jury in accordance with the principles herein, and in its other rulings we are of the opinion that no error was committed which would justify a reversal of its judgment or order. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

SHEEHY v. MILES et al. (No. 13,913.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 6, 1892.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE—WHAT IS PERFECT TITLE—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—HOMESTEAD—RIGHTS OF SURVIVING WIDOW AND CHILDREN—PROBATE COURT—JURISDICTION.

1. Under a contract for the sale of land, which provides for a perfect title, the title must be free from reasonable doubt, and fairly deductible of record.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 1468, prior to April, 1880, provided that when property was set apart for the use of the family the widow should take one-half, and the minor children one-half. Held, that under the section as amended in April, 1880, providing that property set apart for the use of the family should be "for the benefit of the several parties," the widow and each of the minor children took equal shares as tenants in common.

3. The proportional interests which a widow and minor children take in community property set apart for their use as a homestead are determined by the statute in force at the time the order of probate is made.

4. In an action by a vendee of land to recover a payment on the ground that the vendee's title was imperfect, the validity of the offered deed depended on whether a homestead which a prior owner had formerly acquired in the land was at the time of his death, five years later, still subsisting. Held, that the recitals in the homestead claim were not evidence to the vendee that at the time of said owner's death the homestead was still subsisting, and that the vendee need not accept the vendor's statement that the homestead was still subsisting, nor seek extraneous information in regard thereto.

5. On the death of a husband, community property on which a homestead exists vests absolutely in the widow.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by John Sheehy against Edwin Miles and Kate Miles to recover a deposit

¹ Civil Code, § 1822, provides: "A depository must deliver the thing to the person for whose benefit it was deposited, on demand, whether the deposit was made for a specified time or not, unless he has a lien on the thing deposited, or has been forbidden or prevented from doing so by the real owner thereof, or by act of the law, and has given the notice required by section 1825."

made on a sale of land. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. J. Castelhan, for appellants. Sawyer & Burnett, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover a deposit made on a sale of real estate situate in the city and county of San Francisco, the plaintiff claiming the title to be defective. The condition of defendants' title to the tract of land—as to whether or not it is a good and perfect title—is the only question involved upon this appeal.

In the case of Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 177, 18 Pac. Rep. 262, this court said, "A perfect title must be one that is good and valid, beyond all reasonable doubt;" and in that case it was conceded by counsel upon both sides that a title, to be good, "should be free from litigation, palpable defects, and grave doubts, should consist of both legal and equitable titles, and should be fairly deducible of record." It would seem, in fairness to the vendee, that the foregoing requirements should be held absolutely necessary in order to fully satisfy the covenant of perfect title. Certainly, such a condition of title must exist before it can be said to be good and valid beyond reasonable doubt. See Reynolds v. Borel, 86 Cal. 538, 25 Pac. Rep. 67; Richmond v. Gray, 3 Allen, 27; Sturtevant v. Jaques, 14 Allen, 526.

While the record here is silent as to the facts, we will assume that upon the 15th day of December, 1874, the legal and record title to this tract of land was vested in George Styles. Upon that day he filed a homestead upon the property, in all respects in conformity with law, setting forth, among other things, that he resided upon the property with his family, consisting of Jane Styles, his wife, and three children, and that said property was community property. Upon March 28, 1879, he died. Upon November 4, 1880, the widow petitioned to have the property set apart as a homestead for the use of the family. The court set it apart as a homestead for the use of the family, consisting of Jane Styles, widow, and George, Robert, and William Styles, minor children. One Samson was appointed guardian of the estates of the said minors, and returned in an inventory and appraisal an undivided one-half of said property as the estate of said minors; and, upon proceedings in the probate court, said property of the minors was sold to defendant Kate Miles, who at the same time received a deed of bargain and sale to all of said property from said Jane Styles. It is insisted by respondent, and was so found by the court, that by reason of the order setting aside the property as a homestead for the use of the family the widow and children took thereof in equal shares, and that consequently the title to an undivided one-fourth interest in said property still remains in said minors; the guardian's deed to defendant Kate Miles only purporting to convey an undivided one-half interest thereof. In 1880, at the time the order of the probate court was made, setting aside this property for the use of the family, section 1468 of the Code of Civil Procedure read as follows: "When property is set apart for the use of the family, such property shall be for the benefit of the several parties, as provided in section 1465 of this Code." Prior to April, 1880, this section provided that the widow should take one-half of the property set apart, and the minor children one-half. At the session of the legislature of 1881 the section was again changed so as to read practically as it did prior to the provision of 1880. We must assume that the legislature meant something by the varied and repeated legislation with reference to this section of the Code. If the quantum of this homestead property which was to pass respectively to the widow and minor children under the law as it stood in 1879 was not changed by the amendment of 1880, why the change in the law? Why idle and useless legislation? And, again, why did the legislature, in 1881, return to the old law? This question as to the vesting of the title to the homestead was the only subject of legislation involved in the section during all these changes, and the amendments at these various times were so substantial as to amount to repeals of the section as it previously stood. It would seem that under the section as quoted the widow and minor children took equal shares in this property as tenants in common. This is its intent, or it has no meaning whatever. "When parties take title and hold as tenants in common, each will be deemed to hold an equal share; there being nothing to indicate to the contrary." Hardenbergh v. Bacon, 33 Cal. 378. In this decree there is nothing to indicate to the contrary. The section of the Code is absolutely silent upon the question, and we conclude the legislative intent must be held to have been that the minor children should share equally with the widow. Consequently, if these probate proceedings were valid, and any title whatever to this property vested in these minors by reason thereof, then an undivided three-fourths vested, and they still remain possessed of the title to an undivided one-fourth thereof.

Appellants insist that as Styles died in 1879, the property being community, one-half vested immediately in the widow and one-half in the children, subject to be set apart as a homestead under the law as it stood at the time of his death, and that section 1468, as amended in 1880, if applicable to this case, would deprive the widow of vested rights. As the homestead law in existence at the time of Styles' death was repealed by the law of 1880, this reasoning would force us to the conclusion that no homestead whatever could be set apart out of this property. In Re Estate of Boland, 43 Cal. 642, the court said: "The right of Margaret Lane to have a homestead set apart to her from the estate of her former husband, John Boland, must, therefore, be determined from the facts as they existed on the 3d day of January, 1870, when the order of the probate court was made." And in Sulzberger v. Sulzberger, 50 Cal. 388, the court said: "The homestead is to be set apart in pursuance of the statute in force at the time when the order is made, and the interest therein which the widow and the surviving child will take is to be determined by the same statute." In this case it was also decided that the right to have a homestead set apart out of the testator's separate property was paramount to his right to devise the property. We conclude, therefore, that the order of the probate court setting aside this property as a homestead, under section 1468 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it existed at the date of the order, did not give that provision a retroactive effect, and interfered with no vested rights of the widow. It follows that unless Jane Styles, the widow, by right of survivorship, under her recorded homestead, became the owner in fee of this entire property, title to a one-fourth interest thereof is still outstanding in the minor children.

It is settled law in this state that on the death of the husband the community property upon which a homestead exists vests absolutely in the widow; and in the case of Watson v. His Creditors, 58 Cal. 556, it was held that the court had no power to make a decree setting the property apart for the use of the family when such a homestead existed, and that the effect of such a decree, no matter how broad its language, is simply to take the property out of administration. This principle is supported by many authorities, and is undoubtedly the true rule; but these decisions are founded upon the previous determination of the court that a valid recorded homestead upon community property is in full life at the date of such decree, and in this case there was no record, official or otherwise, to bring home to the vendee knowledge of any such state of facts. To be sure, the trial court found that this property was community property, and that Styles and his wife resided upon it at the date of the homestead, and that the homestead had not been abandoned, and that Styles died in 1879; but we cannot see how these findings of the court, tending to show that this homestead was a valid homestead, such as would vest the title in fee in the widow upon the death of said Styles, would indicate a good and perfect title to Sheehy, the plaintiff in this action, at a period weeks previous to the time when these findings were made. All the plaintiff knew about the status of the title to this property was from the recorded homestead. The recitals therein filled the full measure required by the statute, but they were not binding on third parties; for their truth could be assailed by any person having an interest in setting aside the homestead. The vendee is not required to rely upon the word of mouth of the vendor that he has good title. The title must be produced before him in some tangible form, in order that it may be measured and weighed. In this case the recitals in the homestead were not evidence to the vendee that the title was good. Neither was he compelled to go out into the world upon an exploring expedition, and by an examination of witnesses determine—and perchance determine wrongly—the existence of those facts that were necessary to exist in order that Jane Styles, the widow, may have acquired this property by right of survivorship, to-wit, that it was community property; that Styles and his wife resided upon the property, with their children, at the time the homestead was declared and recorded; that it had not been abandoned; that it was not void by reason of a previous homestead having been declared; that Styles was dead, etc. Under this agreement, which contains a covenant of perfect title, when considered in connection with the condition and appearance of this title as it is presented to us, if this were an action for specific performance, it would seem no court of equity would compel the vendee to pay $10,000 for this tract of land. In addition to these matters, which are presented from a consideration of the record homestead, the vendee was confronted with this probate homestead, and the proceedings pertaining to the sale of the various interests derived therefrom. As we have seen, those authorities holding that decrees of the court setting aside probate homesteads from property upon which recorded homesteads rested were void and of no effect gave the vendee in this case no light as to the condition of this title; for he possessed no knowledge, and was not required to go forth seeking knowledge, as to whether or not this recorded homestead was such as to vest title in the widow upon the death of Styles. The inference more properly to be drawn from this action of the court in setting aside the probate homestead would be that the court would not do an idle thing, by making a useless decree, and that from some cause shown at that time the recorded homestead was adjudged void, and that this decree was a valid decree made by the court to preserve the property to the use and benefit of the family as best it could.

For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that appellants' title to this realty was not free from palpable defects and grave doubts, was not fairly deducible of record, and was not a good and valid title, beyond reasonable doubt. Let the judgment be affirmed.

I CONCUR: PATERSON, J.

HARRISON, J., (concurring.) 1. Upon the facts found by the trial court, the declaration of homestead filed for record in the county recorder's office by George Styles had the effect, upon his death, to vest in his surviving widow all the estate in the land therein described that was held by him in his life-time, and her deed to the appellant Kate Miles transferred to her the same estate. The order of the probate court setting this land apart as a homestead for the benefit of the widow and minor children, although made upon the application of the widow, did not divest her of the title that had already vested in her by virtue of her survivorship. That court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter with which it purported to deal, and its order thereon was without any effect upon the title thus held by the surviving widow. The jurisdiction which is conferred upon the superior court "in all matters of probate" is separate and distinct from the ordinary jurisdiction which it exercises in civil matters, and is limited in its exercise to property of the estate of a decedent which is under its control in course of administration; and, as at the instant of the husband's death his widow became vested with the entire estate in the land, the court had no more jurisdiction over it than it had over any other land in which the decedent may have held a life-estate, and could make no order affecting its title or the right to its possession. The order setting it apart as a homestead for the use of the widow and minor children had only the negative effect of declaring that it was not subject to administration, except that, if the estate of the decedent had any interest in the land subject to administration, such interest would, by virtue of the order, pass to the widow and minor children. Whether or not the extrinsic facts were such as to cause the filing of the declaration to impress upon the land the character and incidents of a homestead, were matters in pais, and beyond the jurisdiction of the court sitting in probate to determine. Any issue involving that question, as well as the widow's right of survivorship, must be determined in a different forum, and could not be determined upon an application to the court in probate to set the property aside as a homestead. If the court, upon the contention of any party interested that the property was a part of the estate, notwithstanding the declaration of homestead that had been filed in the life-time of the decedent, should, upon an application therefor, set it apart as a homestead, it would still follow that only such interest as belonged to the estate could be affected by such order; and any controversy between the widow, claiming as survivor, and the children, claiming under this order, could not be determined by the probate court.

2. Assuming, however, that the filing of the declaration was insufficient to impress the land with the homestead claim, and that the land was a part of the estate of the decedent subject to administration, the effect of the order setting it apart was to vest the interest of the decedent's estate in the land so set apart in the "several parties" constituting the family, as is clearly shown in the opinion of Mr. Justice GAROUTTE; the widow and minor children each taking an undivided fourth. As the sale by the guardian did not purport to be for more than an undivided half of the property, it is evident that one-fourth of whatever interest passed under the order setting it aside as a homestead is still outstanding in the minor children.

3. It is a settled rule of this court that, under a contract for the sale of land which provides for a perfect title, the title must be free from reasonable doubt, and fairly deducible of record. The vendee is not required to accept a title depending upon adverse possession, or upon matters which rest purely in parol. Under this rule the respondent was not required to accept the title tendered him by the appellant. If the homestead created in the life-time of Styles was for any reason ineffective, it is conceded that an undivided one-fourth of the land was not embraced in that deed. The respondent was not compelled to accept the statement of the appellant, or of any one under whom she claimed, that at the time of filing the declaration the facts existed from which the homestead claim was thereby impressed upon the land, so that upon the death of Styles the title vested in his widow; nor was he under any obligation to institute such examination, and determine at his own risk whether they did exist.

4. The petition for the guardian's sale of the interest of the minors in the land was, in my opinion, sufficient in form to give to the court jurisdiction to make the order of sale.

For these reasons the judgment should be affirmed.

UNDERHILL v. SANTA BARBARA LAND, BLDG. & IMP. CO. et al. (No. 13,955.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 8, 1892.)

CORPORATIONS—CONTRACTS—ULTRA VIRES—ASSENT OF STOCKHOLDERS—BY-LAWS—CORPORATE NAME.

1. Where a corporation executed two non-negotiable notes and two mortgages, the consideration therefor being the promise of the mortgagees to advance money and deliver lumber as needed and ordered by the corporation for the improvement of the mortgaged property, and the money was advanced and the lumber delivered, and there was no fraud on the part of the mortgagees, such indebtedness was not fictitious.

2. Such indebtedness is not "bonded indebtedness," in the sense of Const. art. 12, § 11, forbidding, except on certain conditions, the increase by corporations of their bonded indebtedness.

3. Though the notes and mortgages were given for a debt larger than the subscribed capital stock of the corporation, their execution was not prohibited by Civil Code, § 309, forbidding directors of corporations from creating debts beyond the subscribed capital stock, and for a violation of this provision making the directors who create such debts jointly and individually liable to the corporation. HARRISON, J., dissenting.

4. It was shown that after the execution of the first note and mortgage, which was for a sum much greater than the subscribed capital stock, the matter was discussed at a meeting of the stockholders of the corporation, at which a resolution was passed affirming all the acts of the directors since the organization of the company. It further appeared that the mortgagees were engaged for about six months in carrying out their part of the contract, and that at a meeting of the stockholders subsequent to the execution of the second note and mortgage the whole matter was discussed, and no objection was then made to the acts of the directors in creating the indebtedness, though no formal resolution of approval was passed. There was no evidence that any stockholder ever objected to these transactions of the corporation until after the full consideration of the notes and mortgages was received. Held, that the by-law which forbade the directors creating any indebtedness exceeding the amount of the subscribed capital stock was waived.

5. Where the body of the second note expressed the promise, and the mortgage expressly purported to be the mortgage of the "S. B. Land, Building & Improvement Company," (its proper name,) but the note is signed by the president and secretary of the "S. B. Land & Improvement Company," and the mortgage is signed by the same parties as president and secretary of the "Land & Improvement Company," and both the note and the mortgage were attested by the corporate seal, there can be no doubt as to what corporation executed the mortgage.

BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

Action by Francis Underhill against the Santa Barbara Land, Building & Improvement Company and Martha S. Barker for the foreclosure of two mortgages. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

D. P. Hatch, C. A. Starke, J. F. Conroy, and Thos. McNulta, for appellants. Cope & Bayse, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The following opinion prepared by Commissioner VANCLIEF, while this cause was pending in department, is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court in bank, and for the reasons therein given the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed:

"The Santa Barbara Land, Building & Improvement Company is a corporation purporting to have been organized under title 16 of the Civil Code, §§ 639-647. The purposes for which it was organized, as expressed in its articles of incorporation, are 'the purchase of real estate, the construction of buildings, and making improvement on real property;' its principal place of business is the city of Santa Barbara, Cal.; and its capital stock is $12,000, divided into 480 shares, of $25 each. The action is to foreclose two mortgages on real property of the corporation, alleged to have been executed by the corporation to Gorham & Co., (a copartnership,) and by the latter assigned to the plaintiff. Martha S. Barker was made a defendant, on the ground that she held a subsequent mortgage on the same property. Both defendants answered, denying all the material allegations of the complaint, except the allegation that the Santa Barbara Land, Building & Improvement Company was duly incorporated, which they expressly admitted, and alleging affirmative matters to show that the notes and mortgages were not executed by the corporation, and that the attempted execution of them was in excess of the power of the corporation. The judgment was for the plaintiff, ordering a sale of the mortgaged property, and application of the proceeds to the satisfaction of plaintiff's mortgages in preference to that of the defendant Barker. Both defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial; and the corporation also appeals from an order made after judgment, requiring it to file an undertaking in the sum of $12,000 to stay execution pending the appeal from the judgment.

"1. Appellants contend that the notes and mortgages constitute 'bonded indebtedness' of the corporation, in the sense of section 11 of article 12 of the constitution of this state; and, inasmuch as they were not executed in pursuance of any general law, nor with the consent of a majority of the stockholders at a meeting called for that purpose, on 60 days' notice, the execution of them was ultra vires. They also contend that the indebtedness was fictitious. The court found, however, from evidence sufficient to justify the finding, that the consideration for the notes consisted of money advanced to and paid for the corporation, and property sold and delivered to it by Gorham & Co. equal in value to the principal sums for which the notes were made; and that the whole consideration for said notes was applied by the corporation to the construction of fences, buildings, and other fixtures upon the mortgaged property. But only a part of the consideration for each note had been received by the corporation at the date of the note. Each note and mortgage was executed in pursuance of a previous agreement that Gorham & Co. were to advance and pay money and deliver lumber as needed and ordered by the corporation for the improvement of the mortgaged property, and the money was so advanced and paid and the lumber so delivered. The full consideration for the first note and mortgage (dated July 1, 1886,) was received by the corporation before the second note and mortgage were executed, and the full consideration for the second note and mortgage (of November 1, 1886) was received by the corporation before January 4, 1887. No fraud on the part of Gorham & Co. is charged, and all the transactions seem to have been in the ordinary course of business, and within the purview of the purposes for which the corporation was organized. Certainly the indebtedness secured by the notes and mortgages is not 'fictitious,' in any sense of the word. Nor is the indebtedness 'bonded indebtedness,' in the sense of section 11 of article 12 of the constitution. Without undertaking to define the meaning of the term 'bonded indebtedness,' as used in the constitution, it may be confidently asserted that it does not embrace a non-negotiable note and mortgage executed by a corporation to secure its indebtedness for money loaned, money paid, property purchased, or labor performed in the ordinary course of its authorized business, and actually received and used in such business. The notes under consideration are not negotiable, as they are payable to Gorham & Co. alone; and they were executed for the considerations received and used, as above expressed. Manifestly, it is not the intention of the constitution to prohibit the increase of all kinds of indebtedness, since the prohibition of a particular kind implies that there may be indebtedness of another kind; and, if a corporation may incur and increase any kind of indebtedness without sanction of a general law and consent of a majority of the stockholders, what is the objection to securing all such indebtedness by mortgage? If the constitution does not prohibit a corporation from securing every kind of indebtedness by mortgage, it follows that the mere fact that a corporation debt is secured by mortgage does not show that it is of the kind prohibited, and that the prohibited kind must be distinguished by some other attribute than that of mortgage security. It will hardly be contended that section 11 of ar-title 12 of the constitution was intended to prohibit all increase of indebtedness not authorized by a general law and consent of a majority of the stockholders; much less, that it was intended to prohibit mortgage security for any kind of indebtedness which a corporation may lawfully incur. Conceding that, to constitute 'bonded indebtedness,' in the constitutional sense, it must be secured by mortgage, it does not follow, as contended by counsel, that all indebtedness secured by mortgage is 'bonded indebtedness' in that sense.

"2. Counsel for appellants further contend that inasmuch as the notes and mortgages were executed for indebtedness beyond the subscribed capital stock of the corporation, their execution was prohibited by section 309 of the Civil Code, which provides that directors of corporations must not 'create debts beyond their subscribed capital stock,' and that, for a violation of this provision, 'the directors under whose administration the same may have happened (except those who may have caused their dissent therefrom to be entered at large on the minutes of the directors at the time, or were not present when the same did happen) are, in their individual and private capacity, jointly and severally liable to the corporation, and to the creditors thereof, in the event of its dissolution, to the full amount of the * * * debt contracted. There may, however, be a division and distribution of the capital stock of any corporation which remains after the payment of all its debts upon its dissolution or the expiration of its term of existence.' Upon a careful reading and construction of this section, in connection with section 354, defining the powers of corporations generally, and section 640, relating to the power of the special class of corporations to which the defendant corporation belongs, I think it will appear that it was not the intention of the legislature, by the enactment of section 309, to deprive corporations of the power to create debts beyond their subscribed capital stock, but merely to provide a remedy in favor of the corporation and its creditors against those members of the board of directors by whose improvident or fraudulent exercise of the powers of a corporation debts are created disproportionately to the subscribed capital stock, and beyond the ability of the corporation to pay. The section does not provide that the contracts or attempted contracts by which the excess of debts is created shall be void, but, on the contrary, seems to imply the power of the corporation to make them, and that they are valid contracts. If they are void, and create no liability of the corporation, it would be absurd, as well as unjust, to make the individual directors liable to the corporation, especially if the corporation had received a consideration equal in value to the debts created; but, as indemnity to the corporation, in case it should be compelled to pay such debts, or to its creditors, in case of the insolvency of the corporation, such liability of the directors is reasonable and just. On the construction contended for, the corporation may receive and retain the consideration, and then repudiate the debt. Again, section 309 does not purport to limit the power of the corporation, but only to regulate and check the exercise of that power by the directors, as might have been done by a by-law, though not to the extent of making the directors liable for the excess of debts. In regard to the effect of statutory prohibitions on the validity of acts thereby forbidden, Mr. Taylor, in his work on Private Corporations, at section 297, deduces from the cases the following rule: 'If a statute expressly forbids a corporation to make a certain contract, the contract is void, even though not expressly declared to be so, and is incapable of ratification; and that the contract is void as unlawful may be pleaded by any one to an action founded directly and exclusively on the contract, unless (1) the statute expressly states what the consequences of violating it shall be, and those consequences are other than that the contract is void; or (2) the statutory prohibition was evidently imposed for the protection of a certain class of persons who alone may take advantage of it; or (3) to adjudge the contract void and incapable of forming the basis of a right of action would clearly frustrate the evident purposes of the prohibition itself.' The learned author then proceeds to illustrate the rule and its qualifications by the cases. In the first place, it is to be observed that section 309 of the Civil Code does not come within this rule, even without the qualifications, for the reason that it does not expressly forbid the corporation from creating debts, etc. In the second place, it does clearly fall within the first qualification, if not within the second and third, since it does state consequences of violating it other than that the contracts creating the debts are void, and does not state that such contracts are void. From the foregoing considerations it follows that the creation of the indebtedness to plaintiff's assignor, and securing it by notes and mortgages, was not prohibited by section 309 of the Civil Code.

"3. It is also claimed that the creation of the indebtedness was ultra vires by force of a by-law of the corporation which provides that 'no indebtedness shall be incurred by the board of directors for any purpose whatever, which in the aggregate shall exceed the amount of capital stock actually subscribed at the time such indebtedness is incurred.' This by-law is the creature of the corporation, acting through and by its stockholders, and generally for their benefit alone, and the same authority that enacted it may repeal it. Tayl. Corp. § 584; Smith v. Nelson, 18 Vt. 511. Furthermore, if a course of action contrary to a by-law of a private corporation is acquiesced in by the shareholders, the by-law is thereby waived, and will not affect the rights of persons dealing with the corporation in good faith, (Tayl. Corp. § 197, and cases there cited,) even though such persons may be shareholders, if they did not have actual notice of the by-law; and, where notice is material, 'it must be proved against shareholders and agents, as well as against strangers, by direct or presumptive evidence, and cannot be imputed by an arbitrary rule of law,' (Mor. Corp. § 500, and cases there cited.) Acts of the directors in violation of a by-law may be ratified by the shareholders, (Id. §§ 623-625; Tayl. Corp. §§ 187, 213,) and, generally, by the same number of shareholders that would be necessary to enact them, (Mor. Corp. § 626.) Such ratification need not be formally made in a meeting of the stockholders, but may be presumed from the circumstances of the case, such as long acquiescence in acts beneficial to the corporation, with knowledge of all the material facts. In this connection it has been said: 'Very slight evidence of acquiescence is sufficient to give validity to a transfer of real or personal property to an agent who was not authorized to receive it, and a ratification may even be presumed without evidence,' Id. § 629. 'Nor can the shareholders of a corporation avoid responsibility for the unauthorized acts of their agents by abstaining from inquiry into the affairs of the company, or by absenting themselves from the company's meetings, and at the same time reap the benefit of their acts in case of success.' Id. § 630. See, also, Tayl. Corp. § 112 et seq.; Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, p. 546, note a; Shaver v. Mining Co., 10 Cal. 396. In this case the authority of the directors to create the indebtedness of the corporation to plaintiff's assignor, and to execute the notes and mortgages to secure such indebtedness, contrary to the by-law, was put in issue by the pleadings; and upon this issue the court found for the plaintiff, upon evidence tending to prove a ratification, which, when proved, is equivalent to original authority, and justifies a finding of original authority. This finding is justified by the evidence. It was proved that on the 10th day of July, 1886, after the execution of the note and mortgage for $10,000, a sum greatly exceeding the subscribed capital stock, a meeting of the stockholders, after discussing the matter of the note and mortgage, passed a resolution approving 'all the facts and proceedings of the present board of directors since the organization of the company.' Plaintiff's assignors, Gorham & Co., were engaged in delivering the lumber, and paying for labor to improve the mortgaged property, for a period of about six months, between June 1, 1886, and January 4, 1887, and all the lumber had been delivered and money paid for such labor, constituting the consideration for the notes and mortgages, before January 4, 1887, under such circumstances that all the stockholders who gave ordinary attention to the affairs of the corporation must have had notice thereof, and of the facts that the entire consideration of the notes and mortgages had been received and used by the corporation. The whole matter was talked over at another meeting of the stockholders, after the execution of the second note and mortgage, without objection to the acts of the directors in creating the indebtedness, although no formal resolution approving them was passed at the meeting. There is no evidence tending to prove that any stockholder ever objected to any part of the transactions of the corporation with Gorham & Co. until long after the full consideration for the notes and mortgages had been received by the corporation, and used in improving its real property. According to the authorities above cited, this evidence has a substantial tendency to prove a ratification which justifies the finding of original authority. The pleadings raise no issue as to the probative fact of ratification, and, if they had, a finding of the ultimate fact of authority is sufficient.

"4. There is nothing in the objection that the second note and mortgage were not so executed as to bind the corporation. There is no question that the president of the corporation, Charles P. Low, and the secretary, Henry B. Brastow, were authorized to execute the note and mortgage by resolution of the board of directors. The only alleged defect in the execution by them is that they described themselves as president and secretary of the 'Santa Barbara Land & Improvement Co.,' omitting from the name the word 'Building.' They attested the execution by the seal of the corporation. The body of the note expresses the promise of the corporation (properly and fully named) to pay, and the mortgage expressly purports to be the mortgage of the 'Santa Barbara Land, Building & Improvement Company;' but the note was signed as follows: 'CHAS. P. Low, President of the Santa Barbara Land & Improvement Co. [Corporate Seal.] Attest: HENRY B. BRASTOW, Secretary.' And the mortgage was signed: '[Corporate Seal.] CHAS. P. Low, President of the Land & Improvement Co. Attest: HENRY B. BRASTOW, Secretary.' The secretary is the proper officer to affix the corporate seal, and it devolves upon the party denying the execution of the deed to prove that he had no authority to affix it. The seal itself is prima facie evidence that it was affixed by proper authority. Ang. & A. Corp. § 224; Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 543; Association v. Bustamante, 52 Cal. 192; Lighter Co. v. Simpson, 77 Cal. 286, 19 Pac. Rep. 426; Evans v. Lee, 11 Nev. 199; Lodge v. Montmollin, 58 Ga. 547; Morris v. Keil, 20 Minn. 531, (Gil. 474;) Sherman Center Town v. Swigart, (Kan.) 23 Pac. Rep. 569. Section 357 of the Civil Code provides that 'the misnomer of a corporation in any written instrument does not invalidate the instrument, if it can be reasonably ascertained from it what corporation is intended.' I think it can be reasonably ascertained from the note, and also from the mortgage, what corporation was intended. If there was any uncertainty as to whether Low and Brastow were president and secretary of the defendant corporation, or whether they were the persons authorized to execute the instruments, such uncertainty was removed by the pleading and evidence. The foregoing also applies to the certificate of acknowledgment which describes Low and Brastow as known to the notary 'to be the president and secretary of the Santa Barbara Land & Improvement Company, the corporation who executed the foregoing instrument.' As above stated, it appears upon the face of the mortgage with reasonable certainty that it was executed by the corporation defendant. The mortgage was therefore entitled to record. No person reading the mortgage and certificate of acknowledgment together could be mistaken as to what corporation executed the mortgage.

"5. The mortgage of the defendant Martha S. Barker is subsequent and subject to those of the plaintiff, and the court found, upon sufficient evidence to sustain the finding, that at the time she took her mortgage she had both constructive and actual notice of the mortgage to Gorham & Co., and of all the facts in relation thereto. Besides, her mortgage is subject to all objections founded upon section 11, art. 12, of the constitution of the state, and the by-law of the corporation, urged against the mortgages to Gorham & Co. Therefore the court did not err in adjudging her mortgage to be subsequent and subject to those of the plaintiff. The foregoing views of the case render all other points made by appellants immaterial. I think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed."

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent.

HARRISON, J. I dissent from the views expressed in the second proposition discussed in the foregoing opinion, and from the judgment of affirmance.

SCHULTZ et al. v. McLEAN et al. (No. 13, 991.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 9, 1892.)

EQUITY—RESCISSION OF DEED—FRAUD OF AGENT.

1. A land-owner placed the title to his land in the hands of an agent, so that the latter might raise money to save the land from foreclosure. The agent reported to the owner that one M. would advance the money on certain terms, and the owner instructed him to accept M.'s proposition. Subsequently the agent reported that he had accepted the proposition, and that he had M.'s agreement as to terms in his possession. The owner, relying on such representations, handed his deed to the agent, with the understanding that the agent should deliver it to M., and that M. would hold the land under the terms mentioned in the agreement. It appeared, however, that M. had never entered into any such agreement, and that when he advanced the money he supposed he was taking a perfect title. Held, in a suit by the owner against M. for rescission, that as both parties were innocent, and the fraud had been practiced by the agent of the former, the relief prayed for would not be granted.

2. The fact that an agent is guilty of fraud, under Civil Code, § 1572, in making a promise which he has no intention of performing, and which he makes merely for the purpose of inducing a third person to execute a conveyance of land, does not render his principal guilty of fraud, if he accepts the conveyance without any knowledge of the contemplated fraud; and the grantor, therefore, is not entitled to a rescission, but only to the enforcement of the promise. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; JAMES F. BREEN, Judge.

Action by George Schultz and Henry

Von Bargen against George D. McLean and others to obtain a rescission of a conveyance of real estate. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

T. M. Osmont, (D. M. Delmas Wm. F. Herrin, and H. L. Gear, of counsel,) for appellants. Mr. Haggin and Van Ness & Dioble, (E. W. McKinstry, John J. Roche, Graves, Turner & Graves, James A. Waymire, and Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, of counsel,) for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. In addition to the facts of this case, disclosed by the findings hereinafter recited, it is proper to add that the plaintiffs, George Schultz and Henry Von Bargen, were the owners of a large tract of land in the county of San Luis Obispo, of the value of $45,000, which was mortgaged to one J. B. Haggin for about $26,000, who had obtained a decree of foreclosure, and was threatening to sell the land thereunder. Plaintiffs were clients of the law firm of Robinson, Olney & Byrne; and C. P. Robinson, a member of the firm, informed plaintiffs that he had a person in view who would advance the necessary money to save the property from sale under the judgment of foreclosure, but that such person would deal only with him, (Robinson,) and that for that reason it was necessary, for the purposes of the negotiation, to put the title to this land in his name. The plaintiffs, having implicit confidence in Robinson, caused the title, which was then standing in the name of one Louis Schultz, to be transferred to him, for the purpose of raising money to preserve the property. The person whom Robinson had in view was the defendant McLean, and Robinson assured plaintiffs that McLean would make the arrangement which will be found set out in finding No. 6. Plaintiffs and defendant McLean had no dealings, personally, pertaining to the transaction; but Robinson was the medium through which the entire matter was consummated. McLean insists that he was to have a perfect title to the property upon the satisfaction of the Haggin judgment, which he satisfied; and Schultz and Von Bargen insist that he took the property under the trust set out in finding No. 6. The conveyance to McLean was a bargain and sale deed, absolute in form, and signed by Schultz, Von Bargen, and Robinson. The foregoing facts are conceded by the record, and, in connection with the following findings of fact by the court, afford a sufficient history of the matters involved in this litigation. The findings which we deem necessary to consider are:

"(1) At all times named in the complaint the defendant C. P. Robinson was an attorney and counselor at law, admitted to practice in all the courts of this state, and practicing law in the city and county of San Francisco, in partnership with Warren Olney and J. K. Byrne, under the firm name and style of Robinson, Olney & Byrne. At all times from and including October, 1881, to and including March 8, 1884, plaintiffs were the clients of said firm of Robinson, Olney & Byrne, and employed said firm in their (plaintiffs') general business, and particularly to defend and protect their interests in the foreclosure suit referred to in the sixth finding herein, and for the purpose of obtaining advances of money upon the lands involved in said foreclosure suit, sufficient to pay the amounts due the plaintiff in said foreclosure suit, and thus to prevent the said mortgaged lands from being sold under said foreclosure proceedings, and lost to plaintiffs.

"(2) At all the times named in the complaint the defendant McLean was a client of the said law firm of Robinson, Olney & Byrne; and the said defendant Robinson, with the consent and approval of defendant McLean, acted for and on behalf of said McLean, and as his agent, in and about the transfer of the lands, as hereinafter stated by plaintiffs, to defendant McLean.

"(3) On or about June 12, 1882, the defendant C. P. Robinson represented to plaintiffs that a friend of his, whose name was not then disclosed, would loan and advance to the plaintiffs, upon the security of the said lands, the amount due as above stated to said Haggin; and the said Robinson stated that his said friend would not deal directly with the plaintiffs, or with any person other than the said Robinson, and that for this reason it was necessary to have the legal title to said lands vested in him, the said Robinson.

"(4) Plaintiffs fully relied upon the truth of the representations of said Robinson, and his honesty and fidelity, and, by reason of their said trust and reliance, procured the said Louis Schultz to make a conveyance of the legal title to all of the said lands held in trust, as aforesaid, by him, to said defendant C. P. Robinson.

"(5) And the said Robinson took the legal title in trust for the said plaintiffs, for the purpose of obtaining the said amount of money.

"(6) On or about July 16, 1883, the defendant C. P. Robinson represented to the plaintiffs that the defendant McLean would advance to the plaintiffs the amount due to said Haggin, to-wit, the sum of $25,906.77, and would also advance and lend to the plaintiffs the further sum of $5,000, and would take and hold the legal title to said lands as security for the said loans and advances. That said McLean would, after paying the claim of said Haggin and making said advance of $5,000, sell said land for a price satisfactory to plaintiffs and said McLean, and would, with the consent and under the control and supervision of plaintiffs, sell said land, and after deducting from this amount so realized from the sale the money advanced to pay the Haggin claim, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, should pay to the plaintiffs one-half of the remainder of the proceeds of said sale, less the sum of $5,000, to be advanced as aforesaid, without interest; and as a compensation for said payment, and as a compensation for advancing said sum of $5,000 in addition to said $25,906.77, would retain the other half of said remainder to the use and profit of him, said McLean. The plaintiffs fully relied upon the said representations, and trusted therein and in the integrity of said Robinson, and accepted the said proposal in good faith, and consented to enter into said agreement.

"(7) About July 16, 1883, the said defendant Robinson, and the plaintiffs, acting under the advice and instructions of the defendant Robinson, and in pursuance of said arrangement, conveyed to said defendant McLean all of the lands described in the fourth finding, and said defendant McLean, on said last-named day, entered into possession of said premises, and has ever since continuously remained in the exclusive possession thereof, and appropriated to his own use all the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and, since said entry, said defendant McLean has made other expenditures for the care and benefit of said lands, the exact amount of which has not been ascertained, nor is, nor has ever, the amount been known to plaintiffs.

"(8) The defendant McLean was advised and fully informed as to the fact that the defendant Robinson held the legal title to said lands solely in trust for the use and benefit of the plaintiffs. But he was not informed and did not know the exact nature and character of the said trust, and during all the negotiations between Robinson and himself relating to the transfer of said lands he did not learn, nor did he seek to ascertain, by personal inquiry or otherwise, what was the particular character and nature of defendant Robinson's said trust. On the contrary, said defendant McLean absented himself from the office of Olney, Robinson & Byrne whenever negotiations were pending between said plaintiffs and Robinson relating to said transfer, and purposely avoided, during the pendency of said negotiations, all personal meetings and interviews with the plaintiffs, or either of them, lest he should become informed as to the true nature and character of the said Robinson's trust with the plaintiffs.

"(9) Defendant McLean was not informed and did not know of the representations made by defendant Robinson to the plaintiffs in respect to the advances which said McLean was represented by said Robinson as being willing to make, as set out in the tenth finding herein, [the sixth finding here.] Nor were the representations, as set out in said tenth finding, ever made by said McLean to Robinson, or by him (McLean) authorized to be made by said Robinson to the plaintiffs; but each and every one of said representations was made without the knowledge, consent, approval, sanction, or authority of said McLean.

"(10) Defendant McLean was willing and anxious to purchase said lands absolutely, and pay therefor a price equal in amount to the claims held by said Haggin against it. But he was not willing and never intended to deal with the said lands in any other way except as an absolute purchaser thereof; and for the purpose of avoiding any notice of said Robinson's trust, and the equities of plaintiffs in said lands, defendant McLean refused to have any meeting or interview with plaintiffs, or either of them; and the said defendant Robinson never communicated to defendant McLean the fact that plaintiffs were not willing to make an absolute conveyance of said lands, but were willing to convey the same only upon the trust, terms, and conditions as set out in the said tenth finding herein.

"(11) All of the said representations and promises made by the defendant Robinson to the plaintiffs in respect to the terms and conditions upon which the defendant McLean was willing to take the title to said lands were false and fraudulent, and made for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the plaintiffs, and depriving them of said lands. And all of said promises were made by said Robinson without any idea or intention that either of said defendants would comply with any of them. On the contrary, said Robinson intended that, after obtaining said conveyance, the said McLean would, after discharging the said liens upon said lands, hold and claim the same absolutely, and repudiate and deny all claims and equities of the plaintiffs in and to the same, or any part thereof; but such intention and design were by the said Robinson, during all the said negotiations, carefully suppressed, concealed, and kept from the knowledge of plaintiffs. And the said McLean intended, during all of said time after having obtained the title to said lands, to hold and claim the same absolutely, and deny all claims and equities of the plaintiffs in and to the same, or any part thereof."

Whatever may be said about the nature of this action, measured by the pleadings, findings, and judgment, the learned counsel upon both sides have practically agreed that it is a suit in equity, seeking to rescind a transfer and conveyance of real estate upon the ground of fraud, and as such we shall treat it. The judgment of the lower court decreed that plaintiffs were the owners of the land involved in this litigation, and that McLean held the legal title to said lands in trust for plaintiffs as security for money due and owing to him. It was further adjudged and decreed that plaintiffs might redeem the land from McLean by paying him the amount due and owing, with legal interest, etc., and that thereupon McLean should transfer the property to plaintiffs by a good and sufficient conveyance. Defendant McLean is now before this court, asking for a reversal of the judgment, and the order denying his motion for a new trial. The fraud upon which plaintiffs relied to rescind the transfer to McLean arises from the representations and promises made by Robinson, set out in detail in finding No. 6; and the fraud, as alleged by plaintiffs' complaint, consists in this: "That all of said representations and promises were false and fraudulent, and made for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the plaintiffs, and depriving them of said lands, and all of said promises were made without any intention of performance upon the part of the defendant McLean, and were made by the said Robinson without any intention of performance; but, on the contrary, said Robinson intended, and the said McLean intended, that, after executing and obtaining the said conveyance to the defendant McLean, the said McLean, after discharging the lien upon said lands held as aforesaid by the said Haggin, should hold and claim the said lands absolutely, and repudiate and deny all claims and equities of the plaintiffs of or in or to the same, or any part thereof." That portion of findings Nos. 8 and 10 wherein the court finds that, "for the purpose of avoiding any notice of Robinson's trust and the equities of said plaintiffs in said land, defendant McLean refused to have any meeting or interview with plaintiffs, or either of them," is not supported by the evidence; but the matter is not sufficiently material to justify a reversal of the judgment. That portion of finding 2 wherein it is found that "defendant Robinson, with the consent and approval of defendant McLean, acted for and on behalf of said McLean, and as his agent, in and about the transfer of the lands, as hereinafter stated," has but little support in the evidence; and that support is barely sufficient to maintain a restricted and limited agency. If a general and unlimited agency had been found by the court, or if counsel for respondents should insist that the finding of the trial court in this regard was a finding of agency in its broadest sense, and the final result of this important litigation depended alone upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support such finding, we would have no hesitation in declaring that the finding had not sufficient support in the evidence. If finding 2 is to be taken in its broadest sense,—that is, if it be construed that Robinson was the agent of McLean throughout the entire transaction pertaining to the transfer of this tract of land,—then the finding is directly in conflict with findings Nos. 9 and 10, and the judgment should be reversed, necessarily, for that reason. If Robinson was the agent of McLean from the inception to the termination of this transaction, then finding No. 9, wherein it is said, "nor were the representations, as set out in said tenth finding [the sixth finding here] ever made by said McLean to Robinson, or by him (McLean) authorized to be made by said Robinson to the plaintiffs, but each and every one of said representations was made without the knowledge, consent, approval, sanction, or authority of said McLean," is absolutely inconsistent with and contradictory to the existence of such fact. A finding of general agency, when taken in connection with the finding pertaining to the making of the representations by Robinson, would also be entirely inconsistent with and contradictory to that portion of finding No. 10 wherein it is said: "But he (McLean) was not willing and never intended to deal with the said lands in any other way, except as an absolute purchaser thereof." For the foregoing reasons, finding 2 can only stand as a finding of a limited and restricted agency for certain special purposes; and only as such would it have support in the evidence, and also only would it be in harmony with the findings already quoted. In Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 606, 14 Pac. Rep. 379, it was said: "We do not think the court should strain the language of a finding to make out a case of conflict. The findings should be reconciled, if it can reasonably be done, and be so construed ut res magis valeat, quam pereat." And upon this well-settled principle, that some effect should be given to each and every finding wherever possible, this finding will be allowed to stand as the finding of a special and limited agency. It is not necessary to determine the exact scope and limits of such agency. It is sufficient for present purposes to know that findings 9 and 10 expressly place the matters therein considered without the limits of such agency.

During the entire pendency of this transaction, down to and including the satisfaction of the Haggin judgment and the delivery of the title-deeds to McLean, the two principals to the contract, Schultz and McLean, exchanged no word, by voice or pen, as to its nature or terms, although both knew that negotiations were in progress, and opportunities were not lacking for consultation. Having determined that, to some extent, Robinson was the agent of McLean, it necessarily follows that in all those particulars where he was such agent he acted in the peculiar and dual capacity of agent for both parties; for there is no question, from the evidence, but that from the time the title was vested in Robinson by plaintiffs, through every step of the proceedings down to and including the delivery of the deed by plaintiffs to him to be delivered to McLean, he (Robinson) was the trusted, acting attorney and agent of plaintiffs. The fraud in this case rests upon the representations made by Robinson, as set out in finding 6. The court has found that they were false, and that Robinson knew that they were false, at the time they were made. When the question is solved as to the position Robinson occupied when he made these representations, and in what capacity he made them, the question is solved as to where the responsibility rests, and where the loss must fall, if loss has resulted. If Robinson was the actual agent of either plaintiffs or defendant in this transaction,—and, as we have seen, he was the agent of both,—and as agent of his principal made the representations to such principal that are set out in finding 6, then such principal must suffer the loss, as against an innocent third party. And, in this case, if it is entirely apparent from the findings and the evidence that, in making these representations, Robinson was acting as the agent of plaintiffs, and that by means of such representations plaintiffs parted with their title to the land, then all question as to the ostensible agency of Robinson for McLean, or as to McLean's subsequent ratification of Robinson's acts by accepting the fruits thereof, have melted away, and forever disappeared from the case. There is no direct finding as to the position Robinson occupied in making to plaintiffs the representations set out in finding 6. The finding of the court is express that he was not McLean's agent in making them; and there is no finding that he so claimed to Schultz, or that Schultz ever thought he was such agent. Indeed, the evidence would not support such a finding, if it existed. While the findings are silent in this respect, the evidence of the plaintiff Schultz clearly and conclusively shows that, in making these representations, Robinson was acting as the agent of plaintiffs, and that plaintiffs so understood the fact. The testimony of the plaintiff Schultz in this regard is as follows:

"McLean was going to pay the Haggin judgment, and give us $5,000, without interest, and he was to let us have the say about the selling of the land. We were to divide the profits,—the net profits. These statements were made at the time this deed was delivered. Robinson told me that he had a written agreement in his safe. This conversation took place in Robinson's office, in San Francisco. I then delivered Robinson the deed. I said to Robinson, 'You take all the necessary papers;' and he said: 'Of course, I will look out for that. I will look out for your interests. They will be all settled all right.' I asked him, of course, if he did not have all the necessary papers drawn,—the agreement from McLean about the lands,—the bargain we had made with Robinson. He said he would look out for that; that everything was all right and straight. I took these papers from Haggin to Robinson,—the agreement which Haggin gave to Sharp that gave us a certain time to redeem, if we gave him a deed for the land. I had several conversations with Robinson before that,—about the lands, principally, and the way I was getting along. * * * Robinson said that I should not sign any agreement like that; that it would debar us from collecting any money from Haggin; and a few days afterwards he said that he had a man who would pay off the Haggin indebtedness. He didn't say at that time what that man would do after paying off that indebtedness. About that time I concluded to transfer our business from Sharp & Sharp to Robinson. From that time (March or April, 1882) down to the termination of the Haggin business, Robinson, Olney & Byrne done our business for us. Robinson did the business. In one of my interviews with Robinson, held in March or April, 1882, he told me he had a friend who would advance the money necessary to take up the Haggin mortgage,—said he had a man. He said he had a friend who would pay the Haggin mortgage and carry the land. He advised me not to accept Haggin's proposition, and gave me as a reason that I would have no remedy against Haggin for damages; and a few days afterwards he told me he had a friend who would pay the mortgage of Haggin, and carry the land. I adopted Robinson's advice in regard to that proposition, and declined Haggin's proposal. Robinson did not tell me at that time who his friend was, but did tell me subsequently. Told me it was George D. McLean. Said that McLean was the man he was referring to. The first time Robinson stated to me he had a friend who would carry the land was about two months or six weeks before the conveyance from Louis Schultz to Robinson. In reference to making that conveyance, Robinson said his friend would deal only directly with him, and I had better put the lands in his name, and make a deed to them. There was a little hitch in getting Louis Schultz to make the conveyance to Robinson. Louis Schultz required an order to be procured. Robinson told me Louis Schultz had refused to convey the property to him without an order. Robinson made out an order for me to sign. I signed the written order by the name of Schultz and Von Bargen, and Louis Schultz would not convey the land on that order, but wanted my partner's signature and mine separate. Then I signed it, and procured my partner's signature, and gave the order to Robinson. He made out the deed from Louis Schultz to him, and Louis Schultz executed it. A deed was subsequently made by the plaintiffs to Robinson for the same lands, and also an additional thousand acres. Question. What were the terms and conditions under which the property was transferred to Robinson, and what was the agreement or understanding between you and Robinson in that matter? Answer. Simply to raise money on the property, and not to sell it. He told me he had a man who would hold the property, and carry it and pay the mortgage, and that we would have the say as to what time it would be sold, and the man was going to advance us $5,000 without interest. Q. Was this arrangement made with Robinson at the time the first deed was made to him? A. It was made before the first deed was made. $5,000 was not stipulated at that time, but besaid a friend of his would advance sufficient to pay the Haggin mortgage; and the bargain for the $5,000 was made at the time he came from San Luis Obispo. At the time Robinson made those statements to me about his friend carrying the land and advancing $5,000, I relied implicitly upon his statements and integrity. At that time I did not suspect that either his friend or himself was not dealing fairly with me. Had no suspicions whatever. If I had had any suspicions that any of his statements were not true, I certainly would not have made those conveyances. The time when Robinson told me his friend would make the bargain referred to was right before they went to San Luis Obispo. Before I delivered the deed to Robinson, on the 2d of July, 1883, which was delivered by him in Haggin's office on the 16th of July, I asked Robinson if he had any agreement to the effect that I spoke of,—that he was going to pay off the Haggin mortgage and give us $5,000,—and he said he had it all straight in his safe before I delivered him the deed in July,—somewhere in the latter part of June or July. I had never heard anything derogatory to the character of McLean. Robinson said McLean was an honest man, and would live up to his bargain, and I supposed so. I had all the confidence in the world in Robinson at that time."

Cross-Examination: "Robinson told me the written agreement with McLean was in his safe, in his office. The safe was in Byrne's room, in the office of Robinson, Olney & Byrne. Each of the firm had a separate room. Byrne's room was just next door from Robinson's; the door opening into it. Think Robinson also had a smaller safe in his room. Robinson said he had the agreement in that safe, and pointed to Byrne's room, as I understood it. I have stated fully the conversation between Robinson and me in reference to the agreement, as near as I can. On the former trial of this case, I testified that I agreed to give a deed in consideration that Robinson would get the agreement from McLean; that I asked Robinson, before I delivered him the deed, whether he had the written agreement from McLean, and that I certainly would not have delivered him the deed unless he told me he had the agreement; that, if McLean would not give any agreement, I certainly would not have delivered the deed; that I wished it understood that if Robinson had not told me, on the 2d of July, that he had the agreement from McLean, in writing, I would not have signed the deed,—not delivered it. That was my testimony on the former trial. Question. Did you testify on the former trial as follows: 'When the bargain was made, Robinson said he would fix that all right for me. I told him we had to have a written agreement, and he said he would get the agreement, and I asked him before I delivered him the deed if he had the agreement.' Did you so testify? Answer. Yes, sir. Q. Did you further testify as follows: 'I said, "Robinson, have you the agreement from McLean?" And he said, "Yes, sir." And I handed him the deed?' A. That was my testimony, and it is true. Q. Was there any other time prior to that that he told you he had a written agreement from McLean? A. He told me that he was going to procure it. That was the bargain. I did so testify on the former trial, and it is true. Robinson told me that he had the release or satisfaction of the mortgage. I didn't see it. I trusted him implicitly, as my attorney, in everything. On the former trial, I testified that it was a few days before the commencement of the action that I discovered that McLean repudiated the contract. I testified that I sent McDonald after McLean when he came to town, and he clearly repudiated, and that was just before the commencement of this action. Q. Did you say on that trial that Robinson was authorized to act for you in that matter? A. Certainly. He was my attorney. He was authorized to act,—to raise money. Q. Did Robinson use the name of McLean to you at any time? A. Yes, sir. Q. How did it come that you didn't speak to McLean yourself? A. Because I didn't want to interfere. Robinson acted as my lawyer. Q. Did you so testify? Witness. I guess so. Q. Is that the reason why you didn't speak to McLean when you went to Robinson's office? A. Yes, sir. During these negotiations, I may have met McLean fifteen or twenty times, but I didn't speak to him about this matter. Q. Why do you say you didn't speak to him about this matter? A. Because Mr. Robinson was my attorney, and acted for me in this matter. Byrne and Robinson were my attorneys. Q. Robinson was acting for you, and, because you had put the matter in his hands to act for you, you wanted him to carry it through, and did not want to interfere with him by talking yourself with McLean. Was that it? A. Yes, sir. Q. You trusted the whole matter to him? A. Yes, sir; I trusted everything to Robinson. I knew that a deed was of no value until delivered; that it would be of no value to McLean until delivered to him. Q. You delivered it to Robinson to deliver it on your behalf to McLean? A. Yes, sir. Q. You instructed Robinson not to deliver that deed to McLean, he acting for you, unless he got from McLean a written acknowledgment of trust, which you say was to attach to these lands? A. That is correct. Within a day or two of the 16th of July, Robinson informed me that the transaction with McLean had been finally consummated, and the money paid to Haggin. After receiving that information, I did not see McLean."

Reduced to its lowest terms, this state of facts discloses that plaintiffs had unbounded and implicit confidence in their attorney and confidential agent, Robinson, and placed the title to this tract of land in him to enable him thereby to more readily raise the money to save the land from foreclosure sale; that, in pursuance of such agency, he reported to them that one McLean would advance the money upon certain terms and conditions. They instructed him to accept McLean's proposition. Subsequently Robinson informed them that he had accepted McLean's proposition, and then had McLean's agreement as to the terms and conditions of the trust in his safe. Believing such representations, and relying upon them, plaintiffs handed to Robinson their joint deed, including the execution thereof by said Robinson, with directions to deliver the same in their behalf to McLean, which Robinson thereupon did. These representations to plaintiffs were false, and thereby a gross fraud was perpetrated upon them. But McLean took his title, and paid his money, without notice or suspicion that such fraud was committed, and in the firm and honest belief that he was getting a perfect legal title to this tract of land. It is these fraudulent representations that give life to plaintiffs' cause of action; and if Robinson, in making them, was the actual agent of plaintiffs, then, as previously suggested, all questions as to the ostensible agency of Robinson for McLean, or subsequent ratification of those representations by McLean, have disappeared from the case, and thus the link connecting McLean with the cause of action no longer exists; for, whatever may have been the fraudulent representations of Robinson to plaintiffs, they, being made by an agent to his principal, gave no equity against McLean, an innocent vendee for a valuable consideration. Occupying such a position, McLean is proof against an attack from plaintiffs based upon the fraud of Robinson. The rule is fundamental and inflexible that a court of equity will not allow a vendee, in good faith and for value, and without notice, to be thus assailed. McLean stands before a court of equity without taint of fraud,—entirely innocent; and over such a one equity has no jurisdiction. "A court of equity acts only on the conscience of the party; and, if he has done nothing that taints it, no demand can attach upon it, so as to give jurisdiction." Sugd. Vend. § 722. In Somes v. Brewer, 2 Pick. 201, it was said by PARKER, C. J.: "It is a general and just rule that, when a loss has happened which must fall on one of two innocent persons, it shall be borne by him who is the occasion of the loss, even without any positive fault committed by him, but more especially if there has been any carelessness on his part which caused or contributed to the misfortune." In Mundorff v. Wickersham, 63 Pa. St. 89, Justice SHARSWOOD said: "Where one of two innocent persons has suffered by the fraud or negligence of the third, whichever of the two has accredited him ought to bear the loss." This principle is recognized by section 3543 of the Civil Code, which reads: "Where one of two innocent persons suffers by the act of a third, the one by whose negligence it happened must be the sufferer." In Compton v. Bank, 96 Ill. 306, the court said: "Even then, if appellant was induced by false representations of her husband and brother to execute the deed, since those representations were neither induced by nor made of the knowledge of those representing the bank, the bank cannot be affected by them." Somes v. Brewer, 2 Pick. 190; Spurgin v. Traub, 65 Ill. 175; White v. Graves, 107 Mass. 327; Mars-ton v. Brittenham, 76 Ill. 617; Fisher v. Boody, 1 Curt. 206; Cornell v. Masten, 35 Barb. 161, 162; Andrews v. Solomon, Pet. C. C. 362.

In this case, plaintiffs and defendant were both innocent. Neither knew that the fraud was being practiced, but if that fraud is productive of injury the injury must result to the plaintiffs for they placed it in the power of the wrong-doer to perpetrate the fraud. The vendee will not be compelled by a court of equity to lose the benefit of a bargain obtained in all fairness and honesty because of a fraud practiced upon the vendors by their own agents. Under such circumstances, they must bear the consequences, for the loss is chargeable to the trust reposed in their agent; in this case, a trust so complete and entire as to cause them to disregard the dictates of ordinary prudence. If the rule of law required that negligence should be charged against the plaintiffs in order to defeat their recovery in this action, which is not the fact, then such negligence of plaintiffs is clearly established. They apparently closed their eyes, and trusted all to their agent. They placed their deed to this valuable property in the hands of Robinson, with instructions to deliver it forthwith to McLean, upon the bare representations of Robinson that the agreement from McLean containing the conditions of the trust was in the safe in an adjoining room. The instrument, according to Robinson's statement, was at hand, and the simplest rules of business knowledge required an inspection of it; and the neglect so to do, under any aspect of the matter, was such negligence as to cast upon the plaintiffs all burdens flowing therefrom, as against an innocent vendee. The rule of law that a grantor cannot question his own conveyance upon the ground that a third party practiced a fraud upon him, not known to or participated in by the grantee, is well settled in this state; and the rule, certainly, would apply with equal force when the fraud was practiced by the agent of the grantor. Salter v. Baker, 54 Cal. 140; Stewart v. Whitlock, 58 Cal. 2; Arnaz v. Escandon, 59 Cal. 489; Overacre v. Blake, 82 Cal. 81, 22 Pac. Rep. 979.

Conceding the facts of this case as counsel for plaintiffs claim them to be, under the evidence and the findings, still they would not entitle the plaintiffs to a decree rescinding the conveyance, and restoring the parties to their original condition. If Robinson had been the duly-authorized agent of McLean in making these representations, there certainly would be no ground for rescission. If Robinson was not in fact McLean's agent in making the representations, but assumed so to act, and McLean ratified such assumption of agency by accepting the fruits of the agreement, such conduct upon his part is no evidence of fraud, but rather to be commended, and places him exactly as if he were an original party to the contract. If McLean ratified the acts of his agent, he has done all that honesty and fair dealing demand. To say the ratification by the principal of the unauthorized acts of his agent is a fraud of the principal, as against the party relying upon the agent's acts and representations, is an anomaly in law. Such a case is not found in the books. Defendant has committed no fraud upon plaintiffs, and plaintiffs have suffered no loss by reason of any fraud. If McLean is bound under the terms of the Robinson agreement, as is insisted, then that agreement is in full life, and plaintiffs are entitled to and can secure all the fruits of it that were anticipated at the time of its creation. The failure to advance the sum of $5,000, as agreed, affords no ground of rescission. Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 134, 20 Pac. Rep. 382. It affords no more ground for rescission than would a repudiation of the trust by McLean 10 years later, by a refusal on his part to sell the land and divide the moneys in accordance with the terms of the trust agreement. "Courts of equity do not punish parties for their wrongs in the administration of trusts, but only furnish adequate means of redress." Perrin v. Lepper, (Mich.) 40 N. W. Rep. 905. To rescind the transaction upon the ground of fraud would place the plaintiffs in a much better position than they would have been, under the contract they allege, if there had been no fraud; and such a result is discountenanced by the plainest principles of equity. The charge of fraud against the defendant is based upon the fact that the promise made by Robinson to Schultz and Von Bargen, and which formed the consideration for the conveyance, was a promise made without any intention of performing it. Civil Code, § 1572. McLean knew nothing of this secret intention of his agent, for the court expressly finds that he knew nothing of the promise. Plaintiffs knew nothing of this secret intention, for the court finds that Robinson carefully concealed it from them. Counsel contend that McLean, by accepting the fruits of the agreement, has ratified the agency of Robinson, and by so doing has ratified Robinson's secret intention; that is, having received the benefits, he has adopted all the means whereby the benefits were obtained. But the secret, unsuspected intentions of Robinson were no part of the means by which the fruits of the contract passed to McLean. How could such intentions be a moving cause in formulating the action of plaintiffs' minds, when they knew nothing of them? The promises made by Robinson, and relied upon by Schultz, were the instrumentalities or means which brought consent to Schultz's mind. There can be no ratification of an authority which the agent did not assume to possess, and which the other party did not believe or suspect him to possess. It would be an absurdity to say that defendant ratified the agreement by entering under it, and at the same time had no intention of performing it. In other words, if he accepts the fruits of the contract, he is not entitled to the fruits of the contract, for he is thereby guilty of fraud in ratifying an agent's secret fraudulent intentions. It is perfectly apparent that plaintiffs' remedy, upon their own theory of the case,—viz., a subsequent ratification of Robinson's agreement by McLean,—is to seek an enforcement of the trusts and conditions which were stipulated by Robinson's agreement. More than that they cannot claim. As to such remedy, it is sufficient to say the complaint does not justify the relief; and, secondly, the views which we entertain from the evidence quoted absolutely prevent the granting of such relief on this appeal, even if the pleading was sufficient. We see no other error in the record. Let the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded.

WE CONCUR. MCFARLAND, J.; PATERSON, J. SHARPSTEIN, J.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. There is but slight and extremely unsatisfactory evidence the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding of the court below that Robinson acted as the agent of McLean in and about the transfer of the lands in controversy. Upon the other points discussed by him, I concur in the opinion of Chief Justice BEATTY. I think, if the finding as to Robinson's agency was supported by the evidence, the plaintiffs would be entitled to maintain this action.

BEATTY, C. J. I dissent. There is but slight and extremely unsatisfactory evidence to support the finding that Robinson acted as agent of McLean in and about the transfer of the lands in controversy; but it is impossible to say that said finding is totally without support in the evidence, and therefore the fact must be accepted as found, for the purposes of this appeal. This being assumed, the construction of the findings as a whole seems to me to present no difficulty. They mean that Robinson had an actual precedent authority from McLean to act for him in his interest in procuring the transfer, but that he had no actual authority to deal with Schultz and Von Barga upon any other terms than an absolute sale and conveyance in consideration of the payment of the amount of the Haggin judgment; that Robinson, in order to induce plaintiffs to execute and deliver their deed of conveyance, made the unauthorized representations as found. It is, of course, clear, from the evidence of Schultz, that Robinson never assumed to be the agent of McLean in any of the negotiations preceding the transfer, but, on the contrary, acted ostensibly as the agent of the plaintiffs, and was so regarded by them. The court has found, however, upon evidence which, as I have said, appears extremely weak and unsatisfactory, but is yet sufficient in law to sustain the finding, that Robinson, while assuming to act for the vendors, was in fact acting for the vendee, and while so acting made the representations upon which they were induced to execute and deliver the deed which they were seeking to set aside. If so, the vendee cannot take and hold the benefit of the deed without being bound by all the consequences of the representations by which the plaintiffs were induced to make it. When he was informed of the conditions upon which the conveyance was made, and the representations of his agent, it may be conceded that he had the option either to keep the land on the conditions of the transfer or to rescind the whole transaction; but since he chose to deny the agency and repudiate the representations, claiming to be the absolute owner of the land, freed of all conditions, it seems to me he made his election to stand upon that ground, and necessarily put the plaintiffs to their action to enforce the only right they had,—that of rescission,—for they had no option. They could not compel McLean to keep the land upon the terms to which he had never consented. They could not compel him to advance $5,000, which he had never consented to advance, and to sell the land and divide the net profits. They could only claim to be restored to their original position; and this, I think, they could claim, on the facts found. In other words, I think they pursued their proper and only remedy in both the original and amended complaints, asking the only relief to which they were entitled. I concur in the conclusions of the court that the second amended complaint did not change the cause of action; that the statute of limitations is not a defense; that no formal tender of repayment of the purchase money was necessary before commencing the suit. I think the superior court erred in admitting secondary evidence of the Haggin proposal; but whether the error was of sufficient consequence to justify a new trial it is unnecessary, in this dissenting opinion, to discuss. Aside from the effect of this one error, I think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an appeal by plaintiffs from that portion of the judgment rendered in the above-entitled cause wherein it is ordered that appellants shall pay respondent, McLean, interest on the amount due as in said decree determined. In the appeal in this case by the defendant, McLean, from the entire judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, which appeal is numbered 13,991, this court has filed its decision, of even date herein, reversing the judgment and order denying a new trial, and remanding the cause. 28 Pac. WELCH v. MOHR. (No. 12,710.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 10, 1892.)

APPEAL—CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover damages for the loss of a horse alleged to have been driven beyond the place to which defendant had promised to drive it, where it appears that the minds of the parties did not meet as to any particular place to which the horse was to be driven, and the evidence on that point was substantially conflicting, a verdict for defendant will not be disturbed on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department
2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; F. E. SPENCER, Judge.

Action by Patrick Welch against Emil Mohr to recover damages for the loss of a horse. Verdict and judgment for defendant. From the judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. H. Laine, for appellant. W. B. Hardy, for respondent.

FITZGERALD, C. This action was brought to recover damages for the loss of a horse, hired by plaintiff to the defendant, and alleged to have been driven by him several miles beyond the place to which he had promised to go; and while being so driven by the defendant the horse died.
The defendant answered by a general denial. The case was tried by a jury, resulting in a verdict and judgment for defendant for costs. The case comes here by appeal from the judgment and the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial.

The only question presented for decision by this appeal is whether the horse and buggy were let to the defendant by plaintiff to be driven to a specified place, viz., Mountain View and return. If so, and the horse was driven to a point several miles beyond that place, such driving was in violation of the bailment, and an unlawful conversion, and defendant's failure to return the horse would entitle the plaintiff to recover the value thereof in damages. It is claimed by appellant, who, it appears, was a livery-man having horses and vehicles to let for hire, that the letting was to drive the horse to Mountain View and return, and no further; and that, in violation of the terms of the contract, defendant purposely drove to a point five or six miles beyond that place, and on the return drive the horse died, and was never returned to plaintiff or paid for. It is clear from the evidence that the minds of the parties did not meet as to any particular place to which the horse was to be driven, and as the evidence on that point, which is the only one involved in this appeal, is substantially conflicting, the verdict, under the well-established rule of this court, will not be disturbed. It therefore follows that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WILSON et al (No. 20,850.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 12, 1892.)

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION—COMMITMENT.

Pen. Code, § 872, provides that if, on a preliminary examination, it appears that a public offense has been committed, and there is sufficient cause to believe defendant guilty thereof, the magistrate must make or indorse on the depositions taken on such examination an order to that effect, and that defendant be held to answer to the same. Held, that the order must be in writing, signed by the judge, and an oral order, reduced to writing by the reporter, is not a compliance with the statute.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco. J. McM. SHAFER, Judge.

Prosecution against Wilson and Crowley for burglary. From a judgment on conviction, and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Carroll Cook, for appellants. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

DE HAVEN, J. The defendants were charged by information with the crime of burglary, and appeal from a judgment of conviction and an order denying their motion for a new trial.

Upon their arraignment the defendants moved to set aside the information, upon the ground that they had not been legally committed by a magistrate. The motion was denied, and the exception of the defendants to this ruling is presented in a bill of exceptions, from which it affirmatively appears that defendants were examined before a magistrate upon a complaint charging them with the crime of burglary; but no order holding them to answer was ever indorsed by the magistrate upon the complaint or upon the depositions of the witnesses who testified upon such examination. The transcript of the reporter's notes of the testimony given upon the preliminary examination was also introduced in evidence, in which is embodied the following statement of the proceedings had upon the conclusion of the evidence: "Mr. Dunne: That is all. That is the case for the people. Mr. Cook: The case is submitted. The Court: It is ordered that the defendants be held to answer the charge that is preferred against them before the superior court of this city and county, and that their bail be fixed in the sum of $4,000 each." This is followed by the certificate of the reporter to the effect that what preceded it was a correct transcript of the testimony and of the proceedings in the case. This was all the evidence which the court had before it upon the hearing of the motion to set aside the information, and it was not sufficient to show that the defendants were ever legally committed, prior to the filing of the information. Section 872 of the Penal Code provides that if, upon the preliminary examination of a defendant charged with crime, it appears that a public offense has been committed, and there is sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof, "the magistrate must make or indorse on the deposition" an order to that effect, and that the defendant be held to answer to the same. This statute contemplates that the order referred to shall be in writing, and signed by the magistrate. Ex parte Branigan, 19 Cal. 133. In so far as it provides that the order shall be indorsed upon the deposition, the statute may be regarded as directory, but it is essential that it should be reduced to writing, and entered either upon the official docket of the magistrate or upon the complaint or deposition. This record does not disclose anything further than that the magistrate made an oral announcement of his conclusion, which the reporter heard and reduced to writing as a part of the history of the proceedings as kept by himself; but this statement, so certified by the reporter, is in no sense an order signed by the magistrate, and cannot be regarded as a compliance with the law which makes such an order the foundation of the right to file an information against a defendant. Judgment and order reversed.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY V. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES et al. (No. 14,888.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 13, 1892.)

SUPERIOR COURT—POWER TO FURNISH ROOMS FOR HOLDING COURT.

Code Civil Proc. § 144, which provides that if suitable rooms for holding the superior courts are not provided in any county by the supervisors thereof, together with the furniture, fuel, and lights sufficient for the transaction of business, the courts, or the judge or judges thereof, may direct the sheriff to provide such rooms, etc., does not authorize the judge of a department of a superior court to anticipate the action of the county court board in completing and furnishing a room of a county court-house, designed for him, though the board are unreasonably delaying the work.

In bank. Original application for writ of prohibition by the county of Los Angeles against the superior court of Los Angeles, and W. P. WADE, judge thereof. Granted.

Jus. McLachlan, Dist. Atty., for petitioner. E. L. Campbell and Carran & Mathews, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an original proceeding in prohibition to restrain the enforcement of an order made by the respondent on November 14, 1891, as judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, in the following terms: "It appearing to the court that no suitable court-room for the holding of the sessions of this court in department 3, together with the chambers of the judge of said department, has been provided by the board of supervisors of Los Angeles county, together with the necessary furniture for the transaction of the business of this department; and it further appearing that the board of supervisors have provided certain rooms in the new court-house of said county for this department, which rooms are now in course of preparation, and almost in a condition for occupancy; and it further appearing to the court that no provision has been made by the board of supervisors for the necessary furniture of said court-room and chambers, and that some time will be consumed in preparing such furniture for said rooms in a fit and proper manner to render them available for the use of said department, beyond the time necessary to finish said court-room and chambers,—the sheriff of said county is hereby ordered and directed to provide such furniture as shall be necessary for the use of the court in the transaction of business for the court-room, judge's chambers, jury-room, reporter's room, and witness-room, lights and fuel, to be reported to the judge of this department, WM. P. WADE, Judge of Superior Court."

The only question to be decided is one of authority. Did the respondent have jurisdiction to make this particular order? Section 144 of the Code of Civil Procedure is the only provision of law from which such a power can be derived. It reads as follows: "If suitable rooms for holding the superior courts, and the chambers of the judges of said courts, be not provided in any city and county, or county, by the supervisors thereof, together with the attendants, furniture, fuel, lights, and stationery sufficient for the transaction of business, the courts, or the judge or judges thereof, may direct the sheriff of the city and county, or county, to provide such rooms, attendants, furniture, fuel, lights, and stationery; and the expenses incurred, certified by the judge or judges to be correct, shall be a charge against the city and county treasury, and paid out of the general fund thereof." The facts disclosed by the uncontradicted allegations of the petition, and by the answer of the respondent, which, for the purposes of this decision, we assume to be true in every particular, are these: At the date of the order in question the county of Los Angeles was engaged in the construction of a court-house, the third story of which was then and is still unfinished, the contractors having until February 20, 1892, to complete the same. The rooms and offices designed for the accommodation of department 3 of the superior court, of which respondent is the presiding judge, are in the unfinished part of the building. There has been unnecessary and unreasonable delay on the part of the board of supervisors in completing the building, and meantime department 3 is occupying quarters which are unwholesome, offensive, and otherwise unsuitable and insufficient. For the purposes of this decision, we assume these to be the facts, and that a case exists which would justify the respondent in making such an order as is authorized by section 144 of the Code of Civil Procedure, above quoted.

The only question which we shall consider is whether said order is in itself, and without reference to the allegations and denials of the petition and answer, such an order as section 144 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes. The recitals of the order show with sufficient clearness that the design is to anticipate the action of the board of supervisors in completing and furnishing an unfinished room in the new court-house. The completion and furnishing of this county building is a matter within the legitimate control of the board of supervisors, and it is their duty to make all necessary contracts to that end. Their right to do so, it seems to us, must necessarily be exclusive, for otherwise great confusion would result. If each of the judges of the superior court has the power, when he thinks the supervisors are unnecessarily delaying the completion and furnishing of a court-house, to take the matter out of their hands, and order the necessary work done, or the necessary furniture to be procured by the sheriff, it is easy to see what confusion would ensue. We do not think the court and judges have such power. The power conferred by section 144 is justified only by the necessity which may sometimes demand its exercise, and ought not to be enlarged by construction. All that it authorizes is an order requiring the sheriff to provide the quarters, or furniture, or lights, etc., which the court presently requires for the transaction of its business. It does not authorize the court or judge to take out of the hands of the board of supervisors the building, completion, or furnishing of a court-house, or to interfere with their contracts in that behalf. In this respect the order here in question goes beyond the statute in attempting to anticipate and preclude the action of the board of supervisors in a matter which they have in hand, and the control of which is given to them.

If, as respondent alleges, they are unreasonably delaying the completion and furnishing of his court-room, that circumstance may justify him in ordering the sheriff to procure and furnish rooms outside of the court-house, but it does not give him the right to interfere with what they are doing. When his rooms are finished and assigned to him, if found insufficiently furnished and provided, it may be that he will have the power to order the sheriff to provide such additional furniture, etc., as may be needed; but he cannot, upon the mere supposition that the board of supervisors will fail to furnish the room designed for the court promptly upon its completion, anticipate them in the performance of their duty. For these reasons we think the alternative writ of prohibition heretofore issued should be made absolute; and it is so ordered.

MALONE v. BIG FLAT GRAVEL MIN. CO. et al. (No. 13,620.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 15, 1892.)

JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT—SETTING ASIDE—PARTIES—TRANSFER OF INTEREST—SERVICE BY MAIL—APPEALABLE JUDGMENTS.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 473, provides that the court may, on such terms as may be just, relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect. Section 4 provides that the provisions of the Code shall be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects, and to promote justice. Held that, under section 385, providing that, in case of transfer of interest otherwise than by death or disability, the action may be continued "in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted," a motion to set aside a default judgment, taken after a transfer of interest, is properly made in the name of the original party.

2. A grantee is the "legal representative" of the grantor, within Code Civil Proc. § 473, providing that the court may relieve a party or his "legal representative" from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect.

3. Such grantee may appeal from an order refusing to take off a default judgment against the grantor, and an objection that there was no judgment as to the grantee, and therefore the order was not subsequent to judgment, and not appealable, is untenable.

4. Where, in an action involving a large sum of money, an amended complaint, after a demurrer has been sustained on appeal, is mailed, but not received by defendant's attorney until 30 days later, though the distance is only 400 miles, and the post-mark does not indicate that it did not come by due course of mail, and neither defendant nor his grantee receives notice of the complaint, and the attorney serves a demurrer in 10 days, a judgment by default, taken meanwhile, will be set aside under Code Civil Proc. § 473.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Del Norte county; JAMES E. MURPHY, Judge.

Action to foreclose certain laborers' liens by John Malone against Big Flat Gravel Mining Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff by default. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Atty. Gen. Hart and Aylett R. Cotton, for appellants. L. F. Cooper and Daniel Titus, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiff commenced this action to foreclose 26 laborers' liens upon certain placer mining property, situate in Del Norte county, and owned by the Big Flat Gravel Mining Company. He alleged that he was the assignee of the claims, and prayed judgment for the sum of $6,644.94, the aggregate amount thereof, and $52 paid out for recording the liens, and $600 for attorneys' fees, besides costs; and that the same be adjudged a lien upon the lands and premises described. A demurrer to the complaint was interposed and overruled, and an answer was then filed. After trial the court gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff. From that judgment an appeal was taken to this court, and on June 16, 1888, the judgment was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer, giving leave to the plaintiff to amend his complaint. 76 Cal. 578, 18 Pac. Rep. 772. On December 17, 1888, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint, in which, after setting up the several causes of action, he prayed judgment "for the sum of $6,645.94, the amount due on said liens, and the further sum of $52, the amount paid for the recording of all said liens, with legal interest on both said sums at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, from the 15th day of November, 1880; and $1,000 for counsel fees of foreclosure, and for costs of suit; and that the same be adjudged a lien upon the land and premises above described." And attached to the complaint was an affidavit, made by plaintiff's attorney, showing service of a copy thereof by mail upon defendants' attorney on the same day. This complaint was very voluminous, covering 142 pages of the printed transcript. On January 21, 1889, no demurrer or answer to the complaint having been filed, on motion of plaintiff the default of the defendants, Big Flat Gravel Mining Company and O. M. Paris, was entered by or der of the court. On January 30, 1889, a demurrer to the complaint was received by the clerk of the court from the attorney of the defendants, but he refused to file the same, on the ground that it was received after the entry of the default. Subsequently, and after giving due notice of their intention to do so, the defendants moved the court to set aside the default entered against them, upon the ground that it was taken through their mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect. At the hearing of the motion affidavits were presented and read by the moving parties, showing that W. H. H. Hart was and had been their only attorney of record; that for several years he had resided and had his office in the city of San Francisco; that on account of illness he was absent from his office, with the exception of two or three days, from December 15, 1888, to January 19, 1889; that he was in his office on January 15th, and again returned there on the 19th, and then first saw lying on his desk a package, which, on being opened, was found to contain a copy of the amended complaint in this case; that he asked his clerk when the package came, and was told that it came only two or three days before, and that this was true; that he had never seen or known of the package before he so found it on his desk; that there was nothing to indicate in what month or year the package was mailed except the figure "3," which could be seen in the post-mark, and, as it arrived on the 16th or 17th of January, both he and his clerk concluded that it must have been mailed on the 13th of that month; that on the 26th of January he prepared a demurrer to the amended complaint, and sent it by mail to the clerk of the court, and also sent a copy of it by mail to the plaintiff's attorney; that, owing to the distance between San Francisco and Crescent City, where the court was held, and where plaintiff's attorney resided, he believed that his demurrer would be received more than a week before the time to plead to the complaint would be out; that he had promised to defend the action until it should be tried and decided on its merits, and intended to do so; that no service of the complaint was made, or notice of the filing thereof given, except by the copy sent to Hart at his office in San Francisco; and that defendants had a good and substantial defense to the action on the merits.

In opposition to the motion, the plaintiff read affidavits showing that on the day the amended complaint was filed (December 17th) his attorney deposited in the post-office at Crescent City an envelope containing a copy of the complaint addressed to defendants' attorney at his office in San Francisco, and paid the postage thereon; and that it was forwarded to its destination by the next outgoing mail, which must have been on the next day. The plaintiff also proved by affidavits, and by deeds recorded in the office of the county recorder of Del Norte county, that shortly after the original judgment was entered, and long before the default complained of was taken, the defendants, Big Flat Gravel Mining Company and O. M. Paris, had conveyed all their right, title, and interest in the premises sought to be charged with the liens to the Del Norte Gravel Mining Company, a corporation formed and existing under the laws of this state; and that since such conveyances were made the said defendants had no interest in the premises. On these proofs the motion was submitted and denied on March 14, 1889, the court holding that, as the Del Norte Gravel Mining Company had become the owner of the property, and had not joined in the motion, nor asked to have the action continued in the names of the defendants, the defendants had no further interest in the property or proceedings, and therefore could not make the motion; citing Moore v. Kellogg, 58 Cal. 385. The court then heard the proofs offered by the plaintiff, and on the 19th of the same month rendered judgment in his favor for the sum of $10,479.09, principal and interest, and the further sum of $1,000 for attorney's fees, besides costs. It also adjudged that these sums were a lien on the property described, and that the property should be sold by the sheriff, and the proceeds applied to the payment thereof. On April 4, 1889, the defendants presented to the court and filed a petition asking leave to renew their motion to set aside the said default and judgment entered against them, and stating therein, among other things, that the Del Norte Gravel Mining Company was ready and desired to join with them in the motion, and that the requisite papers had been prepared, and were ready to be served and filed. After hearing arguments in behalf of the respective parties, the court denied the petition on the day it was presented, and refused to allow defendants' motion to be renewed. On April 20, 1889, the Del Norte Gravel Mining Company duly served and filed a notice that it would move the court to set aside the default and judgment entered against the defendants, Big Flat Gravel Mining Company and O. M. Paris, and to have the action continued in the names of said defendants. And on May 20, 1889, this motion was heard and denied. At the hearing the same affidavits were read and the same proofs introduced by both parties as at the hearing of the first motion. It was also shown by affidavits that the officers of the Del Norte Gravel Mining Company had no notice, knowledge, or information that an amended complaint had been filed in the action, or that the default of the defendants had been entered, or that any judgment had been taken against them, until March 25, 1889; and also that the said company had a good and substantial defense to the action on the merits. Exceptions to each of the rulings of the court above mentioned were duly taken, and on April 10, 1889, the defendants, Big Flat Gravel Mining Company and O. M. Paris, appealed to this court from the judgment entered against them on March 19th; and on May 25, 1889, the same defendants and the Del Norte Gravel Mining Company appealed from the order made and entered on April 4th; and on July 17, 1889, the last-named company appealed from the order made and entered on May 20th. The three appeals are rested on separate bills of exceptions, but brought here in one transcript, covering more than 950 pages of printed matter, and they have been submitted together. Each of the motions was made under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that the court may, "upon such terms as may be just, relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect." It is true that applications for relief under this section are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and orders granting or refusing the relief asked will only be disturbed, on appeal, when it appears that that discretion has been abused. But, while this is so, still the provisions of the section, like all others of the Code, are to be "liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." Section 4, Code Civil. Proc.

The question, then, is, did the court abuse its discretion in making either of the orders complained of? Section 385 of the same Code provides that an action or proceeding does not abate by the transfer of any interest therein if the cause of action survive or continue, and that, in case of a transfer of interest otherwise than by death or disability, "the action or proceeding may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action or proceeding." Under this section, if property is conveyed during the pendency of litigation in regard to it, the grantee may thereafter continue to prosecute or defend the action in the name of his grantor, or may cause himself to be substituted in his place. If no substitution is asked for, the case will go on in the name of the original party, as if no transfer had been made; and to have it do so no application to or action by the court is necessary. That this case was so continued is shown by the fact that after the transfers, which were of record, and known to the plaintiff, and without any permission of the court, it was prosecuted in the supreme court in the names of the original defendants; and, after the judgment was reversed, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint against them, and then caused their default to be entered, and asked for and obtained a decree foreclosing the liens and directing a sale of the property. It was proper, therefore, that the defense and all proceedings necessary therefor be continued and taken in the names of the original defendants. One of these necessary proceedings was the motion to set aside the default; and, in our opinion, it might properly be made in the names of the defendants, notwithstanding their grantee did not nominally join in the motion, and had not asked to have the action continued in their names. The case of Moore v. Kellogg, 58 Cal. 385, upon the authority of which the first motion was denied, is not necessarily in conflict with this conclusion. What was said in that case on the subject must have been upon the theory that, as the defendants conveyed all their interest in the property in controversy after the action was commenced, and before the defaults were entered, they no longer had any interest in it, and therefore could not, on their own behalf, move to set aside the defaults and judgment. Here, in the absence of anything appearing to the contrary, it must be presumed that the motion was made for and on behalf of the real party in interest, and not for the nominal parties.

But, conceding that the ruling upon the first motion was proper, and should be upheld, for the reasons assigned, then the Del Norte Gravel Mining Company, as grantee of the defendants, had a clear right, in its own name, to move to have the default and judgment set aside, and, on denial of its motion, to appeal from the order, and thus bring the matter to this court for review. Plummer v. Brown, 64 Cal. 429, 1 Pac. Rep. 703; People v. Mullan, 65 Cal. 396, 4 Pac. Rep. 348. The objection that there was no judgment as to this company, and therefore the order was not subsequent to judgment, and not appealable, is not tenable. There was a judgment which affected its rights, and to which the motion related, and the case last cited is direct authority for an appeal in such case.

The question, then, is, ought the default to have been set aside upon the showing made? This question, it seems to us, must be answered in the affirmative. The case involved a large sum of money, and its merits were not considered or passed upon on the first appeal. No service of the amended complaint was made, and no notice of the filing thereof given, except by the copy sent to Hart. This copy was mailed on the 17th of December, but it did not reach its destination until the 16th or 17th of January. This may at first seem a little strange, but, in view of the uncontradicted affidavits, must be accepted as true, and accounted for upon the ground that letters are sometimes miscarried or mislaid. When the package was received, there was nothing but a figure "3" to indicate when it was mailed, and Hart had a right, therefore, to assume that it came in the ordinary time, which was two or three days. The distance between Crescent City and San Francisco is said to be about 400 miles, and, if so, he had 26 days from the time the copy was mailed to file a demurrer or answer. He was not, therefore, guilty of any negligence because he did not send the demurrer until the 26th of the month. The Del Norte Gravel Mining Company was in possession of and operating the property, but its officers had no notice of any of the steps taken by the plaintiff until after the default was taken, and the judgment entered. There was, consequently, no negligence on its part. The affidavits of merits read at the hearing of both motions were, in our opinion, sufficient. Under the circumstances shown, therefore, the failure to demur or answer to the amended complaint in time seems clearly to have been caused by such mistake or excusable neglect as entitled the moving party to the relief demanded.

We advise, therefore, that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to set aside the default, and permit a demurrer or answer to be filed within a reasonable time after notice.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to set aside the default, and permit a demurrer or answer to be filed within a reasonable time after notice.

CHAUVET v. HILL. (No. 13,681.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 17, 1892.)

WATER-COURSES—ACTION FOR DIVERTING—PLEADING.

1. Where a stream, from time immemorial, had flowed through plaintiff's land in a perceptible current, and in a well-defined channel, his right to have such flow continued was not affected by the fact that the source of the stream was a spring on defendant's land.

2. Where the cross-complaint in an action to restrain the diversion of a water-course charged plaintiff with diverting the water, plaintiff's answer, averring a prescriptive right, "open, notorious, and continuous, and adverse to defendant," was sufficient without the word "uninterrupted."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; JOHN G. PRESSLEY, Judge.

Action by Chauvet against Hill to restrain defendant from diverting the waters of a stream. Judgment for plaintiff. New trial denied. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George A. Johnson, Barclay Henley, James W. Oats, and Atty. Gen. Hart, for appellant. E. S. Lippitt, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. This action was brought to restrain defendant from diverting the water of an alleged water-course. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff,—at least a judgment for costs,—and defendant appeals. If the appeal had been taken by plaintiff, some difficult questions might have been presented. Neither party seems to have had correct notions about riparian rights; but we see nothing in the record of which defendant can justly complain. There are only two or three matters that need be noticed.

1. We think that the complaint is sufficient. It states facts showing that plaintiff is a lower and defendant an upper riparian proprietor upon a stream that is sufficiently described; and the averments of plaintiff's use of the water for a mill, winery, domestic purposes, etc., are mere surplusage.

2. The main source of the water of the stream was a certain large spring on defendant's land; and many authorities are cited in the briefs about "subterranean streams," "percolation," "water filtration in the soil," the "sources of springs," etc. But the court found, upon ample evidence, that from the spring in question "a stream of water, from time immemorial, has flowed in a perceptible current, carrying a large body of water; and at a short distance below the spring the stream flows in a deep, well-defined channel into Asbury canyon." And, this being so, it is useless to consider the sources of the spring itself. The right of the owner of land to have a well-defined water-course continue to flow through it does not depend upon the length of the stream above him. His right is the same whether the stream commences on his neighbor's land or 50 miles away.

Defendant filed a cross-complaint, in which he averred, in substance, that he owned land extending from said Asbury canyon or arroyo to another stream, called "Sonoma Creek," into which said Asbury arroyo empties; that at a point on said arroyo below the point at which defendant diverted water as charged by plaintiff, the plaintiff himself had diverted the water of said arroyo, and carried it to a place called "Glen Allen;" and that by said diversion sufficient water was not left in said arroyo, or in Sonoma creek, of which the arroyo is the principal tributary, to afford a supply for defendant's live-stock, or for domestic purposes, etc. (Here, as elsewhere in the case, the notion of riparian rights seems to be chiefly that they consist of the privilege of drinking and watering stock.) And defendant prays that plaintiff be enjoined and restrained from diverting the water at said lower point as last above stated. It is doubtful if defendant could obtain the relief asked for by means of a cross-complaint in this action; but it is unnecessary to decide that point, because the plaintiff, in his answer to the cross-complaint, sets up a right by prescription to the diversion complained of, and the court, upon sufficient evidence, found that plaintiff had such prescriptive right. We think that the averment in the answer of a prescriptive right is not defective, as contended by appellant, although the word "uninterrupted" is not used. The words, "open, notorious, and continuous, and adverse to defendant," are sufficient. We think, also, that the findings of the court are sufficient, although they might have been fuller.

As before stated, it is difficult to see why defendant complains of the judgment. It appears that he first diverted the water, and has ever since continued to divert it, directly from the spring, by means of a box and a three-inch pipe, and uses it for domestic purposes, and for irrigating 20 or 30 acres of land. Afterwards, and within three years before the commencement of this action, at a point below the spring, he diverted all the water of the stream, and carried it to another part of his land, and used it in connection with his business of manufacturing wine and packing fruit for market; and, after this second diversion, as the court finds, neither plaintiff nor his tenants "had any water for domestic purposes, nor did any flow down Asbury canyon for the use of the stock of plaintiff or defendant." Now, in the judgment it is decreed that defendant may continue to take all the water which he has heretofore taken directly from the spring by means of said box and pipe, and use it for any purpose. It is also decreed that he may take all the water of the stream, and use it on any part of his land, when it is all necessary "for domestic purposes and watering his stock." And it further decreed that defendant may use for manufacturing purposes, on any part of his land, as much water as "is consumed" for such purposes, provided that he must not use it when "such diversion and use leaves an insufficient flow for plaintiff's domestic use and watering of stock;" and provided further, that "he is not entitled to use it when it cannot be returned to the stream above the land of plaintiff," and that, when there is any surplus, he must "return the surplus to the stream above plaintiff's land." We do not see what other rights in the premises defendant could well ask for; and, if plaintiff is content with the scant remnant of the stream left him by the judgment, defendant should certainly be satisfied. All that plaintiff seems to have gained by the decree is the restraining of defendant from diverting the water to a place from which it cannot possibly flow back into the canyon; and no one, by virtue of riparian ownership, can rightfully divert water beyond the water-shed of the stream from which he takes it. By the findings defendant had no right other than that of a riparian owner to divert the water, except that which he takes directly from the spring as aforesaid, and that is given him by the decree. Judgment and order denying a new trial affirmed.

HUGHES et al. v. EWING et al. (No. 14,441.)
(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 18, 1892.)

SCHOOL-DISTRICTS—ALTERATION.

The board of county supervisors changed the boundaries of F. city school-district by transferring certain lands therein to other districts. Prior thereto F. district had voted to raise $6,000 to build a school-house, which fact was not certified by the district trustees to the county supervisors until after the change in boundaries had been made. The supervisors subsequently levied a tax sufficient to raise the sum voted for the school-house on all the lands that were in F. district when the vote was taken. Held, that only the lands remaining within F. district after the boundaries were changed could be subjected to such tax, the word "district," as used in the Code, being synonymous with "corporation," and by the change of boundaries such corporation or district did not lose its identity, or cease to be the same legal entity, under Pol. Code, §§ 1575, 1837, providing a corporate name for the district, and requiring the board of county supervisors to raise the amount voted by levying a tax upon all taxable property within the "district voting such tax."

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county, M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by Hughes and others against Ewing and others. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Church & Cory, for appellants. W. D. Tupper and H. H. Welsh, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The board of supervisors of Fresno county, on September 6, 1890, changed the boundaries of Fresno City school-district by excluding therefrom certain lands described in the complaint herein, and transferring the same to other districts. Prior to that date the electors of the district had voted to raise the sum of $6,000 for the purpose of building a school-house, but the trustees of the district did not certify the fact to the supervisors until the 23d of September, 1890. Thereafter, on the first Monday of October, the supervisors, at the time of levying the county taxes, levied a tax, sufficient to raise the sum thus voted, upon all the property that was within the district at the time the vote was had, including the lands described in the complaint. The present action is brought by the plaintiffs, as owners of said lands, to declare the tax null and void as to those lands, and to restrain the defendant Ewing, the tax-collector of the county, from collecting the same, and from selling any of the lands described in the complaint for said tax. A school-district, when organized as provided by the Political Code, is a public corporation of a quasi municipal character, possessing such authority as has been conferred by the legislature, to be exercised in the mode and within the limits prescribed by the statute. The power to change the boundaries of the district, as well as to define them in the first instance, is of legislative origin, and, whether exercised immediately by the legislature or mediately by a board of supervisors,—the local legislature,—is, when ever exercised, a legislative act. It is well settled that the legislature has the power to make such changes, and that, in the exercise of this power, it may make such provision respecting the property and obligations of the corporation as it may deem equitable or proper, and that its action in this respect is conclusive. It is also well settled that when the boundaries of such corporation are changed, either by forming a new corporation out of the territory of the original one, or by transferring a portion of the territory to another corporation, in the absence of any provision on the subject the old corporation will be entitled to all the property and be solely liable for all the obligations, and that the territory taken therefrom will not be entitled to any of the corporate property, or liable for any of the obligations of the old corporation. Town of Depere v. Town of Bellevue, 31 Wis. 120; Laramie Co. v. Albany Co., 92 U. S. 307; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 188. Under these principles and authorities, in order to render the territory which was transferred from Fresno City school-district to another district liable for any of the obligations incurred by that district, or to a contribution for any of its obligations, it is necessary to show that such liability has been declared by the legislature. While the constitution has taken from the legislature the power to impose taxes upon counties or other public corporations, it has not given to such corporations any power whatever to impose taxes, but has authorized the legislature to vest such power in them by general laws. Const. art. 11, § 12. The power of a county or other public corporation to impose any tax is only that which is granted by the legislature, and its exercise must be within the limits and in the manner so conferred. Section 1617, Pol. Code, provides that the trustees of a school-district may build a school-house "when directed by a vote of their district;" and by section 1830 the trustees are authorized to call an election, and submit to the electors of a district the question whether a tax shall be raised for that purpose, specifying in the notice of the election the amount of money proposed to be raised, and the purpose for which it is intended to be used. Section 1832. If the electors of the district vote therefor, the trustees are to certify this fact to the board of supervisors, and the supervisors, when levying the county taxes, must levy a tax, sufficient to raise the amount voted, "upon all the taxable property in the district voting such tax." Section 1837.

The vote of Fresno City school district was in the nature of an authority to the trustees from that corporation to expend the sum of $6,000 in the erection of a school-house. Under the provisions of the constitution, before this authority could be exercised, it was necessary that the money should be provided for by taxation. The legislature has designated the supervisors of the county as the body to levy a tax for school purposes, but has limited their authority to the amount voted by the district, and declared that it is to be levied upon the property "within the district voting the same." The "district" upon whose property the tax is to be levied is the "district" which has been constituted a public corporation, and which is designated by the name given it under the provisions of section 1575, Pol. Code. The word "district" as used in section 1837, is not the equivalent of "territory within the district," but is a synonym for the "corporation" voting the tax, and the tax to be levied by the supervisors is limited to the property within this corporation. The "Fresno City school-district," in the present case, was the "district" which voted the tax, and it is upon the property within the "Fresno City school-district" that the tax is to be levied. By the change in its boundaries this public corporation or district did not lose its identity or name, or cease to be the same legal entity that it was before. Bates v. Gregory, 89 Cal. 387, 26 Pac. Rep. 891. For all purposes of corporate power or liability it remained unchanged, and the property upon which the supervisors should have levied the tax is only such property as, at the time when the tax was levied, was within the boundaries of this corporation.

Irrespective of the construction thus given to the section, it would be difficult upon principle to uphold the validity of a tax upon property which is without the district to be benefited by the expenditure of the money so to be raised. The theory upon which the power of taxation is authorized is the benefit to the tax-payer. It would be manifestly unjust to compel a contribution by tax to an object or for the benefit of a class in which the tax-payer is directly excluded from participating. The case of Richards v. Daggett, 4 Mass. 534, is almost identical in its facts with the present case, and, although it is unnecessary to adopt all the views of the court in that case, yet its opinion is in accordance with the foregoing views. It is not shown in this case what proportion of the district was covered by the lands which, under the change of boundaries, were excluded therefrom; but that is immaterial, as the principle is the same whether such lands were a small portion or a majority of the district. If the tax had been levied before the change in the boundaries, so as to become a charge upon the property, or an obligation from the tax-payer, it could have been collected after such change, as was held in Moss v. Shear, 25 Cal. 38. In that case it would have become ripened into an obligation which would constitute a part of the assets or property of the corporation, and, as we have seen, would, in the absence of any legislative provision on the subject, belong to the old corporation, the same as any other public property in its custody. So long, however, as it was only an inchoate right, which had not become an enforceable obligation, the transfer of the property from the limits of the district took away the power to create such obligation. Until the assessment is made, no individual debt is incurred. Waldron v. Lee, 5 Pick. 332; Jackman v. School-Dist., 5 Gray, 413. The judgment is reversed.

MORRILL et al. v. NIGHTINGALE et al. (No. 14,572.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 20, 1892.)

DURESS—FEAR OF MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—COMPOUNDING FELONY.

1. Civil Code, § 1569, defines "duress" as "unlawful confinement of the person;" under section 1570, "menace" consists of threats of such duress, or of injury to the character or person; and Pen. Code, § 513, defines "extortion" to be "obtaining of property from another, with his consent, induced by wrongful use of force or fear, or under color of official right." Held, that a note payable to one who, for the sole purpose of intimidating the maker, illegally and fraudulently procured a warrant for his arrest on a charge of embezzlement, and which was executed in fear of, and to procure immunity from, arrest and imprisonment, is void.

2. Such note is void under Civil Code, § 1668, also, because it was given to relieve the maker from responsibility for crime; and such invalidity, though not pleaded by the maker, will defeat a recovery. Wight v. Rindskopf, 43 Wis. 348, approved.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. WADE, Judge.

Suit in equity by Morrill and others against Nightingale and others to foreclose a contract, and recover the amount of several notes. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Waldo M. York, for appellants. Edward S. Bragg, George J. Denis, and Joseph H. Call, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action in equity to foreclose a contract and recover judgment upon four promissory notes, amounting in the aggregate to $43,000. The contract and notes were made by defendant Nightingale to the plaintiffs on account of an alleged purchase of the capital stock of the Milwaukee Furniture Company. The prayer of the complaint asks that judgment be had for the amount of the notes, and that certain real estate and the said capital stock be applied to the satisfaction of such judgment, said property having been transferred under the contract to secure the payment of the aforesaid notes. Among other matters, the answer sets out that the contract and notes were not signed by the defendant Nightingale voluntarily, but under coercion and intimidation, by threatening defendant with arrest and imprisonment upon a warrant of arrest, which the plaintiffs at the time induced Nightingale to believe had been issued. Judgment went for defendants, and this appeal is prosecuted from the judgment and order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

The merits of this appeal are fully tested by a determination as to whether or not the findings support the judgment; for, after a careful consideration of the evidence, we are satisfied that the following findings of fact made by the court are fully supported thereby: (1) "That on the 26th day of May, 1890, the plaintiffs fraudulently and illegally procured to be issued by a justice of the peace of Los Angeles city township a warrant for the arrest of the defendant Nightingale under the name of John Doe, for the purpose of coercing the defendant Nightingale to pay certain sums of money and sign contracts for the payment of money to plaintiffs, upon the claim by plaintiffs that defendant Nightingale had embezzled large sums of money from the Milwaukee Furniture Company, of which defendant Nightingale had been acting as treasurer." (2) "That such warrant was not procured for any lawful purpose, or for the purpose of prosecuting or convicting the defendant Nightingale for any crime, but for the purpose of frightening and intimidating defendant Nightingale." (4) "That on the 9th day of July, 1890, defendant Nightingale executed and delivered to the plaintiffs the contract and four promissory notes of that date, which are set forth in the complaint and supplemental complaint herein; but such contract and notes were not executed by the free or voluntary act of defendant Nightingale, but his signature and his execution thereof was induced solely by the well-grounded belief on the part of defendant Nightingale that, unless he signed them, and each of them, he would be arrested and imprisoned upon said warrant for such embezzlement, which the plaintiffs then and previously charged him with being guilty of; and that by signing the same the embezzlement with which he was so charged would be compromised and settled." (5) "That at the time of executing said contract and notes on July 9, 1890, the plaintiffs induced the defendant Nightingale to believe, and he did believe, that he would be arrested and imprisoned on said warrant if he refused to sign said contract and notes."

Measured by the facts set out in the findings, we think the defendant Nightingale was acting under a menace at the time of the signing of the contract and notes, which destroyed his free consent to the execution thereof, and which thereby afforded him ample grounds for the rescission of the same. The consent of a party to a contract must be free, and it is not free when obtained through duress or menace. Section 1569, Civil Code, declares duress to consist in the "unlawful confinement of the person of the party or of the husband or wife of such party," etc.; or "the confinement of such person, lawful in form, but fraudulently obtained." Section 1570 provides that menace consists in a threat of the duress above specified, or of a threat of injury to the character of any such person. In this case there was no arrest and confinement, hence no duress; but the history of the transaction, as disclosed by the findings, clearly indicates threats of imprisonment upon a charge of embezzlement, which, in effect, necessarily were threats of injury to the character of defendant Nightingale, and consequently a menace. The court finds that the contract and notes were executed under the influence of such menace, and, such being the fact, the defendant's free consent to the execution thereof was never gained, and the judgment should stand. Section 518 of the Penal Code provides: "Extortion is the obtaining of property from another, with his consent, induced by a wrongful use of force or fear, or under color of official right." The findings of the court disclose a state of facts lacking but few elements, if any, to fill the measure demanded by the foregoing provision of the Criminal Code of this state. The findings show that the warrant of arrest was secured in bad faith, and for purposes not countenanced in law. It was secured solely to be used as a menace for the collection of an indebtedness, and it was ever accompanied with the threat that, if such indebtedness was not satisfied, the warrant would be executed, and imprisonment follow. Such a proceeding is an abuse of criminal process, and impedes the due course of public justice.

In the case of Bane v. Detrick, 52 Ill. 27, the court said: "The mortgage was void for another reason: It was executed through a perversion and abuse of criminal process. It is proved that Bane got out this process, and used it to effect a settlement of a claim which there is much evidence to show was unfounded. It is against public policy that process should be thus used, and no court will allow the results flowing from it to be enjoyed by him who so uses it. It is a gross abuse of legal process, and no person should have the aid of a court of justice to profit by it." Under that kind of menace which consists in a threat of injury to the character of a person, it is entirely immaterial whether such person is guilty or innocent of the crime to be charged. It certainly would be no defense to the accusation of extortion that the charges or publications threatened to be made by the defendant, and by which he obtained valuable property, were true. The truth or falsity of these matters form no element in establishing the guilt or innocence of a defendant charged with extortion. In Hackett v. King, 6 Allen, 58, it was decided that, though a person was arrested under a legal warrant, and by a proper officer, yet, if one of the objects of the arrest was to extort money, or enforce the settlement of a civil claim, such arrest is a false imprisonment, by all who have directly or indirectly procured the same or participated therein for any such purposes; and a release and conveyance of property, obtained by means of such arrest, is void. In Taylor v. Jaques, 106 Mass. 294, the court, in speaking of a certain instruction given by the lower court, said: "We do not concur with that view of the law. If he had embezzled their funds, they had a right to have him prosecuted. If he owed them a debt, they had a right to accept security for it. But they would have no right to make use of a criminal process for the collection of a debt. An arrest, even upon a legal warrant, and upon a criminal charge, to compel the payment of a mere debt, would be a misuse of legal process; and the threat of such an arrest may constitute unlawful duress." In Richardson v. Duncan, 3 N. H. 511, the court said: "But it is now well settled that when there is an arrest for improper purposes, without a just cause, or where there is an arrest for a just cause, but without lawful authority, or where there is an arrest for a just cause and under lawful authority, for unlawful purposes, it may be construed a duress." It will thus be seen that an imprisonment for an unlawful purpose will constitute duress, and, such being the fact, a threat of arrest and imprisonment, made for unlawful purposes, will constitute menace. There is some authority found in the decisions of the courts of Maine opposed to these views, but we think they are not the better rule.

The findings of the court are also sufficient to defeat plaintiffs' right of recovery upon the ground that the contract entered into was forbidden by section 1668 of the Civil Code, one of its objects being, indirectly at least, to relieve the defendant Nightingale from responsibility for a violation of the law. As was said in Eadie v. Slimmon, 26 N. Y. 15: "Either the accusation which the defendant brought against Eadie was entirely unfounded, or he was seeking to compromise a criminal offense. If he knew that a crime had been committed by Eadie, he had no right to compromise it in this way, and the securities obtained upon such compromise were received as a consideration for compromising a felony, and for that reason were invalid; else the whole of his assertions and threats on the subject were a gross imposture." As the answer of defendants does not rely upon such defense, we will not pursue the subject further, although Chief Justice RYAN undoubtedly declared the true rule in Wight v. Rindskopf, 43 Wis. 348, wherein he said: "If the objection be not made by the party charged, it is the duty of the court to make it on its own behalf. Courts owe it to public justice and to their own integrity to refuse to become parties to contracts essentially violating morality or public policy, by entertaining actions upon them. It is judicial duty always to turn a suitor upon such a contract out of court, whenever and however the character of the contract is made to appear." The demurrer to the answer was properly overruled, and we see no error in the rulings of the court upon the admissibility of testimony. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

POWERS et al. v. CHABOT et al. (No. 13,858.)

JOHNSON et al. v. POWERS et al. (No. 13,910.)

(Supreme Court of California. Feb. 5, 1892.)

STAY-BOND—VALIDITY.

The statutory undertaking given on appeal will operate as a stay of execution; and, where another undertaking is given for the purpose of staying the execution, it is without consideration, and cannot be enforced, either as a statutory or common-law obligation, against the sureties thereon, though the judgment was for the foreclosure of a chattel mortgage on perishable property, and the obligee, relying on such undertaking, refrained from disposing of such property pending the appeal, and was thereby damaged, as the statutory undertaking did not contemplate a stay of sale of the property.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeals from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

Action by James A. Johnson and another to restrain O. B. Powers from transferring a certain note. Defendant had judgment on a cross-complaint, which was affirmed on appeal, and defendant moved for judgment on the undertaking filed in stay of execution pending the appeal. Motion was denied, and defendant appeals. Pending the latter motion, O. B. Powers and others, as his assignees, brought action on the same undertaking against the sureties thereon, E. H. Pardee, and the representatives of Antoine Chabot, deceased. Defendants had judgments on demurrer, and plaintiffs appeal. Both appeals were heard together, and the judgments appealed from affirmed.

W. R. Daingerfield and Edward Lynch, for appellants. Metcalf, Metcalf & Yule and Moore & Reed, for respondents.

TEMPLE, C. These two appeals have been considered together. The last named is a proceeding in a case brought to restrain defendant Powers from transferring a certain promissory note. Powers answered, and by a cross-complaint sought to foreclose a chattel mortgage. A decree of foreclosure was entered, and plaintiffs appealed, giving two bonds, one for $300, and a stay-bond in double the amount of the judgment, with Pardee and Chabot as sureties. The judgment having been affirmed, upon return of the remittitur, a sale was had of the mortgaged property, from which only a part of the debt was realized. Motion was then made for judgment against the sureties on the stay-bond for the deficiency. Judge CRANE refused to entertain the motion, and application was made by Powers to this court for a mandate, which was refused on the ground that no stay-bond was required in such cases. It was therefore held that the stay-bond was without consideration, and void. Powers v. Crane, 67 Cal. 65, 7 Pac. Rep. 135. Chabot having died, a claim was presented against his estate for the deficiency, and was rejected March 30, 1888. June 4, 1888, Powers commenced the proceeding in the original suit to obtain a judgment against the sureties on the stay-bond for the deficiency. This was denied October 9, 1889, and from the order denying this motion one of these appeals is taken. This proceeding is authorized only on statutory undertakings; and, inasmuch as the bond in question here had no validity as a statutory bond, this motion was properly denied, and the order should be affirmed.

Appellant claims that he might have had the mortgaged property sold as perishable, notwithstanding the appeal, and that he forbore to do this because of the stay-bond on appeal, which he supposed afforded him ample security for his debt. He claims that this fact constitutes a consideration for the undertaking, and as this fact was not before the court in Powers v. Crane, 67 Cal. 65, 7 Pac. Rep. 135, that case is not authority for the conclusion that the bond is absolutely void. But if appellants were right in this contention, it would simply go to the effect that the undertaking is valid as a common-law obligation. The case is still conclusive authority for the proposition that the bond was void as a statutory bond; that it was not a stay-bond on appeal, and therefore judgment without suit could not be entered against the sureties in the original action. While the last-mentioned motion was pending, to-wit, June 30, 1888, an action was commenced by Powers and Bromley and Lynch, the last two being assignees of Powers, against Pardee and the representatives of Chabot, upon the undertaking. The complaint was demurred to and several times amended. Judgment upon demurrer was entered in favor of Pardee, March 25, 1889, and in favor of the representatives of Chabot, June 14, 1889. From these judgments appeals are taken.

One of the questions presented on the demurrer evidently was whether the representatives of the deceased, Chabot, could be joined with the living surety. In the last amended complaint, however, this misjoinder, if it were one, was avoided, as it was against the representatives of Chabot only. The demurrer must have been sustained on the ground that the undertaking sued upon was void, notwithstanding the alleged consideration that Powers was induced thereby to forbear having a sale of the property as perishable, and in consequence lost some portion of the money due him. Whether this ruling was correct is the question involved in the appeal from that judgment, and, if sustained, will dispose of both appeals. We have the decision that on such appeal the stay-bond serves no purpose under the statute. It was given, however, solely under the mistaken idea that it was necessary to secure to the appellants in that case a stay during the appeal. It was not given to prevent a sale of perishable property, nor would a stay-bond, if one had been required, have had that effect. This is stated by appellants in their briefs. They ask us to "realize vividly that nothing on earth can stay a sale pending an appeal when the judgment requires perishable property to be sold." That is, nothing except the acquiescence of the respondent. Realizing this, we do not see how the fact that Powers forbore to procure a sale can constitute a consideration. The bond was not given to accomplish anything save what might have been accomplished by a stay-bond. No such bond could in any case have had such effect. How could the sureties understand that they might be held liable for damages arising from the fact that Powers refrained from exercising a right that no stay-bond whatever would ever have deprived him of? We do not think, however, that it is necessary to pursue this matter. The undertaking was not given in pursuance of any agreement between the parties, but simply to secure a statutory privilege. It did not have that effect, and was therefore wholly without consideration and void, and could not be valid as a common-law undertaking. The cases cited by appellant as upholding his position illustrate this. Hathaway v. Davis, 33 Cal. 161, was upon a bond strictly in accordance with the statute in form, but it was claimed that the appeal, to secure which it was given, was taken too late, and therefore this court had no jurisdiction to affirm the judgment. The undertaking, then, it was claimed, was void. But the court said the question was not open. The undertaking had secured the privilege of an appeal, which was the consideration mentioned in the undertaking. This court had assumed jurisdiction in consequence of it, and the appellant and his sureties could not now question such jurisdiction. That differs from this in the fact that the privilege sought was in fact secured by the undertaking. Similar to that is the case of Gardner v. Donnelly, 86 Cal. 367, 24 Pac. Rep. 1072, which was an undertaking for the release of property attached. It was contended that the undertaking contained provisions not at all like those required by certain sections of the Code. This court held the undertaking good under another section, but said the issue was immaterial. The undertaking was given to secure a release of the property, and did secure such release; it was therefore good as a common-law obligation. The case here is widely different. The parties on whose behalf the undertaking was given gained nothing by it, and, conceding that Powers lost because he mistook the law and relied upon it, such loss was incidental, and was only occasioned and not caused by the undertaking, as its direct legal effect, nor was it the purpose of the undertaking to prevent such sale. We think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FITZGERALD, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgments and orders in the above-entitled causes are affirmed.
